THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK,
&c. &c.

MY LORD,

Your own dignified character, no less than the exalted station which you fill in the ESTABLISHED CHURCH of this kingdom, was a sufficient inducement for my wishing to introduce the following work to the public under the auspices of your respectable name. Your Grace's ready acquiescence in acceding to that wish, is an instance of liberality for which my thanks are due.

I trust, my Lord, it will be readily believed that my sole object in the compilation of this Dictionary has been the cause of truth and of piety. A work like the present, accessible to persons of all ranks, seems to be particularly requisite at a time when the doctrines and the principles of our holy religion have been misunderstood, and too often misrepresented, both as to their nature and their effects. If I have sometimes seen occasion to commend that National Establishment of which I have the honour to be a member, I hope that the candid of every sect will not ascribe any commendation of that kind to venal motives.

Your Grace was pleased to think favourably of a former work of mine. If the present should obtain a similar reception, and my labour should not appear to be fruitlessly employed, I shall feel a real satisfaction.

I am, my Lord,

With sentiments of the greatest respect,

Your Grace's

Most faithful and obedient Servant,

JOHN ROBINSON.

PREFACE

TO THE FIRST EDITION.

It is a truth which has been acknowledged by Christians of all ages and countries, that a just understanding of the Bible, as the foundation of Christianity, is a most desirable acquisition. The Sacred Volume is a treasure equally valuable to the learned and the unlearned, to the wise and the simple, to the rich and the poor, to men of all ranks and stations. The duties it enjoins, and the doctrines it delivers, are of universal concern, and such as deserve the attention and regard of all mankind.

Of this Volume it has been justly observed, that it ennobles the noble, and enriches the great; that it supports the poor, and guides the ignorant; and that, by exhibiting the bright prospects of immortal happiness, it consoles the mind of man under the inevitable evils which, in this state of probation, he is called to endure. It displays to view the ways of God to man; it is addressed to every man's own bosom; it appeals to every man's sense and conscience; it calls on every individual, and enforces that call by the most awful sanctions; it proposes no subject of trifling consideration, but offers life or death, blessings or curses, heaven or hell.

Indeed, the importance of the Bible as a revelation from Heaven, on subjects which concern our everlasting felicity; and the necessity of understanding the Sacred Volume, in order to a participation of the blessings it reveals; are points so generally acknowledged by all who admit the divine authority of its pages, that it may be thought needless to expatiate upon them. We may, however, be allowed to express our surprise and regret, that, whilst the distribution of "the word of life" has become a matter of general interest, so little attention should be paid to an object of nearly equal importance,—the facilitating of an acquaintance with the oracles of God. To this the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge forms an honourable and a solitary exception; and it were greatly to be desired, that the members of the Established Church, laity as well as clergy, would consider the well-founded claims of that Society on their liberality and pecuniary assistance.

Though the doctrines and precepts of the Bible are remarkable for their clearness and plainness, yet we need not be surprised if some of its historic relations, and accounts of local matters, appear to us dark and confused. Many of them date very early in the history of the world, and some of them from the beginning of time. Some of them refer to customs and manners peculiar only to the eastern part of the world, and therefore little understood by us who live at so remote a distance. Some refer to persons whose actions are only incidentally mentioned, and of whom the inquisitive reader will desire further information than is afforded in the Sacred Volume. Others relate to cities and kingdoms once great and flourishing, now ruined and deserted; and of these we wish for more geographical and historical information, than perhaps is contained in the Bible. The prophetic parts of Scripture contain many predictions which relate to particular persons and states, and the completion of which, though not always noticed in the Bible, is recorded in other histories; and a knowledge of the time and manner of their fulfilment induces us to confide in others of the same kind, and justifies our belief in the Sacred Oracles.

From these and other considerations, Dom Augustin Calmet, a Benedictine monk, and Abbot of Senones, was led to compose his Dictionary of the Holy Bible, in two volumes folio, to which he afterwards added two more volumes, first published under the title of a Supplement, but afterwards incorporated with the original work. This excellent publication, which has been translated into Latin, Dutch, English, and several other languages, has been the principal source whence I have derived most of what has been composed in the following work, on all subjects immediately connected with the Bible.

But as Calmet's Dictionary was intended for the service of those who used the Vulgate Latin Version, the author has introduced perpetual references to that version, which I have diminished; and, instead of passages of Scripture being given in Latin, they are, for the most part, given in the words of our English translation. Calmet has many historical articles, collected from Josephus and other writers, which, as they do not occur either in the Bible or Apocrypha, have been mostly rejected. On the contrary, I have added and explained a great number of articles, which are not to be met with in Calmet, and many of which are of considerable importance. Besides, as Calmet was a member of the Church of Rome, he has mingled in his remarks sentiments which Protestants in general justly reject, and which, therefore, I have uniformly endeavoured to omit.

As it has been my anxious wish, not willingly to neglect, or impair truth, I have attempted to offer what I conceive to be the genuine representations, doctrines, or inferences of the Bible; and for that purpose I have consulted a great number of theological writers, whose names, and the works from which I have quoted, are generally noticed at the end of each article. On the geography and natural history of Scripture I have consulted the latest and best authorities; and the accounts of recent travellers in the East have furnished information on these subjects, of which I have gladly availed myself.

With respect to that part of the work which treats of the different sects into which the Christian world is divided, I trust that I have been guided by candour. It was my intention to give a fair and candid statement of existing sentiments, and of differences of opinion, on the important subject of religion. If, therefore, I have misrepresented the tenets and principles of any sect or party whatever, I have failed in my object. Nothing, indeed, would give me more pain than the consciousness of having misrepresented them. It has been justly observed, that "since, unhappily, there are still so many subjects of debate among those who 'name the name of Christ,' it is, doubtless, every one's duty, after divesting himself, as much as possible, of prejudice, to investigate those subjects with accuracy, and to adhere to that side of each disputed question, which, after much investigation, appears to him to be the truth. But he transgresses the favourite precept of his Divine Master, when he casts injurious reflections, or denounces anathemas, on those who, with equal sincerity, view the matter in a different light ; and, by his want of charity, does more harm to the religion of the Prince of Peace, than he could possibly do good, were he able to convert all mankind to his own orthodox opinions."

The present new Edition has undergone all such revisions as the state of Biblical literature rendered necessary ; and the author hopes, that, like the first Edition, it will be favourably received in all pious families, and found useful in all seminaries of public and private education ; especially to students of divinity in our Universities.

| 2091 | The kings of Sodom and Gomorrah re- volt from Chedorlaomer. | 1909 | 2473 | Moses goes to visit his brethren; kills an Egyptian; being informed that Pharaoh knows of it, he retires into Midian; mar- ries Zipporah, the daughter of Jethro: has two sons by her; Gershon and Eliezer. | 1527 |
| 2092 | Chedorlaomer, and his allies, war against the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, &c. Sodom is pillaged; Lot is taken captive; Abram pursues them, disperses them, re- takes the booty; and rescues Lot. Mel- chizedech blesses him. The Lord makes a covenant with Ab- ram, and promises him a numerous pos- terity. (Gen. xv.) | 1908 | 2513 | The Lord appears to Moses in a burning bush, while feeding his father-in-law's flocks; sends him to Egypt, to deliver Israel. Moses returns into Egypt. His brother Aaron comes to meet him to Mount Horeb. The two brothers declare to Pharaoh the commands of the Lord: Pharaoh refuses to set Israel at liberty; but loads them with new burdens. Moses performs se- veral miracles in his presence. Ten plagues inflicted on Pharaoh and his people, to oblige him to dismiss the Israelites. The Israelites celebrated the last pass- over; and Pharaoh expelled them from Egypt. After the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea, the destruction of the Egyptians, and other remarkable in- cidents, the law is given on Mount Sinai. | 1487 |
| 2115 | Isaac born, the son of Abraham and Sa- rah. Sarah makes Abraham turn away Hagar and Ishmael. Hagar causes her son Ishmael to take an Egyptian woman to wife, by whom he has several children. | 1855 | 2553 | After their murmuring for want of water, the death of Aaron, in the 123d year of his age, and the erection of the Brazen Serpent, to cure them of the biting of fiery serpents; upon Sihon king of the Amorites refusing them a passage through his dominions, the Israelites make war against him, and take his country. Distribution of the countries of Sihon and Og, to the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and to the half tribe of Manasseh. Moses dies, being 120 years old; he was succeeded by Joshua, who, in six years' time, made the conquest of the promised land. | 1447 |
| 2145 | Sarah dies, aged 127 years. | 1855 | 2561 | Joshua dies, aged 110 years. | 1439 |
| 2184 | Abraham dies, aged 175 years. | 1816 | 2599 | Othniel delivers them: conquers Cu- shan-rishathaim: judges the people forty years. | 1401 |

AAR

A'ARON, אהרן, signifies mountain or mountainous, but others derive it from the root to teach or divine. In the former sense, it may refer to Aaron as the founder of God's holy worship, given upon Mount Sinai; and in the latter, as a teacher sent by God.

Aaron was of the tribe of Levi, the son of Amram and Jochebed, and the brother of Moses and Miriam. (Exod. vi. 20.) He was born in the year of the world 2430, about a year before the edict of Pharaoh, which enjoined the Hebrews to destroy all their male children, (ibid. i. 22); and hence it is evident that he was three years older than his brother Moses. (Ibid. vii. 7.) When God had revealed himself to Moses in the burning bush, and declared the resolution he had formed of delivering the Hebrews through his means from the oppressions of the Egyptians, Moses would have excused himself to the Deity, by pleading the difficulty of the undertaking and his natural impediment of speech. God, however, informed him, that his brother Aaron should be his prophet and interpreter, and, in the addresses to Pharaoh, deliver what was necessary to be said. (Ibid. iv. 15.) At the same time, the Lord inspired Aaron with a design of meeting Moses, who departed from the country of Midian, in order to return into Egypt. Aaron, therefore, advanced as far as Mount Horeb, where Moses acquainted him with the commission he had received from God. Aaron expressed great joy at this information, and promised to obey the divine will in all things. They then continued their journey together into Egypt, where they arrived in the year of the world 2513, and before Christ 1491. On their arrival they assembled the elders of Israel, and imparted to them the joyful news of their speedy deliverance. They also presented themselves before Pharaoh, declared to him the orders they had received, and, in conformity with the commission delivered to them by God, performed miracles in the presence of the king. However, the heart of Pharaoh being hardened, he commanded them to return to their tasks; and not content with oppressing the Hebrews as before, he ordered his officers not to supply them with straw, whilst he employed them in making bricks. The distressed Israelites, overwhelmed with despair, inveighed bitterly against Moses and Aaron, whom they accused as the authors of this addition to their misery. God, however, assured Moses and Aaron, that he would remove the oppression of the Egyptians, and overcome the obstinacy of Pharaoh, by such a multitude of plagues and prodigies, as would induce him to dismiss the Hebrews. This, in effect, he accomplished. See MOSES.

During the march of the children of Israel through the wilderness, Aaron and his sons were appointed by God to exercise for ever the office of priests in the tabernacle. (Ibid. xxix. 9.) In point of dignity, Aaron was considered as next to Moses. (ibid. xix. 24.) Previously, however, to this event, when the Amalekites attacked the Hebrews, Moses ascended to the top of a high hill, with Aaron and Hur in his company; and whilst Joshua was engaging the enemy in the plain, Moses held up his hands in prayer, and Aaron and Hur supported them. (Ibid. xvii. 10, &c.)

Moses having ascended Mount Sinai, to receive the law of God, after the Lord had ratified the covenant made with Israel, Aaron, his sons and seventy elders, followed him, though not to the top of the mountain. (Ibid. xxiv. 1, 2, and 9—11.) There, without receiving any hurt, they saw where the Lord was present with Moses. Whilst Moses was absent upon the mount, he appointed Aaron and Hur to be the rulers of the people; but as the absence of Moses continued forty days, and was longer than had been expected, the people became impatient, and addressed themselves to Aaron in a tumultuous manner. "Make us," said they, "gods which shall go before us; for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him." Aaron, in all probability, perplexed by the resolute importunities of the people, ordered them to bring their pendants and the ear-rings of their wives and children. These being melted down, were formed into a golden calf. When this idol was finished, the people placed it upon a pedestal, and danced around it, saying, "These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt."

Moses, being informed by God of the sin which the Israelites had committed, immediately descended from the mount, carrying in his arms the tables of the law, engraven by the Almighty himself. When he came near the camp, and observed what was passing there, he threw the tables on the ground; and broke them, and at the same time reproached the people with their transgression, and Aaron with his weakness. In the greatest confusion, Aaron attempted to excuse himself, by imputing the blame to the wickedness of the people, and by a pretence that he only cast the ear-rings into the fire, and that the golden calf had been formed of them by mere chance. (Ibid. xxxii. 1, et seq.) Aaron, however, afterwards acknowledged his fault, for which he humbled himself, and God was pleased to continue him in the priesthood.

After the tabernacle was built, Moses consecrated Aaron with the holy oil, and invested him with the sacred ornaments.

About the year of the world 2514, Aaron and his sister Miriam, observing the great power which Moses possessed over the people, began to envy him; but to afford some plausible pretext for their quarrel, they alleged that the cause of his offence, was his marrying Zipporah, an Ethiopian, or rather a Midianite, a Cushite (Numb. xii. 1, et seq.). For this conduct Miriam was immediately struck with a leprosy, and her punishment operating on the mind of Aaron, he acknowledged his fault, and asked the forgiveness of Moses, both for himself and his sister. See MIRIAM.

Some time after this, Korah, Dathan and Abiram, rebelled against Moses and Aaron. Korah being of the tribe of Levi, pretended that the office of high-priest belonged to him as much as to Aaron. He was supported in his pretensions by Dathan and Abiram, who were both of the tribe of Judah, and desirous of participating with Moses in the sovereign authority and government of the people. God discovered his indignation against these rebels in a remarkable manner: the earth opened and swallowed them up with others of their adherents; and immediately after, a devouring flame of fire issued forth from the tabernacle, and consumed two hundred and fifty Levites, the accomplices of Korah, who insolently attempted, of their own accord, to burn incense to the Lord. The next day, the Israelites murmuring against Moses and Aaron, the Almighty sent among them a plague, which seized upon the camp, and destroyed part of the people. Aaron, however, taking his censer, ran and placed himself between the dead and the living, and the plague was stayed. (Numb. xvi.) God also wrought another miracle to secure the priesthood to Aaron. Moses having taken twelve rods from the princes of the twelve tribes, and Aaron's separately, he placed them in the tabernacle before the sanctuary, after writing upon each the name of the tribe to which it belonged, and upon the rod of Aaron, the name of that high-priest. The next day, when they were viewed, Aaron's rod, which was made of an Almond-tree, appeared to be covered with leaves, and in full blossom: but the rest were in the same condition in which they were the day before. This rod was therefore placed within the most holy place, to perpetuate the remembrance of the miracle (ibid. xvii.).

Aaron married Elisheba, the daughter of Aminadab, of the tribe of Judah, and by her had four sons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. (Exod. vi. 23.) The first two were killed by fire from heaven, as a punishment for presuming to offer incense with strange fire in their censers. (Levit. x. 1, 2). From the other two the race of the high priests was continued in Israel.

Aaron and Moses not sufficiently expressing their confidence in God, when he commanded them to strike the rock at Kadesh, (Numb. xx. 8—11.) the Lord, in his wrath, declared to them, that they should not enter the promised land. Soon after, God ordered Aaron to ascend mount Hor, at the foot of which the Israelites were encamped, and where he should be gathered to his fathers. As soon, therefore, as Aaron had arrived upon the mount, he stripped himself of his pontifical ornaments in the sight of all the people, and put them on Eleazar his son and successor in the priesthood. This being performed, he died in the arms of his brother and Eleazar his son, in the year of the world 2552, at the age of one hundred and twenty-three years, and was buried by Moses and his son in a cave of Mount Hor. All Israel mourned for him thirty days. (Numb. xx. 24, et seq.)

The Hebrews observe the death of Aaron, and they fast on this occasion, on the first day of the fifth month, which they call Ab, and which, if we suppose the year to begin at Easter, pretty nearly corresponds with our July, O. S. The sepulchre of Aaron has hitherto remained unknown. In one place (Deut. x. 6), the scripture tells us, that Aaron died at Mosera, and in other places (Numb. xxxiii. 38, and Deut. xxxii. 50), that he died upon Mount Hor; the reason of which probably is, that Mount Hor was near the encampment at Mosera. Dr. Wells, however, thinks, that the Hebrew text in Deut. x. 6, 7. has been corrupted by the ignorance or negligence of transcribers. He proposes, therefore, to restore the true reading from the Hebrew, Samaritan, and Pentateuch, which says, that the Israelites, after encamping in the desert of Zin, which is Kadesh, journeyed thence, and pitched in Mount Hor, where Aaron died and was buried. The place of Aaron's interment was kept a secret from the Israelites, that, in after ages, they might not pay to him any superstitious worship, or that the Arabians, in the midst of whom the Hebrews were at that time, might not, upon their departure, violate the sanctity of his grave.

I. In reviewing the life of Aaron, we may observe, that he at once appears as an assistant, and is so far inferior to his brother Moses. Aaron, however, possessed some advantages, which seem to have entitled him to prior consideration. He was the elder brother, an eloquent speaker, and favoured with divine inspiration. No cause is assigned why he was not preferred to Moses, in respect to authority; and, therefore, no other cause can now be assigned, than the good pleasure of God.

II. Among the most confirming signs given by God to Moses, must be reckoned the interview with his brother Aaron, at Mount Horeb. This being predicted by God, and directly happening, was very convincing to Moses. It is probable, also, that Aaron would not have undertaken a journey of two months, from Egypt to Mount Sinai, at great hazard and expense, unless he had been well assured of the authority which sent him. At the same time, he could not have expected to find Moses where he did find him, unless by divine direction, since the place, afterwards called the Mount of God, was then undistinguished and unfrequented. Aaron, therefore, was a sign to Moses, by meeting him there, and Moses was a sign to Aaron. Without doubt, Aaron informed Moses of the events in Egypt, the death of the former Pharaoh, &c.

III. It may be reasonably supposed, that though Moses and Aaron had no pretension to sovereign authority by descent, yet they were of consideration by their property, their office, or some other means. Had Aaron not been above the lower class of people, who were kept to their daily bondage, he could ill have spared time and cost for a journey to Horeb. It seems altogether probable, that Aaron was a governor over the Israelites while building the pyramids. Moses and Aaron appear to be acknowledged by Pharaoh himself, and evidently by many of his servants, as persons of great consideration, and as the proper agents for transacting business, remonstrating, &c. between the Israelites and the king. Aaron performed the miracles before Pharaoh, without any recorded wonder expressed by the king of Egypt, how a person kept to his daily labour, could acquire such skill, eloquence, &c. Had Moses and Aaron been merely private persons, Pharaoh would probably have punished them for their impertinence.

IV. The crime of which Aaron was guilty, whilst Moses was in the mount receiving the law, is not to be palliated; though, perhaps, it was not so gross as is usually represented. See CALF.

If the faith or patience of Aaron were exhausted, and if he also supposed that Moses was dead, no collusion between them could exist. If he had expected the speedy return of Moses, he durst not have acted as he did. If he had received any late information respecting Moses, he would not have ventured on what he knew would be punished. The activity of Aaron in building the calf, and his subsequent submission to Moses, are utterly inexplicable, had not a divine conviction been employed on this occasion. Aaron, though blameably active, seems more to have suffered and tolerated, than to have promoted the evil. The expression is remarkable: 'The Lord plagued the people because they made the calf, which Aaron made.' (Exod. xxxii. 35.)

V. The sedition of Aaron and Miriam against Moses affords another argument against the supposition of any collusion between the two brothers. At first, indeed, Aaron assumes a high tone, and pretends to no less gifts than his brother; but afterwards he confesses his folly, and, with Miriam, submits. Aaron was not visited with the leprosy; but he could well judge of its reality on his sister. It belonged to him to exclude her from the camp during seven days; and from his expression of 'flesh half consumed,' it appears that this was a very inveterate kind of the disease, and, therefore, the more remarkable. Aaron's affection, interest, and passion, all concurred to harden him against any thing less than a full conviction of the divine interposition. He well knew, that it was not in the personal power of Moses to inflict this disease, in so sudden a manner. See PRIEST, MOSES, CALF, PYRAMIDS, EGYPT.

VI. The departure of Aaron for death, is singular and very impressive. We seem to view this feeble old man ascending the mountain to a convenient height, where he transferred the insignia of his office to his son, and then proceeding beyond the sight of the people, and giving up the ghost with that faith, resignation, and meekness, which became one, who had been honoured with the Holy Spirit, and with the typical representation of the great High-priest of the human race.

VII. In the general character of Aaron, is much of the meekness of his brother Moses. He seems willing to serve his brethren, and is too easily persuaded against his own judgment. This appears, when the people excited him to make the golden calf, and when Miriam urged him to rival his brother. It would, indeed, seem, that Miriam was the chief promoter of the sedition, as well from her dislike to a foreign woman, as from her being named in it before Aaron, and from the disease, with which she was afflicted. Aaron was less punished, because less guilty, and because he sympathized with his sister, as well as on account of the importance of his priestly office.

VIII. On the whole, it seems probable, that we may add to the express history of Aaron the following particulars: 1. Aaron was in authority before the return of Moses into Egypt. 2. A part, at least, of his authority consisted in overseeing the Israelites at work on Pharaoh's buildings; though it does not appear, that he was one of the officers that were beaten, because it was not his turn to be at work. 3. He greatly assisted in ordering the people at their departure from Egypt, and was perhaps general inspector, or perhaps treasurer to the caravan. 4. He was a good writer, as well as an eloquent speaker. 5. He had his particular department in the camp, beyond which his authority scarcely, if at all, extended. 6. Though he received the ear-rings from the people, yet, whether the calf was made by his own hands, or under his express directions, may be doubted from the order of the narration.

IX. When we consider the talents of Aaron, his natural eloquence, his probable acquirements, that God often spoke to him as well as to Moses, and that Egyptian priests were scribes as a duty of their profession, it seems very likely, that he assisted his brother in writing some parts of the books, now called the books of Moses; that, at least, he also kept journals of public transactions, and perhaps transcribed the orders of Moses, especially those relating to the priest's office.

This accounts for the difference of style observable in these books, and for such smaller variations in different places as naturally arise from two persons recording the same facts, without lessening in any degree, the authority, the antiquity, or the real value of these books. It accounts also for the third person being used when speaking of Moses, and perhaps for some of the praise and commendation bestowed on Moses, where Aaron seems chiefly in fault. In Deuteronomy, Moses uses the pronouns, I and me, 'I said,' the Lord said 'to me,' which seldom or never occur in the former books.—Additions to Calmet's Dictionary.

AB, according to the Jewish computation, the eleventh month of the civil, and the fifth of the ecclesiastical year. It answers to the moon of July, and contained thirty days. On the first day of this month, the Jews observe a fast, in memory of the death of Aaron; and on the ninth another, in commemoration of the burning of Solomon's Temple on that day by the Chaldeans, and of the second temple by the Romans. The Jews believe, that on this day, the persons, who had been sent to view the land of Canaan, returned to the camp, and excited the people to rebel. They also fast on this day, in memory of the emperor Adrian's edict, which forbade them to continue in Judea, or even to lament the ruin of Jerusalem. Lastly, they fast on the eighteenth, because in the time of Ahaz, the lamp in the sanctuary was extinguished on that night.

AB'ANA, אבנה, signifies made of stone or a building, and is a river of Damascus, mentioned by Naaman, the king of Syria's general, in the following terms: "Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the rivers of Israel?" (2 Kings v. 12.) Calmet is of opinion that this river is the same as the Barrady or Chrysorrhoeas, which, according to Maundrell, derives its source from the foot of Mount Lebanon towards the east, and flowing through and about Damascus, continues its course till its waters are lost in the wilderness, at the distance of about four or five leagues from that city. Radzivil, however, informs us, that the rivers Abana and Pharpar watered the city of Damascus, and that at the time he visited that country they were unnavigable, and well stocked with fish. On the other hand, Thevenot, who was a curious and minute observer of every thing in the neighbourhood of Damascus, never mentions the rivers Abana and Pharpar, but informs us of three rivers, which water Damascus, and which unite their streams a little below that city. The best Arabian geographers, also, do not once mention the names of Abana and Pharpar. Abulfeda relates, that the stream which supplies Damascus, issues from a cavern on the west side of the city, and immediately divides; and this account corresponds so exactly with Maundrell's description, that they sufficiently confirm each other. It is, therefore, generally supposed that Abana and Pharpar were only branches of the river Barrady, or as it was more anciently called, Chrysorrhoeas.—Universal History, vol. ii.

Benjamin of Tudela thinks that part of the Barrady, which runs through Damascus, to be Abana.

AB/ARIM, עבירים, signifies passages or passengers, or furries, and was the name of certain mountains beyond Jordan (Numb. xxvii. 12), which reached far into the country of the Moabites, and of the tribe of Reuben, on each side of the river Arnon. It is probable that they derived their name from the abarim, or passages, between the hills, of which they were formed, and which consisted of the mountains Nebo, Pisgah, Peor, &c. Near these mountains the Israelites had several encampments. (Numb. xxiii. 14—28.)

AB/BA, אבא, in the Syriac as well as in the Hebrew language, signifies father, and is expressive of love and confidence. St. Paul says, "We have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father." (Rom. viii. 15.) Jesus Christ praying in the garden, says, "Abba, Father, all things are possible unto thee." (Mark xiv. 36.)

Abba is more particularly used in the Syriac, Coptic, and Ethiopic churches, as a title given to the bishops. By the bishops themselves, the title of Abba is bestowed more eminently on the bishop of Alexandria; and this induced the people to give him the denomination of Baba, or Papa, which signifies grandfather, and which is a title that was borne by him long before it was bestowed on the bishop of Rome.

Abba is a Jewish title of honour, which was given to certain Rabbins called Tannaïtes. It is also used by some writers of the middle age to designate the superior of a monastery.

St. Mark and St. Paul use this word in their Greek (Mark xiv. 36; Rom. viii. 15; Galat. iv. 6), because it was then commonly known in the synagogues, and the primitive assemblies of the Christians. Selden, Witsius, Doddridge, Whitby, and others, are of opinion, that St. Paul alluded to a law, which existed among the Jews, and which forbade servants or slaves to call their master Abba, or Father; and that the apostle intended to convey the idea, that those who believed in Christ, were no longer slaves to sin, but being brought into a state of holy freedom, they might consequently address God as their father.

A'BESS, the superior of an abbey or convent of nuns. The abbess possesses the same rights and authority over her nuns, which the abbots regularly exercise over their monks. She is not, indeed, allowed to perform the spiritual functions annexed to the priesthood, with which the abbot is usually invested; but there are instances of some abbesses, who have a right, or rather a privilege, of commissioning a priest to act for them. They possess even a kind of episcopal jurisdiction, as well as some abbots who are exempted from the visitation of their diocesan.

ABBEY, a monastery, governed by a superior under the title of abbot or abbess. At first monasteries were only religious houses, to which persons retired from the noise and bustle of the world, that they might spend their time in solitude and devotion. However, these religious houses soon degenerated from their original institution, and procured great privileges, exemptions and opulence. Before the reformation, they prevailed very much in Great Britain, particularly in England. In proportion as they increased in riches, the state became poor; for the lands, which these regulars possessed, could never revert to the lords who bestowed them. These places were entirely abolished by Henry VIII. He first appointed visitors to inspect the lives of the monks and nuns, which were found in some places very disorderly. The abbots perceiving the dissolution of their houses unavoidable, were induced to resign them to the king, who, by that means, became possessed of the abbey lands. These lands were afterwards granted to different persons, whose descendants enjoy them at this day. The clear yearly revenue of the several religious houses, at the time of their dissolution, was estimated at 2,853,000*l.* an immense sum in those days. In some respects, these religious institutions were useful, in others extremely pernicious. Abbeyes were then the repositories, as well as the seminaries of learning. Many valuable books and national records have been preserved in their libraries; the only places in which they could have been safely lodged in those turbulent times. Indeed, the historians of this country are chiefly indebted to the monks for the knowledge they possess of former national events. In these houses the arts of painting, architecture, and printing, were cultivated. Every house of this kind, had at least one person whose office it was to instruct youth. Abbeyes were also hospitals for the sick and poor, and afforded entertainment to travellers, at a time when there were no inns. See MONASTERY.

ABBOT, or ABBAT, the chief ruler of a monastery or abbey. The governors of the primitive monasteries were distinguished from the clergy, though frequently confounded with them, because a degree above laymen. In those early times, the abbots were subject to the bishops and the ordinary pastors. Their monasteries being remote from cities and built in the farthest solitudes, they had no share in ecclesiastical affairs; but having among them several persons of learning, they opposed the rising heresies of those times. This induced the bishops to call them out of those deserts and fix them in the suburbs of cities, and at length in the cities themselves. From that time the abbots degenerated, and learning to be ambitious, assumed the rank of prelates, and aspired at independence. They aimed at so much power, that some severe laws were enacted against them at the council of Chalcedon. However, many of them carried their point, obtained the appellation of lord, and were distinguished by other badges of the episcopate, particularly the mitre.

Hence arose new distinctions among the abbots. Those were termed mitred abbots, who were privileged to wear the mitre, and exercise episcopal authority within their respective precincts, being exempted from the jurisdiction of the bishop. Some were called croziered abbots, from their bearing the crozier or pastoral staff. Some were styled occumenical or universal abbots, in imitation of the patriarch of Constantinople; while others were termed cardinal abbots, from their superiority over all other abbots. In Britain, the mitred abbots were lords of parliament, and called abbots sovereign and abbots general, to distinguish them from other abbots. In Roman Catholic countries, the principal distinctions are those of regular and commendatory. The former take the vow, and wear the habit of their order; but the latter are seculars, though obliged by their bulls to enter into orders, when of a proper age.

ABED'NEGO, עֲבֵד־נֶגוֹ, Aubednegoo, or Obednegoo, denotes servant of light, or servant of Nago, or Nego, which signifies the sun, or morning star, so called from its brightness, or which was supposed to be a deity of the Babylonians. It is the Chaldean name given by the king of Babylon to Azariah, the companion of Daniel. (Dan. i. 7.) Abednego, with his two companions, Shadrach and Meshach, was thrown into the fiery furnace at Babylon, because he refused to worship the statue erected by the command of Nebuchadnezzar. But the condemnation of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, finally redounded to the glory of God; for the Almighty did not suffer them to be injured by the flames, but sent his angel into the midst of the fire to preserve them in the furnace. (Dan. iii.)

A'BEL, אֶבֶל, or HEBEL, signifies vanity, breath, or vapour, and is the name given to the second son of Adam and Eve. He was born in the second year of the world, and before Jesus Christ 4002. Some are of opinion that he and Cain were twins; some, that Abel was the younger; some, that he was born fifteen years after Cain; and others that an interval of thirty years took place between the birth of these two brothers. Some eastern writers say, that Avina, his sister, who is also called Delbora, Decla, or Edocta, was born at the same time with Abel. Cain and Abel, instructed by their father Adam, in their duty to the Creator, offered to God the first fruits of their labours, Cain, as an husbandman, of his corn; and Abel, as shepherd, of the firstlings of his flock, and the fat thereof, as it is rendered in our translation of the Bible. (Gen. iv. 4.) The offering of Abel is by some supposed to have been the paschal lamb; but Le Clerc thinks that it was milk, though his opinion is ably controverted by others. God was pleased to shew, either by fire sent from heaven, which consumed the sacrifice, or by some other means, that the offerings of Abel were agreeable to him, whilst those of Cain were otherwise. Cain perceiving this distinction became melancholy, and, listening to the suggestions of envy, formed the design of killing his brother; and having invited Abel to go with him into the field, he there murdered him. (Id. ibid. 8, 9.)

It should be remarked, that in our translation of the Bible, no mention is made of Cain inviting his brother into the field; but in the Samaritan text, and in the principal ancient versions, the words are express. In some Hebrew copies is a kind of chasm, as 'and Cain said unto Abel his brother,'—'and it came to pass, &c.' without inserting what he said to his brother.

As the scripture does not specify either the manner of the murder, or the instrument, with which it was perpetrated, expositors are much divided respecting these particulars. Certain, however, it is, that the blood of the innocent person crying to heaven, the Lord demanded Abel at the hand of Cain, his brother, whom he punished. See CAIN.

Jerome tells us, that a tradition prevailed among the Jews, that Abel was murdered in the plain of Damascus; and near a village called Sinie, travellers are shewn a tomb, which is said to be that of Abel, and from which the adjacent country is supposed to have received the ancient name of Abilene. This tomb is thirty yards in length; Josephus is of opinion, that Cain buried Abel in it to prevent a discovery of the murder. Maundrell's Journey.

It is asserted in a Hebrew book, intitled Cozri, that the foundation of the quarrel between Cain and Abel proceeded from Cain's desiring to possess Palestine, exclusively of his brother Abel.

St. Paul in commendation of Abel, tells us, that by faith he offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain; that he was declared righteous, God himself having testified that he accepted his gift, and that by reason of his faith, his blood still speaketh even after his death (Heb. xi. 4.) The same apostle compares the voice of Abel's blood to that of Jesus Christ (ibid. xii. 24); and our Saviour himself, in the gospel, distinguishes him by the name of righteous, and places him at the head of those saints, who had been persecuted for righteousness' sake. (Matth. xxiii. 35; Luke xi. 51.)

It has been asked, why had Almighty God respect to the offering of Abel, and not to that of Cain? The reason appears plainly this, that Cain offered only of the fruit of the ground, which had no respect to Christ, and only to God as the creator of the world; but Abel offered the firstlings of his flock, and the fat thereof, which was a bloody sacrifice, typifying the death of Christ, "the Lamb slain from the beginning of the world;" and thus exercised his faith in the promised Messiah. Hence the apostle says, "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain." (Heb. xi. 4.) By faith, that is, by believing the promise, which God had made to mankind in Christ; and he manifested his faith by offering such a sacrifice, as represented the death of Christ, by whom therefore his sacrifice was well pleasing and acceptable to God. It is not improbable (and it seems to be suggested in the history itself) that there was a main difference in this, that Cain offered the vile and refuse, and Abel the most precious part of his treasures. Thus it is said of the one, that he "brought (barely) of the fruit of the ground;" and of the other, that he "brought of the firstlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof." If this were truly the case, the sacrifice of Abel was therefore more acceptable than Cain's, because it expressed a more grateful sense of the divine goodness. To this may be added, that probably the general course of Cain's life was vicious and immoral; and the very offering up of his sacrifice was not attended with that devotion, which was necessary. Bishop Beveridge, Bishop Conybeare, &c.

A'BEL, אבֶל, denotes mourning, and was the name of a city, which was also denominated, Abelbeth-Maacha, or Abel-Maim. According to some, it was situated in Syria, to the north of Damascus, between Libanus, and Antilibanus. Dr. Wells, however, supposes it to have been situated in the north part of the land of Israel, in the tribe of Naphtali, and this supposition seems best founded. Sheba, the son of Bichri, when pursued by the troops of king David, fled to this city; and the inhabitants, that they might free themselves from the siege of Joab, cut off Sheba's head, and threw it over the wall. (2 Sam. xx. 14—18.) About eighty years after, it was taken and ravaged by Benhadad, king of Syria (1 Kings xv. 20.) About two hundred years after this event, it was taken by Tiglath-pileser, who reduced the inhabitants to captivity, and carried them into Assyria. (2 Kings xv. 29.) It was afterwards rebuilt, and, according to some, became the capital of the country of Abilene.

ABELIANS, Abelins, Abelites, or Abelonites; a sect of heretics mentioned by St. Austin, which arose in the diocese of Hippo in Africa. Though Moses never mentions Abel's posterity, yet some explain what is said respecting the blood of Abel crying unto God from the ground (Gen. iv. 19.), as meant of the posterity of this righteous person: but others are of opinion, that he always continued in a state of celibacy.—This latter conjecture gave rise to the Abelians, who condemned marriages, not as if this state of life was in itself blameable, for they themselves were married: but they enjoined continence, and abstained from that conversation with their wives, which was allowable. They said, they would not be the means of bringing unhappy creatures into the world, to be polluted with original sin. However, that their sect might continue, they adopted the sons and daughters of their neighbours, who were to inherit their fortunes, on condition that they should belong to their society, and marry upon the same terms. This sect arose in the reign of the emperor Arcadius, and terminated in that of Theodosius the younger.

A'BEL OF THE VINEYARDS, or, as it is rendered in our translation of the Bible, Plain of the Vineyards, was a town, situated, according to Jerome and Eusebius, six or seven miles from Philadelphia, or Rabbath, the capital of the Ammonites. (Judg. xi. 33.)

A'BEL THE GREAT, was the name of a large stone, which was found in a field belonging to one Joshua, a Bethshemite, and upon which the ark was placed, when it was sent back by the Philistines. It was supposed to have been called by this name, which signifies great mourning, on account of the great number of Bethshemites destroyed by God on this occasion; for the scripture informs us, that fifty thousand threescore and ten Bethshemites were smitten, because they looked into the ark of the Lord. (1 Sam. vi. 18, 19.)

A'BEL-MEHO'LAH, אבֶל-מְחֻלָּה, signifies the mourning of weakness, or of sickness, and is sometimes also called Abelmea. It was the birth-place of Elisha (1 Kings, xix. 16.), and is conjectured to have been situated near the river Jordan. According to Eusebius, this town stood in the great plain, sixteen miles to the south of Scythopolis. Not far from it, Gideon obtained a victory over the Midianites. (Judg. vii. 22.)

A'BEL-SHIT'TIM, אבֶל-שִׁטִּים, Ἀβελσάτιμ, signifies the mourning of the thorns, or prevocations, and is the name of a city, which was situated in the plains of Moab, beyond Jordan, opposite to Jericho. Eusebius says, that it stood in the neighbourhood of Mount Peor. Moses encamped at Abel-shittim some time before the Hebrew army passed the Jordan, under the command of Joshua. At this place, the Israelites fell into idolatry, and worshipped Baal-Peor, for which God punished them severely by the hands of the Levites (Numb. xxxiii. 49; xxv. 1; Josh. ii. 1.) Hence some think it derived its name. Some are also of opinion, that in the neighbourhood of this place, grew a great quantity of that kind of wood which is called shittim-wood, and of which the ark was made. (Exod. xxv. 5—12, &c.) Wells's Geography.

ABI'AH, אבִיָּה, signifies the father of the Lord, or the Lord is my father; or it may denote, the Lord is my will, or the will of the Lord. It was a name by which Abi, the daughter of Zachariah, was sometimes designated.

It was also the name of the second son of Samuel, and brother of Joel. Samuel having entrusted his sons with the administration of public justice, and admitted them to a share in the government, they conducted affairs so ill, that they obliged the people to require of him a king. (1 Sam. viii. 2.) This event took place in the year of the world 2909, and before Jesus Christ 1095.

ABI'ATHAR, אבִי־אֶתָר, signifies excellent father, or father of him that survived, and was the name of the son of Ahimelech, the tenth high priest of the Jews. And when Saul sent his emissaries to Nob, in order to destroy all the priests at that place, Abiathar, who was then young, was preserved from the slaughter, and retired to David in the wilderness. There he continued in the quality of high priest, while Saul, from aversion to Ahimelech, whom he supposed to have betrayed his interests, transferred the dignity of the high priesthood from Ithamar's family to that of Eleazar, by conferring this dignity upon Zadok. Thus there were, at the same time, two high priests in Israel: Abiathar in the party of David, and Zadok in that of Saul. (2 Sam. viii. 17; 1 Chron. xviii. 16.) In this state matters continued, from the death of Ahimelech till the reign of Solomon, when Abiathar, attaching himself to the party of Adonijah, was deprived of the priesthood by Solomon, in the year of the world, 2989.—During the reign of Solomon, the race of Zadok alone performed the functions of this ministry, exclusively of the family of Ithamar, according to that, which had been predicted to Eli, the priest. (1 Sam. ii. 33, &c.; iii. 11, 12, &c.) Some say that the name of Abiathar was sometimes given to Ahimelech, or Ahimelech; and, on the contrary, that his father Ahimelech was sometimes called Abiathar. (Mark ii. 26) The probability however is, that the expression in the Evangelist is merely a short mode of quotation, equivalent to "in Abiathar," "in the history of Abiathar," or that portion of the history in which Abiathar is the principal person.

A'BIB, אבִיב, according to Jerome, signifies green fruits or ears of corn, and was the name given by the Hebrews to the first month of their ecclesiastical year. (Exod. xiii. 4) This month was afterwards called Nisan, and answered nearly to our March, O. S. It was the seventh month of the civil year, and contained thirty days.

AB'IGAIL, אבִיגַיִל, signifies father of joy, or the joy of the father, and is the name of a woman, who was first the wife of Nabal of Carmel, and afterwards of David. Nabal treated David with the greatest ingratitude and contempt, and refused him the present which he requested. Abigail, being informed of the answer which her husband had sent by the messengers of David, hastened to remedy this fault. Having laden some of her asses with provisions, she herself, attended by several of her domestics, went to meet David, and addressed him with such respect and discretion, that she not only disarmed him of his rage, and stopped the effects of his indignation, but, by her sprightly conversation, so wrought upon him, that he conceived for her a great esteem. David having accepted her presents, Abigail returned home. Nabal died ten days after. As soon as the news of his death was brought to David, he sent to demand Abigail for his wife. She received this honour with great acknowledgments; and when the days of mourning for her husband were finished, she went to the camp of David, and they were married. The issue of this marriage, as some think, were two sons, Chileab and Daniel; but as the 2nd of Samuel speaks only of Chileab, and says nothing of Daniel, and as the 1st of Chronicles mentions only Daniel, and nothing of Chileab, it is supposed that they were two names for one and the same person. Daniel signifies a mighty judge, and Chileab an imprisoner. It is therefore very possible that the idea of their names is the same; especially if one was a popular name given him for some particular cause or on some particular occasion. (1 Sam. xxv.; 2 Sam. iii. 3, &c.; 1 Chron. iii. 1.) Patrick, &c.

ABI'HU, אבִי־הוּ, signifies, he is my father, or his father, or father of the Lord. Abihu was the son of Aaron, the high priest, and Elisheba, and, together with his brother Nadab, was consumed by fire sent from God, because he had offered incense with strange fire, instead of taking it from the altar of burnt offerings (Levit. x. 1, 2). This misfortune happened within eight days after the consecration of Aaron and his sons, in the year of the world 2514, and before Jesus Christ 1490. Some commentators believe that this fire came from the altar of burnt offerings; others, that it proceeded from the altar of perfumes. Several interpreters are of opinion that Nadab and Abihu had drunk wine too freely, at the feast of the peace offerings, and by that means forgot to take the sacred fire in their censers. This conjecture is founded on the command of God, which was immediately after delivered to the priests, and which forbade them the use of wine all the time they should be employed in the service of the temple. It is said that the fire did not consume their bodies, nor burn their clothes, but killed them in the manner men are sometimes destroyed by lightning. (Ibid. 5.) Patrick, Grotius, &c.

ABIJAH, אֲבִיָּה, signifies the same as Abiah. It was the name of some princes among the Hebrews. ABIJAH, the son of Jeroboam, the first king of the ten tribes, died very young. This prince having been seized with a dangerous disease, his mother, at the instigation of king Jeroboam, her husband, disguised herself, and went to inquire of the prophet Ahijah whether her son would recover. Ahijah told her he should die, and that he would be the only person of his family that would receive funeral honours, and be lamented by Israel; that all the other descendants of Jeroboam would be either eaten by dogs, or devoured by birds, as a punishment for his ingratitude and impiety. On the return of his mother, Abijah died, in the year of the world 3046, and before Jesus Christ 958. (1 Kings xiv. 1. et seq.)

ABIJAH, the son of Rehoboam, king of Judah, and of Maachah or Micaiah, the daughter of Uriel or Absalom. Some commentators have supposed Maachah to have been the grandmother, and Micaiah the mother of Abijah; and that the united name of his mother's father was Uriel Absalom. He succeeded his father in the year of the world 3306. This prince was at war with Jeroboam, the first king of Israel. Abijah, having procured an army of four hundred thousand men, of Judah and Benjamin, encamped upon mount Zemaraim, upon which Samaria was afterwards built.

It is observable, that many MSS. and printed Bibles, read only 40,000, and 80,000 instead of 400,000, and 800,000, as in our translation; but the Hebrew, Septuagint, Josephus, and the best Latin Bibles, both MS. and printed, agree in this place with the larger number. If we consider the nature and composition of the Jewish, as well as other eastern armies, we shall probably not be inclined to dispute the possibility that 400,000 men could be collected even in such a country as Judea. The numbers which compose the gross amount of Asiatic armies, are very far from denoting the true number of soldiers composing that army. In fact, when we deduct those whose attendance is of little advantage, we should not be very distant from truth, if we should say that nine out of ten are such as would be excluded from any army in Europe; and we ought not absolutely to despise the suggestion, that when we read 40, instead of 400, the true fighting corps of soldiers only are reckoned and stated. In accounts of other Asiatic armies, we may read sufficient to justify the possibility of such numbers being assembled for the purposes of warfare, as the scripture has recorded; and of these purposes plunder is not the least in the opinion of those who usually follow a camp.

At the same time, it may be worthy of observation, that under such circumstances, no conclusive estimate of the population of a kingdom can be drawn from such assemblages.

Jeroboam marched against Abijah at the head of eight hundred thousand men, collected in every part of his dominions. Abijah, hoping to induce the enemy's army again to submit to the house of David, and to return to the worship of the Lord, wished to harangue them. But, while he was speaking, Jeroboam ordered part of his troops to file off behind the mountain, without the enemy perceiving it, and to surround Abijah's army, which was so greatly inferior in number. Abijah and his people observing this, cried unto the Lord, and implored his assistance. The priests sounded the holy trumpets. God struck the hearts of the enemy with terror, and the army of Judah attacked them with so much fury, that they killed five hundred thousand on the spot. Abijah, pursuing his victory, took several cities from Jeroboam, and the Israelites were so much humbled under the hand of Judah, that they had not courage to undertake any thing against them. Abijah is reproached by the Rabbins for neglecting to destroy the profane altar which Jeroboam had erected at Bethel, and to suppress the worship of the golden calves at that place. He was married to fourteen wives, by whom he had twenty-two sons and sixteen daughters. He imitated the impiety and bad conduct of his father, reigned three years, and was succeeded by his son Asa, in the year of the world 3049. (2 Chron. xi. 20; xiii. 2, 3, &c.) Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. xxxvi. p. 59.

ABIJAH was the name of the wife of Ahaz, the mother of Hezekiah, king of Judah. She was the daughter of Zechariah, who was thought by some to be the person who was killed by the command of Joash, between the temple and the altar. (2 Chron. xxiv. 21.)

ABIJAH was also the name of one of the descendants of Eleazar, the son of Aaron. He was chief of one of the four-and-twenty companies of priests, whom David distributed into so many classes. (1 Chron. xxiv. 10.)—Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, was of the course of Abia or Abijah, which was the eighth of the twenty-four. (Luke i. 5.)

ABILE'NE, Ἀβιλήνη, signifies the father of the apartment, or of murmuring. It was a small province between Libanus and Antilibanus, and is thought by some to have been situated within the borders of Naphthali, though it was never subdued by that tribe. Abela or Abila, the capital of Abilene, was to the north of Damascus and Paneas, and to the south of Heliopolis. Of this canton Lysanias was governor in the fifteenth year of Tiberius. (Luke iii. 1.)

ABIMELECH, אֲבִימֶלֶךְ, signifies father of the king, or my father, the king. It was the name of several princes mentioned in Scripture. ABIMELECH, king of Gerar, who, being smitten with the beauty of Sarah, Abraham's wife, and not knowing but she was Abraham's sister, took her from him, and intended to marry her. God, however, did not permit him to defile her, but appeared to him in the night, and threatened him with death, if he did not instantly restore her to Abraham her husband. Abimelech pleaded ignorance in excuse for this action, and said that Abraham had assured him that she was his sister. The next day, therefore, he sent her back to Abraham, and complained that he had been deceived by him. Abraham confessed that she was his wife, but told the king that she was also his sister; being the daughter of his father, but born of a different mother. Abimelech gave great presents to Abraham, and to Sarah a thousand pieces of silver, with which, as the text (Gen. xx. 16.) is generally understood by expositors, he desired her to purchase a veil for a covering to her face. At the same time he cautioned Abraham not to expose himself again to a like inconvenience: it is probable that Abimelech requested Sarah to purchase a veil that all might know she was a married woman; for the wearing of a veil was anciently a token of subjection to the power of a husband. But if the words a covering of the eyes, refer to Abraham, the king might mean that Sarah needed no other defence of her chastity than her husband, who was so dear to God, that God would defend Abraham, and Abraham her. Some interpret the words, as if Abimelech meant, that the money which he had given was a mulct, and a testimony how much he had suffered on her account. (Gen. xx. 1, 2, 3, &c.) Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

The event of which we have been treating took place in the year of the world 2107, and before Jesus Christ 1897. Sarah, therefore, was at this time ninety years old; and it may seem strange, that a woman of her age should be desired by a king, who could command the most youthful beauties in his dominions. But, according to some interpreters, persons of ninety were at that time as fresh and vigorous as those of forty are now. Sarah might also surpass many of her co-evals, by reason of her sterility, which is a great preserver of beauty. Howell's History of the Bible.

Abimelech offered to Abraham the choice of any part of his dominions, that was most agreeable to him, for an habitation. He also begged that Abraham would intercede with God for the cure of his family, which for the sake of Sarah, had been afflicted with some grievous disorder, that appears to have rendered the women unable to conceive, or, as some say, to bring forth.

It appears (Gen. xx. 17.) that Abimelech himself was seized with some indisposition which was the cause of impotency. Calmet.

In our translation of the Bible, it is said of Sarah, after the speech of Abimelech to her, thus she was reprov'd. (Gen. xx. 16.) It is, however, very probable, that this translation is incorrect. Abimelech was desirous of purchasing the friendship of Abraham; and Abraham already had so far justified both Sarah and himself, that the king was satisfied. The Hebrew word should not have been translated reprov'd but inquired into, or examined. Abimelech, therefore, intends nothing more, than that she is acquitted after a full hearing; and the passage in the Chaldee paraphrase is translated in this manner. Universal History, vol. iii. p. 262, 263.

ABIMELECH, king of Gerar, and son to him of whom we have been speaking, though some think that it was the same person. One day, this prince, seeing Isaac sport with his wife Rebekah, whom he called his sister, ordered Isaac to be sent for, and complaining of his dissimulation, charged him with a design of involving him and his subjects in guilt and punishment. It seems therefore, that Abimelech was not unmindful of what had formerly befallen the nation on account of Sarah. The only apology offered by Isaac for his conduct was the fear of death. This apology being accepted by Abimelech, he published a declaration, that no person, on pain of death, should trouble Isaac or his wife. This transaction took place in the year of the world 2200, and before Jesus Christ 1804. Now as Isaac grew extremely rich and powerful, his posterity excited the envy of the Philistines. Abimelech, therefore, said to him, 'go from us, for thou art much mightier than we,' or according to Shuckford, 'thou art increased from us or by us.' Upon this command, Isaac immediately retired into the valley of Gerar, and afterwards to Beersheba, where some time after he was visited by Abimelech who wished to enter into an alliance with him. In the company of Abimelech, were Ahuzath his favourite, and Phicol the commander in chief of his army. Isaac, when he received them, said, 'wherefore come ye to me, seeing ye hate me, and have sent me away from you?' To this, Abimelech, replied, that he had observed how much God had favoured him, and that he was rising to a great height of power and prosperity. He therefore requested that Isaac would enter into friendship with him by a new covenant, or by a revival of the old covenant, which had existed between his father Abimelech and Abraham. He desired, he said, no other terms, than that the Philistines and their posterity should be treated and considered by Isaac and his posterity, as he and his family had been treated and considered by Abimelech and his people. They were splendidly entertained by Isaac; and the treaty being concluded, the next morning they departed in peace. (Gen. xxvi.)

ABIMELECH, the son of Gideon, was born of a concubine, whom Gideon kept at Shechem. After the death of his father, Abimelech, who was a bold aspiring youth, possessed himself of the government, and procured himself to be acknowledged king or judge of Israel, first by the inhabitants of Shechem, over whom his mother had influence, and afterwards by a great part of the other Israelites. Those of Shechem having presented him with seventy shekels of silver, with this money he levied a troop of vagabonds, who attended him. Being come to his father Gideon's house in Ophrah, he killed seventy of his brethren on one stone; and Jotham only, who was the youngest, escaped, and was delivered from his cruelty. Soon after this massacre, the inhabitants of Shechem, with those of Millo, assembled near the oak of Shechem, for the purpose of creating Abimelech, the son of Gideon, king. When Jotham was informed of their design, he appeared upon the top of Mount Gerizim, and reproved them by his celebrated fable of the trees. See JOTHAM.

In a short time, divisions arose among the inhabitants of Shechem, who reflecting on the injustice of their conduct, detested the cruelty of Abimelech in the massacre of his brethren. Whilst, therefore, he was absent from Shechem they revolted, and placed an ambushade in the mountains, with a design to kill him on his return. Abimelech obtained intelligence of what was transacting from Zebul, whom he had left governor of Shechem. The Shechemites had invited one Gaal to their assistance. Gaal being informed that Abimelech had collected some troops, and was marching towards Shechem, went out with the forces he had, and gave him battle, but was defeated; and, as he was attempting to re-enter the city, Zebul drove him thence, and obliged him to retire. Afterwards, Abimelech defeated the Shechemites, destroyed the city, and burnt the tower; but going thence to Thebez, a town about three leagues to the east, a woman from the top of the tower, threw on his head a piece of a mill-stone, which fractured his skull in such a manner, that his brains issued from the wound.—It has been thought that the woman did not throw on Abimelech a piece of a mill-stone, but a division of the mill itself. The word recab, the rider, from the upper riding on the under stone, is inserted to explain the foregoing words. This rider or upper stone, the woman had only to take off the peg which united the mill-stones, even if it were not already separated, and such a stone, two feet in breadth, was amply sufficient to fracture the skull of any man on whom it fell. Finding himself mortally wounded, he called to his armour-bearer, and desired him to put an end to his life, that it might not be said, he died by the hands of a woman. This event took place in the year of the world 2769, and before the vulgar æra 1235. Abimelech judged Israel three years, and was succeeded by Tolah. (Judg. ix.)—Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dict. No. cix. p. 16.

ABIMELECH, the priest of the Lord who gave to David Goliath's sword which had been deposited in the temple, and some of the show-bread, at the time this prince fled from the persecutions of Saul. (1 Sam. xxi. 1.) The Septuagint and several Latin copies read Abimelech; but in the Hebrew, it is אֲחִימֶלֶךְ, Achimelech, or Ahimelech, which is the true reading. See AHIMELECH.

ABI'RAM, אֲבִירָם, signifies father of elevation, or of fraud, and was the name of two persons mentioned in the Bible; 1. Abiram, the eldest son of Hiel, the Bethelite. Joshua having destroyed the city of Jericho, pronounced the following curse: 'Cursed be the man before the Lord, that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho: he shall lay the foundation thereof in his first born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it.' (Joshua vi. 26.) About five hundred and thirty-seven years after this imprecation, Hiel of Bethel, having undertaken to rebuild Jericho, whilst he was laying the foundation of it, lost his eldest son Abiram; and when they hung up the gates of it, his youngest son Segub. (1 Kings xvi. 34.) The rebuilding of Jericho, and the death of Abiram and Segub, took place in the year of the world 3090, and before Christ 914.

This is a remarkable instance of the fulfilment of a prophetic denunciation, on a person who, perhaps, would not credit the report or the truth of the prediction. It has been questioned whether, supposing that Hiel had many children, they all died from the eldest to the youngest, during the time of his building, or whether only his eldest and his youngest son died at the commencement and the termination of his undertaking. It is probable, that the site of the ancient city, which was at a short distance from new Jericho, was chosen by Hiel, as an extremely pleasant situation; but he, not knowing, or not believing the unhealthiness of the place, determined there to build the city. In consequence of this determination, the younger part of his family, his children, being the weakest, first felt the influences of the situation, to which, perhaps, they were exposed freely and without fear, and died, one after another 'from Abiram, his first-born, 'to Segub his youngest.' No blame seems to be attached to Hiel. It is mentioned merely as a remarkable fulfilment of a prediction; and the unhealthiness of the soil was very probably the means in the hand of Providence, of accomplishing the prophecy of Joshua, respecting the re-building of Jericho. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dict. No. v.—See JERICHO.

ABIRAM, the son of Eliab, and grandson of Phallu, of the tribe of Reuben. He was one of those, who conspired with Korah and Dathan against Moses in the wilderness, and was swallowed up alive with his companions in the bowels of the earth, which opened to receive them. (Numb. xvi.)

AB'ISHAG, אבישג, signifies ignorance of the father, or my father has seized, has taken, is arrived. It was the name of a young woman, a native of Shunam in the tribe of Issachar. David, at the age of seventy, finding no warmth in his bed, was advised by his physicians to procure some young person, who might communicate to him the heat he wanted. For this purpose, his servants presented to him Abishag, who was one of the most beautiful young women in Israel. David married her, but did not know her: she continued with him a year. (1 Kings i. 1, 2, &c.) After the death of David, Adonijah demanded her in marriage, but Solomon supposing that, when married to one of the king's wives, he might affect the regal power, caused him to be put to death. (1 Kings ii. 17.)

ABISH'AI, אבישי, signifies the present of my father, or the father of the present; or the father of the sacrifice, or the sacrifice of my father. Abishai, the son of Zuri and Zeruiah, David's sister, was a very valiant man, and principal general in David's armies. He vanquished Ishbi-benob, a giant who was descended from the Rephaim, and who bore a lance, the head of which weighed three hundred shekels of brass. The giant, was on the point of killing David, when Abishai prevented him by giving him a mortal wound. (2 Sam. xxi. 16.) Abishai and David having one night entered the tent of Saul, and finding him asleep, Abishai would have pierced him with his sword, but David would not permit him. (1 Sam. xxvi. 7, &c.)—When David, that he might preserve himself from Absalom, was obliged to leave Jerusalem, Abishai showed an inclination to kill Shimei, who insulted David with very offensive language: but the king checked his zeal, and told him that the Lord permitted this. (2 Sam. xvi. 9—12.) Abishai commanded a third part of David's army against Absalom. (Ibid. xviii. 2.) He also commanded a part of the army, when his brother Joab gave battle to the Ammonites. (Ibid. x. 10.) It is said in scripture, that he lifted up his spear against three hundred, and slew them all. (Ibid. xxiii. 18); but it is not known on what occasion this happened. The time and manner of his death are also unknown.

ABLUTION, was a ceremony used by the ancients, and is still practised in several parts of the world. It consisted in washing the body, and was always performed before sacrificing, or even entering their houses.—Ablutions appear to be as old as any ceremonies, even as external worship itself. They were enjoined by Moses, adopted by the heathens, and have been continued by Mahomet and his followers. They were used by the Egyptians, the Greeks, the Romans, and the Jews. Ablutions were practised by the ancient Christians before receiving the sacrament; and they are still retained by the Romish Church before, and sometimes after mass. The Syrians, Copts, &c. have their solemn washings on Good Friday; and the Turks have their ablutions, their gash, their wodon, aman, taburat, gusul, &c. The Indians feel a great veneration for the waters of the Ganges; and when they cannot wash themselves in those sacred streams, the Bramins tell them that other waters will be equally effectual, if whilst bathing they say, 'O Ganges, purify me!'

AB'NER, אבנר, 'Αβερ, signifies father of the light, or lamp of the father, or the son of the father, and was the name of the son of Ner, uncle to king Saul, and general of his armies. Abner by his influence and great authority, preserved the crown to Ishbosheth, the son of Saul, and supported him at Mahanaim, beyond Jordan, during seven years, against David, who then reigned at Hebron, in the tribe of Judah. (2 Sam. iii. 1.) Between the two parties of David and Ishbosheth, happened several skirmishes, in all of which David obtained the advantage. The two generals, Joab and Abner, one of whom commanded the troops of David, the other those of Ishbosheth, marching one day at the foot of Gibeon with their armies, Abner challenged Joab to fight twelve of Joab's men, with an equal number of his, and said, 'let the young men arise and play 'before us.' Joab consenting to this proposal, twelve men of Benjamin, who belonged to Ishbosheth, and twelve of the servants of David, immediately appeared and fought till they slew each other. After this a general battle ensued, in which Abner and his men were defeated and put to flight. In this battle were the three sons of Zeruiah, David's sister; Joab, Abishai, and Asahel. Asahel being very swift, undertook to pursue after Abner, who endeavoured to escape; but Abner finding himself hard pursued by Asahel, struck him with the back part of his spear, and killed him on the spot. Notwithstanding this, Joab and Abishai continued to follow Abner till sunset. When Abner's whole army were collected upon an eminence, he called to Joab, and said, 'shall the sword devour for ever? knowest thou not that it will be bitterness in the latter end? how long shall it be, then, ere thou bid the people return from following their brethren?' Immediately after Joab sounded a retreat, and the army withdrew from the pursuit of Abner. (2 Sam. ii.)

Sometime after, Abner quarrelled with Ishbosheth, on account of Rizpah, a concubine of Saul, with whom Ishbosheth accused him of familiarity. Abner was very much provoked at this reproach, and threatened to establish the throne of David over both Israel and Judah, from Dan even to Beersheba. He immediately entered into a private correspondence with David, and at a public interview with that prince, offered him his services, and promised to make him king over all Israel. David, who was then at Hebron, received Abner and his attendants very kindly, and entertained them sumptuously. Soon after Abner had departed from Hebron, Joab and his people returned thither from an expedition against the Philistines, and were informed that Abner had concluded an alliance with David. Joab, therefore, expostulated with David, and said, that he had entertained a man who came only as a spy upon his actions. But not satisfied with this expostulation, he sent a messenger after Abner and desired him to return. On the return of Abner, Joab, under pretence of saluting him, stabbed him to the heart, partly through jealousy, and partly to revenge the death of his brother Asahel.—When David was informed of what had passed, he showed publicly his concern, made for Abner a solemn funeral, which he himself attended in person, and in honour of him composed a mournful song. This transaction happened in the year of the world 2956, and before Jesus Christ 1048. (2 Sam. iii. 6, 7, &c.)

ABOMINATION. The scripture generally terms idolatry and idols abominations, not only because the worship of idols is in itself abominable, but because the ceremonies of idolaters were almost always attended with licentiousness, and with actions of an infamous and abominable nature.—Shepherds were an abomination to the Egyptians. (Gen. xlv. 34.) The Hebrews were to sacrifice in the wilderness the abominations of the Egyptians; that is to say, their sacred animals, oxen, rams, goats, and lambs, the sacrifice of which were considered by the Egyptians as abominations, and utterly unlawful. (Exod. viii. 26.) Moses also calls those animals abominable, the use of which were prohibited to the Hebrews.

The abomination of desolation, foretold by Daniel (xi. 31.) denotes, according to the best interpreters, the idol of Jupiter Olympus, which was erected in the temple of Jerusalem, by the command of Antiochus Epiphanes. (2 Maccab. vi. 2; 1 Maccab. vi. 7.) By the same abomination of desolation (Matt. xxiv. 15.) seen at Jerusalem during the last siege of that city by the Romans, under Titus, is meant the ensigns of the Roman army, upon which were formed the images of their gods and emperors, and which were placed in the temple, after it and the city were taken.

A'BRAM, אַבְרָם, signifies the father of elevation; אַבְרָהָם, the father of a great multitude, or of many nations. Abram who was afterwards called Abraham, was the son of Terah, and was born at Ur, a city of Chaldea, in the year of the world 2008, and before Jesus Christ, 1996. (Gen. xi. 26—31.) He spent the first years of his life in the house of his father, who was a worshipper of idols. From the text of Joshua (xxiv. 2), Nehemiah (ix. 7), and Isaiah (xliii. 27), many are of opinion, that Abram himself was at first a worshipper of idols, but that God giving him a better understanding, he renounced that impure mode of worship; and on account of this renunciation, as some suppose, he suffered a severe persecution from the Chaldeans, who threw him into a fiery furnace, from which God miraculously delivered him. The text of the Vulgate in Nehemiah, (ix. 7), already referred to, plainly says that he was delivered from the fire of the Chaldeans; and the same is generally taught by the Jews. But Calmet thinks it probable, that this opinion is founded only on the ambiguity of the word Ur, which signifies fire, as well as the city of Ur, from which God called Abram, and sent him into the land of Promise. He is, therefore, of opinion, that Abram demonstrated to his father the vanity of idolatry, since he induced him to forsake the city of Ur, in which he was settled, and retire to the place, whither the Lord had called Abram. The first city to which they came, was Haran, in Mesopotamia, where Terah, Abram's father, died. (Gen. xi. 31, 32.) Abram journeyed thence into Canaan, which was at that time in the possession of the Canaanites. Here God promised to give his posterity the property of this country, and to confer on him all kinds of blessings. The patriarch, however, did not acquire any possession in Canaan, but lived always as a stranger in the country. (Ibid. xii. 1, 2, &c.) Sometime after his arrival in Canaan, about the year 2084, a great famine obliged Abram to go into Egypt, in order to procure provisions; but, foreseeing that the Egyptians would be captivated with the beauty of Sarai, and fearing that they might not only force her from him, but also take away his life, if they knew that she was his wife, he desired her permission to say that she was his sister. To this Sarai consented. During their stay in Egypt, her beauty being spoken of to Pharaoh, she was forcibly taken away from Abram, and would have been married to Pharaoh, if God had not afflicted him with such grievous plagues that he was obliged to restore her. (Ibid. 10, 11, &c.)

After the famine Abram left Egypt, and returned to Canaan, and pitched his tents between Bethel and Hai, where some time before he had built an altar. As Abram and his nephew Lot possessed large flocks, and therefore could not dwell together, they separated; Lot retired to Sodom, and Abram to the plain of Mamre in Hebron. (Gen. xiii. 1, 2, &c.)

Some years after their separation, that is, in the year of the world 2092, and before Jesus Christ 1912, Lot being taken prisoner in the wars which Chedorlaomer and his allies, carried on against the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, of Admah, Zebaiim, and Zoar, Abram with his people pursued the conquerors; and having overtaken them at Dan, near the springs of Jordan, he defeated them, retook all their spoil, together with his nephew Lot, and brought them back to Sodom. (Ibid. xiv. 1, 2, &c.) At his return, as he marched near Salem or Jerusalem, Melchizedek, king of this city, and priest of the most high God, met him, bestowed on him many blessings, and presented him with bread and wine for himself and for the service of the army, or as some think, offered bread and wine to God, as a sacrifice of thanksgiving for him. (Gen. xiv. 12, &c.)

After this, the Lord renewed all the promises which he had made to Abram, gave him fresh assurances that he should possess the land of Canaan, and that his posterity should be as numerous as the stars of heaven. (Ibid. xv. 1, 2.) As Abram had no children, and could no longer expect any by Sarai, he complied with her solicitations, and married her servant Hagar, who, he imagined, might have children, and thus God would perform the promise, which he had made to him, of a numerous posterity. After her marriage, Hagar finding that she had conceived, treated her mistress with contempt, and Sarai complaining of her conduct, Abram told her that Hagar was still her servant. Hagar, therefore, being used with severity, fled; but the angel of the Lord appeared to her in the wilderness, and commanded her to return to her master, and be more submissive to her mistress. In consequence of this command, Hagar returned to the house of Abram, and sometime after was delivered of Ishmael. (Ibid. xvi. 1, 2, &c.)

In the year 2107, and before Jesus Christ 1897, the Lord having renewed his covenant with Abram, and the promises which he had made to him, changed the name of Abram, or an elevated father, by which he had been hitherto designated, to that of Abraham, or the father of a great multitude; and that of Sarai, which signifies my princess, to that of Sarah, or the princess. As a mark and earnest of the covenant, into which he had entered with Abram, God enjoined him to be circumcised, and to circumcise all the males of his family, and promised him expressly, that within a year, Sarah his wife should bear to him a son. (Ibid. xvii.)

In a short time after, the sins of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the neighbouring cities being completed, God sent three angels to destroy them. These angels came first into the valley of Mamre, where Abraham had pitched his tents; and as soon as he saw them, he ran to meet them, invited them to eat, washed their feet, and hastened to prepare for them some meat. Sarah made cakes for them on the hearth, and when they had eaten, they asked where was his wife Sarah? Abraham answering that she was in the tent, one of the angels said, 'I will surely return unto thee by the time of life; and, lo, Sarah thy wife shall have a son.' Sarah, who was behind the door, heard this, and laughed; and the angel said to Abraham, 'Wherefore did Sarah laugh? Is any thing too hard for the Lord? At the time appointed I will return unto thee, according to the time of life, and Sarah shall have a son.' (Ibid. xvii.) The angels being ready to depart, Abraham waited on them with great respect, and accompanied them towards Sodom. Two of the angels advanced with more haste, whilst the third walked with Abraham. This last, who is called by Moses, יְהוָה Jehovah, which is the incommunicable name of God, is thought by the generality of Christian writers, to have been the Son of God, who thus appeared in the form of an angel. See Univ. History, vol. iii. p. 261, 262. As a farther proof of his favour, he informed Abraham, that the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah had reached heaven, and that he was determined to destroy them utterly, if, upon inquiry, he found their wickedness equal to the cry. Abraham, fearing lest his nephew Lot should be involved in the misfortune of these cities, or rather from his natural compassion, was induced to intercede for those righteous persons, who might be found among the wicked. The patriarch did not cease to expostulate with him, till he had obtained a promise, that if only ten righteous persons should be found in the city, he would spare the place for their sakes. Lot, however, was the only righteous man in the city; and God preserved him from the calamity of Sodom. (Gen. xix.)

Sarah conceived according to the promise of God; and Abraham leaving the valley of Mamre journeyed towards the south, and dwelt as a stranger at Gerar. Abimelech, king of that country, being captivated with the beauty of Sarah, forced her from her husband, but God having informed him that she was the wife of Abraham, he restored her. See ABIMELECH.

In the year of the world 2108, before Jesus Christ 1896, and in the ninetieth year of her age, Sarah was delivered of her son Isaac, whom Abraham circumcised according to the command of God. Sarah herself suckled the child, and weaned him at the usual time, and Abraham feasted all his household on that day. Some time after, Sarah observed Ishmael, the son of Hagar, playing with her son Isaac and treating him with contempt. She therefore said to Abraham, cast out this bond woman and her son, for Ishmael shall not be heir with Isaac. Whatever reluctance Abraham might feel in complying with this request, as soon as God had declared to him that it was his will, he sent them away. (Gen. xxi.)

About this time, Abimelech, king of Gerar, came with Phicol, the general of his army, to visit Abraham, and to enter into an alliance with him. Abraham presented him with seven ewe-lambs out of his flock, in consideration that a well which he had opened should be his own. Each of them swore to the covenant they had concluded; and they called the place Beersheba, or the well of swearing, because of the covenant there ratified with oaths. Here Abraham planted a grove, built an altar, and continued some time. (Ibid. xxi. 22, &c.)

In the year of the world 2133, and before Jesus Christ 1871, God commanded Abraham to sacrifice his own son Isaac upon a mountain which he showed him. Obedient to the divine command, Abraham took his son with some servants, and conducted him towards mount Moriah. On their journey, Isaac said to his father, 'Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb for a burnt offering?' Abraham replied, 'My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt offering.' When they had arrived within sight of the mountain, Abraham left his servants behind him, and ascended the mount with his son only. Having bound Isaac he prepared to sacrifice him; but when he was ready to give the blow, an angel cried to him out of heaven, 'Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing unto him: for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me.' At the same time, Abraham seeing a ram entangled in a bush by his horns, took him, and offered him up as a burnt offering, instead of his son Isaac. He called the place Jehovah-jireh, or the Lord will see, or provide. (Gen. xxii.)

Twelve years after this, Sarah, the wife of Abraham, died in the city of Hebron, otherwise called Arba. Abraham was probably at Beersheba; but being informed of her death, he came to Hebron, to mourn, and to perform for her the last offices. He appeared before the people assembled at the gate of the city, and entreated them to allow him the liberty of burying his wife among them; for as he was a stranger in the country, and at that time possessed no land of his own, he could pretend to no right of giving honourable interment to his dead in the sepulchres of that country, without the consent of the proprietors. He therefore requested that Ephron, one of the inhabitants, would sell him the field called Machpelah, to which there belonged a cave and sepulchre. Ephron complied with his request, and the purchase was made before all the people of Hebron, at the price of 400 shekels of silver, or about 45*l.* sterling. Here Abraham buried his wife Sarah, after he had mourned for her according to the custom of the country. (Gen. xxiii.)

Abraham, perceiving that he was grown old, sent Eliezer, the steward of his house, into Mesopotamia, and instructed him to bring a woman of his own nation, to whom he might marry his son Isaac. Eliezer executed his commission with great prudence, and brought Rebekah, the daughter of Bethuel, and grand-daughter of Nahor, whom Isaac married, and lodged in the tent of his mother Sarah. This transaction took place in the year of the world 2148, and before Jesus Christ 1856. (Gen. xxiv.)

After the death of Sarah, Abraham, in the one hundred and forty-first year of his age, married Keturah, by whom he had six sons; Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah. They were all heads of different people, and dwelt in Arabia, in the neighbourhood of Palestine. At length, in the year of the world 2183, and before Jesus Christ 1821, Abraham died, at the age of one hundred and seventy-five years, and was buried with Sarah his wife in the cave of Machpelah. (Ibid. xxv.)

I. In reviewing the history of this patriarch, we may observe, that Abraham is introduced rather suddenly to the reader, in the sacred Scriptures:—'The Lord had said to Abram,' (Gen. xii. 1); but it may be reasonably concluded, that before he would undertake a long, fatiguing, and uncertain journey, he would be well convinced of the authority, which commanded him to undertake that journey. It may be inferred that God had previously spoken to Abraham, perhaps often, though by what means we are ignorant. From other information than that contained in the Scriptures, we know that about this time, Chaldea became polluted with idolatry; and it is therefore every way credible, that Abraham quitted his country principally from a dread of this evil. In Egypt, this evil was not at that time prevalent, and with it the parts, which were at a distance from the great cities, were little, if at all, infected. This accounts for Abraham's going northward, instead of following the direct road, which communicated through Canaan, between Babylon and Egypt. Undoubtedly, the providence of God called Abraham to seek, for his own personal quiet and that of his family, a country less polluted than Nineveh; and were this all, so far he may be said to have had divine direction.—Every thing, however, leads us to suppose, that he had also a communicated direction to the same purpose.

II. Abraham's estate, previously to his journey, was that of a man of substance. 'He took Sarai his wife, Lot his nephew, and all his property.' It is, therefore, evident that he was no adventurer for a fortune, but was already rich in worldly wealth, and had several dependents, most of whom, probably, accompanied him to his new residence, and many of whom were 'servants born in his house.'

III. Abraham calls Sarai his wife, sister, instead of 'wife.' (Gen. xii. 13, &c.) In the infancy of the human race, the relations of life were so very few, and so very intimate, that it was next to an impossibility for the nearest in blood not to intermarry. It is not incredible, that some families had formed a resolution of maintaining themselves distinct by this custom, and that they chose to be thus restricted to the branches of their own families, cousins, &c. as among the Jews the restriction was afterwards enlarged to their own tribe.

Independently, however, of this opinion, we may observe that every nation, and frequently every family, adheres to its own manners, which sometimes appear strange to others. It seems to have been the custom of the Hebrew families to use the term sister, and others of near consanguinity, to denote not only a general relation, but also a wife, a companion. See FATHER, BROTHER, SISTER.

It is not necessary to suppose, that this custom commenced with Abraham when about to enter Egypt with Sarai. This was his general request long before (Gen. xx. 13); and he again desired Sarai to use the title brother, when speaking of him, or to him, in her ordinary discourse with the Egyptian women. The report of the Egyptian women respecting her beauty, and the accidental sight of her by the chiefs of Pharaoh's house, induced Pharaoh to take her into his palace; that is, to give her apartments in his harem. It is observable, that according to the custom of the east, whilst Sarai was with Abraham, she conversed with no men, and that the eastern women, though very reserved, are not locked up. Sarai's calling Abraham brother, was as likely to have been the immediate cause of her being taken from him, as his calling her sister. The original says, 'the Lord struck the house of Pharaoh with a great stroke, because of the word of Sarai, the wife of Abraham.' Independently of any reference this word might have to her calling him brother, it probably alluded to her complaints to God of the hardship and injury she suffered, and of the violence, with which she was treated. Had she been only Abraham's sister, by what right did Pharaoh detain her against her own consent, and that of her brother, who was her natural guardian? His behaviour, or, at least, that of his officers, seems too much to justify Abraham's former suspicion respecting the Egyptian manners. On the whole, so far as relates to this transaction in Egypt, we may admit, that though the fear of Abraham induced him to use art and management in this affair; yet his fear was well founded, and does not appear to have overcome his faith, as is sometimes said, nor to have put him out of the regular custom of his life. It seems to have suggested what he thought a prudential application in public of what had been his usual custom in private. At the same time, perhaps, by this very prudence, he risked as much from the anger of Pharaoh, when he turned him out without delay, as if he had trusted to the ordinary course of things, and to the simple way of his duty.

In the story of Abimelech (Gen. xx. 2.), we may observe, that the original will bear the idea, that Abraham said to his wife, my sister, as well as of her, that my sister, that is, my dear sister. He thus addressed Sarah in the hearing of some of Abimelech's people; and Abimelech, thinking to confer honour on Abraham and himself by a near connection, sent and took her. He behaved differently from Pharaoh: he meant good rather than harm; and therefore God expostulated with him. To Abimelech, Abraham apologizes, by discovering their true relation, and his general request,—'at every place to which we journey, call me brother.' These circumstances are very different from those of the haughty and oppressive Pharaoh.

The Arab women, at this day, when at home in their tents, have no veils, though those in cities wear them; and as Sarah had been accustomed to dwell in tents only, this circumstance may account for her not wearing a veil.

IV. The dignity and power of Abraham are incidentally stated in the story of his rescuing Lot. He had three hundred and eighteen servants born in his house, whom he could entrust with arms. This implies, that he had many not born in his house, some who must have been old, some women, and some children. If these be added together, they form a considerable tribe, and prove that Abraham was a man of no trifling possessions. In fact, he appears to correspond exactly to a modern Emir; to possess the right of sovereignty in no small degree; and to be little other than an independent prince, even while dwelling in the territories of sovereigns, by whom he was greatly esteemed.

V. Abraham's affection for Sarah seems to have been very great. However customary a plurality of wives might be among the nations around him, he took no other wife than that of his youth, from the great love, it would seem, with which he loved her. His connection with Hagar was not proposed by himself, but by Sarah; and in this Abraham was obedient to Sarah, and yielded to her wishes rather than to his own. The event of this connexion serves to show, that the miracle which preceded the conception of Isaac, principally, if not totally, regarded Sarah. The custom of having more than one wife, especially if the first was barren, is of very ancient origin, and is common in the east at this day, both among Jew and Arabs. In taking Hagar, therefore, Abraham only practised the same as his neighbours. After Hagar had become his wife, he ought not perhaps to have left her so entirely in the power of Sarah; but the sending away of Ishmael and his mother appeared hard to Abraham himself, and to this action he appeared very reluctant, till God had promised his protection to Ishmael. His manner of sending them away was managed with much caution. They were sent away very early in the morning, before Sarah and many of his family could be spectators, and before the heat of the day; and Ishmael, then about thirteen years old, was sufficiently able to carry the loaves or the skin of water. By this privacy, he avoided all farther harshness and bickerings between Sarah and her servant; and he did all he could to ensure the safety of Hagar and her son.

It may be necessary to observe here, that some writers, thinking it improbable that Abraham, after the death of Sarah, should marry Keturah at the advanced age of one hundred and forty years, have dislocated the chronology of this period, by supposing that Abraham took Keturah as a concubine, in consequence of the barrenness of Sarah, his wife, even before he left Charran, and that Keturah's children were in the number of the souls that were born to him and Lot during their residence in that country. It would seem, however, evident from the whole tenor of the history, that Abraham was "childless" till the birth of Ishmael; (Gen. xv. 2, 3.) that he had no other son than Ishmael when he received the promise of Isaac; (Gen. xvii. 18.) and that Isaac and Ishmael, jointly, as his eldest sons, celebrated his funeral. (Gen. xxv. 9.) That Abraham should marry again, at the age of 140 years, shows his faith in the Divine promise, that he should be "a father of many nations;" for which purpose his constitution might be miraculously renovated, like that of Sarah. Besides, Abraham himself was born when his father Terah was advanced in years. "The souls gotten in Charran," denoted the joint increase of the households of Abraham and Lot. Even after their separation in the land of Canaan, Abraham took with him, in the pursuit of the Assyrian confederates, "three hundred and eighteen trained servants, born in his own house," about eight or nine years after his arrival in Canaan; several of these, therefore, must have been born at Charran, in order to be then able to bear arms. See HAGAR, ISHMAEL, and CONCUBINE.

VI. The covenant made with Abraham is well worthy of consideration, whether we regard its solemnity, occasion, or contents. The history of it is related in two parts; the first is previous to the birth of Ishmael, and the second to that of Isaac. The first foretells that Abraham should have a numerous posterity, and that he need not make a stranger his heir; and the second promises him a son by Sarah, and that with his son the covenant should be established. Respecting the contents of the covenant, the following are worthy of observation: (1) The family of this patriarch has long been extremely numerous; from him are derived many tribes of Arabs, descending by Ishmael and by Keturah. To say nothing of the Jews, there is not any other man to whom so many nations refer their origin. Some may have begotten families, but Abraham is the father of nations. (2) The changing of the names, Abram into Abraham, and Sarai into Sarah. (3) Circumcision, the sign of the covenant. This sign had reference to posterity. As all the posterity descending from a circumcised person must be begotten by the part bearing the sign of conformity to the covenant, so the issue of such was considered as sacred to God, not because of its relation to a holy or sacred mother, but because it was derived from a part of the father, become holy or sacred. It seems probable, that had the circumcised part been the finger, the ear, &c. the attributed holiness to the posterity had not been valid. At least, the relation between the sign and the offspring had been neither appropriate, consequential, nor apparent.

VII. On the story of Abraham's entertaining the angels, some have thought, that, in addition to the person, whom Abraham addressed, and who remained some time after the others were gone towards Sodom, the Shekinah appeared. It seems, however, more probable, that this person gradually displayed, or suffered to appear, the tokens of the Shekinah, and without leading Abraham to suppose he had seen Jehovah, might convince him that he had seen his messenger. This sort of ambiguity, brightening into certainty, seems well adapted to the circumstances of the subsequent conversation between Abraham and his glorious guest. If Abraham had conceived he was speaking immediately to Jehovah, no room had been left for reasoning, or representation in abatement of his anger. The narrator says, "Abraham stood before Jehovah," and "Jehovah spake," &c.; but Abraham uses merely the word Adonai, behold I have spoken to Adonai, &c. It seems, therefore, that here was an instance of the "unawareness" with which Abraham entertained angels. Though he supposed the dignity of his guest to be great, yet it was much greater than he supposed. He saw the human part of this appearance fully; but he saw the celestial part very imperfectly, and in such a manner only as flesh and blood are capable of seeing it.

VIII. On Abraham's faith, respecting his son Isaac, when called upon to offer him as a burnt sacrifice, it may be observed, that the patriarch must have been well convinced he followed no idle phantasy of his own brain, in proposing to slay him. The common feelings of human nature, the uncommon feelings of the aged patriarch, all argued against such a deed. The length of the journey, the interval of time, the discourse of Isaac, all conspired to augment the anguish of the parent, unless that parent was well satisfied in his own mind that he acted under a divine direction.

The eastern people, not only Christians and Mahometans, but also Indians and Infidels, have some knowledge of the patriarch Abraham, and highly commend him. But they tell many fabulous stories of him, and his history is embellished with a variety of fictions. Some have affirmed, that he reigned at Damascus, that he dwelt a long time in Egypt, and taught the Egyptians astronomy and arithmetic; and others say, that he invented letters, and the Hebrew language, or the characters of the Syrians and Chaldeans, and that he was the author of several works.

The fathers of the Church have spoken largely in commendation of this great patriarch. The Old Testament, and the prophets, have proposed him as the perfect pattern of faith and obedience to God's commands. Our Saviour assures us in the Gospel, that Abraham earnestly desired to see the day of his coming, and that he saw it, and was glad. (John viii. 56.) In another place, he tells us, that the happiness of the righteous consists in being seated with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven, (Matt. viii. 11.) and in being received into Abraham's bosom, as into a place of rest. (Luke xvi. 22.)

The emperor Alexander Severus, who knew Abraham only by the wonders related of him by Jews and Christians, conceived so great an idea of him, that he ranked him with Jesus Christ among his gods. Additions to Calmet's Dictionary; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. p. 146.

ABRAHAMITES, an order of monks, who, in the ninth century, were exterminated for idolatry by the emperor Theophilus. It was also the name of another sect of heretics, who had adopted the errors of Paulus. These last derived their name from that of their leader Abraham, a native of Antioch, called by the Arabs, Ibrahim, and hence the name of Ibrahimiah is given by them to this sect. The Abrahamites arose about the close of the eighth century, and were suppressed by the vigilance of Syriacus, Patriarch of Antioch.

AB'SALOM, אבשלום, signifies father of peace, or the peace of the father, or of consumption, or of recompence, and was the name of the son of David, who was born of Maachah, the daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur. It is said that he was the most beautiful man in Israel, and had the finest head of hair. When he cut off his hair, which was done at certain periods, it weighed two hundred shekels by the king's weight. (2 Sam. xiv. 25, 26.) In our translation of the Bible, it is said, that the hair on Absalom's head was cut off every year; but the Hebrew does not designate the time. The Targum, therefore, reads at stated times, or when it grew too heavy. The weight of Absalom's hair, when cut off, might be about thirty-one ounces; and we know by the relation of hair-dressers, that some women have thirty-two ounces of hair on their heads. Absalom had a sister both by the father and mother's side, named Tamar. He had also a brother called Amnon, who was also the son of David, but not born of Absalom's mother. Amnon conceived so violent a passion for his sister Tamar, that he began to pine away; but prevailing with the king to allow Tamar to enter his chamber, and to prepare something for him to eat, he ravished her, and then dismissed her with shame and reproach. Absalom not only received his sister into his house, but resolved to revenge the outrage which had been committed. But expecting, perhaps, that the king, his father, would punish so wicked an action, he forbore to say any thing to Amnon. About two years after this transaction, in the year of the world 2974, and before Jesus Christ 1030, Absalom went to a sheep-shearing, at Baalhazor, whither he invited the king and all the royal family. David excused himself, but being pressed by the intreaties of Absalom, he consented that Amnon and his brethren should accompany him. When they had become warm with wine, Amnon was assassinated by the orders of Absalom; and the other princes, in great consternation, immediately fled to Jerusalem. Absalom retired to king Talmi, his mother's father, in the country of Geshur, where he continued three years, and whither David did not pursue him. (2 Sam. xiii.)

Joab, observing that the king was desirous of seeing his son, found means, by the interposition of an artful woman of Tekoah, to procure his consent for the return of Absalom. This woman, in a speech composed for the purpose, persuaded the king that in some cases the life of a murderer might be saved. Absalom, therefore, returned to Jerusalem; but David would not suffer him to appear in his presence. During two years, he continued in disgrace; but at the expiration of that time, he sent for Joab, and intreated him to intercede with the king in his behalf. Joab, however, refusing to go to him, Absalom commanded his servants to set fire to a field of barley, which belonged to Joab. On being informed of this, Joab went, and complained to Absalom, who confessed that the field had been set on fire by his orders, with the hope of procuring his mediation with the king. Joab related all that had passed to David, who commanded Absalom to be immediately introduced, and received him again into his favour. (Ibid. xiv.)

and horses. He came every morning to the gate of the palace, and calling all those, who wished to transact any business with the king, enquired of them their errand. When they had reported to him their business, he told them that their several causes seemed good and just, but that the king had deputed no man to determine them. Absalom also said, 'Oh that I were made judge in the land, that every man, which hath any suit or cause, might come unto me, and I would do him justice!' Absalom continued this practice for some time, and when any man came near to honour him, he put forth his hand, took him up, and kissed him. He practised this conduct during four years, and gradually won the affections of the people; and when he thought that he might declare himself, he requested permission of the king to go to Hebron, under pretence of performing there some vow, which he had made during his abode at Geshur. (Ibid. xv.)

It is observable, that the text, in the seventh verse, mentions forty years, as if Absalom had endeavoured to alienate the affections of the people during that time. The learned Usher, however, has shewn, that the forty years should be reckoned from the time that David was appointed by Samuel, and not from that of his reconciliation with Absalom. This rebellion took place about four years after the reconciliation; and several Latin MSS. Josephus and Theodoret, read four years only. Usher observes, that this rebellion broke out before or about Whitsuntide, in the year of the world 2980, and before Jesus Christ 1024. The particular time of the year appears from the new fruits and parched corn, which Barzilai brought to David in his flight. (Ibid. xvii. 28.)

Absalom having obtained the king's leave went to Hebron, and was accompanied by two hundred men, who followed him without knowing his wicked designs. In the mean time, he sent particular persons, whom he had attached to his interest, throughout all the tribes of Israel, and commanded them to sound the trumpet, and publish in every place, that Absalom was king at Hebron. Immediately a number of people joined him, and he was acknowledged by the greatest part of Israel. David being informed of Absalom's revolt, and that all Israel was of his party, fled with his officers from Jerusalem. Absalom immediately marched to Jerusalem, which he entered without resistance. Ahithophel advised him to abuse his father's concubines publicly, that all the people might understand by this action, that the difference could never be reconciled, and therefore might continue firm to him, without any thoughts of returning to their former allegiance. (Ibid. xvi.)

At the same time, Ahithophel proposed to Absalom, that some troops should be sent in pursuit of David, before he should have time to collect any forces. From this counsel, however, Absalom was diverted by Hushai, David's friend, who pretended to be of his party, but who gave notice of it to David.

The next day, Absalom marched against David with all his forces; and having crossed the river Jordan, he disposed his troops to attack the king his father. David ordered his forces to march out of the city under the command of Joab. In this engagement Absalom's army was routed; twenty thousand of his troops were killed on the spot, and the rest saved themselves by flight. Absalom was mounted upon a mule; and as he fled through the forest of Ephraim, in which the battle was fought, and was passing under a large oak, with very thick boughs, his hair was entangled among the branches, and his mule going on swiftly, he was left hanging. A man seeing him in this situation, informed Joab, who took three darts, and thrust them through the heart of Absalom. Ten young men that bore Joab's armour compassed about, and smote Absalom, and slew him. His body was thrown into a great pit which was in the wood, and on it was laid a large heap of stones.

Absalom had erected a pillar in the king's valley, saying, 'I have no son, and this shall be a monument to perpetuate my name.' He therefore called the pillar after his own name, and it was so denominated in the time of the author of the books of Samuel. (Ibid. xviii. 18.) Eastward of Jerusalem, in the valley of Jehoshaphat, is a monument which is shown to travellers, and which is said to be that of Absalom. Josephus, speaking of this monument, says, it was a marble column, distant about two furlongs from Jerusalem. Travellers assure us, that all, who go near Absalom's pillar, throw a stone at it, to express their abhorrence of the son's rebellion against his father, and that the heap of stones is so great as almost to cover the lower part of the monument. Though we are told that Absalom's body was thrown into a pit, in the forest of Ephraim, under a great heap of stones, it is probable that David, who lamented his son with such excessive grief, caused it to be removed and laid in the sepulchre of the kings, or perhaps near the monument.

In a passage to which we have already referred, the Scripture seems to intimate, that Absalom, when he erected the monument, had no children. In another place, however, it is said, that he had three sons, and one daughter of great beauty, who was called Tamar. (2 Sam. xiv. 27.) But it is probable, that these children, at least the sons, did not live. Some are of opinion, that Tamar, the daughter of Absalom, married Rehoboam, king of Judah.

It is observable, that Absalom was the first that used horses among the Israelites. Till his time, the kings rode upon mules, and the greatest nobles upon asses, as may be seen in the history of the Judges. Univ. Hist. vol. iv. p. 75; Bochart; Patrick.

ABSOLUTION signifies acquittal, and is also used for that act, by which the priest declares the sins of penitents remitted. The ministerial power of remitting sins was vested by Christ in the apostles, from whom it was derived to the Church. To more than this, the primitive Church never pretended, leaving the absolute, sovereign, independent, irreversible power of absolution to God alone. The ancients reckoned five kinds of absolution: 1. That of baptism; 2. That of the eucharist; 3. That of the word and doctrine; 4. That of imposition of hands and prayer; 5. That of reconciliation to the communion of the Church, by a relaxation of her censures. The first two may be called sacramental; the third, declaratory; the fourth, precatory; and the fifth, judicial. The first had no relation to penitential discipline, and was never given to persons, who had once received baptism. The second bore some relation to it, but did not solely belong to it; for absolution was given to all baptized persons, who never fell under penitential discipline, as well as to those, who lapsed and were restored to communion. In both respects this absolution was called the perfection of a Christian. By the third, the ministers of Christ publicly declared to men the terms of reconciliation and salvation. The fourth was used as a concomitant of most other absolutions. By the fifth, penitents were finally restored to the peace and full communion of the church. Anciently, no sinners were absolved till they had performed their regular penance, except in case of imminent death. With respect to the ceremony of absolution, the penitent was publicly reconciled, in sackcloth, at the altar, by this, or a similar form: 'He that forgave the sinful woman all her sins, for which she shed tears, and opened to the thief the gates of paradise, make you partaker of this redemption, absolve you from all the bonds of your sins, heal you by the medicine of his mercy, restore you to the body of the Church by his grace, and for ever keep you whole and sound.' The indicative form 'I absolve thee' instead of 'Christ absolve thee,' was not used till the twelfth century, a little before the time of Thomas Aquinas, who first wrote in its defence. Sometimes chrism or unction was added to the imposition of hands, in the reconciliation of such heretics and schismatics to the Church as had been baptized in heresy or schism; and the reason of this was, because their baptism out of the Church was null and void, and they were supposed to want the true effect of baptism, the grace or unction of the Holy Spirit. The time of absolution was commonly the day of our Saviour's passion. Some penitents were received into the church by absolution, even after their death, particularly such as died during the course of their penance. Absolution was primarily lodged in the bishop, who committed it to the hands of the presbyters and deacons only. However, in cases of extreme necessity, some canons allowed a layman to administer baptism, rather than that a catechumen should die unbaptized.

Some crimes incapacitated a sinner from ever receiving absolution; and these were idolatry, murder, and adultery. Though this rigour was afterwards abated, yet communion was denied to such apostates as remained obstinate and impenitent all their lives, and only desired reconciliation when death approached.

Speaking of the abuse of absolution in the Roman church, the judicious Hooker observes, "They strangely hold, that whatsoever the penitent doth, his contrition, confession, and satisfaction, have no place of right, to stand as material parts in this sacrament, nor consequently any such force as to make them available for the taking away of sin, in that they proceed from the penitent himself, without the privy of the minister, but only as they are enjoined by the minister's authority and power; except, therefore, the priest be willing, God hath, by promise, hampered himself so, that it is not now in his power to pardon any man; he hath no answer to make, but such as that of the angel unto Lot, I can do nothing!" Describing the true nature and effects of absolution, he afterwards says, "The sentence therefore, of ministerial absolution, hath two effects: touching sin, it only declareth us freed from the guiltiness thereof and restored unto God's favour; but concerning right in sacred and divine mysteries, whereof, through sin, we were made unworthy, as the power of the church did before effectually blind and retain us from access unto them, so, upon our apparent repentance, it truly restoreth our liberty, looseth the chains wherewith we are tied, remitteth all whatsoever is past, and accepteth us no less returned, than if we had never gone astray!"

Archbishop Tillotson has given his opinion of the use and intent of absolution in the following words: "Upon this miraculous gift of knowing the secrets of men's hearts, it seems to be very probable, that that which is commonly called, the power of the keys, did depend; I mean the power of remitting or retaining sins; for they, who had the privilege of knowing men's hearts, might do this upon certain grounds, and were secured from mistake in the exercise of their power upon particular persons; which the priests and ministers of the church now are not, nor can be; because they cannot see into men's hearts, whether they be truly penitent, and qualified for forgiveness, or not. For I cannot easily believe but that those words of our Saviour, whose sins ye remit, they are remitted; and whose sins ye retain, they are retained, were intended to signify something more than a mere declaration of the promises and threatenings of the gospel, which any man might make as well as the apostles and ministers of the church. For that God will forgive the penitent, and that he will not pardon the sinner, except he repent, is as true from any man's mouth, as from an apostle's: and as to the absolution of this, or that particular person, though a minister, by the skill and knowledge of his profession, is ordinarily and reasonably presumed, by virtue of his office, to be a better judge of a man's repentance, than other persons are, and therefore may, with more authority and satisfaction to the penitent, declare his judgment and opinion concerning him; yet not being able to see into his heart, he may be mistaken concerning him; and if he be, his declaring his sins to be forgiven, that is, his absolution of him, will do him no good; and on the other hand, his refusal to absolve him, if he be truly penitent, will do him no harm."

The archbishop says, farther, that, "protestants do not make the absolution of the priest at all necessary to the forgiveness of sins, but only convenient for the satisfaction and comfort of the penitent. For which reason, our church does not require a formal absolution to be given to the dying penitent, unless he himself desire it: which is a certain argument, that in the judgment of our church, the absolution of the priest is not necessary to the forgiveness and salvation of the penitent."

In the liturgy of the church of England are three several forms of absolution. The first, is that at morning prayer; "Almighty God, &c. who hath given power, &c. He pardoneth and absolveth," &c. The second is used at the visitation of the sick: "Our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath left power to his church, &c. by his authority committed to me, I absolve thee," &c. The third is in the communion service: "Almighty God, &c. who hath promised forgiveness of sins, &c. have mercy on you," &c. These three different forms, says Bishop Sparrow, are in sense and virtue the same. "For as when a prince hath granted a commission to any servant of his, to release out of prison all penitent offenders whatever, it were all one, in effect, as to the prisoner's discharge, whether this servant says, by virtue of a commission granted to me, under the prince's hand and seal, I release this prisoner; or thus, the prince, who hath given me this commission, pardons you; or lastly, the prince pardon and deliver you."

Before concluding this article, it is necessary to observe, that a late writer seems to be of opinion, that the Roman Catholics do not believe that a priest, bishop, or even a pope, can forgive a person his sins, unless that person be sincerely sorry for them, firmly resolved to avoid them through grace in future, and disposed to give satisfaction by penitential works, according to his capacity, to his offended God, and to make restitution, if he can, to his injured neighbour. Without these dispositions, they do not believe that God himself will forgive any man. Broughton's Dictionary of all Religions; Adams's Religious World displayed.

ABSTEMII was a name given to such persons as could not partake of the cup in the sacrament, on account of their natural aversion to wine.

ABSTINENCE is a religious duty, and denotes fasting or abstaining from necessary food. The Jewish law ordained, that the priests should abstain from wine, during the whole time that they were employed in the service of the temple. (Levit. x. 9.) The same abstinence was enjoined the Nazarites, during the time of their Nazariteship, or separation. (Numb. vi. 3.) The Jews were commanded to abstain from several sorts of animals. See ANIMAL.

By the Jewish law, the fat of all sorts of animals was forbidden to be eaten; and the blood of every animal in general was prohibited under pain of death. (Levit. iii. 17; vii. 23, &c.) The Jews also did not eat the sinew which is on the hollow of the thigh, though otherwise pure, because the angel that wrestled with Jacob at Mahanaim, touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh, and by that means occasioned the sinew to shrink. (Gen. xxxii. 25.)

Among the primitive Christians, some denied themselves the use of such meats as were prohibited by the law; others treated this abstinence with contempt. St. Paul has given his opinion as to these matters, of which we have an account in his epistles. (1 Cor. viii. 7, 10; Rom. xiv. 1, 2, 3.) The council of Jerusalem, which was held by the apostles, enjoined the Christian converts to abstain from meats strangled, from blood, from fornication, and from idolatry. (Acts, xv. 20.) St. Paul requires, that Christians should 'abstain from all appearance of evil,' (1 Thess. v. 22,) and also from every thing which is really evil, and contrary to piety and religion.

The spiritual monarchy of the western world introduced another sort of abstinence which may be termed ritual, and which consists in abstaining from particular meats at certain times and seasons, the rules of which are called rogations.

The apostolical Lent was observed only a few days before Easter. In the course of the third century, it extended at Rome to three weeks: and before the middle of the succeeding age, it was prolonged to six weeks, and began to be called quadragesima, or forty days' fast. About the time of the council of Eliberis, Saturday was a day observed for keeping the lesser fast in some of the western churches, and three days of abstinence were observed in the week. However, in time, the fast on Saturday was observed with greater strictness, and that on Wednesday was wholly disregarded. On the days of humiliation, it was customary to pray in a kneeling posture, contrary to the practice of offering their devotions standing. The latter was usual at those times when any joyful event was commemorated, or any festival observed. The increasing passion for austerities, which during the third century was so observable, must be ascribed to the increasing belief in the power of malignant spirits, who were supposed to be continually inciting men to the commission of evil, and whose influence was thought to be considerably diminished by abstinence and mortification. This opinion may be easily traced to the Gnostic philosophy, which insensibly became interwoven with the doctrines of Christianity; but a great number of the rites introduced into the discipline of the church can be considered only as an accommodation to Paganism. Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church.

ABSTINENTS were a sect of heretics, that appeared in France and Spain, about the end of the third century. They are supposed to have borrowed part of their opinions from the Gnostics and Manichæans, because they opposed marriage, forbade the use of flesh meat, and placed the Holy Ghost in the rank of created beings.

ABYSS, or DEEP. By this name hell is designated in Scripture. (Luke viii. 31; Rom. x. 7; Rev. ix. 1; xi. 7, &c.; Gen. vii. 11; Exod. xv. 5; &c. &c.) It is also the name of the deepest parts of the sea, and of the chaos, which in the beginning of the world, was covered with darkness, and upon which the Spirit of God moved. (Gen. i. 2.) According to some writers, by the Abyss we are to understand that vast quantity of water which is contained within the earth.

In the opinion of the ancient Hebrews, and of the generality of the eastern people at this day, the Abyss, the sea, and waters, encompass the whole earth, that floats on the Abyss, of which it covers a small part. According to the same people, the earth was founded on the waters, or at least its foundations were on the Abyss. (Psalm xxxiii. 7, 9; civ. 6.) Under these waters, and at the bottom of this Abyss, the scripture represents the giants as groaning, and suffering the punishment of their sin. There are confined the Rephaim, those old giants, who, whilst living, caused surrounding nations to tremble. (Prov. ix. 18; xxi. 16, &c.) Lastly, in these dark dungeons, the kings of Tyre, Babylon, and Egypt, are described by the prophets as expiating the

These depths are the abodes of devils or wicked men: "I saw," says St. John, "a star fall from heaven unto the earth, and to him was given the key of the bottomless pit. And he opened the bottomless pit; and there arose a smoke out of it, as the smoke of a great furnace; and the sun and the air were darkened by reason of the smoke of the pit. And there came out of the smoke, locusts upon the earth. And they had a king over them, which is the angel of the bottomless pit." (Rev. ix. 1, 2, 11.) In another place, the beast is represented as ascending out of the bottomless pit, and waging war against the two witnesses of God. (Rev. xi. 7.) Lastly, St. John says, "I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled: and after that he must be loosed a little season." (Ibid. xx. 1, 2, 3.)

In the opinion of the Hebrews, fountains or rivers are derived from the Abyss or sea. (Eccl. i. 7.) At the time of the deluge the depths below, or the waters of the sea, broke down their banks, and the fountains forced their springs, and spread over the earth. The Abyss, which, in the beginning of the world, covered the earth, and was put in agitation by the Spirit of God, (Gen. i. 2,) or by an impetuous wind, was so denominated because it afterwards composed the sea. Out of the midst of this abyss, the earth arose, like an island of the sea, and appeared suddenly, after having been for a long time concealed under water.

ABYSSINIAN CHURCH is that, which is established in the empire of Abyssinia, in Africa. The Abyssinians are a branch of the Copts, with whom they agree in admitting only one nature in Jesus Christ, and in rejecting the council of Chalcedon. Hence they are also called Monophysites, and Eutychians. The Abyssinian church is governed by a bishop, who is styled abuna, and who is sent into Abyssinia by the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria, residing at Cairo; but as the abuna is ignorant of the Abyssinian language, he takes little share in the government, and attends the court on days of ceremony only. In the Church of Abyssinia, are different kinds of degrees. The desperas are neither priests nor deacons, but a sort of Jewish Levites, or chanters, who assist in all public offices of the church. The komos are a kind of high priests, under whose care and superintendence, the inferior clergy, and the secular affairs of the parish are placed. The priests have their maintenance assigned them in the productions of the country. The emperor has a kind of supremacy in ecclesiastical matters, and receives holy orders. They have monks and canons. The former lead an austere and regular life, are poor, and live in a state of celibacy.

They differ from the Eutychians, in confessing that the nature of Christ is composed of two natures, the divine and human, which, being united, became one single nature. They practise circumcision on females as well as males. They eat no meats prohibited by the law of Moses; but this prohibition, as well as the rite of circumcision, is considered by them merely as a political institution. They observe both Saturday and Sunday as sabbaths. Women are obliged to the legal purifications. Brothers marry their brothers' wives, &c.

They celebrate the Epiphany with peculiar festivity; observe four lents; pray for the dead; and invoke angels. They adore images in painting, but abhor all those in relievo, except that of the cross. They admit the Nicene, Constantinopolitan, Ephesian, and some other provincial councils; and they consider the apocryphal books, and the canons of the apostles, as well as the apostolical constitutions, as genuine. They allow divorce, which is granted by the civil judge; and their laws do not prohibit polygamy. They have at least as many miracles and legends of saints as the Romish Church; and they pay so great a veneration to the Virgin Mary, that they charged the Jesuits with not rendering her sufficient homage. They maintain that the soul of man is not created, because, they say, God finished all his works on the sixth day. They disown the pope's supremacy, and transubstantiation, though they acknowledge the real presence of Christ in the sacrament. They administer the communion in both kinds. They believe in a middle state, in which departed souls must be purged from their sins, and may be greatly assisted and relieved by the prayers, alms, and penances, of their surviving friends. They use confession, and receive penance and absolution from the priests.

At different times, the Abyssinians have expressed an inclination of being reconciled to the Church of Rome; but the missions of the Jesuits and others in the seventeenth century for that purpose, were frustrated by the tyrannical and impolitic measures of the missionaries themselves. In the same century, the Lutherans attempted to spread the knowledge of the gospel among the Abyssinians; but their missions were also unsuccessful.

The first conversion of the Abyssinians is ascribed by some to the famous prime minister of their queen Candace, who is mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. However, it is probable, that the conversion of that empire was not perfected till the fourth century, when Frumentius, ordained bishop of Axuma by Athanasius, exercised his ministry among them with great success. They were esteemed a pure church till they embraced the errors of Eutyches and Dioscorus.

It is evident that at present the doctrines and ritual of the Abyssinian Church form a strange compound of Judaism and Christianity, of ignorance and superstition; and it seems difficult to determine, whether it be Jewish or Christian. It is, however, to be feared, that if it be Christian, it retains little more of Christianity than the name. Bruce's Travels; Universal History, &c.

ACACIANS were a sect of heretics of the fourth century, who derived their name from Acacius, bishop of Cæsarea. This bishop denied the Son to be of the same substance as the Father, though some of his adherents allowed the Son to be of a similar substance.

It was also the designation of another sect, who derived their name from Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, and a favourer of the opinions of Eutyches. The events, which followed the formation of this last sect, furnish proofs that the supremacy of the bishop of Rome was far from being universally acknowledged in the fifth century. Pope Felix II. deposed and excommunicated Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, who not only received the sentence with contempt, but in his turn, anathematized and excommunicated the Pope, and ordered his name to be erased from the diptychs, or sacred registers. This conduct of Acacius was approved by the emperor, the Church of Constantinople, by almost all the eastern bishops, and even by Andreas of Thessalonica, who was at that time the Pope's vicar for East Illyricum. This was the occasion of that general schism, which continued for twenty-five years, between the eastern and western churches. At length, the perseverance of the Latins triumphed over the opposition of the oriental Christians; and the name of Acacius was erased from the diptychs, and branded with infamy. Though several articles were alleged against Acacius, as his attachment to the Monophysites, &c. yet the true reasons of the Pope's hatred to him were his denying the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, and his efforts to enlarge the authority and prerogatives of the see of Constantinople. It is worthy of observation, that the eastern bishops did not adhere to the cause of Acacius, from any other principle than a persuasion of the illegality of his excommunication by the Roman pontiff, who, in their judgment, had no right to depose the first bishop of the east, without the consent of a general council. Mosheim.

ACADEMICS was a denomination given to the cultivators of a species of philosophy originally derived from Socrates, and afterwards illustrated and enforced by Plato.—The contradictory systems, which had been successively urged upon the world, were become so numerous, that, from a view of the variety and uncertainty of human opinions, many were led to conclude, that truth was beyond the reach of our comprehension. The consequence of this conclusion was absolute scepticism. Hence the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, the preferableness of virtue to vice, were considered by the Academics as uncertain. This sect, and that of the Epicureans, were the two principal in repute at the time of Christ's appearance, and were embraced and supported by persons of wealth and high rank. A consideration of the principles of these two sects will enable us to form an idea of the deplorable state of the world at the time of Christ's birth, and of the necessity that existed of some divine teacher, who might convey to the mind true and certain principles of religion and wisdom.

AC/CAD, אכר, 'Αρχαδ, signifies a vessel, a pitcher. It was the name of a city built by Nimrod, the situation of which is not sufficiently ascertained. By the Septuagint it is called Archad (Gen. x. 10.) Hence Dr. Wells is of opinion, that some marks of this name are still preserved in that of the river Argades, which flows near Sittace, a town situated at some distance from the Tigris, and anciently giving name to Sittacene, a country between Babylon and Susa. Hence also it is conjectured, that the city Sittace was formerly called Argad, or Archad, and derived its name of Sittace, or Psittace, from the great quantity of psittacias, or pistacias, a sort of nut, which grew in that neighbourhood. Strabo mentions a region in these parts, by the name of Artacene, which was probably formed from Arcad, and might be the ancient denomination of the country Sittacene, as Arcad was of the city Sittace; and Pliny expressly says, that Sittacene was the same as Arbelitis, or the country about Arbelia.

According to Abulfaragi, Accad is the same as Nisibis or Nisibeen, which is situated in the northern part of Mesopotamia, between the Tigris and the Euphrates, though it has been placed on the banks of the former by some geographers, who have confounded that river with the stream that runs by it. Nesibis, Nisibis, Nisibeen, or Nesbin (for all these names have been given to it), is situated in a level plain, with the hills of Mardin on the north, at the distance of from five to ten miles; the high mountains of Sinjar (Singar) on the south, distant about ten or twelve leagues; and a flat desert country, in general, to the east and west. The town is seated on the western bank of the river Mygdonius, the Saocaras of Ptolemy, now called merely the river of Nisibeen, which is still observed to overflow its banks on the falling of the autumnal rains, and the melting of the vernal snows; confirming the accuracy of Julian, who described it as inundating the country near the walls of the city, and watering the neighbouring fields. Several smaller streams run into this river, near the city itself.—Mémoires de l'Académie Royale, tom. xxvii. p. 31; Buckingham's Travels in Mesopotamia, vol. i. pp. 430—443, vol. ii. p. 463; Wells's Geography.

AC/CHO, or Auchoo, עכר, signifies close, inclosed. This city was afterwards called Ptolemais, (Acts xxi. 7.) and more latterly Acra or Acre. It is situated to the north of Mount Carmel, and enjoys every advantage both of land and sea. On the north and east sides is a spacious fertile plain; on the west, the Mediterranean Sea; and on the south, a large bay extending from the city as far as Mount Carmel. On the division, this city fell to the tribe of Asher; but the Israelites did not extirpate the inhabitants of Accho, which continued in the possession of the Canaanites. (Judg. i. 31.)

During a long time, this city was the theatre of contention between the Christians and Infidels, till at length, after a long siege, it was finally taken by the Turks, by whom it was treated with great indignity. Within the walls appear the ruins of the cathedral church; of the church of St. John, the tutelary saint of this city; of the convent of the knights hospitallers; and of the palace of the grand master of that order. This place is remarkable for the opposition, which Bonaparte here encountered from the English and Turks, who, under the direction of Sir Sidney Smith, compelled the French, after a long and memorable siege, to retire from Syria with great loss.

ACCLAMATIONS, were shouts of joy expressed by the people to denote their approbation of the preacher. It seems scarcely credible to us, that practices of this nature should ever have found their way into the church, in which all ought to be reverence and solemnity. Yet such practices were common in the fourth century. The people were not only permitted, but even sometimes exhorted, by the preacher himself, to approve his talents by the clapping of hands, and loud acclamations of applause. The usual words employed on such an occasion were, 'Orthodox,' 'third apostle,' &c. These acclamations being carried to excess, and often misplaced, were prohibited by the ancient doctors, and at length abrogated. However, even at present we find among some sects practices, which are not very decorous, and which consist of loud humming, frequent groaning, strange gestures of the body, &c. See DANCERS, SHAKERS.

ACCOMMODATION OF SCRIPTURE, is the application of Scripture, not to its literal meaning, but to something, to which it is analogous. Thus a scripture prophecy is said to be properly fulfilled, when that which is foretold comes to pass, and by way of accommodation, when an event happens to any place or people similar to what had before happened to some other. Thus the words of Isaiah, spoken to the people of his own time, are said to have been fulfilled in those who lived in the time of our Saviour:—‘Ye hypocrites, well did Esaias prophesy,’ &c. The same words are afterwards accommodated by St. Paul to the Jews of his time. (Isa. xxix. 13; Matt. xv. 8; Acts xiii. 41).

ACCURSED, denotes something under a curse, or sentence of excommunication. According to the idiom of the Hebrew language, accursed and crucified were synonymous terms. By the Jews, every one who died upon a tree was reckoned accursed. (Deut. xxi. 23.)

ACEL/DAMA, חקל-דמה, Ἀργός αίματος, signifies the field of blood, and was the name of that field, which the priests purchased with the thirty pieces of silver that had been given to Judas Iscariot, as the price of the blood of Jesus Christ. Judas having brought back this money into the temple, and the priests not thinking it lawful to use it for the service of so holy a place, they bought with it the potter's field, to be a burying-place for strangers. (Matt. xxvii. 8; Acts i. 18.) This field is shown at this day to travellers.

‘It lies,’ says Maundrell, ‘on the west side of the valley of Hinnom, and at present, from the veneration that it has obtained among Christians, is called Campo Sancto. It is a small plot of ground, not more than thirty yards long, and about half as much broad. One moiety of it is taken up by a square fabric, twelve yards high, built for a charnel house. The corpses are let down into it from the top, there being five holes left open for that purpose. Looking down through these holes, we could see many bodies in different degrees of decay: from which it may be conjectured, that this grave does not make that quick dispatch with the corpses committed to it, which is commonly reported. The Armenians have the command of this burying-place, for which they pay the Turks a rent of one sequin a day.’—Maundrell's Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 101.

ACEPHALI, signifies headless, and was a name given to a considerable body of the Monophysites, or Eutychians, who, by the submission of their leader Mongus to the decree of union published by the emperor Zeno in 482, had been deprived of their chief. This sect was afterwards divided into three others, called Anthropomorphites, Barsanuphites, and Esaianists; and these again were subdivided into others, which are frequently mentioned by the ancient writers. It is, however, necessary to observe, that these subdivisions of the Eutychian sect are not to be too easily adopted. Some of them are entirely fictions; and others are characterized by a nominal, and not a real difference.

These branches of the Eutychian faction did not long flourish. They gradually declined in the following century; and the influence and authority of the famous Baradeus contributed principally to their extinction, by the union he established among the members of that sect.—Mosheim.

ACHA'IA, Ἀχαία, signifies grief or trouble, and was a province of Greece, of which Corinth was the capital. In this city St. Paul preached, and St. Andrew suffered martyrdom. (Acts xviii. 12.) Under Achaia, the Romans comprehended Greece properly so called, and the Peloponnesus.

This seems to be the region intended when St. Paul, according to the Roman acceptance, mentions all the regions of Achaia, and directs his second Epistle to all the saints in Achaia. (2 Cor. xi. 10.) ‘It is worthy of remark, that Luke (Acts xviii. 12.) calls Gallio the deputy, that is, the proconsul of Achaia, which indeed was the proper title for the chief magistrate there, at the time he wrote; but it had not long been so, nor did it long continue to be the case. The propriety of the application, however, confirms, in no small degree, the authenticity of his narrative.’—Calmet.

ACHA'ICUS, Ἀχαϊκός, signifies a native of Achaia, and was the name of a disciple of St. Paul, who recommended him in a particular manner to the Corinthians. Achaicus, with Stephanus and Fortunatus, was the bearer of St. Paul's first Epistle to the Corinthians, A.D. 56. (1 Cor. xvi. 15. 17.)

A'CHAN, עכן, signifies he that troubles or bruises, or a snake. It was the name of the son of Carmi, of the tribe of Judah, who having discovered a Babylonish garment, a wedge of gold, and two hundred shekels of silver, among the spoils of Jericho, took and concealed them. This action was contrary to the command of God, who had cursed the city of Jericho, and devoted it to destruction. Some days after, Joshua sent three thousand men to possess themselves of the little town of Ai, which was distant from Jericho three or four leagues. But these men were attacked by the inhabitants of Ai, and compelled to flee. Though the loss of the Israelites was not considerable, only thirty-six of them being killed in the action, yet they were much discouraged. Joshua and the elders rent their clothes, and put dust upon their heads, crying to the Lord, and begging that he would not forsake his people in the midst of their enemies. ‘The Lord then said to Joshua, Get thee up, why liest thou upon thy face? Israel hath sinned, and they have also transgressed my covenant, which I commanded them; for they have taken of the accursed thing, and have also stolen, and dissembled also, and they have put it even among their own stuff. Therefore I will be with you no more, unless ye destroy the accursed from among you. Up, sanctify the people against to-morrow: the lot shall discover him who is guilty of this crime, and he shall be burnt with fire, he and all that he hath.'

The next day, therefore, Joshua assembled all the tribes of Israel, and having cast lots, the lot fell on the tribe of Judah, afterwards on the family of Zarhi, then on the house of Zabdi, and, lastly, on the person of Achan. 'Joshua said unto Achan, My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Israel, and make confession unto him; and tell me now what thou hast done; hide it not from me. And Achan answered Joshua, and said, Indeed I have sinned against the Lord God of Israel, and thus and thus have I done: when I saw among the spoils a goodly Babylonish garment, and two hundred shekels of silver, then I coveted them, and took them; and behold, they are hid in the earth, in the midst of my tent, and the silver under it.' Joshua immediately sent to Achan's tent messengers, who, finding in it what he had mentioned, brought the things to Joshua and all the Israelites, and laid them out before the Lord. Then Joshua and all the people taking Achan, and the silver, and the garment, and the wedge of gold, his sons and his daughters, his oxen and his asses, his very tent, and every thing that pertained to him, brought them all into the valley of Achor. And Joshua said to Achan, 'Why hast thou troubled us? The Lord shall trouble thee this day.' Then they stoned him and all his family with stones, and afterwards consumed his property with fire. Upon Achan they raised a great heap of stones, which, says the author of the book of Joshua, remains there to this day. This event took place in the year of the world 2553, and before Jesus Christ 1451. (Josh. vi. 17; vii. 1, 2, 3, &c.)

A'CHIOR, אחיור, 'Achiôr, signifies brother of light, or the light of the brother. It was the name of the general of the Ammonites, who, in the expedition of Holofernes into Egypt, joined that commander's army, with the auxiliary troops of his country. The inhabitants of Bethulia having shut their gates against Holofernes, and refusing to execute his orders, he called the princes of Moab, and the commanders of the Ammonites, and in a great passion demanded of them who these people were that opposed his passage, for he thought that the Moabites and Ammonites, who were neighbours to the Hebrews, could best inform him of the truth. Then Achior, gener: ' of the Ammonites, answered, My lord, these people were originally of Chaldea; their ancestors dwelt first in Mesopotamia; and because they would not worship the gods of the Chaldeans, they were obliged to leave their country, and settle in the land, which they at present possess. He continued to relate to him Jacob's descent into Egypt; the miracles wrought by Moses for the deliverance of the Israelites; and their conquest of the land of Canaan. Lastly, he told him, that this people had been always invincible, and, so long as they continued faithful to God, were visibly protected by him; but that, as soon as they showed any infidelity, God never failed to punish them. Now, therefore, he added, learn whether these people have committed any fault against their God; if they have, attack them, for he will deliver them into your hands; but if they have not, we shall not be able to conquer them, because God will undertake their defence, and cover us with confusion. (Judith v. 2, 3, &c.)

On hearing these words, the great men of Holofernes's army were inclined to kill Achior. Holofernes himself was transported with fury, and said to him, Since you have undertaken the office of a prophet, and have told us that the God of Israel would be the defender of his people, to prove to you that there is no other god besides Nebuchadonosor, my master, after we shall have destroyed all these people with the edge of the sword, we will also kill you; and you shall understand, that Nebuchadonosor is lord of all the earth. That you yourself may experience the vanity of your own prophecy, I will cause you to be carried to Bethulia, where you shall undergo the same dangers with this people, whom you consider as invincible. They carried him, therefore, through the hill countries, till they were pretty near the city, when they tied his hands behind him, and fastened him to a tree, that the people of Bethulia, who had come out against him, might take him, and carry him into the city. In the midst of the elders, and in a full assembly of the people of Bethulia, Achior declared to them what he had said, and what had befallen him. Then all the people of the city bowed their heads to the ground, and with great cries begged God's assistance, beseeching him to vindicate the honour of his name, and to humble the pride of their enemies. After this, they comforted Achior; and Ozias, one of the leaders of the people, received him into his house, and entertained him splendidly. (Id. vi. 2, 3, &c.)

Achior continued in Bethulia as long as the siege lasted; but when God had delivered Holofernes into the hands of Judith, and she was returning to the city with his head, Achior was called. Seeing the head of Holofernes, he was so terrified, that he fell with his face to the ground, and his spirits failed him; but recovering soon after, he abandoned the superstitions of the heathens, believed in God, was circumcised, and received into the number of the Israelites. (Id. xiii. 27, 28, &c.; xiv. 6, &c.) See JUDITH.

By some, the war with Holofernes is supposed to have taken place during the reign of Manasseh, king of Judah, in the year of the world 3348, and before Jesus Christ 656; but according to others, it happened after the return from the captivity at Babylon.

A'CHISH, אחיש, signifies thus it is, or is this? It was the name of a king of Gath. David having resolved to withdraw to some distant place from Saul, who sought an opportunity to kill him, retired to Gath, a city of the Philistines, of which Achish was king. The officers that belonged to Achish seeing David, asked the king whether this was not that David, who was respected as a sovereign in his own country, and whether it was not he, of whom it was said at a time of public dancing, 'Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands?' David hearing this, began to apprehend that his life was in danger. He therefore counterfeited madness in the presence of the Philistines, scrambled on the doors of the gate, and let his spittle fall down on his beard. Upon this, Achish said to his servants, 'Lo, ye see the man is mad; wherefore then have ye brought him to me? Have I need of madmen, that ye have brought this fellow to play the madman in my presence? Shall this fellow come into my house?' (1 Sam. xxi. 10, &c.)

Three or four years after this, or about the year of the world 2947, and before Jesus Christ 1057, David sent an offer of his service to Achish, and desired that he might be received either into the city, or into some other part of his dominions. Achish, who knew the valour of David, and the cause of the discontent which subsisted between him and Saul, received him cheerfully into Gath, together with his six hundred men, their wives and children. Here they continued for some time, after which David said to Achish, 'If I have now found grace in thine eyes, let them give me a place in some town in the country, that I may dwell there: for why should thy servant dwell in the royal city with thee?' Achish, therefore, gave him the property of Ziklag, in which David settled, and which afterwards pertained to Judah. (1 Sam. xxvii. 1, 2, &c.)

About two years after, the Philistines having taken the field, in order to encounter the Israelites, David received the commands of Achish to prepare for joining him in the war. David complying with the orders of the king, Achish told him, that he placed such confidence in him as to trust him at all times with the guard of his person. (Id. xxviii. 1, 2.) The Philistines, therefore, being come to Aphek, David and his people marched in the rear with Achish. But the princes of the Philistines observing the Hebrews, said to Achish, 'What do these Hebrews here?' To this he answered, 'Is not this David, the servant of Saul, the king of Israel, which hath been with me these days, or these years, and I have found no fault in him?' But the princes of the Philistines were wroth with Achish, and obliged him to dismiss David.

Soon after the battle of Gilboa, in which Saul and his sons were slain, David left Achish, and went from Ziklag to Hebron, in the tribe of Judah. (2 Sam. ii. 1, 2, &c.) From this time we find no mention of Achish in Scripture.

Whether this was the same Achish, who is mentioned in the twenty-first chapter of the first book of Samuel, and with whom David sought refuge in his first flight from Saul, or some successor of the same name, is a matter of dispute. His being called Achish, the son of Maoch, (1 Sam. xxvii. 2.) seems to imply that he was a different person; because these words can have no other use than to distinguish this Achish from another of the same name. Patrick's and Calmet's Comment.

A'CHOR, עכור, signifies trouble, and was the name of the valley in which Achan, his sons, and daughters, were stoned to death. It is evident from the circumstances mentioned in the history of Achan, that this valley was situated not far from Jericho, and in the north border of the tribe of Judah. (Josh. xv. 7.) Wells's Geography. See ACHAN.

ACH'SAH, עכשה, 'Ośā, signifies adorned, or, bursting of the veil, and was the name of the daughter of Caleb, who promised to give her to the man that should take Kirjathsepher, which, on the division, had fallen to him by lot. Othniel having taken the place, married Achsah. After the wedding, whilst they were conducting her to her husband's house, she persuaded her husband to allow her to ask of her father Caleb a field that was well watered. Alighting, therefore, off her ass, she threw herself at her father's feet, and said, 'Thou hast given me a south land,' (or dry land exposed to the south) 'give me 'also springs of water,' or land in which are springs of water. And he gave her the upper springs and the nether springs, or a field watered with good springs, as well as with dew and rains. (Josh. xv. 16, 17, &c.)

ACH'SHAPH, אכשף, signifies poison, tricks; or one that breaks; or the lip or brim of any thing. It was the name of a city, which belonged to the tribe of Asher, and the king of which was conquered by Joshua. (Josh. xi. 1; xii. 20; xix. 25.) Some think it probable, that Achshaph and Achzib are only different names for the same town of Ecdippa, on the coast of Phœnicia. Achzib was the same as that at present denominated Zib by the Arabs. It was situated near the Mediterranean sea, between Tyre and Ptolemais.

ACĒMETĒ, or ACOMETI, a name given to certain monks in the ancient church, who flourished in the fifth century, particularly in the east, and whom the writers of those times called ἀκρίται, watchers, because they performed divine service day and night without intermission. They divided themselves into three classes, each of which officiated in turn, and relieved the rest, so that they kept up a perpetual course of worship. They founded this practice on that passage of the apostle—'Pray without ceasing.' (1 Thess. v. 17.)

A kind of acemetœ still subsist in the Romish church. The religious of the holy sacrament keep up a perpetual adoration, some of them praying before the sacrament day and night.

ACOLYTHI, or ACOLUTHI, Ἀκόλουθοι, signifies followers, and was a term applied to young persons, who, in the primitive times, aspired to the ministry, and for that purpose continually attended the bishop.

In the Romish church, the acolythi were of longer continuance; but their offices were different from those of their first institutions. Their business was to light the tapers, carry the candlesticks and the pot of incense, and prepare the wine and water. At Rome were three kinds of acolythi: 1. Those who waited on the pope; 2. Those who served in the churches; and 3. Those who, together with the deacons, officiated in other parts of the city.

ACT OF FAITH, AUTO DA FE, in the Romish church, is a solemn day observed by the inquisition, for the punishment of heretics, and the absolution of the innocent persons, who have been accused. It is usually contrived that the auto shall fall on some grand festival, that the execution may take place with the greater awe and regard. At least, it is always on a Sunday. The auto da fe may be considered as the last act of the inquisitorial tragedy; it is a kind of gaol-delivery, appointed as often as a sufficient number of prisoners in the inquisition are convicted of heresy, either by their own voluntary or extorted confession, or on the evidence of witnesses. The process is as follows:—In the morning they are brought into a great hall, where they are clothed in certain habits, which they are to wear in the procession, and by which they know their doom. The procession is led on by dominican friars, who enjoy this privilege, because St. Dominic, their founder, instituted the inquisition. Before them is carried the standard of the holy office, in which the image of the founder is wrought in rich embroidery, holding a sword in one hand, and an olive branch in the other, with the inscription, Justice and Mercy. These friars are followed by the penitents, who have narrowly escaped burning, and who over their black coats have flames painted, with their points turned downwards. Next come the negative and relapsed, who are intended to be burnt, and who have flames on their habits pointing upwards. After these follow such as profess doctrines contrary to the faith of Rome, and who, besides flames pointing upwards, have their picture painted on their breasts, and surrounded by dogs, serpents, and devils, all open-mouthed. Each prisoner is attended by a familiar of the inquisition; and those intended to be burnt, have also on each side a Jesuit, who is continually advising them to abjure. After the prisoners follow a troop of familiars upon horseback; after them, the inquisitors, and other officers, upon mules; and lastly, the inquisitor-general, upon a white horse, led by two men with black hats and green hat-bands. A scaffold is erected sufficiently large for containing two or three thousand people; at one end of the scaffold are the prisoners, at the other end the inquisitors. After a sermon, consisting of encomiums on the inquisition, and of invectives against heretics, a priest ascends a desk near the scaffold, and having received the abjuration of the penitents, recites the final sentence of those, who are to be put to death, and delivers them to the secular power, at the same time earnestly beseeching that their blood be not touched, nor their lives put in danger!!! The prisoners being thus in the hands of the civil magistrate, are immediately loaded with chains, and carried first to the secular gaol, and thence, in an hour or two, brought before the civil judge. After inquiring in what religion they intend to die, the civil judge pronounces sentence on such as declare they die in the communion of the church of Rome, that they shall be first strangled, and then burnt to ashes; on such as die in any other faith, that they be burnt alive. Both are immediately carried to the place of execution, where as many stakes are set up as there are prisoners to be burnt, and about each stake is laid a quantity of dry furze. The stakes of the professed, or of such as persist in the heresy, are about four yards in height, and towards the top have a small board, on which the prisoner is seated. The negative and relapsed being first strangled and burnt, the professed mount their stakes by a ladder; and the Jesuits, after repeatedly exhorting them to be reconciled to the church, part with them, and say that they leave them to the devil, who is standing at their elbow to receive their souls, and to carry them with him to the flames of hell. On hearing this, a great shout is raised by the people, who cry, 'let the dogs' beards be made!' This is performed by thrusting flaming furzes, fastened to long poles, against their chins till their faces are burnt to a coal. This inhuman act is accompanied with the loudest acclamations of joy. At last, fire is set to the furze at the bottom of the stake, over which the professed are chained so high, that the top of the flame seldom reaches higher than the seat upon which they sit, and they seem rather roasted than burnt. There cannot be a more lamentable spectacle: the sufferers continually cry out, while they are able, 'Pity, for the love of God!' Yet it is beheld by all ages, and by both sexes, with transports of joy and admiration. See INQUISITION.

ACTS OF PILATE, a false and supposititious relation of our Saviour's trial before Pilate, composed by the enemies of Christianity, and containing the greatest blasphemy. By a solemn edict, the emperor Maximin commanded it to be sent into all the provinces of the empire, and enjoined the schoolmasters to teach and explain it to their scholars. This work was written with such carelessness or ignorance, that in it our Saviour's death is referred to the seventh year of the reign of Tiberius, which was eleven years before the passion of our Saviour, and five years before Pilate was governor of Judea.—Euseb. lib. ix. cap. 4. 6.

The genuine Acts of Pilate were sent by him to Tiberius, who reported them to the senate; but they were rejected by that assembly, because not immediately addressed to them. This is testified by Tertullian, in his Apol. cap. 5. 20, 21.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, a canonical book of the New Testament, which contains a great part of the lives of St. Peter and St. Paul, and which commences with the ascension of our Saviour, and is continued to St. Paul's arrival at Rome, after his appeal to Cæsar. This book, therefore, includes the history of twenty-eight or thirty years. St. Luke has been generally considered as the author of the Acts, and his principal design in writing it, was to compose a true history of the apostles, and of the foundation of the Christian church, in opposition to the false acts and false histories, which began to be dispersed in the world. The exact time in which St. Luke wrote the book of the Acts, is not known. It is evident that it was written after his Gospel, and two years after St. Paul's abode at Rome, on the first journey he made to that city, or about the sixty-second or sixty-third year of our æra. St. Luke speaks of this journey to Rome, and says that St. Paul 'dwelt two whole years in his own hired house.' (Acts xxviii. 30.) Perhaps he wrote it at Rome, whilst he remained with St. Paul during the time of his imprisonment. However, Jerome and many others are of opinion, that this book was written and published in Greece, whither Luke went after he left Paul, in the year of our Lord 63 or 64.

To the genuineness and authenticity of this book, the early Christian fathers bear unanimous testimony. Not to mention the attestations of the apostolic fathers, in the first century, we may remark that Irenæus and Tertullian, in the second century, both ascribed the Acts of the Apostles to St. Luke; and their evidence is corroborated by that of Origen, Jerome, Augustine, Eusebius, and all subsequent ecclesiastical writers. Further, Chrysostom and other fathers inform us, that this book was annually read in the churches every day between the festivals of Easter and Pentecost or Whitsuntide.

St. Luke does not appear to have intended to write a complete ecclesiastical history of the Christian church, during the first thirty years after our Saviour's ascension; nor even of St. Paul's life during that period; for he has almost wholly omitted what passed among the Jews after the conversion of that apostle, and is totally silent concerning the diffusion of Christianity in the east and in Egypt, the foundation of the church of Christ at Rome, the journey of St. Paul into Arabia, and many other subjects, for which the labours and sufferings of the apostles would have afforded the most interesting materials, if he had intended to compose an entire history of the church.

If we carefully examine the Acts of the Apostles, we shall perceive that St. Luke had two objects in view: 1. to relate in what manner the gifts of the Holy Spirit were communicated on the day of Pentecost, and the subsequent miracles performed by the apostles, by which the truth of Christianity was confirmed; and, 2. to deliver such accounts as proved the claim of the Gentiles to admission into the church of Christ, a claim disputed by the Jews, especially at the time when St. Luke wrote the Acts of the Apostles. To these some add, that St. Luke might design to record only those facts, which he had either seen himself, or had heard from eye-witnesses. Others are of opinion, that St. Luke designed his book to be only a concise specimen of the doctrines preached by the apostles, and that he was chiefly desirous of describing the manner in which the Jews, proselytes of the gate, or devout Gentiles, and the idolatrous Gentiles, were respectively converted. Hence, say they, this book may be divided into three parts. The first part contains an account of the propagation of the Gospel among the Jews only, from A.D. 33 to A.D. 41, including chapters ii. to x. The second comprises an account of the spreading of Christianity among the devout Gentiles, together with its farther progress among the Jews, from A.D. 41 to A.D. 44. (Acts x. to xiii.) The third part comprehends the diffusion of Christianity among the idolatrous Gentiles, together with its farther progress among the two preceding classes of persons, from A.D. 44 to A.D. 63. (Acts xiii. to xxviii.)

The Acts of the Apostles were evidently written with a tolerably strict attention to chronological order; though St. Luke has not affixed a date to any one of the facts recorded by him; but there are several parts of this book, in which ecclesiastical history is combined with political facts, the dates of which are known.

St. Luke wrote this work in Greek, and his language is in general purer than that of the other writers of the New Testament. Epiphanius tells us, that this book was translated out of Greek into Hebrew, or Syriac, which was the common language of the Jews of Palestine, but that those heretics corrupted it with many falsities and impieties, which were injurious to the memory of the apostles.

St. Jerome assures us, that a certain priest of Asia added to the true genuine Acts the voyages of St. Paul and St. Thecla, and the story of baptizing a lion. Tertullian informs us, that St. John the evangelist having convicted this priest of departing from the truth in his relation, he excused himself to the evangelist, by saying, that what he had done was occasioned purely by a love to St. Paul.

Ecumenius calls the Acts the 'Gospel of the Holy Ghost;' and St. Chrysostom, the 'Gospel of our Saviour's resurrection,' or the Gospel of Jesus Christ risen from the dead. In the history of the lives and preaching of the apostles, detailed in this book, we have the most miraculous instances of the power of the Holy Ghost; and in the account of those, who were the first believers, we have received the most excellent pattern of the Christian life.

The book of the Acts has been always esteemed canonical, though it was rejected by the Marcionites, the Manichæans, and other heretics, who were sensible that it clearly condemned their errors. St. Austin says, that the church received this work with great edification; and St. Chrysostom laments, that in his time, this book was too little known, and the reading of it too much neglected.

There were several spurious Acts of the Apostles: 1. The Acts of the Apostles, supposed to have been written by Abdias, the pretended bishop of Babylon. He affirmed, that he was ordained bishop by the apostles themselves, when they were upon their journey into Persia. 2. The acts or the voyages of St. Peter, which was originally produced in the school of the Ebionites. 3. The acts of St. Paul, which was intended as a continuation of St. Luke's work to the death of St. Paul, and which is entirely lost. Eusebius, who had seen this work, pronounces it of no authority. 4. The acts of St. John the evangelist, a book used by the Encratites, Manichæans, and Priscillianites. 5. The acts of St. Andrew, received by the Manichæans, Encratites, and Apotacticks. 6. The acts of St. Thomas the Apostle, used particularly by the Manichæans. 7. The acts of St. Philip, which was used by the Gnostics. 8. The acts of St. Matthias. Some have imagined, that the Jews, for a long time, had concealed the original acts of the life and death of St. Matthias; and that a monk of the abbey of St. Matthias, at Treves, having obtained them out of their hands, procured them to be translated into Latin, and published them. The critics, however, will not allow them to be genuine or authentic.—Lardner's History of the Apostles and Evangelists; Horne's Introduction to the Holy Scriptures; Benson's History of the first Planting of Christianity; Broughton's Dictionary.

A'DAD-RIM-MON, אדד-רמון, or HADAD-RIMMON, signifies the shoot of the pomegranate, or the height of the pomegranate, the invocation of the god Rimmon. It was a city in the valley of Megiddo, where was fought the famous battle, in which Josiah, king of Judah, was slain by the forces of Pharaoh-Necho, king of Egypt. (2 Kings xxiii. 29.) It was situated seventeen miles from Casarea in Palestine, and ten from Jezreel.

A'DAH, אדה, signifies an assembly. Adah was one of Lamech's two wives, and the mother of Jabal and Jubal. (Gen. iv. 19.) It is presumed that she had more children, but the names of the rest are no where mentioned. It was also the name of a daughter of Elon the Hittite, wife to Esau, and the mother of Eliphaz. (Ib. xxxvi. 4.)

AD'AM, אדם, signifies earthly man, red, of the colour of blood. Adam, the first man, and father of the human race, was created by God, of the dust of the earth. The Almighty breathed into him the breath of life, and gave him dominion over all the creatures of the earth. (Gen. i. 26, 27; ii. 7.) He created him in his own image and resemblance; and having blessed him, he placed him in a delicious garden in Eden, that he might cultivate it, and feed upon its fruits. (Ib. ii. 8, 15.) However, at the same time, God gave him the following injunction: 'Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die.' (Ibid. 16, 17.)

The first thing performed by Adam after his creation, and introduction into Paradise, was to give names to all the beasts and birds, which presented themselves before him for that purpose, as well to pay their homage to him, as to make him sensible that there was not among them a fit companion for him. (Ib. 19, 20.)

Now all other animals had been created by pairs, male and female, and man only was without a fellow-creature of his own species. Therefore, God said, It is not good for man to be alone, I will make an help-mate for him. For that purpose, the Lord caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and whilst he slept, he took one of his ribs, or some substance near his side; for the original does not strictly signify a rib; and in the Septuagint it is called πλεύρα. He closed up the flesh instead of it; and of the substance which he took from man, he made a woman, (womb-man, Saxon) or man-ess, whom he presented to Adam when he awoke. Then Adam said, This is now bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh, she shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man. Therefore shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh. And they were both naked, the man and his wife, and were not ashamed. (Ib. 21, 22, 23, 24, 25.) Adam also called his wife's name Eve, because she was the mother of all living. (Ib. iii. 20.)

Now the serpent being more subtle than any beast of the field, came to Eve, and said, 'Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?' The woman answered, that they might eat of all the trees of the garden, one only excepted, which they were forbidden to touch, lest they should die. The serpent replied, that they should not die. For that God knew the virtue of the tree; and that as soon as they had eaten of it, their eyes would be opened, and they would be as gods, knowing good and evil. Therefore, the woman seeing that the tree was good for food, and pleasant to the eyes, and desirable for wisdom, took of the fruit of it, and ate, and gave also to her husband, who did likewise eat. Immediately the eyes of both were opened, and they knew that they were naked; and having sewed fig-leaves together, they made themselves aprons to cover their nakedness. After this, as they heard the voice of the Lord walking in the garden in the cool of the day, they hid themselves from his presence, amidst the thickest trees of Paradise. Then the Lord called Adam, and said unto him, Where art thou? Adam answered, I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked, and I hid myself. God said, Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat? Adam replied, The woman, whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat. And the Lord God said unto the woman, What is this that thou hast done? And the woman said, the serpent beguiled me, and I did eat. Then the Lord God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life. And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel. Unto the woman he said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children, and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee. To Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it, the ground for thy sake shall be cursed, and in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life. Thorns also, and thistles, shall it bring forth to thee, and thou shalt eat the herb of the field. In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. Then the Lord made coats of skins for Adam and his wife, and clothed them. He also said, Behold the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil; and now lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever: therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden, to till the ground, from whence he was taken. So he drove out the man; and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden, cherubim, and a flaming sword, which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life. (Gen. iii. 1, 2, 3, &c.)

a state of innocence is very uncertain. It is probable that they did not immediately transgress the divine command; but it would seem by the narration of Moses, that their fall was not long after their creation. The Jews in general, and most of the Christian fathers, believe that it happened on the very day, on which they were created; but this is almost impossible, for a day would be too short for the several actions, which, on that supposition, it must have comprised. Besides, God himself, after the sixth day was past, declared (as at the end of the preceding days) that every thing was very good. This declaration would not have been consistent with truth, if sin, the greatest of all evils, had then entered into the world. Some have therefore conjectured, that this calamity happened on the eighth day from their creation; that as the first week of the world terminated with the formation of man and woman, the second was probably concluded with their fall. Others think that this event took place on the tenth day of the world's age, and that, in commemoration of the fall, the great day of expiation, which was the tenth day of the year, was afterwards instituted. If we can subscribe to the opinion of Mr. Whiston, who thinks that a day and a year were the same before the fall, there will be no difficulty in supposing it to have happened even on the sixth day.

Some little time after they had been driven out of Paradise, Eve conceived, and brought forth Cain, saying, I have gotten a man from the Lord. (Gen. iv. 1, 2, &c.) It is believed that she had a girl at the same time, and that she was commonly delivered of twins. The Scripture notices only three sons born to Adam, Cain, Abel, and Seth, and does not say particularly that he had any daughter. But Moses will not suffer us to doubt of his having many children, when he tells us, that he begat sons and daughters. Adam died at the age of nine hundred and thirty years; before Christ 3074. (Ib. v. 4, 5.)

This is all we learn from Moses concerning our first parent. But interpreters, not satisfied with this general relation, have invented numberless suppositions, and proposed a variety of questions, to illustrate this subject, and to supply the deficiencies of the narration of Moses.

I. In remarking on the history of Adam, we may observe, that besides the usual derivation of this name from אָדָמָה, (Admah) signifying vegetable earth or mould, other derivations have also been given. 1. In Sanchoniatho, protogonus signifies first made, and seems to be the translation into Greek of the Egyptian title of Adam. 2. Mr. Bryant says, Ad and Ada signify first, more laxly, a prince or ruler; and therefore Adad answers to Most High, or Most Eminent, and may probably be referred to Adam. 3. Sir William Jones queries whether Adam may be derived from Adim, which in Sanscrit means the first, and is a name of the first Menu. 4. Mr. Parkhurst supposes the name Adam to be derived from בדמות, (Bede-mut), which signifies likeness, that is, the likeness of God.

II. The formation of Adam is introduced with circumstances of superior dignity to any, with which the creation of the animals was attended. God said, 'Let us make man (1.) in our image, (2.) according to our likeness, and let him rule,' &c. These appear to be two ideas. First, 'in our image,' in our similitude, could not refer to his figure. 1. Because the human figure, though greatly superior to those of other animals, is not so distinct from them in the principles of its construction, as to require a special consultation, after the other animals had been formed. 2. If all the species of monkeys were made before man, the difference of some of them from the human form is so small, as greatly to strengthen the former argument. 3. The Scriptures, in other places, represent this matter as referring to moral excellencies; 'in knowledge, after the image of him who created him,' (Col. iii. 10.), in 'righteousness and true holiness,' (Eph. iv. 24), &c. &c. Secondly, 'According to our likeness,' is a stronger expression than the former, and more determinate in its application. If we connect this with the words following, and let him rule, perhaps the passage may be thus paraphrased: 'Man shall have, according to his nature and his capacity, a general likeness to such of our perfections, as fit him for the purposes, to which we design him; but he shall still more closely resemble us in the rule and government of the creatures; for though he be incapable of any of our attributes, he is capable of maintaining a purity, a rectitude, and a station of dominion, in which he may be our vice-gerent.' Thus, then, in a lower and less confined sense, man was the image of God: he possessed a kind of likeness to him, of which the creatures were absolutely void; and he had also a resemblance to God as his deputy, his representative, among and over the creatures; and for this he was qualified by holiness, knowledge, &c.

The day on which the creation ended was immediately succeeded by a sabbath; and on that evening, the first act of man was the worship of God. Where then is the wonder, that the custom of setting apart a sabbath obtained among his posterity, since not in Paradise only this custom would be maintained by Adam? For the reason of its being every seventh day, see MOON.

III. It would seem that the most proper idea to be affixed to the words, 'Adam became a living soul,' is, that Adam became a living person. 1. Because such is the import of the original, simply taken. 2. It having been mentioned that Adam was made of the dust of the earth, it was necessary also to mention his animation; and if the word

Adam be derived from Admah, earth, it might have been simply said, according to this idea, 'The earth (Adam) became alive.'

3. It, however, implies some real distinction between the nature of the living principle, or soul (not spirit) in Adam, and that of other animals. Perhaps we may suppose, that this principle, thus specially imparted by God, was capable of immortality; that, though the beasts might have died by nature, man would have survived by nature; and that he had no seeds of dissolution in him, but that his dissolution was the consequence of his sin, and the execution of the threat, dying thou shalt die. In fact, as Adam lived nearly one thousand years after eating the fruit, which, probably, poisoned his blood, we know not how long he might have lived, had he never taken that poison. Some poisons now exist, whose operation is gradual, continuing for many years, and producing a lingering mortality, an incessant death.

IV. It has been supposed by some, that to Adam, from his very creation, was imparted that knowledge which not only raised him above all men his descendants, but also rendered him a little, and only a little, lower than the angels. This may be admitted in some respects, and under certain restrictions. Adam could not be acquainted with any discovery, mode, or thing, which has originated since his time. He was created pure and holy, and therefore could not feel those baneful passions of the human mind, anger, jealousy, grief, &c. He could have no knowledge of disease, pain, &c.; of the changes of seasons, and their effects; of extreme heat or cold; of thunder or lightning; of ice, snow, &c. In short, it appears, that the glory of Adam's mind consisted in its freedom from any false bias; in its having no easily besetting sin to warp and injure it. The sensations becoming such a mind, were all the amiable passions, gratitude, love, and veneration towards God, affection and attention towards his partner, kindness towards the creatures, and universal good-will infinitely extended. To a mind so capable as Adam's, the contemplation of his Maker would occasionally furnish an increase both of piety and knowledge. The Almighty might more fully reveal himself, his attributes, &c. to the faith, or the conceptions of Adam. As experience ripened or prepared the mind of Adam for farther acquisitions, those acquisitions may have been granted him to degrees of knowledge, understanding, and acquaintance with subjects both celestial and terrestrial, inexpressibly beyond what human attainments or conceptions have ever known. In this sense, Paradise may have been a heaven on earth, abundantly receiving 'favour upon favour, grace upon grace.'

It appears that Adam knew so much of language, as to understand all that was necessary for him to know. He must have understood the prohibition respecting the tree of knowledge, and have been able to distinguish that and the tree of life by name. As Adam was capable of speech, it is probable he was enabled to use that capacity, by affixing to certain sounds, which expressed natural wants, those determinate ideas, which, ever after, when those wants recurred, prompted him to utter the same vocal sounds. His number of vocal sounds was greatly increased by his being appointed to give names to the creatures; and this may, perhaps, be justly considered as his first extensive lesson in language. The effect would be, that whenever afterwards he meant, for instance, to denote a sheep, he might perhaps use the name baa, taken from its voice. If he meant to denote a cow, he might call it boo.

V. Though Adam might be a man in capacity of understanding, yet he was only a child in experience; and perhaps it may be asserted without any risk, that scarcely one among the millions of his sons, arrived at man's estate, might not have been an overmatch in craft for his father Adam, in his condition of original simplicity. This, however, does not excuse the disobedience of Adam; because, as was his situation, so was the test proposed to him. It was not an active, but a passive obedience; not something to be done, but something to be left undone; a negative trial, which did not regard the mind, but the appetite only. Disobedient presumption, unrestrained desire, liberty extended into licentiousness, was the principle of Adam's transgression.

VI. The breaking of a beautiful vase may afford some idea of Adam after he had sinned. By transgression he lost the integrity of his mind. The first compliance with sin opened the way for all others. Spotless purity became defiled; and perfect uprightness becoming warped, lost that completeness, which had been its chief glory. Adam was deprived of that distinction, that character, which fitted him for conversing with his Maker, for immediate communion with perfect holiness. He was reduced to the necessity of accepting, of soliciting such communion mediately, not immediately; by another, not by himself; in prospect, not instant; in hope, not in possession; in time future, not in time present; in another world, not in this.

VII. How precisely have the same principles, which governed Adam, actuated all his posterity! Who is not self-convicted of pride? Whenever the sacred hands of Adam, stained with the blood of the victim recently offered to Jehovah, were extended in blessing his family, he might speak thus to his descendants: 'See in me the sad instance of disobedience to restraint. Had I constantly honoured that simple prohibition, I had been happy. How many restraints, now necessary for human welfare, had never been known! Now is man restrained from this, because to this he is prone; and from that, because that seems good, but in reality produces evil. Such was the character of my temptation! It offered pleasure, but I found it anguish; it allured the sense, but by it the very sense was depraved. Before I sinned I was serene, delighted, happy. After I transgressed, I became gloomy, turbulent, miserable; because I had violated the divine restraint; because in the midst of abundance, I had desired more; because, being a man, I had wished to be as gods; because knowing good only, I had desired to know evil also; and because I had lost the good, but obtained the evil.'

VIII. It is credible, that only, or chiefly in the garden of Paradise, were the prime fruits and herbage in perfection. The land in the vicinity of the garden might be much less finished, and forwarded only to a certain degree. To promote its fertility, by cultivation, was now the immediate object of Adam's labour; and in the sweat of his brow he himself ate bread. But the sentence passed on Adam and Eve, seems to consider them as the representatives of their posterity, the whole human race; and after noticing them personally, it appears to suggest the condition of the sexes, in the future ages of the world. Under this idea, the sentence is prophetic, (1.) of the seed of the woman, him, who was to bruise the serpent's head; (2.) of the condition of the female sex, its circumstances, and its duties; (3.) of the condition of the male sex, its labours, and necessary diligence, in the maintenance of its consort and offspring.

IX. Death closes the sentence, and is also prophetic of what should happen to Adam and all his descendants. As if it had been said, 'The poison in thy blood, though slow, is sure; though latent, yet it will act in time. I shall not exert my almighty power in curing this malady directly, but remedy its effects another way. I leave you in daily suspense of the time of your death; every day brings you nearer to that important event. This anxious uncertainty shall be the commencement of your punishment. It is one of the bitternesses of death. When your constitutions, intended for nobler purposes, shall sink under the effects of that poison they have received, the complete termination of life will more fully demonstrate its fatal effects, which, though suspended, are not annihilated, but which I now leave to their natural course.'

By the favour of God, the effect of this sentence is greatly mitigated. It pronounces pain to the woman, but that pain was to be connected with the dearest comforts, and with the great restorer of the human race. It pronounces labour to the man, but that labour was to be for the support of others dearer to him than himself, and, indeed, repetitions of himself. It denounces death, but that death is shown at a distance, and is the path to life.

X. The expression in the day (Beium), is used in the threat to man; it obviously has a general signification, and includes a period of time long past, or long to come. In that very day (Beium Hehua), has a more confined meaning, and expresses precisely a fixed time, an instant day.

XI. The mercy of God was still farther extended to Adam. Perhaps, he was not instantly expelled the garden, but was allowed some delay; at least so long as his farther instructions, as new rites of worship, and mediatorial institutions, required. Our first parents were now covered with a skin, doubtless of a beast; one skin served them both, for the word is in the singular, not in the plural number. They had endeavoured to cover themselves with trees; but the intertwining, the plaiting of a leaf, or leaves, of boughs, or branches, presented no image of death. It shed no blood, and expressed in it nothing that had the idea of atonement.

On the contrary, the skin of a beast was not to be obtained, without taking away the life of that beast; and the taking away of the life of that beast, must have reminded Adam that this was death.

How would Adam tremble, when he first selected the creature to be slain; when he led it towards the place appointed for its death; when he bound it, wreathed around it the confining twigs, and then proceeded to slaughter it! What would be his reflections, when its blood streamed, its limbs quivered, and at length it ceased to live! Its last gasp would thrill through his soul; and he would now feel what death was. To death he must also submit, and to it he had subjected his descendants to the very latest posterity. It seems evident, therefore, that the import of sacrifice was a memorial representation of death deserved, but escaped by transference to a substitute. See EVE, LANGUAGE, REVELATION, &c.

It is pretty generally agreed, that the serpent, which tempted Eve, was the devil, who, envying the privileges of man in innocence, assumed, for a time, the form of a serpent, and, tempting man to disobey the command of his Maker, was the cause of his forfeiting all those privileges, which he had received from God at his creation. This interpretation is supported by many passages of Scripture, in which the devil is called the serpent, and the old serpent. (John viii. 44; 2 Cor. xi. 3; Rev. xii. 9.) Some believe that the serpent then possessed the faculty of speaking, and conversed familiarly with the woman, without her conceiving any distrust of him; and that God, to punish the malice, with which he had abused Eve, deprived him of the power of speech. This is certainly placing the serpent above the level of the brute creation. Some maintain, that a real serpent having eaten of the forbidden fruit, Eve concluded she might also eat of it without danger, and by her disobedience in eating of the forbidden fruit, incurred the displeasure of God. This, say these last authors, is the plain fact, which Moses has related under the allegorical representation of the serpent conversing with Eve. Bekker thought that the natural serpent was not intended, but that the devil was the tempter, and was only metaphorically a serpent. This opinion, however, is no less liable to exception than any of the rest. For though the devil is frequently called in Scripture the serpent, the old serpent, yet why he should be called the most subtle beast of the field, we cannot conceive. Nor will the punishment inflicted on the serpent suffer us to doubt, that, at least, the body of a serpent was employed in this transaction.

The nature of the forbidden fruit is another circumstance in this relation, which has occasioned no less variety of conjectures. The Rabbins believe that it was the vine; some, that it was wheat; some, from the circumstance of Adam and Eve covering themselves with fig-leaves immediately after their transgression, tell us, that this fruit must have been the fig; some, think that it was the cherry; and the generality of the Latins, the apple. Those, who admire allegorical interpretations, suppose the forbidden fruit to have been merely the sensual act of generation, for which the punishment inflicted on the woman was the pain of child-bearing. But this opinion has not the least foundation in the words of Moses, especially if we consider, that Adam knew not his wife till after their expulsion from Paradise.

In our translation of the Bible, it is said, that our first parents 'sewed fig-leaves together, and made themselves aprons.' But the original denotes only that they adapted or fitted the flexible branches of the fig-tree round their waists, probably in the manner of a Roman crown.

Many have been the suppositions and conjectures on this subject in general; and some have so far indulged their imagination in the history of Adam, and the circumstances of the fall, as to pervert the whole narration of Moses into a fable, full of the most shameful extravagances, and productive of the most absurd heresies. We are assured that the heretics called Ophitæ, or Serpentine, believed Jesus Christ to be the serpent, which tempted the first woman. Others believe that the prince of the devils came in person to tempt Eve, and that he was mounted upon a serpent as large as a camel. Many Jewish writers have asserted that man and woman were created together, and fastened to each other by the shoulders. Not less fabulous are the stories respecting the stature and beauty of Adam, who is said to have been the greatest giant, as well as the handsomest man, that ever lived. The Rabbins tell us, that his stature was so prodigious, that he reached from one end of the world to the other; but that after his transgression, God pressed his hand heavily upon him, and reduced him to the measure of an hundred ells; others say, that he was reduced to this measure at the request of the angels, who were frightened at his first stature. In order to perfect his beauty, they tell us, that God, before he formed him, assumed a human body of the most exquisite beauty, after the pattern of which he created Adam. In this manner it was literally true, they say, that he was made after the image or resemblance of God.

Adam has also been the reputed author of several books. It has been supposed, that he possessed the most profound and extensive knowledge; and some have believed that he invented the Hebrew language. The Jews say, that he is the author of the ninety-first psalm, which he composed soon after the creation. It is very uncertain where our first parents were buried: some of the ancients believed at Hebron; but others maintained, that Adam was buried upon mount Calvary, where is a chapel dedicated to him.

Some Rabbins and oriental authors inform us, that Adam, during the time of his separation from his wife after his transgression, or as some say, after the death of Abel, begat genii, or familiar spirits, who, as the ancients affirm, had bodies. To these they apply the text of Scripture, that 'the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair; and they took them wives of all which they chose.' (Gen. vi. 2.) Others maintain, that these genii are older than Adam, and that as they had frequently rebelled against God, the Almighty resolved to confer the government of the world on a new species of creatures. For this purpose he created Adam, and commanded the genii to obey him. They, who refused submission to him, had Eblis, or Lucifer, at their head, and are what we call the evil angels. The rest, who continued in their duty, are the good angels, or sons of God. Both are supposed to be corporeal, and even subject to death.

It would be endless to relate the many fabulous stories of the Persians, Banians, Mahometans, Cabalists, Talmudists, and other eastern nations and sects, relative to the creation of Adam and Eve, their fall, and that of the angels.—Additions to Calmet's Dict.; Universal History; Patrick's Comment.

AD'AM, or אָדָם, signifies earth, earthy, red, or bloody. It was the name of a city, that was probably so called from the colour of the soil in its neighbourhood, which is understood to have been a stiff clay.—Some, however, suppose that the word Adam denotes beauty or symmetry, and therefore, that this town was handsome. This city was situated in Perea, on the banks of the river Jordan, opposite to Jericho. It was towards the south of the sea of Cinnereth, or Galilee, and was the centre, where the waters separated. (Josh. iii. 16.) Wells's Geography; Sacred Geography.

AD'AMAH, or אֲדָמָה, signifies bloody, earthy, or red earth. It was one of the four cities, which were destroyed by fire from heaven, and buried under the waters of the Dead Sea. (Gen. xiv. 2. Deut. xxix. 23. Hosea xi. 8.) It was the most easterly of those which were swallowed up. It is probable that it was not entirely sunk under the waters, or that the inhabitants of the country built a new city of the same name, on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, for Isaiah, according to the Septuagint, 'says that God will destroy the Moabites, the city of Ar, and the remnant of Adamah,' (Ἀρὼ τὸ σπέρμα Μωὰβ, καὶ Ἀριήλ, καὶ τὸ κατὰ-λοιπον Ἀδάμα, Isaiah xv. ult.) This town probably derived its name from the neighbourhood.

ADAMITES were a sect that arose in the second century of the Christian Church. The author of this sect was Prodicus, a disciple of Carpocrates. They assumed the name of Adamites, and pretended to the innocence of Adam, whose nakedness they imitated in their churches, which they called Paradise. Community of women was one of their principal tenets; they condemned the state of matrimony, and lived, or pretended to live, in solitude and continency. When one of them was guilty of any particular crime, they called him Adam, and said that he had eaten of the forbidden fruit; and when they expelled him their assembly, they called it driving him out of Paradise. This obscure and ridiculous sect did not long continue. It was, however, revived with additional absurdities, in the twelfth century. About the beginning of the fifteenth century, one Picard, a native of Flanders, spread these errors in Bohemia, whither he and his followers retired. Their opinions were afterwards disseminated through Germany, and also found some partisans in Poland, Holland, and England. The Adamites assembled in the night; and one of the fundamental maxims of their society was the following:

Jura, perjura, secretum prodere noli;

Swear, forswear, and reveal not the secret.

AD'DAR, אָדָר, signifies a cloak, or power, or grandeur. It is the twelfth month of the ecclesiastical year, and the sixth of the civil year among the Hebrews. It consists of only twenty-nine days, and corresponds with our February, but sometimes continues into March, according to the course of the moon. See MONTH.

On the third day of Adar, the building of the temple was finished, and it was dedicated with great solemnity, in the year of the world 3489, and before Jesus Christ 515. (Ezra vi. 15.) On the seventh day the Jews celebrate a fast, on occasion of the death of Moses. On the thirteenth they celebrate a fast called Esther's, in memory of that observed by Mordecai, Esther, and the Jews of Susa, to avert the calamities, with which they were threatened by Haman. On the fourteenth, they celebrate the festival of Purim, on account of their deliverance from the cruelty of Haman. (Esth. ix. 17.) The twenty-fifth is observed in commemoration of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, who was advanced by Evil-merodach above other kings that were at his court. (Jerem. lli. 31, 32.) The lunar year, which the Jews have followed in their calculation, is shorter than the solar year by eleven days; and as these days at the end of three years make a month, they then insert a thirteenth month, which they call Veadar, or a second Adar, and which consists of twenty-nine days.

ADESSENARIANS were a branch of the Sacramentarians, and derived their name from the Latin word adesse, to be present, because they believed the presence of Christ's body in the eucharist, though in a manner different from the Romanists.

ADIAPHORISTS, is derived from the Greek word ἀδιάφορος, indifferent, and was a name given in the sixteenth century to the moderate reformers, who adhered to the sentiments of Melancthon, and afterwards to those who subscribed the Interim of Charles V. Melancthon declared, that in matters of an indifferent nature, compliance was due to the imperial edicts; and hence arose the adia-phoristic controversy, which divided the church during many years, and proved highly detrimental to the progress of the Reformation. See INTERIM.

AD'ONAI, אדני, signifies my lords in the plural, and my lord in the singular number. It is one of the names of God. The Jews, who, either from respect or superstition, do not pronounce the name Jehovah, read Adonai instead of it, as often as they meet with Jehovah in the Hebrew text. But the ancient Jews were not so scrupulous; and there is no law which forbids them to pronounce the name of God.

ADONIBE'ZEK, אדני-בזק, signifies the lightning of the Lord, or the Lord of lightning; or the Lord of Bezek. Adonibezek was king of the city of Bezek, in the land of Canaan. He was a powerful and cruel prince; and having taken seventy kings, he ordered the extremities of their hands and feet to be cut off, and compelled them to gather their meat under his table. (Judg. i. 7, &c.) After the death of Joshua, Judah and Simeon marched against Adonibezek, who was at the head of an army of Canaanites and Perizzites.—They defeated him, killed ten thousand of his men, and having taken him alive, cut off his thumbs and great toes. Adonibezek then acknowledged the justice of this punishment, and confessed that God had treated him in the same manner in which he had treated the seventy princes, who had fallen into his power. Afterwards the Hebrews carried him to Jerusalem, where he died, in the year of the world 2585, and before Jesus Christ 1419. (Judg. i. 1, 2, 3, &c.)

ADONIJAH, אדנייה, signifies the Lord is my master. Adonijah, the fourth son of David and Haggith, was born at Hebron, at the time when his father was acknowledged king by only one part of Israel. (2 Sam. iii. 4.) When his elder brothers, Amnon and Absalom were dead, Adonijah conceived that the crown of Judah, by right of birth, belonged to him; and as David, in the latter part of his life, had fallen into so weak a state, that he could not attend to the affairs of the government, he thought that he ought to endeavour, before his father's death, to be acknowledged king. He therefore set up a magnificent equipage, took horsemen into his service, and had fifty men to run before him. David, his father, never re-proved him for this. Adonijah was the eldest of the royal family, handsome, beloved by the king, and had a powerful party at court.

In particular, he possessed a great ascendancy over Joab, the general of David's armies, and over Abiathar the priest; but neither Zadok the priest, nor Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada, captain of the king's guards, nor Nathan the prophet, nor the body of David's army, were of his party. Adonijah made a great entertainment for his adherents, near the fountain of Rogel, east of the city, and invited to it all the king's sons except Solomon, and the principal persons of Judah, except Nathan, Zadok, and Benaiah. At that meeting, he designed to procure himself to be proclaimed king, and to obtain possession of the government before the death of David. Matters, however, happened otherwise.

Nathan, having understood what was transacting, went directly to Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, and advised her to go and inform the king, and to remind him of his promise in favour of her son. In compliance with this advice, Bathsheba went immediately to the king, and while she was talking with him, Nathan, as had been before agreed, came and gave the king an account of Adonijah's feast, company, and design, desiring to know whether it was with his consent. The king, surprised at this report, commanded that Solomon should be immediately set upon his own mule, and accompanied by his guards, and by Zadok, Benaiah, and others of his chief officers, carried to Gihon, where he should be crowned king, and that he should be afterwards seated upon the royal throne, and proclaimed his successor by the sound of trumpet.

The king's commands were executed with such dispatch, that Adonijah and his company did not obtain the least knowledge of what had taken place, till they heard the shouts of 'Long live King Solomon.' Soon after, Jonathan, the son of Abiathar, came and gave them an account of the whole proceeding. This unexpected news so amazed them, that they all fled in the utmost haste; and Adonijah seeing himself deserted, sought refuge at the horns of the altar. Solomon being informed that Adonijah had taken sanctuary, sent him word, that if he conducted himself in future as a good subject, he would not injure one hair of his head, but that if he attempted another disloyal action, he should certainly be punished with death. On this, Adonijah came and humbled himself before the new king, and was afterwards ordered to retire to his own house, (1 Kings i. 1, 2, 3, &c.) This happened in the year of the world 2989, and before Jesus Christ 1015.

Sometime after David's death, Adonijah, by means of Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, solicited that he might marry Abishag, the recent wife of king David, his father.—Solomon replied, 'Why dost thou ask Abishag the Shunammite for Adonijah? Ask for him the kingdom also; for he is mine elder brother; even for him, and for Abiathar the priest, and for Joab, the son of Zeruah.' Then Solomon swore by the Lord, saying, 'God do so to me, and more also, if Adonijah has not spoken this word against his own life. I swear by the Lord, Adonijah shall be put to death this day.' Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada, being sent to kill Adonijah, slew him, in the year of the world 2990, and before Jesus Christ 1014. (Id. ii. 13, &c.)

ADONIS, אָדוֹנִיס, Thamuz, signifies concealment, or burning, according to the Syriac; or secret, because Adonis was kept in a coffin. The text of the vulgate in Ezekiel (viii. 14.) says, that the prophet saw women sitting in the temple, and weeping for Adonis; but according to the reading of the Hebrew text, they are said to weep for Thamuz, or Tammuz, the hidden one. Among the Egyptians Adonis was adored under the name of Osiris, the husband of Isis. But he was sometimes called by the name of Ammuz, or Tammuz, the concealed, probably to denote his death or burial. The Hebrews, in derision, sometimes call him the dead, (Psalm cvi. 28; Lev. xix. 28.) because they wept for him, and represented him as dead in his coffin; and at other times, they denominate him the image of jealousy, (Ezek. viii. 3. 5.) because he was the object of Mars' jealousy. The Syrians, Phœnicians, and Cyprians, called him Adonis; and Calmet is of opinion, that the Ammonites and Moabites designated him by the name of Baal-peor. See BAAL-PEOR.

The manner in which they celebrated the festival of this false deity was as follows: they represented him as lying dead in his coffin, wept for him, bemoaned themselves, and sought for him with great eagerness and inquietude. After this, they pretended that they had found him again, and that he was still living. At this good news they exhibited marks of the most extravagant joy, and were guilty of a thousand lewd practices, to convince Venus how much they congratulated her on the return and revival of her favourite, as they had before consoled with her on his death. The Hebrew women, of whom the prophet Ezekiel speaks, celebrated the feasts of Tammuz, or Adonis, in Jerusalem; and God showed the prophet these women weeping for this infamous god, even in his temple. See TAMMUZ.

Fabulous history gives the following account of Adonis: he was a beautiful young shepherd, the son of Cinyras, king of Cyprus, by his own daughter Myrrha. The goddess Venus fell in love with this youth, and frequently met him on Mount Libanus. Mars, who envied this rival, transformed himself into a wild boar, and as Adonis was hunting, struck him in the groin and killed him. Venus lamented the death of Adonis in an inconsolable manner. The eastern people, in imitation of her mourning, generally established some solemn days for the bewailing of Adonis. After his death, Venus went to Hell, and obtained from Proserpine, that Adonis might be with her six months in the year, and continue the other six in the infernal regions. Upon this were founded those public rejoicings, which succeeded the lamentations of his death. Some say, that Adonis was a native of Syria; some, of Cyprus; and others, of Egypt.

One of the ceremonies in the festival of Adonis, consisted in the women having their heads shaven, after the manner of the Egyptians at the death of Apis. They, who refused to be shaven, were obliged to prostitute themselves a whole day to strangers; and the money thus obtained was consecrated to Venus, in whose temple the ceremonies were performed. Calmet thinks, that the fabulous relations respecting the birth of Adonis, are much the same as those we learn from the sacred history concerning Lot's incest with his daughter. He also thinks that there is some affinity between Chemosh, the deity of the Moabites, and Ammuz, or Tammuz, which is the same as Adonis.—Macrobius informs us, that Adonis represented the sun, which during six months of the year is with Venus, or the earth, and absent the other six. Chemosh also represented the sun, and under this notion was adored by the Moabites. See LOT and CHEMOSH.

By Adonis some mythologists understand corn, which is hidden six months in the earth, before the time of the harvest. Adonis is said to have been killed by a wild boar, that is, by winter, which extinguishes the heat of summer, and is the enemy of Venus and Adonis, or of beauty and procreation. The scene of Adonis's history is said to have been at Byblos in Phœnicia, where, once a year, the river Adonis changed the colour of its waters, and appeared as red as blood. This was the signal for celebrating their Adonia, or feast of Adonis. The common people were induced to believe, that the Egyptians, during these feasts, sent by sea a box, which was made of rushes, or Egyptian paper, and formed in the shape of a head, in which was inclosed a letter, informing the inhabitants of Byblos, that their god Adonis, whom they considered as lost, had been found. The vessel, which carried this letter, always arrived safe at Byblos, at the end of seven days.

ADONIZE'DEK, אֲדֹנִיזֶדֶק, signifies justice of the Lord, or the Lord of justice. Adonizedek was king of Zedek or Jerusalem: for this city is supposed to have had four names, Salem, Jerusalem, Jebus, and Zedek. A proof of this last name we have in Melchizedek, which signifies the king of Zedek or Salem. Adonizedek being informed that the inhabitants of Gibeon had submitted to the Hebrews, and that the cities of Jericho and Ai had been destroyed by them, was very much terrified, and considered by what means he might put a stop to the conquests of the Israelites. For this purpose, he sent to Hotham king of Hebron, to Piram king of Jar-muth, to Japhia king of Lachish, and to Debir king of Eglon, and invited them to join him, that they might take Gibeon, and chastise the inhabitants, who had submitted to Joshua. These five kings, therefore, marched against Gibeon, and besieged it, in the year of the world 2553, and before Jesus Christ 1451. Upon this, the Gibeonites sent in haste to demand succours from Joshua, who was still at Gilgal. Joshua, without delay, chose some of the bravest men of his army, and marching all night, attacked the enemy at break of day. The Lord having spread a terror among the troops of these confederate princes, he made a great slaughter, and pursuing them towards Beth-horon, continued to cut them in pieces, till they reached Azekah and Makkedah. In their flight came on a dreadful tempest of hail-stones, of such an enormous size, that they suffered more from the hail-stones, than from the sword of Joshua. In so general a dispersion, many might have escaped, had not the sun, at the prayer of Joshua, stopped his course, that the Israelites might see to overtake and destroy the scattered multitude.

The five kings, perceiving only destruction before them, hid themselves in a cave near the town of Makkedah. This being reported to Joshua, he commanded the mouth of the cave to be stopped with large stones, and left men sufficient to guard it. In the meantime, the Israelites continued the pursuit till evening. When they returned to the camp near Makkedah, Joshua ordered the mouth of the cave to be opened; and producing the five kings before the whole army of Israel, he said to the principal officers, 'Come near, put your feet upon the necks of these kings.' He added, 'Fear not, nor be dismayed, for thus shall the Lord do to all your enemies, against whom ye fight.' Afterwards, Joshua smote the five kings, and slew them, and hanged them upon five trees, until evening; and at the time of the going down of the sun, he commanded them to be taken from the trees, and cast into the cave, in which they had been hid, and the mouth of the cave to be covered with great stones. (Josh. x. 1, 2, &c.)

ADOPTION, an act, by which any person receives another into his own family, owns him for his son, and appoints him his heir. It does not appear that adoption, properly so called, was used by the Hebrews. Moses does not mention it in his laws. Jacob's adoption of his two grandsons, Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. xlviii. 14), was merely a kind of substitution, by which he intended that the two sons of Joseph should each possess their lot in Israel, as if they had been his own sons, and the effect of which related only to the increase of fortune and inheritance between them. A kind of adoption used by the Israelites, consisted in the obligation of one brother to marry the widow of another, who died without children. (Deut. xxv. 5; Ruth iv.; Matt. xxii. 24.) The children, therefore, that were born of this marriage, were considered as belonging to the deceased brother, and were called by his name. This practice was used before the law, as may be seen in the history of Tamar. (Gen. xxxviii. 6.) Neither of these, however, was the adoption so well known among the Greeks and Romans. Pharaoh's daughter adopted Moses; (Exod. ii. 10.) and Mordecai, Esther (Esth. ii. 7.) We are not acquainted with the ceremonies observed on these occasions, nor how far the privileges of adoption extended. But it is presumed, that the adoption was of the same kind as that mentioned in the Roman law, by which the adopted children participated in the estate with the natural children, assumed the name, and became subject to the paternal authority of the person who adopted them.

By the propitiation of our Saviour, and the communication of the merits of his death, penitent sinners become the adopted children of God, and heirs of the inheritance in heaven. This is taught us by St. Paul, in the following passages of his epistles: 'Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father.' (Rom. viii. 15.) 'We ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body.' (Id. ibid. 23.) — 'When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons.' (Gal. iv. 4, 5.)

Among the Mahometans the ceremony of adoption is performed by obliging the person adopted to pass through the shirt of the person, who adopts him. Something like this is observable among the Hebrews. Elijah adopted the prophet Elisha, and communicated to him the gift of prophecy, by putting his mantle upon him. (1 Kings xix. 19.) When Aaron was about to die, Moses dressed Eleazar in that high priest's vestments, to show that Eleazar succeeded him in the functions of the priesthood, and that he was adopted to the exercise of this dignity. (Num. xx. 26.) St. Paul in several places says, that Christians 'put on the Lord Jesus Christ,' that they 'put on the new man,' to denote their adoption as sons of God, (Rom. xiii. 14; Gal. iii. 27; Ephes. iv. 24; Coloss. iii. 10.)

AD'ORAM, אֲדֹרָם, signifies their beauty, their power, and their cloak; or, praise, or a cry raised. Adoram was the name of the chief treasurer to Rehoboam. This prince having provoked the ten tribes by his haughty and imprudent answers, and induced them to separate from the house of David, probably thought that he should be able to appease them by sending to them Adoram, chief receiver of the tribute-money, or principal surveyor of the works. Many are of opinion, that Adoram was the same as Adoniram, who had executed this office under Solomon. Whether, therefore, Rehoboam intended to reduce them by harsh or gentle means, or whether he designed to make some concessions to them, by putting into their hands Adoram, who had been the instrument of those vexations, which they had suffered in the preceding reign, seems uncertain. However, the people, who had been extremely irritated, fell upon Adoram, and stoned him to death. (1 Kings xii. 18, &c. See also 2 Sam. xx. 24.)

ADORATION, the act of rendering divine honours, and includes reverence, esteem, and love: this is called supreme or absolute. The word is compounded of ad, 'to,' and os, oris, 'a mouth,' and literally signifies, the applying of the hand to the mouth, 'to kiss the hand.' This in the eastern countries was a great mark of respect and submission. (See Job xxxi. 26, 27. 1 Kings xix. 18.) But we find, that the attitude of adoration has not been confined to this mode. Standing, kneeling, uncovering the head, prostration, bowing, lifting up the eyes to heaven, or fixing them on the earth, sitting with the under part of the thighs resting on the heels, have all been used as expressive of veneration and esteem. But whatever be the form, it ought to be remembered, that adoration is an act, which is properly due to God alone. (Matt. iv. 10; Acts x. 25, 26; Rev. xix. 10.)

It is also used in Scripture for those marks of outward respect, which belong to kings, great men, and superior persons. (Gen. xviii. 2; xxiii. 7; Exod. iv. 31.)

In some churches it consists in the worship paid to an object as belonging to, or representative of another. In this sense, the Romanists profess to adore the cross, not simply, or immediately, but in respect of Jesus Christ, whom they suppose to be upon the cross. This, however, is generally considered by the Protestants as idolatry. See IDOLATRY.

ADRAM'MELECH, אֲדָרָמֶלֶךְ, signifies the cloak, glory, grandeur, or power of the king, and was the name of the son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria. This king returning to Nineveh, after his unfortunate expedition into Judea, against king Hezekiah, was killed by his two sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer, whilst he was performing his devotions in the temple of Nisroch, his god. It is uncertain what induced these two princes to be guilty of parricide. After they had committed the murder, they fled for safety to the mountains of Armenia, and their brother, Esar-haddon, succeeded to the crown. (Isaiah xxxvii. 38; 2 Kings xix. ult.)

ADRAMMELECH was one of the gods adored by the inhabitants of Sepharvaim, that settled in the country of Samaria, in the place of those Israelites, who were carried beyond the Euphrates. The Sepharvaites obliged their children to pass through the fire in honour of this idol, and of another called Anammelech. (2 Kings xvii. 31.) The Rabbins pretend that Adrammelech was represented under the form of a mule: but there is greater reason to believe, that Adrammelech denoted the sun, and Anammelech the moon: the former signifying the magnificent king, the latter the gentle king. See ANAMMELECH.

The learned Hyde is of opinion, that Adrammelech signifies king of the flocks; and he supposes that Adrammelech and Anammelech were worshipped as protectors of cattle.

ADRAMYT'TIUM, Ἀδραμύττιον, signifies pure solidity; or rather, the court of death, the mansion of death. Adramyttium was a maritime town of Mysia, in Asia Minor, opposite to the island of Lesbos. We read in the Acts of the Apostles, that St. Paul, in his first voyage to Italy, embarked in a ship belonging to Adramyttium. (Acts xxvii. 1, 2.)

A'DRIA, Ἀδρία, a city of Italy, on the Tartaro, in the state of Venice. It gives name to the Adriatic Sea, which is sometimes called simply Adria. (Acts xxvii. 27.) When Paul says that they were tossed in Adria, he does not mean (observes Dr. Whitby) the Adriatic Gulf, which ends with the Illyrian Sea, but the Adriatic Sea, which, according to Hesychius, is the same as the Ionian Sea. How then could St. Paul's ship, which was near to Malta, and so in the Lybian or Sicilian Sea, be in the Adriatic? To this it is answered, that not only the Ionian, but even the Sicilian Sea, and part of that which washes Crete, was called the Adriatic. Thus Ptolemy says, that Sicily was bounded on the east ὑπὸ τοῦ Ἀδριῶν by the Adriatic; and that Crete was compassed on the west ὑπὸ τοῦ Ἀδριατικοῦ πελάγους, by the Adriatic Sea: and Strabo says, that the Ionian Gulf μέρος ἐστὶ τοῦ νῦν Ἀδριῶν λεγομένου, is a part of that, which in his time was called the Adriatic Sea. See MELITA. Whitby's Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament, vol. ii. p. 711, tenth edition, 1807.

A'DRIEL, אֲדִרְיֵאל, Ἐδριέλ, signifies the flock of God, or a privation or cutting off of God. Adriel, the son of Barzillai, married Merab, the daughter of Saul, who had been first promised to David. (1 Sam. xviii. 19.) She bare to Adriel five sons, who were delivered to the Gibeonites, to be put to death before the Lord, in revenge for the cruelty, which their grandfather Saul had exercised towards the Gibeonites. The text of the second book of Samuel (xxi. 8.) imports, that these five were the sons of Michal and Adriel; but it appears extremely probable, that the name of Michal is put for that of Merab, or that Michal had adopted the sons of her sister Merab.

ADVERSARY, one who sets himself in opposition to another, and is a name of Satan.

ADULLAM, אדולם, עירולם, signifies their testimony, their prey, or their ornament. It was the name of a city, which belonged to the tribe of Judah, and which was situated towards the southern part of this tribe, the Dead Sea. (Josh. xv. 35.) This place was rebuilt by Rehoboam, who strengthened it with good fortifications. (2 Chron. xi. 7.) Eusebius says, that in his time it was a very great town, ten miles to the east of Eleutheropolis; and Jerome tells us, that it was not a small place in his days. Judas Macabeus encamped in the plain of Adullam, where he passed the Sabbath-day. (2 Mac. xii. 38.) Joshua killed the king of Adullam. (Josh. xii. 15.) David, when he withdrew from Achish, king of Gath, hid himself in the cave of Adullam. (1 Sam. xxii. 1.)

ADULTERY. By the law of Moses, adultery was punished with the death of both the man and the woman who were guilty of the crime. (Levit. xx. 10.) When any man, prompted by the spirit of jealousy, suspected that his wife had committed adultery, he brought her first before the judges, and informed them that having often admonished his wife not to be conversant in private with a certain person, she regarded not his admonitions; but as she asserted her innocence, and would not acknowledge the fault, he required that she should be sentenced to drink the waters of bitterness, that by that means God might discover what she wished to conceal. (Numb. v. 11, 12, &c.) The man produced his witnesses, who were heard. Afterwards, both the man and the woman were carried to Jerusalem, and brought before the sanhedrim, the judges of which endeavoured, by threats, to confound the woman, and oblige her to confess the crime. If she persisted in denying it, they caused her to walk till she was tired; and if she still refused to confess, she was led to the eastern gate of the court of Israel, where she was stripped of the clothes she wore, and dressed in black, before a multitude of persons of her own sex. The priest then told her, that if she knew herself to be innocent with respect to the crime, of which she was accused, she need not fear; but that if she was guilty, she might expect to suffer the punishment, with which the law threatened her. To this she answered, 'Amen, Amen.' The priest wrote the terms of the law on a piece of vellum, with ink made particularly for this use without vitriol, that the writing might be more easily blotted out. The words were as follows: 'If a strange man has not come near you, and you are not polluted by forsaking the bed of your husband, these bitter waters, which I have cursed, will not injure you. But if you have gone astray from your husband, and have polluted yourself by coming near another man, may you be accursed of the Lord, and become an example to all his people! May these cursed waters enter into your belly, and cause it to swell till it burst, and may your thighs putrefy!'

After this, the priest filled a pitcher of new earth with water out of the brazen basin, which stood near the altar of burnt-offerings. Into the water he cast some dust taken from the pavement of the temple, and mingled it with wormwood, or some other bitter drug. Having read to the woman the curses above-mentioned, and received her answer of Amen, he scraped them into the pitcher of water. During this time another priest tore her clothes as low as her bosom, bared her head, untied the tresses of her hair, and fastened together her clothes which had been torn, with a girdle bound under her breasts. He then presented her with the tenth part of an ephah, or about three pints of barley-meal, which was in a frying-pan, without oil or incense. Then he, who had prepared the waters of jealousy or bitterness, gave them to the accused person; and as soon as she had drank them, he put the pan containing the meal into her hand. This meal was stirred before the Lord, and a part of it thrown into the fire of the altar. If the woman was innocent, she returned with her husband, and the waters instead of injuring her, increased her health, and rendered her more fruitful. If, on the contrary, she was guilty, she immediately grew pale, her eyes seemed to start out of their sockets; and lest the temple should be polluted by her death, she was instantly carried out, and died with all the ignominious circumstances related in the curses. The Rabbins say, that the curses produced effects on the man, with whom the woman had transgressed, even though he were absent, and at a distance. If the husband of the woman had been himself guilty of adultery the bitter waters did not injure her. Leo of Modena.

The Jews having surprised a woman in adultery, brought her to Jesus Christ, and asked how they should treat her, Moses having commanded that women guilty of this crime should be stoned? This they said to tempt Jesus, that they might find matter of accusation against him. Jesus stooped down, and wrote with his finger on the ground. After some time, he raised himself, and said, 'He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her.' Then stooping down again, he continued to write on the ground. The Jews, convicted by their own consciences, departed one after another, the oldest retiring first. When Jesus arose, and saw only the woman, he said to her, 'Where are those, thine accusers? Hath no man condemned thee?' She answered, 'No man, Lord?' Jesus said, 'neither do I condemn thee: go, and sin no more.' (John viii. 11.)

By the law of Moses, the culprit (male as well as female) was to be brought before the council, and if condemned, the whole audience, council included, were to stone him. Hence it appears, 1. that by bringing this woman to Jesus, the Jews were guilty of partiality, as they ought to have brought the adulterer also; 2. They desired Jesus to take on himself the office of the council, which would have been assuming political power, and would have endangered his life. This insidious measure he retorts on themselves, by saying, 'Do you, on your own proposals, assume that conduct, which you well know the council would pursue in such a case; consider this prisoner as ipso facto condemned by the circumstances, in which she was apprehended, and do you, therefore, cast stones at her, as the council would cast stones at a person so condemned.' This they declined, being aware of its tendency; and they shrunk from that, to which they had urged Jesus. To this his words seem more particularly to allude: 'Let him who is without sin—not moral guilt, but political offence—he who can be innocent in assuming that power, which is legally lodged elsewhere, let him act the judge, and stone her.' And so, speaking to the woman, he says, has nobody condemned thee—actively shown his condemnation of thee—executed the condemnation of the law, on thee, by stoning thee?—Neither do I condemn thee; I do not execute condemnation on thee by stoning thee: remember the narrow escape thou hast now experienced: 'go, and sin no more.'

This story is not found in many Greek copies of the Evangelist St. John. St. Jerom observes, that, in his time, no part of it was recorded in many books, as well Greek as Latin. By the generality of the Greek fathers it is never read. Of twenty-three commentators in the Greek Catena on St. John, not one has explained it; and hence it has been thought, that it was not inserted in those books. Maldonat assures us, that of all the Greek copies, which he had consulted, he found it only in that which contains Leontius's commentary on St. John. Leontius does not speak of it in his commentary; and in the Greek text joined to it, this story is marked with obelisks, to show that it was added to the text. Dr. Mill cites many other Greek manuscripts, in which it is not to be found. It was not known to Origen, St. Chrysostom, Theophylact, or Nonnus. Nor can Eusebius be said to have received it, since he notices that it was not contained in the Hebrew copy of St. Matthew, used by the Nazareans. The manuscripts, in which it is found, vary extremely: in some, it is inserted at the end of St. John's Gospel; in some, at the end of the twenty-first chapter of St. Luke; in some, in the margin of the eighth chapter of St. John; and in others, it is marked with obelisks, to denote that it is of doubtful authority. Euthymius mentions it in his commentary, but confesses that it is not found in the best manuscripts.

On the other hand, it is urged, that this story is contained in all the copies used by Robert Stephens, to the number of sixteen; and in those consulted by Theodore Beza, which amounted to seventeen, one manuscript only excepted. It is also acknowledged, for the most part, by those to which Dr. Mill had recourse. Tatian, who lived in the year 160, and Ammonius, who lived in 230, considered it as canonical, and inserted it in their harmonies of the Gospel; and several others of equal authority, as Athanasius, St. Jerom, St. Austin, Ambrose, and the rest of the Latin fathers, did not hesitate to receive it. 'The story, therefore, of the adulterous woman,' observes Kuinsel, 'though it is brief and concise, and our Evangelists seem to have here (as elsewhere) omitted some circumstances, which, if added, would have thrown greater light on it; yet since it contains nothing improbable or incongruous, since the difficulties met with in it are not inexplicable, since its omission in many MSS. may be accounted for on good grounds, and since it is found in ancient MSS. of various recensions; I can by no means assent to those, who are of opinion that this portion is not genuine. I am inclined to agree with Staudlin, the able defender of this passage, who maintains that this portion may be defended with arguments far stronger and more numerous than those by which it can ever be impugned.' 'Indeed,' says Mr. Bloomfield, 'I do not hesitate to maintain, that even if it could be proved that the narrative did not come from the pen of the Evangelist, still the reality of the facts might be supported from the high antiquity of the story, and its strong internal proofs.' Bloomfield's Recensio Synoptica Annotationis Sacrae, vol. iii. pp. 283, 284; Supplementary Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible.

ADULTERY is also used in Scripture for idolatry, or departing from the true God, and worshipping idols, (Jerem. iii. 9, 10, &c.) It is likewise used to signify any species of impurity or crime against the virtue of chastity. (Matt. v. 28.) By ecclesiastical writers, it is employed to denote a person's invading or intruding into a bishopric, during the former bishop's life.

ÆLIA-CAPITOLINA, a name given to Jerusalem, when the Emperor Adrian, about the year of Jesus Christ 134, settled in it a Roman colony, and entirely banished the Jews, who were forbidden, on pain of death, to continue in the city. See JERUSALEM.

It was called Ælia from Ælius, the name of Adrian's family, and Capitolina, from Jupiter Capitolinus, to whom the city was consecrated. It was known by this name till the reign of the emperor Constantine, when it resumed that of Jerusalem: but the name Ælia was not long abolished, for it was so denominated after the time of Constantine.

ÆNON, or ENON, עֵינן, אֵינוֹן, signifies cloud or mass of darkness, or his fountain, or his eye. It signifies the place of springs, where John baptized. (John iii. 23.) It is uncertain where it was situated, whether in Galilee, or Judæa, or Samaria, where Lubin places it, namely in the half-tribe of Manasseh, within Jordan.

ÆRA, a series of years commencing from a certain fixed point of time called an epoch or epocha; as the Christian æra, that is, the number of years, which have elapsed since the birth of Christ. However, by the generality of authors, the terms æra and epocha were used as synonymous, that is, for the particular time, from which any computation commences. See EPOCH.

The ancient Jews used several æras in their computations: sometimes they reckon from the deluge; sometimes from the division of tongues; sometimes from their departure out of Egypt; sometimes from the building of the temple; and, at other times, from their restoration after the captivity. But their vulgar æra was computed from the creation of the world, which agrees with the year 953 of the Julian period. Consequently they supposed, that the world was created 249 years sooner than according to our computations. After the Jews became subject to the Syro-Macedonian kings, they were obliged to use in all their contracts, the æra of the Seleucidæ, which was thence denominated the æra of contracts. This æra commences with the year of the world 3692, of the Julian period 4403, and before Christ 312. The æra generally used among Christians is computed from the birth of Jesus Christ, respecting the true time of which chronologers differ among themselves. Some place it two, some four, and others five years before the vulgar æra, which is computed at the year of the world 4004. Archbishop Usher, and after him the generality of modern chronologers, suppose the birth of Christ to have happened in the year of the world 4000, and of the Julian period 4714.

The ancient heathens used several æras: 1. The æra of the first Olympiad is placed in the year of the world 3228, and before the vulgar æra of Jesus Christ 776. 2. The taking of Troy by the Greeks, in the year of the world 2820, and before Jesus Christ 1184. 3. The voyage undertaken for the purpose of bringing away the golden fleece, in the year of the world 2760. 4. The foundation of Rome in 3251. 5. The æra of Nabonassar, in 3257. 6. The æra of Alexander the Great, or his last victory over Darius, in 3674, and before Jesus Christ 330.

ÆTIANS, the followers of Ætius, a presbyter, and monk, and one of the leaders of the Semi-Arians, in the fourth century. The principal point, on which Ætius and his adherents differed from the other Semi-Arians, appears to have been their belief, that no distinction existed in Scripture between a presbyter and a bishop. Ætius earnestly condemned prayers for the dead, stated fasts, the celebration of Easter, and other rites; and he attempted to restore the discipline of the church to its primitive simplicity and excellence.

AFFECTION may be defined a settled bent of mind towards any particular being or thing, and occupies a middle place between disposition on the one hand, and passion on the other. It is distinguishable from disposition, which, forming a part of our original nature, must exist before there can be an opportunity to exert it upon any particular object; whereas affection can never be original, because, having a special relation to a particular object, it cannot exist till that object has been at least once presented. It is also distinguishable from passion, which, depending on the real or ideal presence of its object, vanishes with its object; whereas affection is a lasting connection, and, like other connections, subsists even when we do not think of the object.

The affections, as they respect religion, have been defined the vigorous and sensible exercises of the inclination of the soul towards religious objects. When the great truths of religion are not firmly believed, and the mind is not fully persuaded of their reality, they may be contemplated without emotion; but a real belief of the truth of religion will naturally excite devout affections. The doctrines of religion are so important and so interesting, and the objects which they present to view are so glorious, that the man, who can contemplate them without having his affections excited, must either be sceptical, or destitute of the feelings of the human heart. When the devout man in his moments of retirement, contemplates the eternity, the immensity, and the omnipotence of the Divine Being, and is deeply impressed with sentiments of reverence and godly fear, his feelings are not to be considered as enthusiasm. When he reflects on his own unworthiness, and contemplates the mercy and grace of God towards him, he is not to be ridiculed for humbling himself before the Most High, and dropping a penitential tear in the presence of the Father of mercies, who deals not with him according to his sins, but views him with tenderness and compassion. When he contemplates the bounty of his gracious Creator, and considers every comfort and every blessing as the gift of God, he is not to be ridiculed for giving vent to the emotions of pious gratitude. When with humble confidence, he looks up to God as his father in heaven, who made and preserves him, whose eye is continually upon him for good, and whose care over him is never remitted; when with a firm reliance on his wisdom, and mercy, and faithfulness, he entertains the hope that the Almighty will conduct him safely through all the difficulties and dangers of this life, and afterwards receive him into glory and happiness; he is not to be ridiculed if, in those sacred moments, his devout affections be exalted into rapture. When, impressed with the vanity of the things of time, and the shortness of human life, he looks forward to the regions of immortality, where choice friends are no more separated by death, and where he shall meet his pious departed relations among an innumerable multitude of spirits of just men made perfect; when he indulges the hope of being admitted into the heavenly mansions, to see his Redeemer, to behold the glory of God, and to enjoy the light of his countenance for ever; it is no wonder that, in those sacred moments, his joy should rise into rapture. The views, which the Gospel affords us, of God, of divine providence, of the salvation of mankind by Jesus Christ, and of a future state of immortality, are calculated to animate all the springs of the human heart, and to excite the warmest affections.

That there is such a thing as enthusiasm or fanaticism, the production of a heated imagination, misled by ignorance, is not to be denied. Many baneful effects have resulted from such enthusiasm. But, because there are counterfeits of the devout affections, and abuses of religion, we are by no means to conclude that all religious affections are delusive. There are counterfeits of every virtue; but we are not to suppose that no virtue exists among men. Whilst, therefore, we guard against enthusiasm, let us take heed lest we become insensible to the impressions of piety, and extinguish in our breasts the flame of devotion. The man, who is a stranger to the devout affections, is a stranger to the noblest feelings, and the sublimest enjoyments, of which the heart is susceptible. Genuine devotion, daily cherished in the breast, refines the sentiments, purifies the heart, and exalts the soul. By the daily exercise of the pious affections, the devout man anticipates on earth, in some degree, the pleasures of the heavenly state, and becomes more and more meet to be translated to the society of the heavenly inhabitants. Lord Kaimes's Elements of Criticism; Dr. Hood's Sermons.

AFFINITY. There are several degrees of affinity, in which marriage was prohibited by the laws of Moses. The son was not allowed to marry his mother, nor his father's wife. The brother was not allowed to marry his sister, whether she was so nearly related to him by the father only, or by the mother only, and much less if she was his sister by both the same father and mother. The grandfather was not permitted to marry her, who was his granddaughter, either by his son or his daughter. No person was allowed to marry the daughter of his father's wife, or the sister of his father or mother. The uncle was not permitted to marry his niece; nor the aunt her nephew; nor the nephew the wife of his uncle by the father's side; nor the father-in-law his daughter-in-law. The brother was not allowed to marry the wife of his brother whilst he was living; nor even after the death of his brother, if he left children: but if he left no children, the surviving brother was to raise up children to his deceased brother, by marrying his widow. It was forbidden to marry the mother and the daughter at one time, or the daughter of the mother's son, or the daughter of her daughter, or two sisters together. (Levit. xviii. 7, &c.)

It is certain that before the law, the patriarchs sometimes married their sisters, for Abraham married Sarah, who was his father's daughter by another mother; and two sisters together, for Jacob married both Rachel and Leah; and even their own sisters, by both father and mother, for Seth and Cain married their own sisters. But these marriages are not to be proposed as examples; for in some cases they were authorized by necessity; in others by custom; and, at that time, the law was not in existence. If some other examples be found since the promulgation of the law, they are expressly disapproved of by the Scripture: as, Reuben's incest with Balah, his father's concubine; the action of Amnon with his sister Tamar; and the conduct of Herod Antipas, who married Herodias his sister-in-law, the wife of his brother Philip, whilst her husband was living.

AFFLICTION, that which causes a sensation of pain or sorrow; calamity, or distress of any kind. When we consider the nature of this world, and our state of sin and imperfection, we have reason to expect afflictions. Our passage from the cradle to the grave, is a scene of disquietude, interspersed with some joy. As daily experience renders it evident that afflictions are unavoidably incident to human life, that calamity will neither be repelled by fortitude, nor escaped by flight, neither awed by greatness, nor eluded by obscurity, it is our wisdom, and will be our advantage, quietly to submit to the dispensations of providence.

Afflictions purify the heart, and teach us many useful lessons. They convince us of human weakness, and dispose us to flee for relief to the Divine Being, and repose ourselves under the shadow of his wings. The present experience of pain and misfortune is never joyous but grievous, never so much an object of congratulation as of complaint. Yet we perceive the uses of affliction, and are willing to acknowledge those uses when the present agony is past, when the danger has subsided, or the difficulties are overcome. We are ready then to exclaim with David, 'It is good for me that I have been in trouble.' (Psalm cxix. 71.) Prosperity may intoxicate, but afflictions bring us to ourselves. They correct our pride and our prejudices, the insolence of our manners, or the loftiness of our looks, and teach us to form juster notions and a more sober estimate of happiness. One of the principal arts of happiness seems to consist in knowing how to appreciate rightly, and to use wisely the good within our reach; and this art we seldom learn so well as from the experience of privations and sufferings.

Afflictions are often physically, but always morally beneficial. In the last moments when the mind is calm, and all things of the world are viewed with more than philosophical serenity, men commonly find that they ascribe more good to their pains than to their pleasures, and that they had more reason to rejoice at those calamitous occurrences, in which, at the time, they beheld the most fruitful source of sorrow and complaint. At that solemn hour, when we are about to leave this world, when the false appearances of things no longer dazzle or deceive, if our minds be at leisure to reflect on the aggregate of the varied events of our lives, or the improvement of our conduct, we shall discover that the pain and suffering, which we experienced, contributed in a greater degree to our real happiness than what we deemed our more prosperous fortune. If, therefore, we be certain that the time is coming when we shall be convinced that that which we deemed the greatest evil, will be found to have been necessary to our greatest good, when we shall look on our present privations and misfortunes with complacency and delight, surely on this conviction we may ground some solid reasons for cheerful acquiescence in the lowest condition, or the most distressing circumstances. For why should we so greatly repine at those disasters and afflictions, in which, whether they be considered as the correctives of vice, or the corroborants of virtue, we shall afterwards find such abundant arguments to prove, and such abundant excitements to extol the benevolence of God?

Though afflictions bear an unpleasant aspect, yet they are of short continuance. —The day is at hand when we shall be delivered from every temporal evil, and our sorrow be turned into joy. We are now on a tumultuous sea, where the winds roar, and the waves swell; but let us not be discouraged, we are near the harbour where all our toils and dangers shall cease, and be no more. Though we bear the heat and burden of the day, yet the evening is fast approaching, when we shall receive an ample reward and recompense of our sufferings. Richardson's Divine and Moral Essays; Fellowes's Body of Theology; Johnson's Rambler.

AFRICA, Ἀφρική, Libue, may signify dust, or ashes reduced to dust, and is one of the four quarters of the world, and a peninsula joined to Asia, by the narrow isthmus of Suez. It is situated between 37 degrees of north, and 35 degrees of south latitude; and between eighteen degrees of west, and 51 degrees of east longitude: it is 4300 miles in length from north to south, and 3500 miles in breadth from east to west. Africa is bounded on the north by the Mediterranean Sea, which separates it from Europe; on the east by the Isthmus of Suez, the Red Sea, and the Eastern Ocean, which divide it from Asia; on the south, by the Southern Ocean; and on the west, by the Atlantic or Western Ocean, which separates it from America. Africa was peopled chiefly by Ham and his descendants. Mizraim peopled Egypt. The Pathrusim, the Naphthuhim, the Casluhim, and the Ludim, peopled other parts of the country, the limits of which are at this time not exactly known. It is supposed that many of the Canaanites, who were expelled their country by Joshua, retired into Africa.

AG'ABUS, Ἀγαθος, signifies a locust, or the feast of the father. By the Greeks Agabus is said to have been one of the seventy disciples of our Saviour. He was a prophet, and foretold that there would be a great famine in all parts of the earth; and we are informed that it happened accordingly, in the fourth year of the reign of the emperor Claudius, and in the forty-fourth of Jesus Christ. (Acts xi. 28, 29, 30.)

Profane authors notice this famine, and Suetonius observes, that the emperor himself was insulted on this occasion, being attacked by the people in the middle of the market-place, and obliged to retreat to his palace.

Ten years after this, as St. Paul was going to Jerusalem, and had already landed at Casarea in Palestine, the same prophet Agabus arrived at that place; and coming to visit St. Paul and his company, he took the apostle's girdle, and binding his hands and feet, he said, Thus saith the Holy Ghost, so shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles. When they heard these things, all those who were present besought Paul to go no farther. But he answered, that he was ready, not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus. (Acts xxi. 10, &c.) The Scripture furnishes no other particulars of the life of Agabus.

A'GAG, אגג, Agagos, signifies roof, floor, and was the name of a king of the Amalekites. The Amalekites attacked the Israelites in the wilderness, after they had come out of Egypt, and whilst they were sinking under the fatigues, which they had suffered in that country. Having massacred all those who were unable to keep up with the body of the army, the Lord was not satisfied with the victory, which Joshua had gained over the Amalekites in the same wilderness, in the year of the world 2513, and before Jesus Christ 1491: but he protested with an oath that he would destroy the memory of Amalek from under heaven. (Exod. xvii. 14. 16; Deut. xxv. 17.) About four hundred years after this, the Lord remembered the cruel treatment, which Amalek had formerly shewn to his people, and commanded Samuel to inform Saul, that he should march against the Amalekites, cut them in pieces, and destroy every thing that belonged to them. On receiving this command, Saul ordered the people to assemble, and on a review of them, found that their number amounted to two hundred thousand foot, without reckoning the ten thousand men of the tribe of Judah, who formed a separate body. Having entered into the country of the Amalekites, he cut in pieces all with whom he could meet, from Havilah to Shur. He suffered Agag and the best of the cattle to remain alive. But Agag did not long enjoy this favour. As soon as Samuel heard that he was alive, he sent for him; and notwithstanding his insinuating address, and the vain hopes, with which he flattered himself, that 'the bitterness of death was passed,' he caused him to be hewn in pieces in Gilgal before the Lord. This event happened about the year of the world 2930, and before Jesus Christ 1074. (1 Sam. xv. 1, 2, &c.) See AMALEK.

AGAPÆ, love feasts, or feasts of charity among the ancient Christians, in which liberal contributions were made by the rich for the poor. The word is derived from ἀγάπη, friendship. St. Chrysostom gives the following account of this feast, which he derives from the practice of the apostles; 'the first Christians had all things in common, as we read in the Acts of the Apostles; but when that equality of possessions ceased, as it did even in the apostles' time, the agapæ, or love-feasts were substituted in its room.' On certain days, after partaking of the Lord's Supper, they met at a common feast, the rich bringing provisions, and the poor, who possessed nothing, being invited.' It was always attended with the receiving of the holy sacrament; but the ancient and modern interpreters differ in opinion whether this feast was held before or after the communion. St. Chrysostom, as we have seen, supports the latter: Calmet, the learned Dr. Cave, and others, are in favour of the former opinion. During the first three centuries, these love-feasts were held in the church without scandal or offence; but in succeeding times the heathens began to tax them with impurity. This occasioned a reformation of these agapæ. The kiss of charity, with which the ceremony used to end, was no longer interchanged between those of different sexes; and it was expressly forbidden to have any beds or couches for the convenience of those, who were disposed to eat more at their ease. Notwithstanding these precautions, the abuses committed in those feasts became so notorious, that the holding of them, especially in churches, was solemnly condemned at the council of Carthage, in the year of our Lord 397.

The Jews had certain devotional entertainments, relating in some respects to the agapæ, of which we have been treating. On their great festival days, they entertained their family, their friends, and relatives, and invited to the feasts, the priests, the poor, and orphans, to whom they also sent a portion of their sacrifices. These repasts were made in the temple before the Lord; and the law appointed certain sacrifices and first fruits, which were to be set apart for this purpose. (Deut. xiv. 22. 27. 29; xxvi. 10, 11, 12. Nehem. viii. 12. Esther ix. 19.)

The Wesleyan Methodists hold their love feasts quarterly. To them no persons are admitted, who cannot produce a ticket to prove that they are members, or a note of admittance from the superintendent. However, to any serious person who has never been present at one of these meetings, a note will be given for once, but not oftener, unless this person shall become a member. The meeting commences with singing and praying. Afterwards, small pieces of bread, and some water are distributed; and all present, eat and drink together, in token of their Christian love for each other. Then, if any persons have any thing to say concerning their past or present Christian experience they are permitted to speak. After a few have spoken, a collection is made for the poor; and the meeting is concluded by singing and praying. The Methodists consider this institution as having no relation to the Lord's Supper. The elements of the Lord's Supper are bread and wine; but at the love-feasts cake and water only are used.

The former is regarded by them as a positive institution, which, as Christians, they are bound to observe; the latter, as merely prudential, which they observe because they think them scriptural and edifying. They suppose, that to this St. Jude alludes, in the twelfth verse, where, speaking of some evil doers that associated with the Christians, he says, 'these are spots in your feasts of love,' and that of this also, the apostle Peter speaks in his second epistle. AGAPETÆ, a name given to certain virgins and widows, that in the ancient church associated themselves with ecclesiastics, whom they attended from a motive of piety and charity. See DEACONESSES.

AGATE, a semipellucid gem, which is mentioned in some places of Scripture, and which is variegated with veins and clouds, but has no zones.

The Agate was the second in the third row of precious stones in the breast-plate of the Jewish high-priest. (Exod. xxviii. 19.)

AGES OF THE WORLD. The times preceding the birth of Jesus Christ have been commonly divided into six ages. The first age extends from the beginning of the world to the deluge, and comprehends 1656 years. The second from the deluge to the time of Abraham's coming into the land of promise, in 2082, comprehends 426 years. The third age of the world, from Abraham's entrance into the promised land to the deliverance of the Hebrews out of Egypt, in the year of the world 2513, includes 430 years. The fourth age, from the departure of the Hebrews out of Egypt to the foundation of the temple by Solomon, in the year of the world 2992 comprehends 479 years. The fifth age, from the foundation of the temple by Solomon, to the Babylonish captivity in the year of the world 3416, contains 424 years. The sixth age of the world comprises the time from the Babylonish captivity to the birth of Jesus Christ, which happened in the year of the world 4000, four years before the vulgar æra, and includes 584 years.

Few persons are ignorant, that a great difference exists in the ages of the patriarchs, as they are given in the Septuagint, and in the Hebrew text. This difference, with respect to the time before the deluge, is about 586 years more in the Septuagint, than in the Hebrew, or Vulgate Bible. According to the former, the deluge happened in the year of the world 2242; but according to the latter, in 1656. After the deluge, from the six hundred and first year of Noah, which was the year after the deluge, the Septuagint version reckons 1172 years to the seventieth year of Terah; whilst the Hebrew text computes only 292 years. This difference of reckoning causes a variation of 880 years; and by adding the 586 years before the deluge, there will be found 1466 years more in the Septuagint than in the Hebrews.

Hitherto no person has been able to discover the true motive, which could induce the Septuagint thus to lengthen the lives of the patriarchs. Some have conjectured, that their design in this was to rescue the sacred books from the censure of the heathens, who unable to credit the relation of the long lives of the patriarchs, maintained, that one of our years was equivalent to ten or five of theirs. One therefore, who had been said to live eight hundred years, in reality lived only eighty, or, at most, one hundred and sixty; and others in proportion. However this may be, no doubt exists, but that the Septuagint interpreters have multiplied the lives of the patriarchs; and there is no reason to consider the diminution of these as effected by the Hebrew writers.

With respect to the length of the year, it appears evident from the computation of Moses and the old Hebrews, that, from the time of Noah, it consisted of twelve months of one-and-thirty days. The proof of this is seen in the particular account of the days of that year, in which the deluge happened; and this account of the days is very accurately given us by Moses.

Ludovicus Capellus attempts to reconcile the difference in the computation between the Septuagint and Hebrew, by saying that this addition was not made by the Septuagint writers themselves, but by some early transcriber of their version. This transcriber, perhaps, thought that their years were only lunar, and computed that thus the patriarchs must have been fathers at the early age of 5, 6, 7, or 8 years. Perceiving, therefore, the incredibility of such a circumstance, he might be induced to add 100 years to each, to render them of a more probable age at the birth of their respective children. But if he thought that the years were solar, he might suppose, that infancy and childhood were proportionably longer in men, who were to live seven, eight, or nine hundred years, than they are in us, and that it was too early for them to be fathers at the age of sixty, seventy, or ninety years. He might, therefore, be induced to add a hundred years, to render their advance to manhood more proportionable to the duration of their lives. That however, which God designed we should learn from the sacred history contained in the first eleven chapters of Genesis, is not affected by this difference in the chronology of the Hebrew and Septuagint. See PATRIARCHS. Dr. Brett's Dissertation on the Ancient Version of the Bible. AGNOETÆ, a sect which appeared about the year of our Lord 370, and which derived its name from ἀγνοέω, to be ignorant. They doubted the omniscience of God, and alleged that he knew things past only by memory, and things future only by an uncertain prescience. In the sixth century arose another sect of the same name, who followed Themistius, deacon of Alexandria, and who maintained that Christ was ignorant of certain things, and particularly of the time of the day of judgment. It is supposed that they founded their hypothesis on the following passage of the New Testament: 'Of that day and that hour knoweth no man; no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father.' (Mark xiii. 32.) It seems that the meaning of this passage is, that this was not known to the Messiah himself in his human nature, or by virtue of his unction, as any part of the mysteries, which he was to reveal; for considering him as God, we cannot suppose that he was ignorant of any thing.

AGNUS DEI, in the church of Rome, a cake of wax stamped with the figure of a lamb supporting the banner of the cross. The name literally signifies the Lamb of God. These cakes, being consecrated by the pope with great solemnity, and distributed among the people, are supposed to possess great virtues. They cover them with a piece of stuff cut in the form of a heart, and carry them very devoutly in their processions. From selling these agni Dei to some, and presenting them to others, the Romish clergy and monks derive considerable pecuniary advantage.

The practice of blessing the agnus Dei, took its rise about the seventh or eighth century. It was common in those times to convert thousands and tens of thousands in a day by only marking them with the sign of the cross after baptism; and in order to distinguish the converted from heathens, they were commanded to wear about their necks pieces of white wax, stamped with the figure of a lamb. This was done in imitation of the heathenish practice of hanging amulets around the neck, as preservatives against accidents, diseases, or any sort of infection.

Though the efficacy of an agnus Dei has not been declared by councils, the belief in its virtues has been strongly and universally established in the church of Rome. Pope Urban V. sent to John Palæologus, emperor of the Greeks, an agnus folded in fine paper, on which were written verses explaining all its properties. These verses declare, that the agnus is formed of balm and wax mixed with chrism, and that being consecrated by mystical words, it possessed the power of removing thunder, and dispersing storms, of giving to women with child an easy delivery, of preventing shipwreck, taking away sin, repelling the devil, increasing riches, securing against fire, &c. &c.!!—Claude's Defence of the Reformation.

AGONISTICI, a name given by Donatus to such of his disciples as were sent to fairs, markets, and other public places, to propagate his doctrine. They were called agonistici, from the Greek word ἀγών, a contest, because they seemed to be sent for the purpose of fighting and subduing the people to their opinions. See DONATISTS.

AGONYCLITÆ, a sect of Christians in the seventh century, who thinking it unlawful to kneel, prayed always standing.

AGRIPPA, Ἀγρίππας, signifies one who causes pain at his birth.

AGRIPPA, surnamed Herod, the son of Aristobulus and Mariamne, and grandson to Herod the Great, was born in the year of the world 3997, three years before the birth of our Saviour, and seven before the vulgar æra. After the death of his father Aristobulus, Josephus informs us, that Herod, his grandfather, undertook his education, and sent him to Rome to ingratiate himself with Tiberius. The emperor conceived a great affection for Agrippa, and placed him near his son Drusus. In a very short time Agrippa obtained the favour of Drusus, and of the empress Antonia; but Drusus dying suddenly, all those who had been intimate with him were commanded by Tiberius to depart from Rome, lest the sight and presence of them should renew his affliction. Agrippa, who had lived freely, was obliged to leave Rome overwhelmed with debts, and in a very poor condition. He did not think proper to go to Jerusalem, because he could not appear in that city in a manner suitable to his birth; but he retired to the castle of Masada, in which he lived rather like a private person, than a prince. Herod the tetrarch, his uncle, who had married his sister Herodias, assisted him for some time with great generosity. Herod constituted him chief magistrate of Tiberias, and presented him with a large sum of money; but all this not being sufficient to defray the expenses and profusion of Agrippa, the tetrarch grew weary of supplying him with money, and reproached him for his want of economy. Agrippa was so affected with the reproaches of his uncle, that he determined to leave Judea and return to Rome.

But as Agrippa was in want of money, he obtained from one Protus, a freedman in the suite of Berenice, the loan of twenty thousand drachmas; and he borrowed two hundred thousand drachmas of Alexander, alabarch, or chief of the Jews at Alexandria.

Having arrived in Italy, Agrippa sent to the emperor Tiberius, who at that time was with his court at Caprea, acquainted him with his return, and desired leave to attend him. Tiberius informed him that he was glad to hear of his return, received him with great kindness, and, as a mark of distinction, gave him an apartment in his palace. The next day, the emperor received from Herennius, who superintended his affairs in Judea, letters which acquainted him, that Agrippa had borrowed three hundred thousand pieces of silver out of his majesty's exchequer, and had fled from Judea, without repaying them. This news exasperated the emperor so much, that he commanded Agrippa to leave the palace, and to pay what he owed. However, Agrippa having obtained a sum of money from the empress Antonia, who loved him on account of his mother, appeased the anger of Tiberius, and was again received into favour.

On the death of Tiberius, Caius Caligula, his successor, placed a royal diadem on the head of Agrippa, and gave him the tetrarchy of Batanæa and Trachonitis, which had been possessed by Philip, the son of Herod the Great. To this he added the government held by Lysanias. Soon after, Agrippa returned into Judea, to take possession of his new kingdom. The emperor Caligula, wishing to be adored as a god, commanded that his statue should be set up in the temple of Jerusalem. But the Jews opposed this design with so much resolution, that Petronius was obliged to suspend all proceedings in this affair, and to inform the emperor of the resistance which he experienced.—Agrippa, who was then at Rome, endeavoured to dissuade the emperor from his resolution, and his arguments were so cogent that Caligula was induced to desist, at least in appearance, from his design.

On the death of Caligula, which happened in the beginning of the next year, and the forty-first of Jesus Christ, Agrippa, who was then at Rome, contributed much by his advice to maintain Claudius in the possession of the imperial dignity, to which he had been advanced by the army. But, in this affair, Agrippa showed more cunning and address, than sincerity and honesty. Whilst he pretended to espouse the cause of the senate, he secretly advised Claudius to act with resolution, and not to abandon his good fortune. The emperor, as an acknowledgment for his kind offices, bestowed on him all Judea, and the kingdom of Chalcis, which had been possessed by Herod his brother. Thus Agrippa suddenly became one of the greatest princes of the East, and was invested with perhaps more territories than had been enjoyed by his grandfather, Herod the Great. He returned to Judea, which he governed to the great satisfaction of the Jews. But the desire of pleasing them, and a mistaken zeal for their religion, induced him to commit an action which is mentioned in Scripture.—About the feast of the Passover, in the year of Jesus Christ 44, St. James the Greater, the son of Zebedee, and brother to St. John the Evangelist, was seized by the command of Agrippa, and put to death. He also caused St. Peter to be apprehended and imprisoned, and intended that after the termination of the festival he should be executed. God, however, miraculously delivered St. Peter from the place of his confinement, and frustrated the designs of Agrippa (Acts xii. 1, 2, 3, &c.).

After the passover, this prince went from Jerusalem to Casarea, where he caused games to be performed in honour of Claudius. At this place, the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon, waited on him to sue for peace. Agrippa, having come early in the morning to the theatre, with a design of giving them an audience, seated himself upon his throne, dressed in a robe of silver tissue, which was wrought in a wonderful manner. The rays of the rising sun gave the robe such a lustre as dazzled the eyes of the spectators. When therefore the king spoke to the Tyrians and Sidonians, the parasites who surrounded his throne said, it is the voice of a god, and not of a man. Instead of rejecting these impious flatteries, Agrippa received them with complacency. At the same time, the angel of the Lord smote him, because he did not give the glory to God. Being therefore carried home to his palace, he was racked with tormenting pains in his bowels, and devoured by worms, and died at the end of five days. Such was the death of Herod Agrippa, after a reign of seven years, in the year of Christ 44. He left a son of the same name, and three daughters, Berenice, Mariamne, and Drusilla.—Josephus's Antiquities, lib. xviii. c. 7. lib. xix. c. 3.

AGRIPPA, son to the former Agrippa, was at Rome with the emperor Claudius at the time of his father's death. Josephus says, that the emperor was inclined to give him all the dominions possessed by his father, but was dissuaded from this by his ministers. The year following, which was the 45th of Jesus Christ, the governor of Syria came to Jerusalem, and intended that the high priest's ornaments should be put into the hands of Cuspius Fadus. For this purpose he wished to compel the Jews to deliver them up, that they might be kept in the Tower of Antonia, in which they had been before lodged, till Vitellius committed them to the care of the Jews. However, the Jews were permitted to send to Rome certain deputies, who, by means of the credit and good offices of young Agrippa, managed matters so well, that the Jews were allowed the possession of their privileges and the pontifical ornaments were continued in their custody.

Three years after, Herod, king of Chalcis, and uncle to young Agrippa, dying, the emperor gave his dominions to this prince.—However, Agrippa did not return into Judea till the year of Christ 53, when Claudius took from him the kingdom of Chalcis, and bestowed on him the provinces of Galanitis, Trachonitis, Batanæa, Peræa, and Abilene, which had been formerly possessed by Lysanias. After the death of Claudius, his successor Nero, who felt great affection for Agrippa, added to his other dominions Julius in Peræa, and that part of Galilee to which Tarichæa and Tiberias belonged.—Festus, governor of Judea, coming to his government in the year of our Lord 60, king

Agrippa, and his sister Bernice, went as far as Casarea, to salute him. As they continued at that place for some time, Festus spoke to the king concerning St. Paul, who, about two years before, had been seized in the Temple, and a few days previous to this visit had appealed to the emperor. Agrippa said unto Festus, 'I would also hear the man myself.' 'To-morrow,' answered Festus, 'thou shalt hear him.' The next day, therefore, when Agrippa and Bernice had come with great pomp, and were entered into the place of audience, Paul was brought forth. Festus introduced Paul's case to the king, and added, 'I have brought him forth before you, and especially before thee, O king Agrippa, that, after examination had, I might have somewhat to write. For it seemeth to me unreasonable, to send a prisoner, and not withal to signify the crimes laid against him.' (Acts xxv. 13, 14, &c.)

Then Agrippa said to Paul, 'Thou art permitted to speak for thyself.' Paul, therefore, stretched forth his hand, and answered for himself. He related the persecutions, which he had promoted against the Christians, and the miraculous manner, in which God had converted him on his way to Damascus. Whilst he was speaking of the resurrection, and what he had seen in his journey to Damascus, Festus said, with a loud voice, 'Paul, thou art beside thyself: much learning doth make thee mad.'—To this Paul answered, 'I am not mad, most noble Festus; but speak forth the words of truth and soberness. For the king knoweth of these things, before whom also I speak freely: for I am persuaded, that none of these things are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner. King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest.' Then Agrippa said unto Paul, 'Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.' And Paul said, 'I would to God, that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost, and altogether such as I am, except these bonds.' Then Agrippa said to Festus, 'This man might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed unto Cæsar.' (Ib. xxvi. 1, 2, 3, &c.)

Agrippa deprived Joseph Cabei of the high priesthood, which he bestowed on Ananus, in the year of Christ 62. This is the same Ananus, who put to death James the Less, in Jerusalem, near the time of the passover, A.D. 62. This action so offended the people in general, that Agrippa, after he had enjoyed the priesthood only three months, deprived him of the pontifical dignity, and conferred it on Jesus, the son of Damnaeus. Sometime after, he permitted the Levites, who were appointed to sing in the temple, to wear the linen robe, which had hitherto been reserved for the use of the priests only; and he allowed the rest of the Levites, who filled other offices in the temple, to learn singing, that they might participate in the privilege, which he had granted. Whilst every one in Judea appeared disposed to rebel, Agrippa attempted to quiet the minds of the people, and to incline them to peace. His endeavours, however, were unsuccessful. For some time, indeed, he suspended, but could not suppress, the passions of the Jews, who were exasperated, and driven to the greatest distress, by the cruelties and insolence of their governors. In the year 66, they declared openly against the Romans; and Agrippa was obliged to join his troops with those of Rome, and assist in reducing his countrymen, and taking Jerusalem. After the destruction of that city, he retired to Rome with his sister Bernice, with whom he had always lived in such a manner as to excite much blame. He died about the age of seventy years, in the year of Christ 90.—Josephus's Antiq. lib. xix. c. 9; lib. xx. c. 1, 3, 5, 7; Wars, lib. ii. c. 22—24; lib. iii. c. 2; lib. iv. c. 3, 6; lib. vi. c. 2.

A'GUR. The thirtieth chapter of Proverbs begins as follows: 'The words of 'Agur, the son of Jakeh,' which, according to the signification of the original terms, may be translated, as the Vulgate reads them, verbum congregantis, filii vomentis; or, according to Lewis de Dieu, 'The words of him, who has recollected himself, the son of obedience.' This translation is condemned by Le Clerc and many others, who suppose these to be proper names, which ought not to be translated. The generality of the fathers and ancient commentators think, that Solomon describes himself under the name of Agur, the son of Jakeh. Others conjecture, that Agur, and also Lemuel, mentioned in the next chapter, were wise men, who lived in the time of Solomon, and who were his interlocutors in the book of Proverbs; an opinion which, as that book is not in the form of a dialogue, Calmet thinks is without the least show of probability. This last expositor is of opinion, that Agur was an inspired author, who was different from Solomon, and whose sentences it was thought fit to join with those of that prince, because of the conformity of their matter. For what could have obliged Solomon to disguise his name in this place? For what reason could he have changed his style and manner of writing in this chapter only? For it is certain that the thirtieth chapter of Proverbs is penned in a way very different from the rest of the book. Besides, it could not become Solomon to express himself as this author does in the second verse: 'Surely I am more brutish than any man, and have not the understanding of a man.' Nor is it probable that he would address himself to God in the following manner: 'Give me neither poverty nor riches.' Certainly these words are not consistent with the dignity of king Solomon. Mr. Pool observes, that, from the laws of good interpretation, one of which is, that all words should be understood in their natural and proper sense, when there is neither evidence nor necessity, that they should be understood figuratively, these words cannot belong to Solomon. Patrick thinks it may be conjectured, that this Agur, the son of Jakeh, had obtained the name of collector, because he had only collected from other men's works, and disclaimed his being a wise man himself. Le Clerc suspects, from the first and third verses of this chapter, that Agur was no Hebrew, but a proselyte from some of the neighbouring nations.

AGYNIANI, a sect who condemned all use of flesh, and also marriage, which they said was not instituted by God, but introduced at the instigation of the devil. The word is compounded of the privative a, and γυνή, woman. They are sometimes also called Agynienses, and Agynii, and are said to have appeared about the year 694.

A'HAB, אַחָאב, Ἀχαάβ, signifies, the brother of the father, uncle, or father of the brother. Ahab, king of Israel, the son and successor of Omri, began his reign in the year of the world 3086, and reigned twenty-two years. This prince did evil in the sight of the Lord, and exceeded all that went before him in impiety. He married Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, who introduced the idols of Baal and Astarte among the Israelites, and induced Ahab to worship these false deities. (1 Kings xvi. 29, &c.) God, provoked at the sins of Ahab, sent to him the prophet Elijah, who declared to the king that there would be a famine of three years' continuance. The prophet having delivered his message, retired, lest Ahab or Jezebel should procure his death. (Id. xvii. 1, et seq.) The famine having continued three years, Ahab sent Obadiah, who was governor of his house, to find some good pasture in the country, that he might preserve part of his cattle. Obadiah, in his journey, met Elijah, who commanded him to go and tell Ahab, that Elijah was there. Ahab came immediately to meet him, and said to the prophet, 'Art thou he that troubleth Israel?' The prophet answered; 'I have not troubled Israel; but thou and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the Lord, and thou hast followed Baalim.' Then the prophet desired Ahab to gather all the people to Mount Carmel, and with them the prophets of Baal; and when they were assembled, Elijah caused fire to descend from heaven on his sacrifice. After that, he obtained of God that it should rain, and the earth recovered its former fertility. (Id. xviii.)

Six years after this, that is, in the year of the world 3103, Ben-hadad, king of Syria, besieged Samaria, and sent ambassadors to Ahab, with insolent messages.

Ahab replied, 'Let not him that girdeth on his harness, boast himself as he that putteth it off.' After this, Ahab numbered the young men of the princes of the provinces, whom he found to be a choice company of two hundred and thirty-two young men; and the people of Samaria, who amounted to about seven thousand men. With this small army, Ahab attacked the numerous host of the Syrians at noon-day, whilst Ben-hadad, and the thirty-two kings that accompanied him, were drinking and making merry. A panic seized the Syrian troops, and they began to flee. Even Ben-hadad himself mounted his horse, and fled with his cavalry. Ahab perceiving this discomfiture of the enemy, pursued, killed great numbers of them, and took a considerable booty. (1 Kings xx. &c.)

What is rendered the 'young men of the princes of the provinces,' (verse 14.) who were the instruments in obtaining this victory, has some ambiguity in the Hebrew.—It may signify either the sons, or the servants of the princes of the provinces; either young noblemen themselves, or their fathers' pages, who were brought up equally delicate and unaccustomed to war. It was by these young men, and not by old experienced officers, that this battle was to be won; that it might be evident the victory was wholly owing to God's gracious and powerful providence, and not to the valour or strength of the people.

After this, the prophet of the Lord came to Ahab, to animate him with fresh courage, and to caution him against negligence and supineness, for he assured the king that Ben-hadad would return against him the next year. According to this prediction, Ben-hadad returned at the end of the year, and encamped at Aphek, with a resolution of engaging the Israelites in battle. Ahab, informed of this, marched against him with an army much inferior in number; but he was assured of victory by a prophet from God. Both armies were ranged in order of battle, during seven successive days; and at length, on the seventh day, a battle ensued, in which one hundred thousand of the Syrians were killed. The rest fled to Aphek; but as they endeavoured to enter the city, the walls of Aphek fell on them, and crushed twenty-seven thousand of them to death. Ben-hadad, submitting himself to the mercy of the conqueror, was received by Ahab into his own chariot. The king of Israel also entered into an alliance with him, and permitted him to depart, on condition, amongst other things, that Ahab should be allowed to make streets and market places in Damascus, as the father of Ben-hadad had formerly done in Samaria. (Id. ibid. ver. 22, 23, &c.)

It is not agreed what we are to understand by streets. Some are of opinion, that by streets Ben-hadad means market places, in which commodities were sold, and the toll of which should belong to Ahab. Some think that he means courts of judicature, in which Ahab was to maintain a jurisdiction over the subjects of Ben-hadad. Some suppose that they were piazzas, of which Ahab was to receive the rents. Some, that he means citadels or fortifications, which might serve as a restraint on the chief city of Syria, and be a means of preventing the Syrians from attempting any new irruptions into the land of Israel. But it seems most probable, that some Israelites were allowed to dwell together in certain streets of Damascus, where they might exercise their own religion and laws.

The Jews say, that the prophet sent to Ahab to inform him of the return of Ben-hadad, was Micaiah.

The clemency, shown so unseasonably to the king of Syria, greatly provoked the Lord; Ahab was reproved by a prophet. However, the king of Israel returned to Samaria in great indignation, and concerned himself little respecting the prophet's prediction or reproof. (Id. ibid. 35, 36, &c.)

In the year of the world 3105, and before Jesus Christ 899, Ahab wished to make a kitchen garden near his palace, and requested one Naboth, a citizen of Jezreel, to sell him his vineyard, which was conveniently situated for his purpose, and for which he offered to give Naboth a better, or to pay him its value in money. Naboth replied, 'The Lord forbid, that I should give the inheritance of my fathers to thee.' On receiving this answer, Ahab returned very discontented to his house, threw himself on his bed, turned towards the wall, and would eat nothing. But Jezebel his wife, wrote letters in the name of Ahab, sealed them with the king's signet, and sent them to the elders of Jezreel, directing them, by false witnesses, to procure the death of Naboth as a traitor. These orders were too punctually executed, and when Ahab was informed of Naboth's death, he immediately took possession of his vineyard. (Id. xxi. 1, 2, 3, &c.)

The law of Moses prohibited the alienation of lands from one tribe or family to another; but if a man was reduced to poverty he might sell his inheritance till the jubilee, when it was to revert to its former owner. (Levit. xxv. 15, 25, 28.) But as he was not poor, Naboth did not expect that it would be returned to him at the Jubilee: and it is, therefore, probable, that Naboth was one of the seven thousand, who duly observed the law.

It was always customary, on the approach of any great calamity, or the apprehension of any national judgment, to proclaim a fast: and Jezebel ordered such a fast to be observed in Jezreel, that she might the better conceal her design against Naboth. For by this means she intimated to the Jezreelites, that there was among them some accursed thing, which was ready to draw down on their city the vengeance of God, and that it was therefore the business of the Jezreelites to inquire respecting all those sins, which provoked God to anger against them, and to purge them out effectually.

Josephus is of opinion, that as Naboth was of an illustrious house, it was ordered that he should occupy an honourable place among the elders, and chief rulers of the city, that it might appear they did not condemn him from hatred or ill will, but merely from the force of evidence. Others, however, suppose, that the reason of his being placed upon an eminence, was only because persons accused and arraigned were wont to have a conspicuous situation before their judges, that all the people might see them, and hear both the accusation and defence.

As Ahab returned from Jezreel to Samaria, he was met by the prophet Elijah, who said to him, 'Hast thou killed, and also taken possession? Thus saith the Lord, In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine.' Ahab said to Elijah, 'Hast thou found me, O my enemy?' And he answered, 'I have found thee: because thou hast sold thyself to work evil in the sight of the Lord, behold I will bring evil upon thee and upon thy family.' Of Jezebel the Lord spake, saying, 'The dogs shall eat Jezebel by the way of Jezreel.' When Ahab heard these words, he rent his clothes, put sackcloth upon his flesh, and gave other indications of sorrow and repentance.

It is supposed, that at this time Ahab also made his son Ahaziah co-partner of his crown, or perhaps only his viceroy. At least, this is the most likely expedient, by which the anachronisms in the books of Kings and Chronicles can be reconciled.

The Lord, therefore, said to the prophet Elijah, 'Because Ahab humbled himself before me, I will not bring the evil in his days, but in his son's days will I bring the evil upon his house.' (Id. ibid. 17, 18, &c.) But as Ahab's repentance was neither sincere nor lasting, God inflicted upon him some part of this punishment. However, he did not extirpate his family till the reign of his son Ahaziah. See AHAZIAH.

It has been observed, that God declared to Ahab the cause of the judgment, which was to befall him, but does not assign the place. For though the words in our translation are, 'In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, shall dogs lick thy blood,' yet we are afterwards told, that the dogs licked the blood of Ahab in Samaria. (1 Kings xxii. 38.) The original should therefore be rendered, 'as the dogs licked,' or, 'in like manner as the dogs licked Naboth's blood, so shall they lick thine, even thine.' Patrick's Comment.

In the year of the world 3107, and before Jesus Christ 897, Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, came to visit Ahab in Samaria. This was at a time when Ahab was preparing to attack Ramoth-gilead, which Ben-hadad, king of Syria, unjustly retained. The king of Israel invited Jehoshaphat to accompany him in this expedition; and that prince accepted the invitation, but desired that some prophet of the Lord might first be consulted. Ahab therefore assembled all the prophets of Baal, who were in number about four hundred, and all of whom concurred in saying, 'Go up, for the Lord shall deliver Ramoth-gilead into the hands of the king.' But Jehoshaphat said, 'Is there not here a prophet of the Lord besides, that we might inquire of him?' To this Ahab replied, 'There is one Micaiah, who never prophesied any good concerning me.' However, Jehoshaphat ordered to send for Micaiah. When the prophet came, the two kings were dressed in royal apparel, and seated each upon a throne, in an open place near the gate of Samaria, and around them were all the prophets of Baal, who pretended to be inspired persons. One of these prophets, Zedekiah, the son of Chenaanah, making himself horns of iron, said to Ahab, 'Thus saith the Lord, with these shalt thou push the Syrians, until thou have consumed them.' The rest also prophesied in the same manner, and exhorted the king to march resolutely against Ramoth-gilead. (1 Kings xxii. 2, 3, &c.)

Some have thought, that the prophets here mentioned were prophets of the groves, who were not slain with the prophets of Baal, because they are the same in number. (1 Kings, xviii. 19.) But perhaps in Israel, as well as in Judah, were schools of the prophets, in which those were instructed, who pretended to possess this gift. Though it is evident that these were false prophets, yet it is not probable that Ahab would send for those who were professed servants of Baal, and from whom he knew Jehoshaphat would receive no advice. Besides, Jehoshaphat would not have accompanied Ahab, in opposition to the opinion of Micaiah, if he had believed that only Micaiah belonged to the Lord, and his adversaries to Baal. Patrick's Comment.

Ahab asked Micaiah whether he should march against Ramoth-gilead? 'Go,' said Micaiah ironically, 'and prosper: for the Lord shall deliver it into the hand of the king.' Ahab added, 'I adjure thee, that thou tell me nothing but that which is true, in the name of the Lord.' Then Micaiah, with a more serious countenance said, 'I saw all Israel scattered upon the hills, as sheep that have no shepherd: and the Lord said, these have no master; let them return every man to his house in peace.'

Then Ahab ordered his people to seize Micaiah, and to carry him to Amon, the governor of the city, and to Joash, the king's son, and to say as follows: 'Put this fellow in the prison, and feed him with bread of affliction, and with water of affliction, until I come in peace.' But Micaiah said, 'If thou return at all in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me.' Afterwards, Ahab and Jehoshaphat went up to Ramoth-gilead.—The king of Israel said to Jehoshaphat, 'I will disguise myself, and enter into the battle, but put thou on thy robes.'

God, however, in order to fulfil his word, permitted one of the Syrian army to shoot a random arrow, which pierced the breast of Ahab. The king of Israel therefore said to his charioteer, 'Turn thine hand, and carry me out of the host, for I am wounded.' The battle lasted the whole day, and Ahab continued in his chariot that he might encourage his army. In the mean time, the blood still issued from his wound, and flowed into the midst of his chariot, and towards the evening he died. As soon as his death was known, it was proclaimed by sound of trumpet, that every man should return to his own city and country. The king's corpse was carried to Samaria, and buried in the royal sepulchre; and his bloody armour, chariot, and harness, were washed in the fish-pool of Samaria, and the dogs licked his blood, according to the word of the Lord, in the year of the world 3107, and before Jesus Christ 897. (Id. ibid. 34, 35, &c.)—Patrick's Comment.; Calmet's Comment.; Le Clerc's Comment.; Pool's Annotat.

AHAB, the son of Koiaiah, one of the two false prophets that seduced the Israelites at Babylon. The Lord threatened them by Jeremiah, that he would deliver them into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, who should put them to death in the presence of those whom they had deceived; and that all the people, when they wished to curse any one, should use their names, and say, 'The Lord make thee like Ahab and Zedekiah, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire.' (Jerem. xxix. 21, 22.)

AHASUERUS, חשמונש, signifies, prince, chief. This word is probably Persian. Ahasuerus was also called Artaxerxes, and was the husband of Esther. Chronologers are greatly divided who this Ahasuerus was. Usher believes, that it was Darius, the son of Hystaspes, and that he married Atossa, who is the same as Vashti, afterwards divorced by him; and that he took to wife Aristone, the daughter of Cyrus, and widow of Cambyses, who is the same as Esther. This opinion, however, is contradicted by Herodotus, who informs us that Aristone was the daughter of Cyrus, and, consequently, could not be Esther, who was too young. The same historian says farther, that Atossa had four sons by Darius, without reckoning daughters, and that she had so great an ascendancy over him, as to prevail with him to declare her son Xerxes his successor, to the exclusion of his own sons.—(Hist. lib. iii. and vii.)

Scaliger, who has been followed by Jahn, thinks that Xerxes is the Ahasuerus of Scripture, and his wife Amestris, queen Esther. He founds his belief on the resemblance of the names; but the characteristics of Amestris in history incontestably prove that she is not the Esther of Scripture.

The authors of the Universal History think, that Cambyses was the Ahasuerus, and Smerdis the Artaxerxes, of Scripture, from their obstructing the work of the temple; for in the sacred history they are said to have reigned between Cyrus and Darius, by whose decree the temple was finished; and as no one except Cambyases and Smerdis, reigned between Cyrus and Darius, these authors are of opinion, that no one, except Cambyases and Smerdis, could be the Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes, who are said to have put a stop to the work. (Ezra iv. 5, 6, 7.)

The most probable opinion seems to be that of Dr. Prideaux, who maintains that the Ahasuerus of Scripture was Artaxerxes Longimanus. The following are the reasons on which he founds this opinion: 1. Josephus (Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 6.) assures us, that Artaxerxes Longimanus was the husband of Esther. 2. The Septuagint version, and the Greek additions to the book of Esther, call Ahasuerus by the name of Artaxerxes. 3. Several circumstances in these additions cannot be applied to Artaxerxes Mnemon. 4. The extraordinary favour, with which Artaxerxes Longimanus honoured the Jews, farther strengthens the probability that he had married a Jewess. This opinion of Dr. Prideaux is maintained by Sulpitius Severus, and many others, both ancients and moderns; and it has been adopted by bishop Tomline, Dr. Gray, and Dr. Hales, the very accurate chronologer. See ARTAXERXES LONGIMANUS. Prideaux's Connexion, vol. i. pp. 270, et seq.; Gray's Key, p. 227; Tomline's Elements, vol. i. p. 93; Hales's Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. pp. 524, et seq.; Horne's Introduction, vol. iv. p. 69, note; Univ. History, vol. v.

AHA'VA, אַחַוָּא, signifies essence, or generation. It was the name of a river of Babylonia, or rather of Assyria, where Ezra assembled those captives, whom he afterwards brought into Judea. (Ezra viii. 15.) The river Ahava is thought to be that which ran along the Adabene, where a river Diava, or Adiava, is mentioned, and on which Ptolemy places the city Abane or Aavane. This is probably the country called Ava, whence the kings of Assyria translated the people called Avites into Palestine, and where they settled some of the captive Israelites. (2 Kings xvii. 24; xviii. 34; xix. 13; xvii. 31.) Ezra, intending to collect as many Israelites as he could, who might return to Judea, halted in the country of Ava, or Ahava, whence he sent agents into the Caspian Mountains, to invite such Jews as were willing to join him. (Ezra viii. 17.) The history of Izates, king of the Adiabeniens, and of his mother Helena, who became converts to Judaism some years after the death of Jesus Christ, sufficiently proves that there were many Jews still settled in that country.

A'HAZ, אַחַז, signifies one that takes and possesses, or that sees. Ahaz, king of Judah, and son of Jotham, is celebrated for his impieties. There are great difficulties with respect to the age of this prince when he began to reign. The text says expressly that he was twenty years of age. (2 Kings xvi. 2.); and if he reigned only sixteen years, he lived only thirty-six years. But we are told that his son Hezekiah was twenty-five years of age when he ascended the throne, and must therefore have been born when his father Ahaz was only eleven years of age, (2 Kings xviii. 2.) This, indeed, is maintained by many good commentators. Such, however, as cannot be reconciled to this opinion, have attempted by various ways to solve the difficulty. See HEZEKIAH.

Ahaz ascended the throne of Judah in the year of the world 3262, and before Jesus Christ 742. He imitated the kings of Israel and Samaria, and gave himself up to idolatry and all manner of disorders. He consecrated one of his sons, whom he made to pass through the fire in honour of the false god, Moloch; and he offered sacrifices upon the hills and high places, and in groves.—About the end of the reign of his father Jotham, the Lord sent Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, against Judah; and these two kings invaded the kingdom, in the beginning of the reign of Ahaz, whose troops they defeated, and afterwards besieged Jerusalem. When they found that they could not take that city, they divided their army, plundered the country, and made the inhabitants prisoners. Rezin, and his part of the confederated army, marched with all their spoil to Damascus; but Pekah attacked Ahaz, and after killing one hundred and twenty thousand of his army, took captive two hundred thousand persons, men, women, and children. As these were being carried prisoners to Samaria, the prophet Oded, with the principal inhabitants of the city, came out to meet the captors, and by remonstrances prevailed with them to liberate their prisoners. Besides their liberty they also gave them food, and restored the booty which they had taken. Those who were unable to perform their journey homeward on foot, were conveyed in carriages to Jericho. At the same time, the Philistines and Edomites invaded other parts of the dominions of Ahaz, committed great disorders, killed many people, and carried off much booty. (2 Kings xvi. 2 Chron. xxviii.)

In these deplorable circumstances, and just before the siege of Jerusalem, the prophet Isaiah, with his son Shear-jashub, went to Ahaz, and foretold the deliverance of his country, and the destruction of his enemies. To prove the truth of his prediction, the prophet offered him the choice of what prodigy he pleased; but Ahaz, under the pretence of declining to tempt the Lord, refused to select any sign. 'Hear, then,' saith Isaiah, 'O house of David, is it a small thing for you to weary men, but will ye weary my God also? Behold the sign, which the Lord shall give you; a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name

Immanuel. Butter and honey shall he eat, that he may know to refuse the evil, and choose the good.' Then Isaiah, as a demonstration of the approaching ruin of Rezin and Pekah, pointed to his own son, and assured Ahaz, that before this child should be able to distinguish between good and evil, the two kings confederated against Judah should be slain. (Isaiah vii. 3. 16.)

But as Ahaz did not change his life, God permitted his enemies to return the year following, and to lay waste the kingdom of Judah. In this distressed condition, Ahaz sent ambassadors to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, saying, 'I am thy servant, and thy son, come up and save me out of the hand of the king of Syria, and out of the hand of the king of Israel, which rise up against me.' To induce the king of Assyria to espouse his interest, he collected the gold and silver, which were in the temple and the palace, and sent them to the king of Assyria. Soon after, Tiglath-pileser marched to the assistance of Ahaz, attacked Rezin, and killed him. He also took Damascus, and destroyed it, and removed the inhabitants to Cyrene, or to that part of Iberia, in which the river Cyrus runs. (2 Kings xvi. 7. 9.)

The book of Kings says, Tiglath-pileser came to the assistance of Ahaz; whilst that of Chronicles, (2 Chron. xxviii. 20, 21.) that he did not assist, but rather straitened the king of Judah. To reconcile this difference, it seems probable, that Tiglath-pileser, instead of assisting Ahaz against the confederated sovereigns, attacked the king of Syria with his whole army, under pretence of causing a diversion.

Ahaz went to Damascus to meet the king of Assyria, and having seen in that city a profane altar, which he admired, he sent a model of it to the high-priest Urijah, and commanded him to construct one like it, to be placed in the temple of Jerusalem. Accordingly, Ahaz caused the altar, which was in the temple, to be removed, and this to be fixed in its room. Upon this altar he offered sacrifices, and ordered the high-priest Urijah to use no other in future. He also commanded to take away the borders of the bases, and the laver from off them. He removed the brazen sea, which was supported by oxen of the same metal, and ordered it to be placed below, on the pavement of the temple. (2 Kings xvi. 10, 11, &c.)

The misfortunes, to which Ahaz was exposed, produced no amendment in his conduct. In his greatest affliction he showed the highest contempt of God, by sacrificing to the Syrian deities, and endeavouring to render them propitious to his wishes. He broke in pieces the vessels of the house of God, shut up the gates of the temple, and erected altars in all parts of Jerusalem, and in all the cities of Judah, to burn incense on them to false gods. He died, and was buried in the city of Jerusalem, but not in the se-pulchres of the kings of Judah, on account of his iniquitous course of life, in like manner as his predecessors, Jehoram and Joash, had been, and two of his successors, Manasseh and Ammon, afterwards were treated for the same reason. He was succeeded by his son Hezekiah, in the year of the world 3278, and before Jesus Christ 726. (2 Chron. xxviii. 22, 23, &c.) Universal History.

AHAZIAH, אחזיה, signifies seizure, possession, or vision of the Lord, and was the name of the son and successor of Ahab, king of Israel. He reigned two years, partly alone, and partly with his father Ahab, who associated him in the kingdom a year before his death. He imitated his father's impieties, and worshipped Baal and Astarte, whose rites had been introduced into Israel by his mother Jezebel. Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, having equipped a fleet at Ezion-geber, Ahaziah requested that his servants might accompany those of Jehoshaphat to Ophir. The fleet of these two princes sailed for Tarshish; but God, provoked at the alliance of Jehoshaphat with this impious king, shattered the ships by tempestuous winds, and disabled them from performing the voyage. (2 Chron. xx. 37.)

The Moabites, who had been subject to the kings of Israel since its separation from Judah, revolted after the death of Ahab, and refused to pay the ordinary tribute. Ahaziah was unable to reduce them to obedience; for about this time he fell from the terrace of his house, and hurt himself considerably. He therefore sent messengers to Ekron, to consult Baal-zebub, the god of that place, whether he should recover of the indisposition occasioned by this accident. The prophet Elijah, by divine appointment, met these messengers, and said, 'Is it because there is not a God in Israel, that ye go to inquire of Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron? Therefore, thus saith the Lord, Thou shalt not come down from that bed, on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die.' Ahaziah having received this information, immediately sent a captain, with fifty soldiers under his command, to seize Elijah, and to bring him to the palace; but the captain speaking to the man of God in an imperious manner, Elijah called fire from heaven, which consumed him and his fifty soldiers. Ahaziah hearing of this, sent another captain, who with his fifty men was in like manner consumed. A third being sent to the prophet, fell on his knees before him, and entreated Elijah to spare his life, and wait on the king. Elijah therefore, by the advice of the angel of the Lord, went to Ahaziah, and told him that he should not recover. According to the prophet's prediction, Ahaziah died, in the year of the world 3108, and before Jesus Christ 896, and Jehoram, his brother, succeeded to the throne. (2 Kings i. 1, 2, &c.)

year of the world 3119, and before Jesus Christ 885. He was twenty-two years old when he began to reign, and he reigned only one year at Jerusalem. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, and walked in the ways of Ahab's house, to which he was allied by his mother, (2 Kings viii. 26, 27; 2 Chron. xxii. 2, 3, &c.) This prince was also called Jehoahaz. The text of the Chronicles imports, that he was forty-two years of age when he began to reign, and in this differs from that of the Kings. Some suppose that the forty-two years in the book of Chronicles are not to be understood as pertaining to the age of Ahaziah, but to the time elapsed from Omri's coming to the throne to the reign of Ahaziah. Others think, that as the Septuagint in this place reads only twenty-two years, the passage has been corrupted.

Joram, king of Israel, attacked Ramoth-gilead, and was there dangerously wounded. At his own request he was carried to Jezreel to be healed of his wounds. Ahaziah, his friend and relation, came to visit him at Jezreel. (2 Kings viii. 28, 29.) In the mean time, Jehu, the son of Nimshi, whom Joram had left besieging Ramoth, rebelled against his master, designing to extirpate the house of Ahab, according to the commandment of the Lord. Joram and Ahaziah, who were ignorant of his intentions, went to meet him. Jehu shot Joram dead on the spot. Ahaziah fled; but Jehu's people overtook him at the ascent of Gur, and wounded him so desperately, that he died by the time he reached the city of Megiddo. His servants carried him to Jerusalem, where he was buried with his fathers in the city of David. In this manner is this incident related in the second book of the Kings, (ix. 21, 22, &c.)

In the Chronicles, the story is told rather differently, and as follows: 'When Jehu was executing judgment on the house of Ahab, and found the princes of Judah, and the sons of the brethren of Ahaziah, that ministered to Ahaziah, he slew them. And he sought Ahaziah, and they caught him, (for he was hid in Samaria,) and brought him to Jehu; and when they had slain him, they buried him, because, said they, he is the son of Jehoshaphat' (2 Chron. xxii. 8, 9.) Calmet observes, that to reconcile these two relations, it may be said, that in this passage Samaria is put, not for the city, but for the kingdom of that name.—Jehu being informed that Ahaziah was still in the territories of Israel, and continued dangerously ill at Megiddo, ordered him to be brought into his presence, and put to death.

We must also observe, that one great end of writing the book of the Chronicles was to supply what had been omitted in that of the Kings. In the latter, therefore, the account of the death of Ahaziah is very short, and includes the story of Jehoram, that the reader may at once perceive in what manner both these princes fell. In the former, the narative of this event is given more in detail. From comparing both, it would appear that Ahaziah, perceiving Jehoram mortally wounded, turned his chariot, and hastened to Samaria, that he might escape into his own kingdom: but finding the passes narrowly guarded, he concealed himself in the town. Jehu coming to Samaria, and receiving intelligence that Ahaziah was in the city, commanded diligent search to be made for him, and that, when found, he should be carried to Gur, and there killed in his chariot. But as Jehu's orders to the officers were only to smite him, they probably thought it sufficient to wound him mortally. The servants of Ahaziah, therefore, carried their master from Gur to Megiddo, the next town in the tribe of Issachar, where he died.—Stackhouse's History of the Bible.

AHIAH, אחיה, signifies brother of the Lord. Ahiah was the son of Ahitub the high-priest, and his successor in the sovereign pontificate. He left this dignity to his son Abimelech, who was put to death by the order of Saul. (1 Sam. xiv. 3.)

AHIJAH, אחיה; see AHIAH. Ahijah was a prophet of the Lord, who dwelt at Shiloh. It is thought that he was the person, who spoke twice to Solomon from God: once whilst he was building the temple, when he promised him divine protection, (1 Kings vi. 11.); another time, after his irregularities, when God expressed his indignation with great threatenings and reproaches, (Id. xi. 6.) Ahijah wrote the history of this prince's life. (2 Chron. ix. 29.) The same prophet met Jeroboam, and taking from off Jeroboam's (or rather perhaps his own) shoulders a mantle, which he then wore, he tore it in twelve pieces, and said, 'Take ten pieces for thyself; for thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give ten tribes to thee.' He added, 'Howbeit, I will not take the whole kingdom out of his hands, and I will suffer him to govern for the remainder of his life; but I will take the kingdom out of his son's hands, and will give it unto thee, even ten tribes.' (1 Kings xi. 29, &c.) This happened in the year of the world 3020, and before Jesus Christ 984. See JEROBOAM.

About the end of Jeroboam's reign, and towards the year of the world 3046, Ahijah, the son of Jeroboam, fell sick. Jeroboam therefore said to his wife, 'Arise, I pray thee, and disguise thyself, that thou be not known to be the wife of Jeroboam, and get thee to Shiloh; behold there is Ahijah the prophet, which told me that I should be king over this people. And take with thee ten loaves and cracknels, and a cruse of honey, and go to him: he shall tell thee what shall become of the child.' Accordingly, the queen went to Ahijah's house in Shiloh. Now the prophet could not see, his eyes being darkened with age; but the Lord said to him, 'Behold the wife of Jeroboam cometh to consult thee concerning the indisposition of her son; thus and thus shalt thou say to her.' As Jeroboam's wife, disguised, and concealing her dignity, entered the house, Ahijah heard the sound of her feet, and said, 'Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam; why feignest thou thyself to be another? for I am sent to thee with heavy tidings.' The prophet then commanded her to go and tell Jeroboam all the evil, which the Lord had declared he would bring upon his house, for his impieties. He also informed her, that as soon as she entered the city, her son Ahijah would die, and that he only, of Jeroboam's house, should come to the grave, or receive the honours of burial. (1 Kings xiv. 2, &c.) See AHIJAH and JEROBOAM.

In all probability Ahijah did not long survive these predictions; but with the time and manner of his death, we are not acquainted.

AHIJAH, son of Baasha, king of Israel. Baasha killed Nadab, the son of Jeroboam (of whom we have been speaking), and usurped his kingdom; thereby executing the vengeance, which God had denounced by Ahijah the Shilonite. (1 Kings xv. 27.)

AHIM'AAZ, אֲחִימָאֵז, signifies brother of the council, or my brother is counsellor, or the beauty of my brother. It was the name of the son of Zadok, the high-priest. He succeeded his father under the reign of Solomon, in the year of the world 3000. He rendered David very important services during the war with Absalom; for whilst his father Zadok was in Jerusalem with Hushai, the friend of David, Ahimaaz and Jonathan remained without the city near En-rogel, or the fountain of Rogel, whither a maid-servant came to tell them the resolutions of Absalom's council. They immediately departed to give intelligence to the king; but being discovered by a young lad, who informed Absalom, they were pursued. Ahimaaz and Jonathan, fearing to be taken, retired to the house of a man of Bahurim, in whose court-yard was a well, in which they concealed themselves. Upon the mouth of this well the woman spread a covering, and on the covering corn ground, or rather parched. When Absalom's people came and inquired after Ahimaaz and Jonathan, the woman answered, 'They are over the little water, being in great haste.'—Deceived by this equivocation, the pursuers passed over a brook at no great distance, but not finding them, returned to Jerusalem.'—Afterwards Ahimaaz and Jonathan continued their journey to David. (2 Sam. xv. 27, &c.; xvii. 17, &c.)

After the battle of Joab and Abishai, in which Absalom was slain, Ahimaaz desired leave of Joab to carry the news to David; but Joab first sent Cushai, and afterwards, at his repeated entreaty, Ahimaaz, who went by the way of the plain, and out-ran Cushai. The sentinel, who kept watch upon the roof over the gate, seeing him, gave notice to the king, and said, 'The running of the foremost messenger is like the running of Ahimaaz, the son of Zadok.' The king said, 'He is a good man, and bringeth good tidings.' Ahimaaz coming near, called, and said, 'All is well,' and he fell down to the earth on his face before the king, and spoke as follows: 'Blessed be the Lord thy God, who hath delivered up the men that lift up their hand against my lord the king.' The king said, 'Is the young man Absalom safe?' Ahimaaz, from prudence, or real ignorance, or unwillingness to declare the truth, replied only, 'When Joab sent the king's servant, and me thy servant, I saw a great tumult, but I knew not what it was.' The king said, 'Turn aside, and stand here.' (2 Sam. xviii. 19, 20, &c.) This is all we learn concerning Ahimaaz. He was succeeded in the high-priesthood by his son Azariah. (1 Chron. vi. 9.)

AH'IMAN, אֲחִימָן, Ἀχίμαν, signifies a brother prepared, or brother of the right hand.—Ahiman was a giant of the race of Anak, and dwelt at Hebron, when the spies visited the land of Canaan. (Numb. xiii. 22.) He was driven from Hebron with his brethren Sheshai and Talmai, when Caleb took that city, in the year of the world 2559, and before Jesus Christ 1445. (Josh. xv. 14.)

AHIM'ELECH, אֲחִימֶלֶךְ, signifies my brother is a king, or the brother of my king. Ahimelech, in some versions is called Abimelech, and was the son of Ahitub, and brother of Ahijah, whom he succeeded in the high-priesthood. At that time, the tabernacle was at Nob, where Ahimelech, with other priests, dwelt. David finding it necessary to retire from Saul, went to Nob, to the high-priest Ahimelech, who was very much surprised to see him, and said, 'Why art thou alone, and no man with thee?' David pretended urgent business, which belonged to the king, and persuaded the priest to give him the shew-bread recently brought from the sacred table in the holy place, Ahimelech having no other in his house. David also took the sword, which he had won from Goliath, and of which he said, 'There is none like that, give it me.' Afterwards David fled to Achish, king of Gath. It happened that Doeg the Edomite was at Nob, when David went thither. (1 Sam. xxi. 1, &c.) Some time after, when Saul was complaining to his officers, that no one was affected with his misfortunes, or informed him of what was carrying on against him, Doeg related what had happened when David came to Ahimelech the high-priest. Immediately Saul sent for Ahimelech, and the other priests, and said to Ahimelech, 'Why have ye conspired against me, thou and the son of Jesse, in that thou hast given him bread, and a sword, and hast inquired of God for him?' Ahimelech, in vindication, answered the king, 'Who is so faithful among all thy servants as David, which is the king's son-in-law, and goeth at thy bidding, and is honourable in thine house? Did I then begin to inquire of God for him?' By this last interrogation Ahimelech meant, that he had often before inquired of God for David. Saul commanded his guards that were about him to slay the priests; but they refused to commit so barbarous an action, as to kill the priests of the Lord. However, Doeg, who had been their accuser, by the king's command became their executioner, and with his sacrilegious hand slew eighty-five of them, though the Septuagint and the Syriac version read three hundred and fifty. He afterwards went to Nob, and put to the sword, men, women, children, and cattle; but one of Ahimelech's sons, by name Abiathar, escaped the slaughter, and retired to David. (1 Sam. xxii. 9, &c.) This happened in the year of the world 2944, and before Jesus Christ 1060.

AHITOPHEL, אֲחִיתוֹפֶל, signifies brother of ruin or folly, and was the name of a native of Gilo. He was a great statesman, and for some time the counsellor of king David, whom he at length deserted, by participating in the rebellion of Absalom. The Jews describe him as grandfather to Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah, and afterwards of David, by his son Ammiel, the father of Bathsheba. If so, Ahitophel must have been very old at the time of Absalom's rebellion, since his grand-daughter Bathsheba had been some time married to Uriah, before she became the wife of David. Some conjecture, that the cause of Ahitophel's embracing the interest of Absalom with so much warmth, was revenge for the dishonour which David had brought on his grand-daughter. For the same reason also they imagine, he advised Absalom to lie with his father's concubines; but the Scripture says, this was done to render Absalom and David irreconcilable. However this might be, Absalom was no sooner acknowledged king by the greater part of Israel, than he sent for Ahitophel to assist him with his advice; for at that time, Ahitophel's counsels were received as oracles.—Nothing gave David more uneasiness, than the information that this great statesman was of Absalom's party; when his friend Hushai came to accompany him in his flight he entreated him rather to return to Jerusalem, offer his services to Absalom, and endeavour to frustrate the prudent measures, which might be proposed by Ahitophel.

When Absalom had entered Jerusalem, Ahitophel advised him, in the first place, publicly to abuse his father's concubines, that all Israel might know he had rendered the breach with his father absolute and irrevocable. Soon after, Ahitophel said to Absalom, 'Let me now choose out twelve thousand men, and I will arise and pursue after David this night. And I will come upon him while he is weary and weakened, and will make him afraid; and all the people that are with him will flee; and I will smite the king only. And I will bring back all the people unto thee; the man, whom thou seekest, is as if all returned: so all the people shall be in peace.' This advice was very agreeable to Absalom, and to all the elders of Israel. However, Absalom desired that Hushai might be called, and give his opinion.

Hushai being informed of the advice of Ahitophel, said, The counsel that Ahitophel has given is not good at this time.' He then proposed some other measure; and the Lord permitted the advice of Ahitophel to be rejected, that the ruin of Absalom might be hastened. When Ahitophel saw that his counsel was neglected, he went to his house at Gilo, and hanged himself, and was buried in the sepulchre of his fathers. (2 Sam. xvi. 15; xvii. 1.) Without doubt, he foresaw what would be the event, and was determined to avoid that ignominious death, which he deserved, and which David would certainly have inflicted on him, when resettled on the throne. This happened in the year of the world 2981, and before Jesus Christ 1023.

AHO'LIBAH, or AELIBEH, אֲהוֹלִיבָה, signifies my tent and my tabernacle.

Aholibah and Aholah are two feigned or symbolical names used by Ezekiel in his prophecy to denote the two kingdoms of Judah and Samaria. (xxiii. 4.) They are represented as sisters, and of Egyptian extraction. Aholah denotes Samaria, and Aholibah, Jerusalem. The first signifies a tent; the second my tent is in her. They both prostituted themselves to the Egyptians and Assyrians, whose abominations and idolatries they imitated. Therefore the Lord abandoned them to the power of those very people, for whom they had shown so excessive and so impure an affection. They were carried into captivity and reduced to the severest servitude.

AHUZ'ZATH, אֲחֻזַּזַּת, Ahuzath or Achozath, signifies possession, occupation, vision, or brother of the olive. Ahuzzath was the friend of Abimelech, king of Gerar, and came with that prince and Philco the general of his army, to make an alliance with Isaac. (Genesis xxvi. 26.) Several interpreters, following the Chaldee and St. Jerom, take Ahuzzath in an appellative sense to signify a company of friends, who attended Abimelech. The Septuagint call him Ahuzzath, the bride-man. He lived in the year of the world 2200, and before Jesus Christ 1804.

A'I, a city to the westward of Bethel. (Gen. xii. 8. Josh. vii. 2, 3, &c.) The Septuagint call it Agai, Josephus denominates it Aina; and others call it Aiath. Joshua having sent a detachment of three thousand men against Ai, God permitted them to be repulsed on account of the sin of Achan, who had violated the anathema, pronounced against the city of Jericho, by appropriating to his own profit some of the spoil, in the year of the world 2553, and before Jesus Christ 1451. After the expiation of this offence, the Lord commanded Joshua to march the whole army against Ai, and treat this city and its king as he had treated Jericho, with the difference, that the plunder should be given to the army. (Josh. viii. 1.)

Joshua sent by night thirty thousand men, to lie in ambush behind Ai. The next day, early in the morning, he marched against the city with the remainder of his army. The king of Ai sallied hastily out of the town, with all his people, and attacked the Israelites, who, on the first onset, fled, as if under some great terror; but this flight was only a feint, to draw the enemy into the open plain. When Joshua perceived that all of them were out of the gates, he elevated his shield upon the top of a spike, as a signal to the ambuscade, which immediately entered the town, now without defence, and set it on fire. The people of Ai, perceiving the rising smoke, endeavoured to return, but were attacked in the rear by those, who had set fire to the city, whilst Joshua and his army advancing in front, destroyed them all. The king was taken alive, and brought to Joshua. The Israelites entered the place, and killed, in this day's action, twelve thousand men, women, and children. The king of Ai was hung upon a gibbet, where he continued till sun-set; and when taken down, he was thrown before the entrance of the city, and over him was raised a great heap of stones. Afterwards, the Israelites divided among themselves the spoil of the place, as had been permitted them by the Lord.

The author of the book of Joshua says, 'Joshua arose and all the people of war, to go up against Ai, and Joshua chose out thirty thousand men of valour, and sent them away by night.' (viii. 3.)

There is a manifest contradiction between this verse and the twelfth, in which it is said, that 'Joshua chose five thousand men, whom he sent to lie in ambush between Bethel and Ai.' Calmet observes, that Masius allows only five thousand for the ambuscade, and twenty-five thousand for the attack of the city, being persuaded, that an army of six hundred thousand men would occasion only confusion. Masius seems to argue rightly, and to think like a soldier; but the generality of interpreters, continues Calmet, acknowledge two bodies to be placed in ambuscade, both between Bethel and Ai, one of twenty-five thousand, the other of five thousand men. It is probable, that Joshua sent at first thirty thousand men, who marched by night, and, to prevent discovery, went behind the eminences of Bethel, and posted themselves at the place appointed for the ambuscade. The officer at the head of these troops, detached five thousand men, who lay as close to the town as possible, that they might throw themselves into it on the first opportunity.

With respect to the nature of the signal used by Joshua, several embrace the opinion of the Rabbins, who believe it was a staff belonging to some of their colours. Some think it very probable, that it was one of the fire-pots, which are used as ensigns by the eastern caravans, and the smoke of which would rise to a considerable height, and denote the fate intended for the city. However, Bochart and others are of opinion, that the signal was only a spear or lance, to which was fastened a flag to render it more visible. Patrick's Comment. ; Additions to Calmet's Dict.

A'JALON, אֵילֹן, Ailon, signifies a chain, or strength, or a stag. It was the name of a city of the tribe of Dan, and was assigned to the Levites of Koath's family. It was situated between Timnath and Bethshe-mesh, and is probably the city alluded to by Joshua, (x. 12.) There were three other cities of this name, one was in the tribe of Benjamin, east of Bethel, (2 Chron. xi. 10.); another in the tribe of Ephraim, not far from Shechem; and the third in the tribe of Zebulun, but its situation is not known. (2 Chron. xxviii. 18.)

AICHMALOTARCH, Αἰχμαλωτάρχης, signifies the prince of the captivity, or chief of the captives. The Jews pretend, that this was the title of him, who had the government of the people during the captivity of Babylon, and they believe these princes or governors to have been constantly of the tribe of Judah, and family of David. But they would be very much at a loss to prove the real existence of these Aichmalotarchs. There was no prince of the captivity before the end of the second century. The office continued till the eleventh century. The princes of the captivity resided at Babylon, where they were installed with great ceremony, held courts of justice, &c. They were set over the eastern Jews, or those settled in Babylon, Chaldæa, Assyria, and Persia.

AKIBA, a famous rabbin, who lived about the year of our Lord 130, and was, as it were, the forerunner of the celebrated impostor Barchochebas. Respecting this man, the Jews relate many ridiculous fables. He was in the height of his reputation, and prince of the Sanhedrim, when Barchochebas appeared, to whom he was attached, and whom he served in almost the same quality as John the Baptist served our Saviour. But these two men were governed by a very different spirit from that of our Saviour and his forerunner. They kindled a war in Judea, prompted the Jews to rebellion, committed infinite disorders in Judea and Syria, killed thousands of Christians and Romans, and caused the entire destruction of the country. See BARCHOCHEBAS.

ALABARCH, Ἀλαβάρης, a term used to signify the chief of the Jews in Alexandria. Some believe that this name was given to the principal magistrate, or head of the Jews at Alexandria, by the Gentiles, who hated and despised the Jews. Some derive the word from alaba, ink used in writing. Others suppose it to denote the person who had the custom of salt, and that it was given in derision to the head, or governor of the Jews at Alexandria.

ALABASTER, the name of a genus of fossils, nearly allied to the marbles. We read in the Gospel of St. Matthew, that Jesus Christ being at table in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, Mary, the sister of Lazarus, poured an alabaster box of precious ointment upon his head, (xxvi. 6, 7.) It is observed that all vessels for the purpose of keeping liquors or unguents, were denominated alabaster, and hence it is supposed by some, that the box here mentioned was made of glass. This conjecture, they think, is supported by what St. Mark says, that the woman, who poured the perfume on our Saviour, broke the box of alabaster, (xiv. 3.) To this it is replied by others, that the expression, breaking the box, merely implies, that the seal which closed the box, and kept the perfume from evaporating, had never been removed, but on this occasion was broken, or first opened.

Alabaster was also used by the ancients as a liquid measure, containing ten ounces of wine, or nine of oil. Hence some have supposed, that the box mentioned in the Gospels was made of glass, and denominated alabaster, from its holding the measure known by that name. Addenda to Calmel's Dictionary.

ALASCANI, a sect of Anti-Lutherans in the sixteenth century, whose distinguishing tenet, besides their denying baptism, was, that the words, 'This is my body,' in the institution of the eucharist, are not to be understood of the bread, but of the whole action or celebration of the supper. They derived their name from Johannes Lisco, a Polish baron, who was superintendent of the Polish church in England.

ALBANENSES, a sect which arose about the year of our Lord 796. They held, with the Gnostics, and Manicheans, two principles, the one good, and the other evil. They believed with Pythagoras in a transmigration of souls. They denied the divinity, and even the humanity, of Jesus Christ, asserting that he was not truly man, did not suffer upon the cross, die, rise again, nor really ascend into heaven. They rejected the doctrine of the resurrection, and affirmed that the general judgment was past, and that hell torments were no other than the evils we feel and suffer in this life. They denied free will, did not admit original sin, and never administered baptism to infants.—They disallowed marriage; maintained the eternity of the world; and held that a man can give the Holy Spirit of himself, and that it is unlawful for a Christian to take an oath. They derived their name from the place in which their spiritual ruler resided. Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. i. pp. 447, 448. See MANICHEANS and CATHARISTS.

ALBANOIS, a denomination, which arose in the eighth century, and renewed the greatest part of the Manichean principles. They also maintained the eternity of the world. See the article MANICHEANS.

ALBIGENSES, a party of reformers in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, who derived their name from Albi, a considerable town of Guienne, where they first settled. They were a branch from the parent stock of the Waldenses, in common with whom they opposed the errors and superstitions of the Romish Church. Such an enormity could not pass unpunished; and Peter de Bruys, one of their first teachers, was condemned to be burned. By their adversaries they were charged with the errors of Manicheism; but certainly no errors of that nature appear to have been proved against them, though some of the later adherents to this sect seem to have imbibed the reveries of the Gnostics.

The Waldenses, Albigenes, and other sects, daily increased, spread imperceptibly throughout all Europe, assembled numerous congregations in Italy, France, Spain, and Germany, and formed by degrees, so powerful a party, as rendered them formidable to the Romish pontiffs, and menaced the papal jurisdiction with a fatal revolution. To the ancient sects, new factions were added, which differed indeed in various instances, yet were all unanimous in one opinion, "That the public established religion, was a motley system of errors and superstition; and that the dominion, which the Popes had usurped over Christians, and the authority they exercised in religious matters, were unlawful and tyrannical." These reformers refuted the superstitions and impostures of the times by arguments deduced from Scripture, and declaimed against the power, the opulence, and the vices of the popes and clergy, under whose usurpations many princes and civil magistrates felt uneasy. The pontiffs, therefore, considered themselves as obliged to have recourse to new and extraordinary methods of defeating enemies, who, by their number and their rank, were every way calculated to alarm their fears. In 1198, Pope Innocent III. prohibited all communion with the Waldenses and Albigenes; he confiscated their goods, disinherited their children, denied them the rites of burial, and gave to their accusers one-third of their effects. The same pontiff sent into the southern provinces of France legates extraordinary to extirpate heresy, in all its forms and modifications, without being at all scrupulous in using such methods, as might be necessary to effect their salutary purpose. From these spiritual champions, the formidable and odious tribunal, called the inquisition, derived its origin.

But as Innocent III. perceived that the labours of the first inquisition were not immediately attended with the effects he had fondly expected, he addressed himself, in 1207, to Philip Augustus, king of France, and to the leading men of that nation, and solicited them by the alluring promises of the most ample indulgences, to extirpate the heretics by fire and sword. This address was repeated the year following. In 1209, a formidable army of Crusaders appeared against the heretics, who were comprehended under the general denomination of Albigenses, and commenced an open war, which they carried on with the utmost exertions of cruelty, though with various success, for several years. The principal director of this ecclesiastical war was Arnold, abbot of the Cisterians, and legate of the pope; and the commander-in-chief of the expedition was Simon, earl of Montfort. Raymond VI., earl of Toulouse, who had been solemnly excommunicated, to deliver himself from the ecclesiastical malediction, forsook the Albigenses, and joined the crusaders; but as fear had occasioned the apostasy of the earl of Toulouse, a similar motive produced his return to the friends he had deserted. The earl of Montfort had embarked in this war, not so much from a principle of zeal for religion, or of aversion to the heretics, as from a desire of augmenting his fortune, which he hoped to improve by obtaining the territories of Raymond. The selfish views of Montfort were seconded and accomplished by the court of Rome. After many battles, sieges, and a multitude of other exploits, conducted with the most intrepid courage, and the most abominable barbarity, he received from the hands of Innocent III. at the council of the Lateran, in 1215, the county of Toulouse, and the other lands belonging to that earl, as a reward for his zeal in supporting the cause of God and of the Church. About three years after this he lost his life at the siege of Toulouse; and Raymond, his valiant adversary, died in the year 1222.

The death of the two chiefs of this deplorable war, was far from extinguishing the flame of persecution on the side of the pontiffs, or calming the restless spirit of faction on that of the pretended heretics. Raymond VII. earl of Toulouse, and Amalric, earl of Montfort, succeeded their fathers at the head of the contending parties, and prosecuted the war with the utmost vehemence, and with such various success, that the issue for some time seemed doubtful.—Raymond commenced his career with advantages superior to those of his antagonist; and pope Honorius III. alarmed at his vigorous opposition to the orthodox legions, engaged Lewis VIII. king of France, by the most pompous promises, to march in person with a formidable army against the enemies of the Church. The obsequious monarch attended to the solicitations of the pontiff, and embarked with a considerable military force, but did not live to reap the fruits of his zeal. However, his engagements with the court of Rome, and his furious designs against the heretics, were executed with the greatest alacrity and vigour, by his son and successor, commonly called St. Lewis. Raymond, pressed on all sides, was obliged, in the year 1229, to conclude a peace on the most disadvantageous terms, even by ceding the greater part of his territories to the French monarch, after having sacrificed a portion of them, as a peace-offering, to the Church of Rome. This treaty of peace gave a mortal blow to heresy, and dispersed the champions, who had appeared in its defence. The inquisition was established at Toulouse, and the heretics were not only exposed to the pious cruelties of Lewis, but Raymond himself, who had formerly been their patron, became their persecutor, and treated them, on all occasions, with the most inhuman severity. Afterwards, Raymond broke the engagements, into which he had entered by the treaty, and renewed the war against Lewis and the inquisitors, who abused their victory, and the power they had acquired in the most odious manner. However, this new effort in favour of the heretics, was attended with little or no effect; and the unfortunate earl of Toulouse, the last representative of that noble and powerful family, dejected and exhausted by the losses he had sustained, and the perplexities in which he was involved, died in the year 1249, without male issue. Thus ended a civil war, of which religion had been partly the cause, and for which it was partly the pretext.—The war, however, in its consequences, was highly profitable both to the kings of France and the Roman pontiffs.

It is impossible to contemplate the vast effusion of human blood on this occasion, without emotions of horror. In the course of these wars, not less than a million of men are supposed to have been sacrificed; and in this number are included three hundred thousand of the crusaders themselves.—What aggravates the horror to the utmost extreme, is, that the name of Christ should have been profaned to sanction such destruction. Gregory's History of the Christian Church, vol. ii. pp. 127. 174.

AL'CIMUS, Ἀλκιμος, signifies strong, vigorous. Alcimus, or, as he is called by Josephus, Jacimus, or Joachim, was high-priest of the Jews, and succeeded to this office in the year of the world 3842, and before Jesus Christ 162. He was of the race of the priests, but not of a family of the first rank, nor whose ancestors had enjoyed the high-priesthood. Besides, he had been polluted with idolatry during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, (2 Macc. xiv. 3.) and obtained this dignity by very irregular methods. After the death of Menelaus, he was confirmed in his office by king Antiochus Eupator. Alcimus did not perform the functions of it, till after the death of Judas Maccabæus. Seeing, therefore, that he could not exercise his dignity of high-priest, he no sooner heard that Demetrius, the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, had privately left Rome, and was arrived in Syria, than he waited on the new monarch at the head of the apostate Jews, who were then at Antioch. He besought Demetrius to defend them from the violence of Judas Maccabæus, whom he accused as an oppressor of such as supported the king's party, and who had expelled them their country. He also entreated him to send some person into Judea to examine into the mischiefs and disorders committed by Judas Maccabæus, and to chastise his insolence. (1 Macc. vii.)

Demetrius immediately sent Bacchides with an army into Judea, and confirming Alcimus in his office of high-priest, charged them jointly with the conduct of the war. They endeavoured to surprise Judas and his brethren, who, suspecting the snare laid for them, happily escaped. However, Alcimus swearing that no injury should be offered to any, about sixty Assideans, with many scribes and doctors of the law, put themselves in his power, and were all murdered. After this perfidious action, no one would trust him.

Bacchides having established Alcimus by force in Judea, marched into Syria, and left to Alcimus the whole government of the province, with troops sufficient for his support. Alcimus for some time defended himself with success; but Judas obtaining a superiority, he found himself unable to resist him, and returned to the king with a present of a gold crown, a palm-tree, and golden branches, which he had probably taken out of the temple. (2 Macc. xiv. 3, 4.) Seizing a favourable opportunity, he represented to the king, that so long as Judas lived, his authority would never be settled in Judea. The same was suggested by others, who had much influence with the king. Demetrius, therefore, was at length persuaded to send a new army into Judea, under the command of Nicanor. This general was killed, and his army routed, in a battle, which he fought with Judas Maccabæus. Demetrius, being informed of this, again sent Bacchides and Alcimus, with a powerful reinforcement, consisting of the choice of all his troops. Judas Maccabæus having ventured to attack this army with a body of only eight hundred men, was killed in the engagement. (1 Macc. ix. 1, 2, &c.)

By the death of Judas, Alcimus and his party were delivered from a formidable enemy, and obtained superiority in the country. Alcimus began to exercise the offices of the priesthood, which he had purchased with money; but attempting to pull down the wall of the inner court, which had been built by the prophets, and which probably separated the altar of burnt-offerings from the priests' court, God punished him by a stroke of the palsy, of which he died in the year of the world 3844. (1 Macc. vii. 9; ix. 54.)

ALEPH, (א), the name of the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet, from which the alpha of the Syrians and Greeks was formed. This word signifies prince, chief, or thousand. Certain Psalms, and other parts of Scripture, begin with aleph; and other verses with the rest of the Hebrew letters. These pieces are called acrostics, because all the verses, which compose them, begin with a letter in alphabetical order.

ALEXAN'DER, Ἀλέξανδρος, signifies one that assists men; helps stoutly; or turns away evil.

ALEXANDER the Great, son and successor of Philip, king of Macedon, is denoted in the prophecies of Daniel by a leopard with four wings, signifying his great strength, and the unusual rapidity of his conquests. (Dan. vii. 6.) and by a one-horned he-goat running over the earth so swiftly as not to touch it, attacking a ram with two horns, overthrowing him, and trampling him under foot, without any being able to rescue him. (Id. viii. 4, 5, 6, 7.) The he-goat prefigured Alexander; the ram, Darius Codomannus, the last of the Persian kings. In the statue beheld by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream, (Id. ii. 39.) the belly of brass was the emblem of Alexander, and the legs of iron denoted his successors. He was appointed by God to destroy the Persian empire, and to substitute in its room the Grecian monarchy.

Alexander succeeded his father Philip in the year of the world 3668, and before Jesus Christ 336. He was chosen by the Greeks general of their troops against the Persians, and entered Asia at the head of thirty-four thousand men, in the year of the world 3670. In one campaign, he subdued almost all Asia Minor, and afterwards defeated, in the narrow passes, which lead from Syria to Cilicia, the army of Darius, which consisted of four hundred thousand foot, and one hundred thousand horse. Darius fled, and left in the hands of the conqueror, his camp, baggage, children, wife, and mother.

After subduing Syria, Alexander came to Tyre; and the Tyrians refusing him entrance into their city, he besieged it. At the same time, he wrote to Jaddus, high-priest of the Jews, that he expected to be acknowledged by him, and to receive from him the same submission, which had been hitherto paid to the king of Persia. Jaddus refusing to comply, under pretence of having sworn fidelity to Darius, Alexander resolved to march against Jerusalem, when he had reduced Tyre. After a long siege, this city was taken and sacked; and Alexander entered Palestine, in the year of the world 3672, and subjected it to his obedience. As he was marching against Jerusalem, the Jews became greatly alarmed, and had recourse to prayers and sacrifices. The Lord, in a dream, commanded Jaddus to open the gates to the conqueror, and at the head of his people, dressed in his pontifical ornaments, and attended by the priests in their robes, to advance and meet the Macedonian king. Jaddus obeyed; and Alexander perceiving this company approaching, hastened towards the high-priest, whom he saluted. He then adored God, whose name was engraven on a thin plate of gold, worn by the high-priest upon his forehead. The kings of Syria, who accompanied him, and the great officers about Alexander, could not comprehend the meaning of his conduct. Parmenio alone ventured to ask him, why he adored the Jewish high-priest? Alexander replied, that he paid this respect to God and not to the high-priest. 'For,' added he, 'whilst I was yet in Macedonia, I saw the God of the Jews, who appeared to me in the same form and dress as the high-priest at present, and who encouraged me, and commanded me to march boldly into Asia, promising that he would be my guide, and give me the empire of the Persians. As soon therefore as I perceived this habit, I recollected the vision, and understood that my undertaking was favoured by God, and that under his protection I might expect all kind of prosperity.'

Having said thus, Alexander accompanied Jaddus to Jerusalem, where he offered sacrifices in the temple according to the directions of the high-priest. Jaddus showed him the prophecies of Daniel, in which the destruction of the Persian empire by Alexander is declared. The king was therefore confirmed in his opinion, that God had chosen him to execute this great work. At his departure, Alexander bade the Jews ask of him what they would. The high-priest desired only the liberty of living under his government according to their own laws, and an exemption from tribute every seventh year, because in that year, the Jews neither tilled their grounds nor reaped their fruits. With this request, Alexander readily complied.

Having left Jerusalem, Alexander visited other cities of Palestine, and was every where received with great testimonies of friendship and submission. The Samaritans, who dwelt at Sichem, and were apostates from the Jewish religion, observing how kindly Alexander had treated the Jews, resolved to say, that they also were by religion Jews. For it was their practice, when they saw the affairs of the Jews in a prosperous state, to boast that they were descended from Manasseh and Ephraim; but when they thought it their interest to say the contrary, they failed not to affirm, and even to swear, that they were not related to the Jews. They came therefore with many demonstrations of joy, to meet Alexander, as far almost as the territories of Jerusalem. Alexander commended their zeal; and the Sichemites entreated him to visit their temple and city. Alexander promised that he would at his return; and as they petitioned him for the same privileges as the Jews, he asked them if they were Jews? They replied they were Hebrews, and were called by the Phœnicians Sichemites. Alexander said that he had granted this exemption only to the Jews, but that at his return he would inquire into the affair, and do them justice.

This prince having conquered Egypt, and regulated it, gave orders for the building of the city of Alexandria, and departed thence, about spring, in pursuit of Darius. Passing through Palestine, he was informed that the Samaritans in a general insurrection had killed Andromachus, governor of Syria and Palestine, who had come to Samaria to regulate some affairs. This action greatly incensed Alexander, who loved Andromachus. He therefore commanded all those, who were concerned in his murder, to be put to death, and the rest be banished from Samaria, and settled a colony of Macedonians in their room. What remained of their lands he gave to the Jews, and exempted them from the payment of tribute. The Samaritans who escaped this calamity, retired to Sichem at the foot of Mount Gerizim, which afterwards became their capital. Lest the eight thousand men of this nation, who were in the service of Alexander, and had accompanied him since the siege of Tyre, if permitted to return into their own country, should renew the spirit of rebellion, he sent them into Thebais, the most remote southern province of Egypt, where he assigned them lands.

A detail of Alexander's history is foreign to our subject. After defeating Darius in a pitched battle, and subduing all Asia and the Indies, with incredible rapidity, he gave himself up to intemperance. Having drunk to excess, he fell sick and died, after he had obliged 'all the world to be quiet before him.' (1 Macc. i. 3.) Being sensible that his end was near, he sent for the grandses of his court and declared, that 'he gave the empire to the most deserving.' Some affirm that he regulated the succession by a will. The author of the first book of Maccabees says, that he divided his kingdom among his generals while he was living. (1 Mac. i. 7.) This he might do; or he might express his foresight of what actually took place after his death. It is certain, that a partition was made of Alexander's dominions among the four principal officers of his army, and that the empire, which he founded in Asia, subsisted for many ages. Alexander died in the year of the world 3681, and before Jesus Christ 323, in the thirty-third of his age, and the twelfth of his reign. He was buried at Alexandria. See ALEXANDRIA.

ALEXANDER BALAS, so called from Bala his mother, was the natural son of Antiochus Epiphanes, and upon medals is sur-named Theopator Euergetes. Some historians will not allow him to be even the natural son of Antiochus Epiphanes. Florus calls him an unknown person, and of uncertain extraction. Justin says, that the enemies of Demetrius, king of Syria, suborned a young man from among the meanest of the people, to declare himself son and heir of Antiochus; and that he, warring with success against the king of Syria, obtained his kingdom. Appian plainly affirms, that Alexander Balas pretended to be of the family of the Seleucidæ without any title to that pretension; and Athenæus says, that he was the supposed son of Antiochus Epiphanes. However, the Roman senate, the Jews, the Egyptians, and the Syrians, acknowledged him as son and heir of that prince. Heraclides of Byzantium was the person, who undertook to seat Alexander Balas on the throne of Syria, and to displace Demetrius, his particular enemy. He carried Alexander to Rome, and by presents and intrigue prevailed on the senate not only to acknowledge Alexander as the son of Antiochus, but also to issue a decree permitting him to recover the kingdom of Syria from Demetrius, and promising him the assistance of the Roman people. By virtue of this decree, Alexander Balas raised forces; and sailing to Ptolemais in Palestine, he possessed himself of that city, and assumed the title of king of Syria, in the year of the world 3851, and before Jesus Christ 153. He then wrote to Jonathan Maccabæus, and sent him a purple robe, and a crown of gold. (1 Mac. x. 18, &c.) Jonathan therefore embraced the party of Alexander, notwithstanding the offers and solicitations of Demetrius. The two contending kings committed the determination of their cause to a decisive battle, in which Demetrius, after performing prodigies of valour, was defeated and slain.

Alexander Balas having thus obtained full possession of the kingdom of Syria, sent to demand the daughter of the king of Egypt in marriage. Ptolemy complied with the demand; and the marriage was performed at Ptolemais, where the two kings met. But Alexander did not long enjoy prosperity. He had not filled the throne above two years, when Demetrius Nicator, eldest son of the former Demetrius Soter, resolving to revenge the death of his father, procured from Crete an army of mercenaries, and passed into Cilicia. Alexander was then in Phœnicia; and as soon as he received the news, he returned with all speed to Antioch, that he might order affairs before the arrival of Demetrius.

In the mean time, Demetrius having given the command of his troops to Apollonius, that general was defeated by Jonathan Maccabæus, whom Alexander, for his services, advanced to new honours, and made an addition to his territories. (1 Mac. x. 69, &c.) Whilst these things were transacting, Ptolemy Philometor, father-in-law of Alexander Balas, devised how he might unite the kingdom of Syria with that of Egypt, and took private measures to destroy both Demetrius Nicator, and Alexander Balas. Under the pretence of assisting his son-in-law, he entered Syria; and after possessing himself of many cities, which received him as a friend, he said that Balas had prepared for him several ambuscades in Ptolemais. (1 Mac. xi. 1, 2, &c.) He advanced to Antioch, without encountering any resistance, and seating himself on the throne of Syria, put upon his head the two diadems of Egypt and Syria. (Id. ib. 13.)

Balas, who had retreated into Cilicia, collected a numerous army, with which he marched against Ptolemy and Demetrius Nicator, who were now confederated against him. He gave them battle, but his army was routed, and himself obliged to flee into Arabia; and Zabdîel, a prince of the Arabians, cut off his head, and sent it to Ptolemy. (1 Mac. xi. 17.) This is the account given by the author of the first book of Maccabees. Other historians relate, that Alexander's generals, considering their own interests and security, treated privately with Demetrius, treacherously killed their master, and sent his head to Ptolemy at Antioch. This happened in the year of the world 3859, and before Jesus Christ 145. Alexander Balas left a son very young, who was called Antiochus Theus, and whom Tryphon raised to the throne. See ANTIOCHUS.

ALEXANDER LYSIMACHUS, alabarch of Alexandria, and brother to Philo the Jew. Some think that this was the Alexander, who was in company with the priests when the apostles were carried before the senate, to give an account of their doctrine and conduct. (Acts iv. 6.) This happened in the year of our Lord 34. Josephus says, that this Alexander was the wealthiest Jew of his time. He presented rich gifts to the temple, and was the father of Tiberius Alexander, who renounced the religion of the Jews, and turned Pagan. Alexander Lysimachus managed the affairs of the empress Antonia. He was imprisoned by the emperor Caligula, and was not liberated till the reign of Claudius, his successor.

ALEXANDER of Ephesus, who addressed the rabble that clamoured against St. Paul, and endeavoured to appease them. When, however, he appeared in the assembly, and was known to be a Jew, the Ephesians cried more vehemently, 'Great is Diana of the Ephesians!' It is not known whether this Alexander was friendly or inimical to St. Paul; whether he was a Jew, or a convert to Christianity. (Acts xix. 33.) This took place in the year of our Lord 56.

ALEXANDER, an artificer in copper, mentioned by St. Paul in his first Epistle to Timothy. (i. 19, 20.) The generality of commentators are of opinion, that the apostle excommunicated him and Hymeneus, because they had blasphemed against the truth. Some, however, think, that they were not excommunicated, but instructed by suffering to reform their conduct. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

ALEXANDRIA, a celebrated city in Egypt, built by Alexander the Great, in the year of the world 3673, and situated between the lake Mœris and the Mediterranean Sea. Alexandria is pretty often mentioned in the Latin version of those books of the Old Testament, which were written before the reign of Alexander. But this name does not occur in the original Hebrew; and instead of it we read No, or Ammon-no, which is thought by some to be the city of Diospolis, in the Delta, between Busiris and Mendes. Some are of opinion that the old city No having fallen into decay, Alexander the Great approved so much of the situation of the place, that he built there the noble city, from him called Alexandria.

The Arabians inform us, that Alexandria was called Caissoun, before it was rebuilt or enlarged by Alexander the Great. Dinocrates, who prepared the plan of this city, was the same architect that rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus. Aridæus, the brother of Alexander, was charged with the care of carrying the corpse of that prince from Babylon, where he died, to Alexandria. He employed two years in preparations for the funeral pomp, which is described by Diodorus Siculus. A prophecy had prevailed, that the place in which Alexander should be buried would rise to great prosperity. The governors, therefore, of several towns and provinces disputed the honour and advantage of possessing his body. It was proposed to carry it to Aigui, in Macedonia, where the kings of that country were generally buried; but, at length, Egypt prevailed. His body was deposited first at Memphis, and afterwards in Alexandria, and is said to have been enclosed in a coffin of gold, and embalmed in honey. Some years ago, a sarcophagus was brought to this country from Alexandria, and deposited in the British Museum. This sarcophagus was supposed by some to be the actual tomb of Alexander the Great. This opinion, however, has been ably controverted, and little doubt remains that the sarcophagus in question contained the remains of some other mighty conqueror, whose 'path of glory led but to the grave.'

The happy situation of Alexandria, between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, attracted the commerce of the East and West, and soon rendered it one of the most flourishing cities in the world. But this city, formerly so rich and powerful, has now little remarkable besides its ruins, the remains of its past grandeur.

The commerce of Alexandria was formerly so considerable, especially in corn, that the century might readily find a ship of Alexandria, laden with corn, sailing into Italy. (Acts xxvii. 6.) Apollon was a native of this city. (Id. xviii. 24.) Wells's Geography; Monthly Magazine, 1804; Addenda to Calmet's Dict.

ALEXANDRIAN MANUSCRIPT, a famous copy of the Scriptures, in four volumes folio. It contains the whole Bible in Greek, including the Old and New Testament, with the Apocrypha, and some smaller pieces, but not quite complete. It is preserved in the British Museum. It was sent as a present to King Charles I. from Cyrilus Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople, by Sir Thomas Rowe, ambassador from England to the Grand Seignior, about the year 1628. Cyrilus brought it with him from Alexandria, where it was probably written. In a schedule annexed to it, he gives the following account:—that it was written, as tradition informed them, by Thecla, a noble Egyptian lady, about thirteen hundred years ago, and not long after the council of Nice. But this high antiquity, and the authority of the tradition, to which the patriarch refers, have been disputed; and the most accurate biblical writers are not agreed respecting its age. Grabe thinks, that it might have been written before the end of the fourth century; others are of opinion, that it was not written till near the end of the fifth century, or rather later.

This manuscript received the name of the Alexandrian MS., because Cyrilus brought it immediately, though perhaps not originally, from Alexandria. It appears, however, to have been really written in Egypt. After a great display of learning, in which Dr. Woide examines the evidence for the antiquity of this manuscript, he concludes by saying, Codicem Alexandrinum intra medium et finem sæculi quarti scriptum esse. This is supposed to be the very greatest antiquity that can be allowed to this manuscript. But the question relative to the antiquity of a manuscript, is of much less importance, than that which relates to the antiquity of its text. Dr. Woide published the Alexandrian MS. in 1786, with types cast for that purpose, line for line, without intervals between the words, as in the manuscript itself: its title is Novum Testamentum Græcum à Codice MS. Alexandrino, qui Londini in bibliotheca Musei Britannici asservatur descriptum. It consists, as has been already mentioned, of four folio volumes, the first three of which contain the Old Testament, and the fourth the New Testament, together with the first epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, and a fragment of the second. Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, with notes by Dr. Herbert Marsh, vol. ii. pp. 186, 187, &c.; vol. iii. pp. 655, &c.

ALLEGORY, a figurative discourse, which employs terms appropriate to one thing, to signify another. It is a metaphor prolonged and pursued. The prophets present the Jews under the allegory of a vine, which is planted, cultivated, and watered, by the hand of God, but which, instead of producing good fruit, brings forth sour grapes. In like manner, the apostle compares the two covenants of Sinai and the Gospel, or Jerusalem that 'now is,' and the heavenly Jerusalem, and says that these things may be allegorized.

Allegories, as well as metaphors, parables, similitudes, and comparisons, are frequent in Scripture. It is therefore one principal business of a commentator to distinguish between the literal and allegorical meaning of passages, and to reduce the allegorical to the literal sense. The ancient Jews, as the Therapeutæ, the Book of Wisdom, Josephus, and Philo, and, in imitation of them, many of the fathers, turned even historical passages of the Scripture into allegories, and such places as had already a literal sense. But such allegorical explanations are of little or no use.

ALLELUIAH, or HALLELU-JAH, הללויה, signifies praise the Lord; or, praise to the Lord. This word occurs at the beginning or end of many psalms. Halleluiah was sung on solemn days of rejoicing. (Tobit xiii. 18.) St. John says, that he heard a great voice of much people in heaven, who cried, Alleluiah; and the four and twenty elders, and the four beasts, fell down and worshipped God that sat on the throne, saying Alleluiah. (Rev. xix. 1. 3. 4. 6.) This is the song of the saints at the fall of Antichrist. This expression of joy and praise was transferred from the synagogue to the church, and is still occasionally used in devotional psalmody.

An expression very similar in sound to this, seems to have been used by many nations, who can scarcely be supposed to have borrowed it from the Jews. Could this be one of the most ancient expressions of devotion? As the Greeks used ἐλεεὺ ἰού, in a solemn beginning and ending of their hymns to Apollo, it would seem that they knew it; and it is said also to have been heard among the Indians in America; and Alla, alla, as the name of God, and likewise in composition, is used in a great part of the East. Ad-denda to Calmet's Dictionary.

ALLUSH, ALUSH, or OLLUSH, אלוש, Ἀλως, signifies paste or dough. The Israelites being in the wilderness of Shur, departed from Dophkah to Allush, and thence to Rephidim. (Numb. xxxiii. 13.) Eusebius and S. Jerom fix Allush in Idumea, about Gabala or Petra, the capital of Arabia Petraea. In the accounts of the empire, it is situated in the third Palestine, and is reckoned by Ptolemy among the cities of Idumæa.

Some suppose that this word may signify a tongue, and in that case it would indicate a tongue of land, or a cape, as it imports a tongue of sea, or a bay. (Josh. xv. 2. 5.) Hence, probably, it implies, that the Israelites traversed the peninsula of Arabia to its most southern cape or point, now Ras Mohammed, before they turned directly towards Mount Sinai. Taylor's Sacred Geography.

ALMAH, ערמה Halma, a Hebrew word signifying properly a virgin, a young woman unacquainted with man. In this sense it occurs in the famous passage of Isaiah, (vii. 14.) 'Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son.' The Hebrew has no term that more properly signifies a virgin, than almah, though it must be confessed, without lessening the certainty or application of Isaiah's prophecy, that sometimes by mistake, a young woman, whether truly a virgin or not, is called almah. In like manner, the Latin word virgo is sometimes applied to one that has not her virginity. St. Jerom, in his Commentary on this passage, observes, that the prophet declined using the word bethaul, which signifies any young woman, or young person, but employed the term almah, which denotes a virgin never seen by man. This is the import of the word almah, which is derived from a root that signifies to conceal. It is very well known, that young women in the East do not appear in public, but are shut up in their houses, and their mothers' apartments, like nuns. The Chaldee Paraphrast and the Septuagint translate almah, a virgin, ἡ παρθένος; and Akiba, the famous Rabbim, who was a great enemy to Christ and Christians, and lived in the second century, understands it in the same manner. The apostles and evangelists, and the Jews of our Saviour's time, explained it in the same sense, and expected a Messiah born of a virgin.

The Jews, that they may obscure this plain text, and weaken this proof of the truth of the Christian religion, pretend, that this Hebrew word signifies a young woman, and not a virgin. But this corrupt translation is easily confuted. 1. Because this word constantly denotes a virgin in all other passages of Scripture, in which it is used. 2. From the intent of the passage, which was to confirm their faith by a strange and wonderful sign. It surely could be no wonder, that a young woman should conceive a child, but it was a very extraordinary circumstance, that a virgin should conceive and bear a son. Poole's Annotat.

ALMARICIANS, a sect so denominated from their leader Almaric, who broached his tenets in France, in the year 1209. He affirmed that every Christian was actually a member of Christ, and without this belief no one could be saved. His followers went farther, and asserted, that the power of the Father continued only during the Mosaic dispensation; that the coming of Christ introduced a new law; that at the end of the twelfth, or the beginning of the thirteenth century, commenced the reign of the Holy Ghost, in which the sacraments and all external worship were to be abolished; and that every one was to be saved by the internal operations of the Holy Spirit alone, without any external act of religion.—Their morals were as infamous as their doctrine was absurd. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iii. pp. 129—133.

AL'MON, עֲלִמֹן, signifies the same as Alameh. Almon was a city belonging to the tribe of Benjamin, (Josh. xxi. 18.) and is thought by Calmet to be the same as Ale-meth, which was given to Aaron's family. (1 Chron. vi. 60.)

ALMOND-TREE, a tree often mentioned in Scripture. The Hebrews call it שָׁקֵד shaked, from a root which signifies to watch; and, indeed, the almond-tree is one of the first trees that blossom in the spring. The Lord intending to display to Jeremiah the vigilance of his wrath against his people, showed him the branch of an almond-tree, and said unto him, 'What seest thou?' He answered, 'I see the rod of an almond-tree,' (Jer. 11.); a watcher; which signified that God would watch over his word to fulfil it. In Judea, the almond-tree blossoms in January, and bears fruit in March.

Aaron's rod, which bore blossoms and fruit in the wilderness, was of the almond-tree. (Numb. xvii. 8.) Ecclesiastes, expressing in an enigmatical manner, that an old man's hair will grow white, says, 'the almond-tree shall flourish,' (xii. 5). This tree blows white.

ALMUGIM, or Almug-tree, a certain kind of wood, which is mentioned in the first book of Kings, (x. 11.) and which the Vulgate translates ligna thyina; and the Septuagint wrought wood. The Rabbins generally render it coral; and others ebony, brazil, or pine. But it has been observed that the almug-tree cannot be coral; for coral is not proper to make musical instruments, nor to be used in rails, nor in a stair-case, for which purposes the Scripture tells us this wood was employed. The wood thyinum is that of the citron-tree, which was known to the ancients, and much esteemed for its colour and beauty. It came from Mauritania. By the best commentators, therefore, the almugim, or algumim, or simply gummim, taking al for a kind of article, is understood to be an oily and gummy wood, particularly the tree, which produces gum Arabic. It is said, that gum Ammoniac proceeds from a tree resembling that which bears myrrh; and gum Arabic comes from the black acacia, which is supposed to be the same as the shittim-wood, frequently mentioned by Moses. If so, Solomon's almug-tree, and Moses's shittim-wood, will be the same. See SHITTIM.

ALOES, or ALOE, in the Linnæan system of botany, is a genus of the hexandria monogynia class of plants.

Of this genus, botanical writers enumerate ten species; of which the most considerable are the Aloe of America, and that of Asia, the former being valued on account of its beautiful flowers, and the latter for the drug prepared from it. This drug, which is also called Aloe or Aloes, is procured from the inspissated juice of the Asiatic plant in the following manner. From the leaves fresh culled is pressed a juice, the thinner and poorer sort of which is poured off; and being afterwards placed in the sun, becomes a hard yellowish substance, called socotorine aloe. The thicker part being put into another vessel, hardens into a substance of a liver-colour, and is thence called aloe hepatica. The thickest part, or sediment, hardens into a coarse substance, which is called aloe caballina, or horse aloe, from its being given to horses. This juice is famous for its purgative virtues, and is usually given in wine, in the form of a tincture.

This drug was used by the ancient Jews in embalming, to prevent the putrefaction of the dead body. Nicodemus bought about a hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes, to embalm the body of Jesus Christ. (John xix. 39.) In Proverbs, the debauched woman says, that she had perfumed her bed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon, (vii. 17.); and the spouse in the Canticles, that myrrh, aloes, and all kind of perfumes, are to be found in the garden of her beloved, (iv. 14.) The Hebrew text in these passages, and in Numbers, (xxiv. 6.) reads ahalim, which some interpret sandal-wood; but the generality of commentators understand by it the aloe. Linnæi Gen. Plant.; Hill's Hist. of the Mat. Med. &c.

ALOGIANS, a sect of heretics that sprang up in the church soon after the death of John the Evangelist. They were called Alogians from their denying the Divine Logos, the Word, or Son of God. They rejected the Gospel of St. John as a spurious work, only because it opposed their tenets. Their founder was one Theodore of Byzantium, a currier by trade. This man, having apostatized from the catholic faith, during the heat of persecution, offered to return to the church; but his offer being rejected, he broached the preceding opinions, which were afterwards improved by the Arians. Hurd on Religions.

ALPHA, (Α) the first letter of the Greek alphabet, which is derived from aleph (א) the first of the Hebrew alphabet. In the Greek alphabet, alpha stands for one, or the first. Α and Ω, or Alpha and Omega, the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, are appellations, by which Jesus Christ denominates himself in three different places of the Revelation, (i. 8; xxi. 6; xxii. 13.) By this expression he denotes, that he is the beginning and the end, the power that produces every thing, and to whom all things shall be referred.

ALPHE'US, Ἀλφαῖος, signifies a thousand, and was the name of the father of St.

James the Less, the first Bishop of Jerusalem. (Matt. x. 3. Luke vi. 15.) Alpheus was the husband of Mary, who is supposed to have been sister to the mother of our Saviour, and therefore, James is called the Lord's brother; but, though the fact is probable, the term brother is too general in its application, to fix their relation. Many are of opinion that Cleophas, mentioned by St. Luke, is the same as Alpheus. (Luke xxiv. 18. John xix. 25.) It is therefore supposed, that Alpheus was his Greek, and Cleophas his Hebrew or Syriac name according to the custom of this province, or of the time; men being often known to their friends and countrymen by one name, and to the Romans or strangers by another.

ALTAR, a kind of table or raised place, upon which ancient sacrifices were offered to God. Calmet thinks, that as sacrifices are nearly as ancient as the world, altars are of equal antiquity; but we do not read of altars in the Jewish history till after the flood, when Noah built an altar to God, and offered upon it burnt-offerings. The Scriptures speak of altars erected by the patriarchs, without describing their form or their matter. The altar, which Jacob set up at Bethel, was the stone, which had served him for a pillow. Gideon sacrificed upon a rock, which was before his house. In the patriarchal times, altars were commonly built near some grove of trees. The Jews were forbidden to plant groves, or even a single tree, near the altar of God. (Deut. xvi. 21.) The first altars, that God commanded Moses to raise, were made of earth, or rough stones, (Exod. xx. 24, 25.); and the Lord declared, that if iron tools were used in constructing them, they would become impure. (Ibid. 25.) The altar, which Moses enjoined Joshua to build upon mount Ebal, was to be made of unpolished stones, (Deut. xxvii. 5. Josh. viii. 31.); and it is very probable, that such were those built by Samuel, Saul, and David. The altar, which Solomon erected in the temple, was of brass, but filled, it is believed, with rough-stones. It was twenty cubits long, twenty wide, and ten high. (2 Chron. iv. 1.) That built at Jerusalem by Zerubbabel, after his return from Babylon, was of rough stones, as was also that of the Maccabees. Josephus says, that the altar, which in his time was in the temple, consisted of rough stones, and was fifteen cubits high, forty long, and forty wide.

The principal altars of the Jews were the altar of burnt-offerings, the altar of incense, and the table of shew-bread, which is improperly called an altar.

ALTAR of burnt-offerings was a kind of coffer of shittim-wood, covered with brass. It was five cubits, or two yards and a half, square, and three cubits, or one yard and a half, high. Moses placed it to the east, before the entrance of the tabernacle, in the open air, that the smoke of the fire, which was kept perpetually upon it, might not defile the inside of the tabernacle. At each of the four corners of this altar was a spire in the form of a horn, which was made of the same piece of wood as the altar itself, and covered with brass. Within the altar was a grate of brass, upon which the fire was kept, and through which the ashes fell as they increased upon the altar, and were received into a pan placed below. At the four corners of the grate were four rings and four chains, by which it was fixed to the four horns of the altar. This altar was portable, and was carried upon the shoulders of the priests by means of staves of shittim-wood, overlaid with brass, and fastened with rings to the sides of the altar. (Exod. xxvii. 1, 2, 3.)

Such was the altar of burnt-offerings belonging to the tabernacle, which Moses erected in the wilderness. The altar of burnt-offerings in the temple of Solomon was much larger, being twenty cubits square and ten high. It was covered with thick plates of brass, and filled with rough stones; and on the east side was an easy ascent to the altar. After the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, and the building of the second temple by Zerubbabel, the altars of the Jews were different in some respects from those, which had been before used. Though the altar of burnt-offerings was built in the same place, in which it had stood before the captivity, after the return of the Jews from Babylon, it was a large pile of unhewn stones, thirty-two cubits square at the bottom, and twenty-four at the top. The ascent to this altar was by a gentle rising on the south side, called the Kibbish, which was thirty-two cubits in length, and sixteen in breadth. For to ascend the altar by steps was forbidden by the law. (Exod. xx. 26.) Prideaux.

ALTAR of incense, was a small table of shittim-wood, covered with plates of gold, one cubit in length, another in width, and two in height. At the four corners were four kinds of horns; and all round it was a little border, or crown. Every morning and evening, the officiating priest offered upon it incense of a particular composition; and for this purpose, he entered with the smoking censer, filled with fire from the altar of burnt-offerings, into the sanctuary or holy place, where this altar was fixed opposite to the table of shew-bread. The priest having placed the censer upon it, retired from the sanctuary. (Exod. xxx. 1, 2, 3.) This was the altar hidden by Jeremiah before the captivity. (2 Maccab. ii. 5, 6.)

ALTAR, or table for the shew-bread, was a small table of shittim-wood, covered with plates of gold, having round it a little border adorned with sculpture. It was placed in the sanctuary, and was two cubits in length, one in breadth, and one and a-half in height. Upon this table were placed, every Sabbath day, twelve loaves, with salt and incense. (Exod. xxv. 23, 24. Mal. i. 7.)

ALTAR at Athens inscribed ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ, to the Unknown God. St. Paul being come from Thessalonica to Athens, he disputed every day either in the synagogue with the Jews, or in the market-place with the philosophers. As he discoursed on the resurrection of the dead, some of the philosophers brought him before the judges of the Areopagus, to whom he spoke in the following manner: 'Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious; for as I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, To the Unknown God; whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you.'

It has been disputed what this altar was, which was thus consecrated to an Unknown God. Jerom says, that it was inscribed 'to the gods of Asia, Europe, and Africa; to the unknown, and strange gods;' and that the apostle uses the singular form, because his design was only to demonstrate to the Athenians, that they adored an unknown God. But as Dr. Doddridge observes on this passage, the express testimony of Lucian sufficiently proves, that there was such an inscription at Athens, and shows the unnecessary, as well as unwarrantable supposition of Jerom.

Some believe, that St. Paul speaks of altars, extant in several places of Attica, without any inscription, and erected after a solemn expiation for the country, by the philosopher Epimenides. Some affirm, that this altar is the same as that mentioned by Pausanias and Philostratus, who tell us, that there were altars at Athens consecrated to the unknown gods. The occasion of this altar is differently related by Peter Comesator, author of the Historia Scholastica, Theophylact, and Eucumenius; but it has been observed, that their several accounts have no authority from the ancients. St. Chrysostom thinks, that each of these opinions is liable to objections. The altar inscribed 'to the gods of Asia, Europe, and Africa, to the unknown and strange gods,' he observes, is not, in all probability, that mentioned by St. Paul; for the Areopagites would never have understood it by the bare name of the Unknown God. He also thinks that one of the altars set up by Epimenides, and not inscribed to any deity, cannot be that, which is mentioned by the apostle.

Some have thought that the God of the Jews was the object of this altar, he being a powerful God, but not fully known, as the Jews, instead of using his name in speech, substituted 'the Lord,' for 'Jehovah.' But it would seem, that this was a public altar, and probably stood in a public place, and therefore alluded to some public incident of former ages.

Eichhorn conjectures that there were many altars at Athens originally with no inscriptions, from the art of writing having been, at the period of their erection, unknown, or not generally received; and that these, in a later age, the Athenians did not destroy, but, since they knew not to whom they were dedicated, inscribed on them ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ, to an (some) unknown god; and that of several altars so inscribed St. Paul saw only one: and since he knew that more were so inscribed, made mention of this, in order to show that he proposed nothing unusual or unheard of, but that his one God was found in the number of the gods already worshipped by them. To this opinion Niemeyer accedes. For my own part, says Kuinoel, I think that there were at Athens several altars on which this inscription was written in the plural number, as in the passages of Pausanias and Jerom above cited. And Pausanias, (v. 14.) tells us, that in Elis, where the Olympic games were celebrated, there were placed near the altar of Jupiter Olympus βασιλὸς ἀγνώστων θεῶν. But I am of opinion, that at Athens there was also one altar with the inscription ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ; although it does not appear that any other writer has recorded it. For no argument can be deduced from their silence, to the discredit of any writer, like St. Paul, of unimpeached integrity. The altar in question had probably been dedicated ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ on account of some remarkable benefit received, which seemed attributable to some God, though it was uncertain to whom.

The opinion of Kuinoel, observes Mr. Bloomfield, seems, upon the whole, best founded; and in this Bishop Pearce (who wrote most judiciously upon the passage) appears to have finally acquiesced. For, in conclusion, he says, 'Therefore we may reasonably suppose that each of the altars, (viz. those mentioned by Pausanias, Philostratus, and others,) or at least one of them, may have had the inscription ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ.' He very properly rejects the interpretation of Jerom, and judiciously remarks, that 'the case between Paul and Jerom is this: Paul, who was on the spot, says that he saw at Athens an altar with this inscription, To the Unknown God; and Jerom, who never was there, and who lived some hundreds of years after Paul, says, that the inscription which Paul saw, was not To the Unknown God, but To the Unknown Gods.' Now, utri creditis, Quirites? Bloomfield's Recensio Synoptica Annotationis Sacrae, vol. iv. pp. 573, 574; Dr. Doddridge in loc.

ALTAR, is also used among Christians for the table where the Lord's Supper is administered. In the primitive church, altars were made only of wood, as being frequently to be removed from one place to another; but the council of Paris, in 509, decreed, that every altar should be built of stone. At first there was only one altar in each church; but the number soon increased; and from the writings of Gregory the Great, who lived in the sixth century, we learn that twelve or thirteen were in the same church. Not less than 49 altars are in the cathedral of Magdeburg. The altar is sometimes sustained on a single column, and sometimes by four columns; but the customary form is a massive stonework, sustaining the altar-table.

At the beginning of the reformation a dispute arose, whether those tables in the form of altars, which had been used in the times of popery, and upon which the mass had been celebrated, should be continued? This was followed by another controversy, whether the table placed in the room of the altar, should retain the same situation? In consequence of the former dispute, it was ordered that the altars should be destroyed; but this order was afterwards countermanded by queen Elizabeth, who observed, that it was not a matter of importance whether there were altars or tables, but that if the altar should be destroyed, a table should be set in the same place, in which the altar had before stood. Bingham's Antiq.; Wheatly on the Common Prayer.

AMALEK, or Omelek, אֶמֶלֶק, signifies a people that licks up, or that takes away all; or a people that strikes, or that uses ill; or the people of the sovereign, or ruler.

AMALEK was the son of Eliphaz and Timna his concubine, and grandson to Esau. He succeeded Gatam in the government of Edom, south of Judah. (Gen. xxxvi. 12. 16. 1 Chron. i. 36.) Amalek was father of the Amalekites, a powerful people, who dwelt in Arabia Petræa, between the Dead Sea and the Red Sea, or between Havilah and Shur, perhaps in moving troops. (1 Sam. xv. 7.) We cannot assign the particular place of their habitation, nor does it appear they had any cities, though one is mentioned. (1 Sam. xv. 5.) They lived generally in parties, in caves, or tents. The Israelites had scarcely passed the Red Sea, when the Amalekites attacked them in the deserts of Rephidim, and slew those who, through fatigue or weakness, were obliged to lag behind. Moses, by God's command, directed Joshua to attack this people, to record this act of inhumanity in a book, that it might be remembered, and to revenge it in the most remarkable manner. Joshua, therefore, fell on the Amalekites, and defeated them, while Moses was upon the mountain, and in company with Aaron and Hur. During the engagement, Moses lifted up his hands to heaven; and to this his success was owing, for as oft as he did not extend them, Amalek prevailed. But the hands of Moses being tired, Aaron and Hur supported his arms, and held them extended, during the remainder of the battle, which continued from morning till the approach of night. (Exod. xvii. 8, &c.) This happened in the year of the world 2513, and before Jesus Christ 1491.

The ground of the enmity of the Amalekites against the people of Israel, is generally supposed to have been an innate hatred from the remembrance of Jacob's depriving their progenitor of his birthright and his blessing. However, their attacking the Israelites without any provocation, when they perceived them weak through great fatigue, and excessive drought, was an inhuman action, and justly deserved the defeat which they experienced. The reason of God's denouncing against them perpetual war, may be explained as follows: the Amalekites, knowing that God intended to give the Israelites possession of the land of Canaan, attacked them with an armed force, in hopes of frustrating the designs of providence concerning them.

Under the judges, we see the Amalekites united with the Midianites and Moabites, to oppress Israel, (Judg. vi. 3.); but Ehud delivered Israel from Eglon, and Gideon delivered them from Midian and Amalek. (Judg. iii. 13; vii. 1.) In the year of the world 2930, and before Jesus Christ 1074, the Lord said to Samuel, 'Go to Saul, and say, Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way when he came up from Egypt. Now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not, but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass.' Saul, therefore, marched against the Amalekites, advanced to their capital, and defeating them, drove them from Havilah, which is towards the lower part of the Euphrates to Shur, towards the Red Sea. He destroyed the people, but spared the best of the cattle and moveables, and thereby violated the command of God (1 Sam. xv. 1, &c.) See AGAG and SAUL.

However, some fugitives escaped this slaughter. Though the Amalekites scarcely appear again in history, yet about the year of the world 2949, and before Jesus Christ 1055, a troop of them pillaged Ziklag, which belonged to David, and in which he had left his two wives, Ahinoam and Abigail. But David, returning from an expedition, pursued, overtook, and dispersed them, and recovered all the booty, which they had carried off. (1 Sam. xxx. 1, 2, &c.)

The Arabians maintain, that Amalek was the son of Ham, and grandson of Noah; and that he was the father of Ad, and grandfather of Schedad. Calmet thinks, that this opinion is not to be rejected: it is not easy to conceive how Amalek, if only the posterity of the son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau, could be a people so powerful and numerous as the Amalekites were when the Israelites departed out of Egypt. Besides, Moses relates that in Abraham's time, long before the birth of Amalek, the son of Eliphaz, the five confederate kings invaded the country of Amalek, about Kadesh; and also that of the Amorites, at Hazezon-tamar. (Gen. xiv. 7.)

In another place, Moses relates, that Balaam, observing at a distance the land of Amalek, said in his prophetic style, 'Amalek is the first (the head or original) of the nations, but his latter end shall be that he perish for ever.' (Numb. xxiv. 20, &c.) Calmet observes, that the epithet of the first of the nations cannot agree with the Amalekites, if they were so modern, for the generation then living was only the third from Moses. Moses never reproaches the Amalekites with attacking the Israelites their brethren; an aggravating circumstance, which he would not have omitted, if they had been descended from Esau, and, in this sense, brethren to the Israelites. Lastly, we see the Amalekites almost always joined in Scripture with the Canaanites and Philistines, and never with the Edomites; and when Saul destroyed Amalek, the Edomites neither assisted nor avenged them. It is therefore probable, that the Amalekites, so often mentioned in Scripture, were a people descended from Canaan, and very different from the descendants of Amalek the grandson of Esau, who, perhaps, were only a small tribe, and not permanently conspicuous. It may be observed, that by the expression, 'Amalek is the first of the nations,' Bochart understands the most noble of the nations; and Le Clerc, in his commentary, thinks, that the Amalekites were the most ancient and powerful nation of those, which proceeded from the loins of Abraham and Lot. In the margin of our present version of the Bible, the Amalekites are called 'The first of the nations, that warred against Israel.'

The Arabians give us the following account of the Amalek destroyed by Saul. He was the father of an ancient tribe in Arabia, which contained only the Arabians called pure, the remains of whom were mingled with the posterity of Jocktan and Adnan, and so became Mosarabes or Mostaarabes, or Arabians blended with foreign nations. They believe that Goliath, who was overcome by David, was king of the Amalekites; that the giants, who inhabited Palestine, in Joshua's time, were of the same race; and that part of them retired into Africa while Joshua was living, and settled on the coasts of Barbary. The son of Amalek was Ad, a celebrated prince among the Arabians. Some make him the son of Uz, and grandson of Aram, the son of Shem. The Mahometans say, that Ad was the father of an Arabian tribe called Adites, who were exterminated for not hearkening to the patriarch Eber, who preached to them the unity of God. Ad had two sons, Schadad and Schedid. This is what the Arabians relate concerning the Amalekites.

These accounts, indeed, are very imperfect; but it seems fairly warrantable to suggest, (1.) that there were more kinds of Amalekites than one; (2.) that the tribe, which Saul destroyed, might not be at that time a very numerous people, and that the tract of country mentioned as relating to them, was that of their flight, not of their possession; (3.) that they were turbulent and violent towards their neighbours, as formerly towards the stragglers of Israel; (4.) that such being their character, they might have given recent cause of offence to Israel, which produced a war, though the Scripture mentions only the fulfilment of an ancient prophecy; and (5.) that Agag, who was slain by Samuel, appears from the expression, 'As thy sword has made mothers childless,' to have been an extremely cruel prince, and therefore received a merited punishment. See SAMUEL.

It is probable, that the different tribes of the Amalekites may in a geographical view, be thus arranged: 1. Amalek the ancient. (Gen. xiv. 7.) who may be placed near the Jordan, (Numb. xxiv. 20.); 2. a tribe in the regions east of Egypt, between Egypt and Canaan, (Exod. xvii. 8. 1 Sam. xiv. 48.); 3. the descendants of Eliphaz. It was against the second of these that Moses and Joshua fought; and against this tribe perpetual hostility was to be maintained. It was probably to the ancient Amalekites, that Balaam alluded as having been 'head of the nations.' (Numb. xxiv. 20.) Taylor's Sacred Geography; Universal History; Patrick Comment.

AMA'NA, אַמְנָה, signifies integrity and truth. Amana is a mountain mentioned in the song of Solomon. (Cant. iv. 8.) Some are of opinion that this is Mount Amanus, in Cilicia. St. Jerom and the Rabbins make the land of Israel to extend northward to this mountain; and Solomon's dominion did extend so far. Mount Amanus, with its connections, separates Syria from Cilicia, and reaches from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates. There is another mountain of this name, which is situated beyond Jordan, and which some think to be the Amana mentioned in the Canticles.

AMA'SA, or Omesha, אֹמֶשָׁא, signifies a forgiving people; or the burden of the people. Amasa was the son of Jether and Abigail, David's sister. Absalom, during his rebellion against David, placed his cousin Amasa at the head of his troops. (2 Sam. xvii. 25.) Amasa engaged Joab, the general of David's army, but was defeated, in the year of the world 2981, and before Jesus Christ 1023. After the defeat of Absalom's party, David from hatred to Joab, who had killed Absalom, and whose insolence rendered him insupportable, offered Amasa his pardon, and promised him the command of the army in the room of Joab. (2 Sam. xix. 13, &c.) On the revolt of Sheba, the son of Bichri, David ordered Amasa to assemble all Judah against Sheba; but Amasa not forming his army at the time prescribed, David directed Abishai to pursue Sheba with the soldiers he had then about his own person. Joab, with his people, accompanied him; and these troops had scarcely got so far as the great stone, which is in Gibeon, before Amasa came and joined them with his forces. Then said Joab to Amasa, 'Art thou in health, my brother?' At the same time, he took him by the beard with the right hand to kiss him. But Amasa not observing the sword which was in Joab's hand, the latter smote him with it under the fifth rib, and shed out his bowels to the ground, and he died. (2 Sam. xx.)

AMAS'AI, or Omeshi, אֲמָשַׁי, signifies the present of the people; or with a present. Amasai, the son of Elkanah. (1 Chron. vi. 25.) It is supposed that he was the Amasai, who was chief of the captains of the tribes of Benjamin and Judah, that came to David whilst in the wilderness fleeing from Saul. David went to meet them, and said, 'If ye be come peaceably to help me, mine heart shall be knit unto you; but if ye be come to betray me to mine enemies, seeing there is no wrong in mine hands, the God of our fathers look thereon, and rebuke it.' Then said Amasai, 'Thine are we David, and on thy side, thou son of Jesse; peace be unto thee, and peace be to thine helpers.' David therefore received them and gave them a command. (1 Chron. xii. 17, 18.)

AMAS'IS, a king of Egypt, who though not mentioned in the text of Scripture, is yet celebrated in sacred history. The Scripture speaks of Necho, who killed Josiah, king of Judah, in the battle of Megiddo, (2 Kings xxiii. 29; Jerem. xli. 2.) Necho was succeeded by Psammis; Psammis, by Apries, who is called in Jeremiah, Hophra; and Hophra by Amasis, who lived in Egypt at the same time Cyrus reigned in Babylon. Amasis reigned forty-four years, from the year of the world 3438 to 3482, and was loved and respected by his subjects. He died in the time of Cambyzes, before Jesus Christ 522.

AMAZ/IAH, אֲמָזִיָּה, signifies the strength of the Lord. Amaziah, the eighth king of Judah, was the son of Joash, whom he succeeded in the year of the world 3165, and before Jesus Christ 839. (2 Chron. xxiv. 27.) He was twenty-five years of age when he began to reign; and he reigned twenty-nine years at Jerusalem. (Ibid. xxv. 1, 2, 3, &c.; 2 Kings xiv.) He did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, but not with a perfect heart. When settled in his kingdom, he put to death the murderers of his father, but not their children; because it is written in the law, 'The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers; every man shall be put to death for his own sin.' (Deut. xxiv. 16.) It may, therefore, be reasonably supposed, that all his predecessors had not observed this law, but had caused the children to be put to death, lest they should form factions, and seek to revenge the punishment of their father.

In the muster, which Amaziah made of his people, he found three hundred thousand men capable of bearing arms. Besides these forces, he hired of the King of Israel one hundred thousand men, for whom he paid that prince a hundred talents, or about 34,218*l.* 1*s.* English money. His design was to employ these troops against the Edomites, who had revolted from Judah in the reign of Joram, about fifty-four years before his accession. (2 Kings viii. 20.) While Amaziah was occupied with these preparations, a prophet of the Lord came to him, and said, 'O king, let not the army of Israel go with thee; for the Lord is not with Israel. But if thou wilt go, do it, be strong for the battle: God shall make thee fall before the enemy, for God hath power to help and to cast down.' Amaziah, therefore, separated the troops that came from Ephraim, and sent them back into their own country. But the Israelites who had been thus discharged, were strongly irritated against Amaziah; and dispersing themselves over the cities of Judah, from Bethoron to Samaria, they killed three thousand men, and carried off a great booty, to recompense themselves for what they had expected from Edom. (2 Chron. xxv. 7, &c.)

Amaziah, with his own forces, gave battle to the Edomites, killed ten thousand of them on the spot, and took ten thousand more, who, says Calmet, had saved themselves, in all probability, upon a rock, where they were assaulted, and whence they were thrown headlong, so as to be dashed to pieces (Ibid. 2 Kings xiv. 7.) It is said that Amaziah took Selah, and gave it the name of Joktheel. It has been observed, that the Hebrew word Selah, which our translators retain, signifies a rock, and exactly answers to the Greek word petra. It is, therefore, agreed by most commentators, that this Selah is the same with Petra, the metropolis of Arabia Petræa.

Hence expositors in general think, that Amaziah having slain ten thousand Edomites, and taken ten thousand more in the valley of Salt, marched thence to Selah, the metropolis of Arabia Petræa, of which he soon rendered himself master. From the top of the rock, upon which the town was situated, he threw down the ten thousand he had taken prisoners, so that they were all dashed to pieces. Patrick, &c.

Calmet observes, that this punishment was not commonly practised by the Jews, though it was in use among the Romans. It also prevailed in other nations, as Selden (de Synedriis) has remarked. It is not in the catalogue of punishments mentioned by Moses, nor was it ever inflicted by any regular court of judicature. Le Clerc, therefore, thinks that it was a cruel punishment, or that the Edomites, by their conduct to the people of Judah, had provoked Amaziah to a retaliation.

Amaziah having thus punished the Edomites, in the year of the world 3175, and before Jesus Christ 829, carried away their gods, and adored them as his own deities. This provoked the Lord, who, by a prophet, said unto him, 'Why hast thou sought after the gods of the people, which could not deliver their own people out of thine hand?' Amaziah answered him, 'Art thou made of the king's counsel? forbear; why shouldst thou be smitten?' Then the prophet forbore, and said, 'I know that God hath determined to destroy thee, because thou hast done this, and hast not hearkened unto my counsel, (2 Chron. xxv. 14, &c.)

God, therefore, permitted Amaziah to be so blinded, as to believe himself invincible. He sent to defy the king of Israel, saying, 'Come, let us look one another in the face.' The motive of this war was, probably, to oblige Joash, king of Israel to repair the ravages, which his troops had committed in their return to Samaria. Joash answered him by the fable of the cedar and the thistle. Amaziah, deaf to these reasons, advanced to Bethshemesh with his army, and Joash, king of Israel, gave him battle. Amaziah was defeated, and being taken prisoner was carried to Jerusalem. Joash ordered four hundred cubits of the walls of that city to be destroyed; and he carried to Samaria all the gold and silver, the rich vessels of the house of God, the treasures of the royal palace, and the sons of those among his own people, who had been sent as hostages to Jerusalem. (Ibid. 17, 18, &c.)

After this, Amaziah reigned fifteen or sixteen years at Jerusalem, but returned not to the Lord with all his heart. God, therefore, to punish him, permitted a conspiracy to be formed against him at Jerusalem. He endeavoured to escape to Lachish; but the conspirators sent after him to that place, and caused him to be assassinated. He was brought back upon horses, and buried in the city of David. He died in the year of the world, 3194, and before Jesus Christ 810. He was succeeded by his son Uzziah, or Azariah, who was only sixteen years of age (Ib. 25, &c.; xxvi. 1.) Universal History; Le Clerc's Comment.; Wells's Geography.

AMAZIAH, priest to the golden calves that were at Bethel. The prophet Amos had said that the high places, consecrated to idols, should be destroyed, and that, how holy soever they might be thought by Israel, they should be overthrown, and the house of Jeroboam extirpated by the sword. Amaziah, priest of Bethel, therefore, sent to Jeroboam, complaining of Amos, and at length procured his banishment. (Amos vii. 9, 10, &c.) See AMOS.

AMBASSADOR, a messenger sent by a king or state to carry important news, or transact affairs of great moment. (2 Chron. xxxii. 31.) Eliakim, Shebna, and Joah the servants of king Hezekiah, are called ambassadors of peace. (Isaiah xxxiii. 7. xxxvi. 3.) The apostles style themselves ambassadors of Christ, and were sent to carry his name among the nations. (2 Cor. v. 20.)

AMBER occurs thrice in the sacred writings. (Ezek. i. 4. 27; viii. 2.) The Hebrew word is differently interpreted. Amber is natural, and loses its brightness in the fire; or it is artificial, and formed of gold and fine brass or copper. Bochart, Le Clerc, and others, suppose this artificial amber to be the chasmal mentioned in Ezekiel. It brightens in the fire, and is of equal value with gold. It resembles the Corinthian brass, now known only by its name, and is exceedingly splendid, and very hard. By its splendour, it denotes the glorious majesty of God, and by its hardness, his invincible power; and both signify that it is necessary this people and we should repent, and amend, and return to him. Poole's Annotat.; Scripture illustrated.

AMBROSE, bishop of Milan, in the fourth century. The life of this prelate has an appearance of romance. He was the prefect of Liguria and Emilia, and on entering the Church of Milan in a civil capacity, to quell a riot between the Arian and orthodox parties, concerning the choice of a bishop, found himself called upon to assume the vacant office, by the unanimous voice of the assembly, and was compelled to advance at once from the humble station of a catechumen to the government of the Church. In this high situation, he firmly sustained the cause of orthodoxy against the Arians of his diocese, against the entreaties and threats of the empress Justina, the mother of Valentinian, and even of the emperor Theodosius, whom he prevented from establishing a Jewish synagogue at Milan, and from erecting an altar to Victory. He also rebuked the emperor for his slaughter at Thessalonica, and compelled him to atone for his guilt, by the performance of public penance. Ambrose was loud in the praises of a monastic life, and uncharitable in his conduct towards those, who differed from him in religious opinion. With a credulity that bordered on folly, or with a design to impose on the credulity of mankind, a practice not very uncommon in those times, he pretended to the Arians to produce men, who were possessed with devils, and who, on the approach of certain relics, had been compelled to acknowledge the purity of the Nicene faith, and the impiety of that of Arius. Ambrose composed several treatises in praise of celibacy; a discourse on mysteries and penance; several books concerning Faith, and the Holy Ghost; a discourse on the Incarnation; and several other works. He was not destitute of a certain degree of elegance, both of genius and style, and his sentiments were by no means absurd; but he wanted solidity, accuracy, and order, the prevailing defects of that age. Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. i. p. 222, &c. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 294, &c.

AMBUSH, or AMBUSHMENT, the post in which soldiers or assassins are placed, in order to attack an enemy unexpectedly; the act of surprising any one, by lying in wait; or the persons stationed for that purpose. (Josh. viii. 2. Jerem. li. 12. 2 Chron. xiii. 13; xx. 22.)

AMEDIANs, a congregation of monks in Italy, who derived their name from their professing themselves amantes Deum, 'lovers of God,' or rather amati Deo, 'beloved of God.' They wore a grey habit and wooden shoes, had no breeches, and girt themselves with a cord. They had twenty-eight convents, and were united by Pope Pius V. partly with the Cistercian order, and partly with that of the Soccianti, or wearers of wooden shoes.

A'MEN', אמן, in Hebrew, signifies true, faithful, certain. It is employed also in affirmation, and was often thus used by our Saviour; amen, amen, verily, verily. Lastly, it is understood as expressing a wish, as amen, so be it, (Numb. v. 22.); or amen, yes: I believe it. 'How shall he that occupieth the place of the unlearned, say amen at thy giving of thanks? seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest?' (1 Cor. xiv. 16.) The Hebrews end the five books of Psalms, according to their way of distributing them, with the words amen, amen, which the Septuagint translate genoito, genoito, and the Latins fiat, fiat. The Greek, Latin, and other Churches, have preserved this word in their prayers, as well as alleluia and hosannah. At the conclusion of the public prayers, the people anciently answered with a loud voice, Amen. Jerom says, that at Rome, when the people answered Amen, the sound was like a clap of thunder. The Jews assert, that the gates of heaven are opened to him, who answers Amen with all his might.

Amen is applied as a title to our Lord; 'the Amen, the true and faithful witness.' (Rev. iii. 14.)

AMETHYST, a gem of a purple colour, which appears to be composed of a strong blue and deep red; and according as either of these colours prevails, it affords different tinges of purple, sometimes approaching to violet, and sometimes fading even to a pale rose. Though the amethyst is generally of a purple colour, yet it is sometimes found naturally colourless; and it may, at any time, be easily so made, by putting it into the fire. In this pellucid and colourless state, it so much resembles a diamond, that the amethyst can be distinguished only by want of hardness.

This stone was the ninth in order on the high-priest's breast-plate; and upon it was engraven the name of Issachar. (Exod. xxviii. 19.; xxxix. 12.) Hill's Hist. of Fossils.

A'MMI, אמי, signifies mother; or fear; or a cubit; or a nation. The imposing of this name on the ten tribes after their rejection, imports that in the latter days, God will redeem them from their misery and bondage, and include them in a special covenant with himself. (Hos. ii. 1.)

AMMIN'ADAB, אמינדב, signifies my people is liberal; or, prince of the people; or, a people that vows. It is the name of several men among the Hebrews:—1. Amminadab, of the tribe of Judah, the son of Aram, and father of Naashon and Elisheba, the wife of Aaron the high-priest, (Exod. vi. 23.) 2. Amminadab, the son of Koath, and brother of Korah, (1 Chron. vi. 22.) 3. Amminadab, or Abinadab, the son of king Saul, who was killed with him in the battle of Gilboa, in the year of the world 2949, and before Jesus Christ 1055 (1 Sam. xxxi. 2. 1 Chron. viii. 33.; x. 2.) 4. Amminadab, or Abinadab, a Levite, and an inhabitant of Kirjath-jearim, with whom the sacred ark was deposited, after it was brought back from the Philistines. (1 Sam. vii. 1.) He dwelt at Gibeah, or in the highest part of the city of Kirjath-jearim. Eleazar his son was consecrated, or appointed peculiarly, to the office of keeping the ark. It is not certain, whether Aminadab was at that time living. 5. The chariots of Amminadab are mentioned as being extremely light: 'Or ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Amminadab.' (Cant. vi. 12.) He is thought to have been some celebrated charioteer, whose horses were remarkably swift.

AM'MON, עמוני, signifies his people.—Ammon, No-ammon, or No. See No.

AMMON, or HAMMON, or JUPITER AMMON, the celebrated god of the Egyptians, probably, a deification of Ham, whose posterity peopled Africa, and who was the father of Mizraim, the founder of the Egyptian polity and power. See HAM and MIZRAIM.

Ammon had a famous temple in Africa, where he was adored under the symbolical figure of a ram; for the Egyptians represented their gods under the form of certain animals. The famous temple of Ammon was situated in a delicious spot, in the midst of a frightful desert. Here was an oracle of great fame, which Alexander the Great consulted at the hazard of his life. This oracle, however, as well as others, fell insensibly into contempt. In the time of Strabo, it did not enjoy its ancient repute; in that of Plutarch, it was scarcely regarded; and in the reign of Theodosius, according to Prudentius, it was no longer mentioned. At Thebes, the capital of Upper Egypt, Ammon had a most magnificent temple, which is mentioned by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, and the ruins of which are still visible, and justify the accounts of its extent and grandeur. From Diodorus we learn, that the same city, which was called Thebes, and which probably derived its name from some remembrance of thebah, the ark, was also denominated Dios- polis, the city of Jupiter or Ham. The prophet Nahum calls it by its Egyptian name, No-Ammon, the habitation of Ammon, or, according to the copies collated by Dr. Kennicott, Nueh, and Nau. It may be therefore remarked, that No, Nueh, and Nau, all of which are met with in the name of this town, have certainly some reference to the patriarch Noah; that Thebes equally refers to the ark; that Ammon also refers to Ham, the progenitor of the nations addicted to his worship; and that Ammon was certainly the Jupiter of the Greeks. Hence we see in what sense Jupiter is said to be the 'father of gods and men;' and what was the origin and nature of that idolatry, which overspread these countries. It has been disputed, whether Ammon is not an Egyptian compound of Ham and On, i.e. Ham the sun; on being the Egyptian name for that luminary, afterwards idolatrously referred to Ham. On the other hand, it may be disputed, whether On (און) is not a transposition for no נוא, so that originally Ham-on was equivalent to Ham of No, or Ham the son of Noah.

The Scripture says nothing of this false deity in particular, but speaks of Ham, and of the city of Ammon, or No-Ammon, which was principally devoted to it, and which was very distant from the oracle just mentioned. Though Hammon, the god of the Egyptians, was the same as the Jupiter of the Greeks, yet in succeeding ages the Egyptian and Greek names were united, and this deity was called Jupiter-Hammon.

AMMON, or BEN-AMMI, the son of Lot, was born of that patriarch and his youngest daughter, in the year of the world 2107, and before Jesus Christ 1897. (Gen. xix. 34. 38.) Of him we know nothing more, than that he was the father of the Ammonites, a famous people, always at enmity with Israel, and that his abode was east of the Dead Sea and Jordan, in the mountains of Gilead.

AMMONIAS. See PLATONICS.

AMMONITES, עַמּוֹנִים, or MEONITES, מִעֲוֹנִים, signifies afflicted, or who fail; or, who answer. They were sometimes called Ammanites, and were a people descended from Ammon, the son of Lot. The Ammonites destroyed the giants called Zamzummim, and seized their country. (Deut. ii. 19, 20, 21.) God forbade Moses and Israel to attack the Ammonites, because he did not intend to give their land to the Hebrews. (Ibid. 19.) Before the Israelites entered Canaan, the Amorites had conquered great part of the countries belonging to the Ammonites and Moabites. This Moses retook from the Amorites, and divided it between the tribes of Gad and Reuben. In the time of Jephthah, the Ammonites declared war against Israel, under pretence that Israel detained a great part of the country, which had been their's, before it was possessed by the Amorites. Jephthah replied, that as this was acquired by Israel in a just war from the Amorites, who had long enjoyed it by right of conquest, he was under no obligation to restore it. The Ammonites were not satisfied with this answer; and, therefore, Jephthah gave them battle, and defeated them. (Judg. xi.)

The Ammonites and Moabites generally united in attacking Israel. After the death of Othniel, the Ammonites and Amalekites joined with Eglon, king of Moab, to oppress the Hebrews, whom they governed for the space of eighteen years, till Israel was delivered by Ehud, the son of Gera. (Id. iii.) Some time after, or in the year of the world 2799, the Ammonites greatly oppressed the Israelites beyond Jordan; but in 2817, God delivered the Israelites by means of Jephthah, who attacked the Ammonites, and, as above mentioned, overthrew them with great slaughter. In the beginning of Saul's reign, Nahash, king of the Ammonites, having attacked Jabesh-gilead, reduced the inhabitants to a capitulation. Nahash would accept of their surrender on no other conditions than their submitting to have every one his right eye plucked out, as a reproach to Israel. But Saul coming seasonably to the relief of Jabesh, delivered the city and people from the cruelty of Nahash. (1 Sam. xi. 1, &c.)

David had been a friend of the king of Ammon, and after his death sent compliments of condolence to Hanun his son and successor, who, thinking that these ambassadors were spies to observe his strength and the condition of his kingdom, treated them in a very injurious manner. David revenged this indignity, and subdued the Ammonites, the Moabites, and the Syrians, their allies. (2 Sam. x. 4, &c.) Ammon and Moab continued under the government of David and Solomon, and after the separation of the ten tribes, were subject to the kings of Israel till the death of Ahab, in the year of the world 3107, and before Jesus Christ 897. (2 Kings i. 1.)

Two years after the death of Ahab, Jehoram, his son, and successor of Ahaziah, defeated the Moabites, (2 Kings iii. 4, 5, 6, &c.); but it does not appear that this victory was so complete as to reduce them to his obedience. At the same time, the Ammonites, Moabites, and other people, made an irruption on Judah, but were forced back, and routed by Jehoshaphat. (2 Chron. xx. 1, 2, &c.) Isaiah threatens the Moabites with a misfortune, which was to happen three years after his prediction, and which probably referred to the war of Shalmaneser against them, about the year of the world 3277, and before Jesus Christ 727. (Isaiah xv. xvi.)

After the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, were carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser, in the year of the world 3264, and before Jesus Christ 740, the Ammonites and Moabites took possession of the cities belonging to these tribes. For this they are reproached by Jeremiah. (Jer. xlix. 1.) The ambassadors of the

Ammonites were some of those, to whom this prophet presented the cup of the Lord's fury, and whom he directed to make bonds and yokes for themselves, exhorting them to submit to Nebuchadnezzar, and threatening them, if they did not, with captivity and slavery. (Jer. xxvii. 2, 3, 4.)

Ezekiel denounces their entire destruction, and tells them that God would give them up to the people of the East, who should build palaces in their country, so that the Ammonites should be no more mentioned among nations; and this as a punishment for insulting the Israelites, on their calamities, and the destruction of the temple by the Chaldeans. (Ezek. xxv. 4—10.) It is thought, that these misfortunes happened to the Ammonites in the fifth year after the taking of Jerusalem, when Nebuchadnezzar waged war against all the people around Judea, in the year of the world 3420 or 3421, and before Jesus Christ 583.

It is probable, that Cyrus gave to the Ammonites and Moabites the liberty of returning into their own country, whence they had been removed by Nebuchadnezzar; for we see them in the place of their former settlement, exposed to those revolutions, which were common to the people of Syria and Palestine, and subject sometimes to the kings of Egypt, and sometimes to the kings of Syria. Antiochus the Great took Rabboth, or Philadelphia, their capital, demolished the walls, and garrisoned it, in the year of the world 3806. During the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Ammonites showed their hatred to the Jews, and exercised great cruelties against such of them as lived near their country. (1 Macc. v. 6—45.) Justin Martyr says, that in his time there were still many Ammonites remaining; but Origen assures us that when he was living, they were known only under the general name of Arabians. Thus was accomplished the prediction of Ezekiel.

AM'NON, אַמְנוֹן, or אִמְנוֹן AMINON, signifies faithful and true; or, foster father, or tutor; or, son of the mother. Amnon was the eldest son of David by Ahinoam his second wife. It is commonly said, that this prince conceived a violent and an unlawful incestuous passion for his sister Tamar; but it ought to be remembered, that Tamar, though uterine sister to Absalom, is mentioned as the concubine children's sister, (1 Chron. iii. 9.) having been born before her mother was connected with David. Though Tamar, therefore, was honoured as the king's daughter by courtesy, yet she was not in reality akin to Amnon, and might have been married to him, according to her expression: 'Speak unto the king, for he will not withhold me from thee.' Some, however, are of opinion that the law did not allow of such a marriage.

Amnon, having conceived a violent passion for Tamar, the daughter of Absalom's mother, became ill. This being observed by Jonadab, the son of Shimeah, David's brother, he inquired the cause. Amnon discovered to him his passion, and the difficulty that opposed his satisfying it. Jonadab advised him to counterfeit sickness, and when the king his father came to see him, to say to him, 'I pray thee let my sister Tamar come and give me meat, and dress the meat in my sight, that I may see it, and eat it at her hand.' Amnon followed this advice, and the king easily granted his request. Tamar came to the apartment where Amnon lay, made cakes in his sight, baked them, and poured them out before him.

Amnon refused to eat; but calling his sister into the most private part of the chamber, and hearkening only to the dictates of his passion, he, by force, abused her. After committing this crime, his aversion to her became more excessive than had been his love. He wished her instantly to leave the room; but she remonstrating, he called in one of his servants, and ordered him to turn her out. Her brother Absalom meeting her in tears lamenting, and with her head covered with ashes, soothed her, and advised her to be silent. When David was informed of what had passed, he was extremely afflicted: but as he tenderly loved Amnon, who was his eldest son, he was unwilling to punish him.

Absalom kept his resentment close within his own heart for two years; but at length he contrived an opportunity of revenging the treatment his sister had received. He invited the king his father, and all his brothers, to an entertainment, which he had provided at Baal-hazor, on account of the shearing of his sheep. The king declined the invitation, but permitted him to take with him the princes his sons, and particularly Amnon. Absalom ordered his servants, that when they saw Amnon disordered with wine, on a signal being given, they should kill him, in revenge for the criminal and violent treatment, of which he had been guilty to Tamar. The servants, in compliance with the orders of their master, killed Amnon at his brother's house, in the midst of his carousing, in the year of the world 2974, and before Jesus Christ 1030. (2 Sam. xiii. 1, 2, &c.) See ABSALOM.—Patrick's Comment.

A'MON, אֲמוֹן, signifies faithful, true, &c. See AMNON. Amon was the fourteenth king of Judah, and son of Manasseh and Meshullemeth, the daughter of Haruz of Jotbah. He began to reign at the age of twenty-two, in the year of the world 3363, and before Jesus Christ 641, and reigned only two years at Jerusalem. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, as his father Manasseh had done. He forsook Jehovah, and worshipped idols. His servants conspired against him, and slew him in his own house; but the people killed all the conspirators, and established his son Josiah on the throne. Amon was buried in the garden of Uzza. (2 Kings xxi. 19, 20, &c.)

AM'ORITES, a people descended from Amorrite, or Amorrhæus, אַמֹּרִי, Amōppāios, which signifies bitter; or a rebel; or a babbler, or prater. Amorrhæus, according to the Septuagint and Vulgate; Emoræus according to some expositors; Hæmorri, according to the Hebrew; and Emorite, according to our version of the Bible; was the fourth son of Canaan. (Gen. x. 16.)

The Amorites first peopled the mountains lying west of the Dead Sea. They had also establishments east of the same sea, between the brooks Jabbok and Arnon, whence they forced the Ammonites and Moabites. (Numb. xiii. 29; xxi. 13. 24; Josh. v. 1. Judg. xi.) Moses wrested this country from their kings Sihon and Og, in the year of the world 2553, and before Jesus Christ 1451.

The prophet Amos, speaking of the gigantic stature and valour of the Amorites, compares their height to the cedar, and their strength to the oak. (Amos ii. 9.) The name Amorite is frequently used in Scripture to denote the Canaanites in general, (Gen. xvi.). The lands, which the Amorites possessed on this side Jordan, were given to the tribe of Judah; and those, which they had enjoyed beyond the Jordan, to the tribes of Reuben and Gad.

The Amorites are said to have consisted of three nations: 1. a people in Mount Lebanon, east of Phœnicia; 2. another people in mount Gilead, between the rivers Jabbok and Arnon; 3. another people inhabiting the mountain Paran, between Sinai and Kadesh-Barnea. Taylor's Sacred Geography.

AM'OS, אֲמוֹס, by (א) aleph, signifies strong, robust; עֹמֹס, by (ע) ain, omoos, loading, weighty.

Amos, the third of the minor prophets, is said to have been of the little town of Tekoa, in Judah, four leagues south of Jerusalem. There is however, no proof that he was a native of this place, except his retiring to it when driven from Bethel. It seems very probable, that he was born in the territories of Israel, to which his mission was principally directed. He prophesied in Bethel, where were the golden calves under Jeroboam II., about the year of the world 3215, and before Jesus Christ 789. Amaziah, the high-priest of Bethel, accused him to king Jeroboam in the following manner: 'Amos hath conspired against thee in the midst of the house of Israel: the land is not able to bear all his words. For thus Amos saith, Jeroboam shall die by the sword, and Israel shall surely be led away captive out of their own land.' Amaziah said therefore to Amos, 'O thou seer, go, flee thee away into the land of Judah, and there eat bread, and prophesy there. But prophesy not again any more at Bethel: for it is the king's chapel, and it is the king's court.' Amos answered Amaziah, 'I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son; but I was a herdsman, and a gatherer of sycamore fruit; and the Lord took me as I followed the flock, and the Lord said unto me, Go, prophesy unto my people Israel. Now, therefore, hear thou the word of the Lord. Thou sayest, Prophecy not against Israel, and drop not thy word against the house of Isaac. Therefore, thus saith the Lord, Thy wife shall be an harlot in the city, and thy sons and thy daughters shall fall by the sword, and thy land shall be divided by line; and thou shalt die in a polluted land: and Israel shall surely go into captivity forth of his land.' (Amos vii. 10, 11, &c.) The prophet then fled into the kingdom of Judah, and dwelt in Tekoa, where he continued to prophesy. In many places he complains of the violence offered him to compel him to silence, and bitterly exclaims against the disorders of Israel.

Amos began to prophesy the second year before the earthquake, in the reign of king Uzziah. (Amos i. 1.) Josephus and most commentators refer this to that prince's usurpation of the priest's office when he attempted to offer incense. Consequently Amos was contemporary with Hosea, (though he is supposed not to have lived so long as the last-mentioned prophet,) with Jonah, and probably also with Joel. The first prophecies of Amos in order of time, are those of the seventh chapter. The rest were pronounced in Tekoa, whither he retired. His first two chapters are spoken against Damascus, the Philistines, Tyrians, Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Judah, and Israel. The evils he threatens, refer to the invasions of Shalmaneser, Tiglath-pileser, Sennacherib, and Nebuchadnezzar.

He predicted the misfortunes of the kingdom of Israel after the death of Jeroboam II., who was then living; the death of king Zechariah; the invasion of Israel by Phul and Tiglath-pileser, kings of Assyria; and the captivity of the ten tribes, and their return. He uses sharp invectives against the sins of Israel, their effeminacy, avarice, and harshness to the poor; the splendour of their buildings, and the delicacy of their tables. He reproves Israel for going to Bethel, Dan, Gilgal, and Beersheba, the most famous pilgrimages of the country, and for swearing by the gods of these places.

The time and manner of the death of this prophet are not known. Some old authors relate that Amaziah, priest of Bethel, provoked by the discourses of Amos, caused his teeth to be broken, in order to silence him. Others say, that Hosea, or Uzziah, the son of Amaziah, struck him with a stake on the temples, and almost killed him; and that in this condition he was carried to Tekoa, where he died, and was buried with his fathers. But it is generally thought that he prophesied long at Tekoa, after his expulsion by Amaziah; and as the prophet does not complain of any ill treatment received from Uzziah, his silence is probable evidence that he did not suffer in the manner related.

Jerom applies to him the words of Paul, 'rude in speech, though not in knowledge,' (2 Cor. xi. 6.); and he further observes, that he selects his comparisons from the country life, in which he had been brought up.

Calmet and many others have followed the authority of Jerom, in speaking of this prophet, as if indeed he were quite rude, inelegant, and destitute of all the embellishments of composition. The matter, however, as Bishop Lowth has remarked, is far otherwise: "Let any person, who has candour, and perspicuity enough to judge, not from the man, but from his writings, open the volume of his predictions, and he will, I think, agree that our shepherd 'is not a whit behind the very chief of the prophets.' (2 Cor. xi. 5.) He will agree, that as, in sublimity and magnificence, he is almost equal to the greatest, so, in splendour of diction, and elegance of expression, he is scarcely inferior to any. The same celestial Spirit, indeed, actuated Isaiah and Daniel in the court, and Amos in the sheep-folds: constantly selecting such interpreters of the Divine will as were best adapted to the occasion, and sometimes 'from the mouths of babes and sucklings perfecting praise;' constantly employing the natural eloquence of some, and occasionally making others eloquent."—Bishop Lowth's Lectures, vol. ii. lect. xxi. p. 98. Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, vol. iv. pp. 149, 150.

Amos, the father of the prophet Isaiah, was, it is said, son of king Joash, and brother to Amaziah. The rabbins pretend, that Amos, Isaiah's father, was a prophet as well as his son, according to a rule among them, that when the father of a prophet is called in Scripture by his name, it indicates that he had the gift of prophecy. St. Austin thinks that the prophet Amos, the third among the minor prophets, was the father of Isaiah; but the names of these two persons are written differently, עמז being the father of Isaiah, and אמוז the prophet Amos. Besides, Amos, Isaiah's father, was as well as himself, of Jerusalem, and of much superior quality to the prophet Amos.

Amos, the son of Nahum, and father of Mattathias, is in the genealogy of our Saviour according to the flesh. (Luke iii. 25.)

AMPHIPOLIS, 'Αμφίπολις, signifies a city encompassed. It was the name of a city between Macedon and Thrace, but dependent on Macedon. St. Paul and Silas being delivered out of prison, left Philippi, went to Thessalonica, and passed through Amphipolis. (Acts xvii. 1.) It was also called Chrysopolis, or Christopolis. In the division of Macedonia, by Paulus Æmilius, it became the chief city of the first region of Macedonia.

AMPLIAS, 'Αμπλίας, signifies large, extensive. Amplias, of whom St. Paul speaks, was particularly beloved by the apostle. (Rom. xvi. 8.) It is not certainly known who he was, nor what he did; but the Greeks say, that he was ordained bishop of Odysopolis, in Mæsia, by St. Andrew; that he was an apostolical person, at least one of the seventy-two disciples, and suffered martyrdom.

AM'RAM, עמרם, 'Αμβράμ, signifies exalted people; or, their sheaves; or, handfuls of corn; or, with the most high. Amram, son of Kohath, of the tribe of Levi, married Jochebed, by whom he had Aaron, Miriam, and Moses. He died in Egypt at the age of 137 years. (Exod. vi. 20.)

AM'RAPHEL, אמרפל, signifies one that speaks of hidden things; or, one that speaks of judgment; or, of ruin. Amraphel, king of Shinar, confederated with Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, and two other kings, to wage war against the kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, and the three neighbouring cities. The kings, who were in league with Amraphel, plundered those cities, and carried off abundance of captives, among whom was Lot, Abraham's nephew; but Abraham pursued them, retook Lot, and recovered the spoil, in the year of the world 2092, and before Jesus Christ 1912, (Gen. xiv.)

AMSDORFIANS, a sect of Protestants, in the sixteenth century, who took their name from Amsdorf, their leader. They maintained that good works were not only unprofitable, but were obstacles in the way of salvation. The extravagant assertions of Amsdorf were opposed by George Major, an eminent teacher of theology at Wittemberg, who maintained the necessity of good works. This debate was at length terminated by the form of concord. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iv. p. 39.

AMULET, a charm or preservative against mischief, witchcraft, or diseases. Amulets were an ancient kind of superstition, and consisted of certain characters, ligaments, stones, or metals, engraved or adorned with stars. Some are of opinion, that Laban's teraphim carried away by Rachel, (Gen. xxxi. 19.) and the ear-rings which Jacob hid under an oak, (Id. xxxv. 4.) were preservatives or amulets. See TERAPHIM.

AMYRALDISM, a name given by some writers to the doctrine of universal grace, as explained and asserted by Amyraldus, or Moses Amyrault, and others; his followers, among the reformed in France towards the middle of the seventeenth century. This doctrine principally consisted of the following particulars, viz. that God desires the happiness of all men, and none are excluded by a divine decree; that none can obtain salvation, without faith in Christ; that God refuses to none the power of believing, though he does not grant to all his assistance, that they may improve this power to saving purposes; and that many perish through their own fault. Those, who embraced this doctrine were called Universalists, though it is evident they rendered grace universal in words, but partial in reality. For this doctrine represents God as desiring salvation for all, which, in order to its attainment, requires a degree of his assistance, which he refuses to many. See CAMERONIANS.

Moses Amyrault was an eminent French Protestant divine, and studied at Saumur, where he was chosen professor of theology. His work on the mystery of predestination and grace occasioned a controversy between him and some other divines. He died in 1664. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iv. pp. 503, 504.

ANABAPTISTS. At a very early period of the Reformation, certain of the disciples of Luther, and particularly one of the name of Muncer, adopted opinions in some instances apparently replete with enthusiasm, and on some occasions proceeded to the disturbance of the public tranquillity. From these violent reformers arose the formidable sect of the Anabaptists. They first appeared in the provinces of Upper Germany, where they were controlled by the severity of the magistrates; but in the Netherlands and Westphalia, where the tendency of their opinions was more unknown, and less guarded against, they obtained admittance into several towns, and spread the contagion of their principles. The most remarkable of their religious tenets related to the sacrament of baptism, which, they contended, ought to be administered only to persons grown up to years of understanding, and should be performed, not by sprinkling them, but by dipping them in water. For this reason, they condemned the baptism of infants; and as they re-baptized all, whom they admitted into their society, the sect obtained the name of anabaptists. To this peculiar notion concerning baptism, which appears to be founded on the practice of the church in the apostolic age, and contains nothing inconsistent with the peace and order of human society, they added other principles of a most enthusiastic and dangerous nature. They maintained that, among Christians, who had the precepts of the Gospel to direct, and the Spirit of God to guide them, the office of magistracy was not only unnecessary, but an unlawful encroachment on their spiritual liberty; that the distinctions occasioned by birth, rank, or wealth, were contrary to the spirit of the Gospel, which considers all men as equal, and should therefore be entirely abolished; that all Christians, placing their possessions in one common stock, should live together in that state of equality, which becomes members of the same family; and that as neither the laws of nature, nor the precepts of the New Testament, had imposed any restraint on men, with regard to the number of wives they might marry, they should use that liberty, which God himself had granted to the patriarchs.

In the year 1532, two Anabaptist prophets, John Matthias, a baker of Haerlem, and John Boccold, or Beikels, a journeyman tailor, of Leyden, possessed with the rage of making proselytes, fixed their residence at Munster, an imperial city of Westphalia, of the first rank, under the sovereignty of its bishop, but governed by its own senate and consuls. As neither of these fanatics wanted the talents requisite in desperate enterprises, great resolution, the appearance of sanctity, bold pretensions to inspiration, and a confident and plausible manner of discoursing, they soon gained many converts, some of whom were persons of eminence. Emboldened by the countenance of such disciples, they openly taught their opinions; and not satisfied with that liberty, they attempted to render themselves masters of the town, in order to establish their tenets by public authority. In this design they at length succeeded; and Matthias, in the style, and with the authority of a prophet, uttered his commands, which it was instant death to disobey. He deposed the magistrates, confiscated the estates of those who had escaped, and deposited the wealth in a public treasury for the common use of all. He commanded the members of this commonwealth to eat at tables prepared in public, and even prescribed the dishes to be served up each day. His next care was to provide for the defence of the city. He invited the Anabaptists in the low countries to assemble at Munster, which he dignified with the title of Mount Sion, that they might set out to reduce all the nations of the earth under their dominion.

Matthias was soon cut off by the army of the bishop of Munster; but Boccold, by the same gifts and pretensions, which had gained Matthias credit, soon revived the spirits and hopes of the Anabaptists to such a degree, that he succeeded the deceased prophet in the same absolute direction of all their affairs. Though less daring in action than Matthias, Boccold was a wilder enthusiast, and of more unbounded ambition. Not satisfied with power or titles less than supreme, a prophet, whom he had instructed for that purpose, assembled the multitude, and declared it to be the will of God, that John Boccold should be king of Sion, and sit on the throne of David. John was immediately acknowledged as monarch by the deluded multitude, and assumed all the state and pomp of royalty.

Having now attained the height of power, Boccold instructed the prophets and teachers to harangue the people on the lawful ness and even necessity of marrying more wives than one, and to assert that this was one of the privileges granted by God to the saints. Boccold set the people an example, and married at once three wives. As he was allured by beauty or the love of variety, he gradually added to the number of his wives till they amounted to fourteen, though only one of them, the widow of Matthias, was dignified with the title of queen. After the example of their prophet, the multitude yielded to the most licentious and uncontrolled gratification of their desires. No man remained satisfied with a single wife; and together with polygamy, freedom of divorce, its inseparable attendant, was introduced, and became a new scene of corruption. Every excess was committed, of which the passions are capable, when not restrained by the authority of laws or the sense of decency; and by a monstrous and almost incredible conjunction, voluptuousness was engrafted on religion, and dissolute riot accompanied the austerities of fanatical devotion.

The German princes were highly offended by Boccold's usurpation of royal honours; and the profligate manners of his followers filled men of all professions with horror. The princes of the empire, assembled by the king of the Romans, voted a supply of men and money to the Bishop of Munster; and, in the year 1535, the city of Munster, which had been in the possession of the Anabaptists more than fifteen months, was more closely pressed. At length, after the besieged had endured the utmost rigour of famine, and suffered hardships, the recital of which is shocking to humanity, the city was entered by surprise. Most of the Anabaptists were slain, and the rest taken prisoners. Boccold, loaded with chains, was carried from city to city as a spectacle to gratify the curiosity of the people, and was exposed to all their insults. After this, he was brought back to Munster, where he was put to death with the most exquisite and lingering tortures, all of which he bore with astonishing fortitude. This extraordinary man, who had acquired such amazing dominion over the minds of his followers, and had excited commotions so dangerous to society, was only twenty-six years of age.

With its monarch, the kingdom of the Anabaptists terminated. Their principles having taken deep root in the Low Countries, the party still subsists there under the name of Mennonites. However, by a very singular revolution, this sect, so mutinous and sanguinary at its origin, has become altogether innocent and pacific. Holding it unlawful to wage war, or to accept of civil offices, they devote themselves entirely to the duties of private citizens, and by their industry and charity endeavour to repair to human society for violence committed by their founders. Those of this sect settled in England, retain its peculiar tenets concerning baptism, but without any dangerous mixture of enthusiasm. Indeed, the Baptists in England and Holland, disavow the practice, which the appellation of Anabaptists implies; they profess an equal aversion to all principles of rebellion on the one hand, and to all suggestions of fanaticism on the other. See BAPTISTS and MENNONITES. Robertson's History of Charles V. vol. iii. pp. 65—77. Encycl. Britan.

ANACHORETS, or ANCHORITES, a sort of monks in the primitive church, who retired from the society of mankind into some desert, that they might avoid the temptations of the world, and be more at leisure for meditation and prayer. Such were Paul, Anthony, and Hilarion, the founders of monastic life in Egypt and Palestine.

Anachorets, among the Greeks, consist principally of monks, who retire to caves or cells, with the leave of the abbot, and an allowance from the monastery; or who, weary of the fatigues of the monastery, purchase a spot of ground, to which they retreat, and never appear again in the monastery, except on solemn occasions.

ANAGOGICAL, signifies mysterious, transporting, and is used to express whatever elevates the mind, not only to the knowledge of divine things, but of divine things in the next life. This word is seldom employed, except as one of the four senses in which the Scripture may be interpreted, viz. the literal, allegorical, anagogical, and tropological. The anagogical sense is when the text is explained with regard to eternal life, the point which Christians should have in view: for example, the rest of the Sabbath, in the anagogical sense, signifies the repose of everlasting happiness.

AN'AH, עֲנַח, 'Eṇāh, signifies one, who answers, or, who sings responsively; or, poor or afflicted. Anah was the son of Zibeon, the Hivite, and father of Aholibamah, Esau's wife. Whilst feeding the asses of his father Zibeon in the wilderness, he discovered the mules. (Gen. xxxvi. 24.) Thus our English version, and also several other versions of the Bible, translate the Hebrew matseth hajjemim. The Septuagint, Theodotion, Aquila, and Symmachus, retain the original word Jameim, or Janim, as a proper name. Others suppose, that Anah discovered the manner of producing mules, by the union of a horse and an ass; but the Scripture never calls mules jamim, nor are such creatures mentioned in Scripture till the time of David. St. Jerom has rendered the passage springs of warm water, or medicinal springs. But the Chaldee reads giants, and the Samaritan version 'the Emim,' a people mentioned by Moses as a sort of giants. (Gen. xiv. 5. Deut. ii. 10.) These Emim dwelt in the neighbourhood of Seir, where Anah fed his asses. It is therefore thought that Anah found, i. e.

attacked, or surprised, a people called Jemim, or Emim, in the wilderness, where he was feeding asses; for Jamim, or Jemim, is put for Emim, either by cutting off the first letter, or by changing jod into aleph, both of which are common among the Hebrews. It is also observable, that the Hebrew word מָצָא, matsa, which signifies to find, is often used for the sudden attacking or surprising of an enemy. That the Emim are here meant, and that Anah attacked or surprised this people in the wilderness, where he was feeding asses, is the opinion of the learned Bochart, Le Clerc, Calmet, Poole, and most of the modern commentators. Indeed, this seems to be the only probable explanation of the passage.

Some have thought, but without any proof, that Anah was exalted to divine honours, and that he is mentioned in the second book of the Kings, where it is said the Sepharvaim adored Henah, or Anah, and Ivah. (2 Kings xviii. 34. Isaiah xxxvii. 13.) It has been lately conjectured, that from Henah are derived the Heneti, who were famous for breeding mules, and whose posterity were afterwards called Veneti (quasi Ve Heneti;) and hence the Venetians, whose doge still retains the Phrygian bonnet, as his crown of state.

ANAK, or Onok, עֲנֹק, signifies a collar or ornament. From it some derive the Greek word ἀναξ, a king. Anak, the father of the Anakim, was the son of Arba, who gave his name to Kirjath-arba, or Hebron. (Josh. xiv. 15.) Anak had three sons, Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmi, who were giants as well as their father, and who, with their posterity, all terrible for their fierceness and extraordinary stature, were called the Anakim. (Id. xv. 14. Numb. xiii. 22.) In comparison of the Anakim, the Hebrews, who were sent to view the land of Canaan, reported that they were only as grass-hoppers. (Numb. xiii. ult.) Caleb, assisted by the tribe of Judah, took Kirjath-arba, and destroyed the Anakim, in the year of the world 2559, and before Jesus Christ 1445. (Josh. xv. 14. Judges i. 20.)

AN'AMIM, עֲנִיִּים, Anetaméia, signifies a fountain, or eye; or answer, song, affliction. He was the second son of Mizraim. (Gen. x. 13.) If we may credit the paraphrast Jonathan, the son of Uzziel, Anamim peopled the Mareotis, or, rather the Pentapolis of Cyrene, according to the paraphrast of Jerusalem. Bochart is of opinion, that these Anamim dwelt in the parts adjacent to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and in the Nasamonitis. Calmet thinks, that the Amanians and Garamantes were descended from Anamim.

ANAMMELECH, אֲנַמְלֵךְ, signifies answer, or song of the king and council; or the king. It is said that the inhabitants of Sepharvaim, sent from beyond the Euphrates into Syria, burned their children in honour of Anammelech and Adrammelech, their gods. (2 Kings xvii. 31.) It is thought that Adrammelech signified the sun, and Anammelech the moon. Some of the rabbins represent Anammelech under the figure of a mule; others, under that of a quail, or pheasant. See ADRAMMELECH.

ANANIAS, עֲנַיָּה, signifies the cloud of the Lord, and was the name of the son of Nebedæus, high-priest of the Jews. According to Josephus, he succeeded Joseph, the son of Camith, in the forty-seventh year of the Christian era. Quadratus, governor of Syria, coming into Judæa, on the rumours, which prevailed among the Samaritans and Jews, sent the high-priest Ananias to Rome, to vindicate his conduct to the emperor. The high-priest justified himself, was acquitted, and returned. St. Paul being apprehended at Jerusalem, by the tribune of the Roman troops that guarded the temple, declared to him that he was a citizen of Rome. This obliged the officer to treat him with some regard. As he was ignorant of what the Jews accused him, the next day he convened the priests, and placed St. Paul in the midst of them, that he might justify himself. St. Paul began as follows: 'Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God, until this day.' He had scarcely spoken this, when the high-priest, Ananias, commanded those, who were near him, to smite him on the face. The apostle immediately replied, 'God shall judge thee, thou whited wall; for, sittest thou to judge me after the law, and commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law? They that stood by said, Revilest thou God's high-priest? Paul answered, I wist not, brethren, that he was the high-priest; for it is written, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people.' (Acts xxii. 23, 24; xxiii. 1, 2, 3, &c.)

On this passage it has been asked, how it happened that St. Paul said, 'I wist not, brethren, that he was the high-priest,' since the external marks of office must have determined whether he were so or not? To this it has been answered, that soon after the holding of the first council, as it is called, at Jerusalem, Ananias, as it has been already observed, was dispossessed of his office, in consequence of certain acts of violence between the Samaritans and the Jews, and sent prisoner to Rome, whence he was afterwards released, and returned to Jerusalem. Now from that period he could not be called high-priest in the proper sense of the word, though Josephus has sometimes given him the title of ἀρχιερεὺς, taken in the more extensive meaning of a priest, who had a seat and voice in the Sanhedrim; and Jonathan, though we are not acquainted with the circumstances of his elevation, had been raised in the meantime to the supreme dignity in the Jewish church. Between the death of Jonathan, who was murdered by order of Felix, and the high-priesthood of Ismael, who was invested with that office by Agrippa, elapsed an interval, in which this dignity continued vacant. Now it happened precisely at this interval, that St. Paul was apprehended in Jerusalem; and the Sanhedrim being destitute of a president, Ananias undertook of his own authority the discharge of that office, which he executed with the greatest tyranny. It is possible, therefore, that St. Paul, who had been only a few days in Jerusalem, might be ignorant that Ananias, who had been dispossessed of the high-priesthood, had taken upon himself a trust to which he was not entitled; he might therefore very naturally exclaim, 'I wist not, brethren, that he was the high-priest!' Admitting him, on the other hand, to have been acquainted with the fact, the expression must be considered as an indirect reproach, and a tacit refusal to recognise usurped authority.

After this, the assembly being divided in opinion, St. Paul was sent by the tribune to Cæsarea, that Felix, governor of the province, might take cognizance of the affair. When it was known that the apostle had arrived at Cæsarea, Ananias the high-priest, and other Jews, went thither to accuse him, but the affair was adjourned, and St. Paul continued two years in prison in that city. (Acts xxiv.) See PAUL.

The apostle's prediction to Ananias, that God would smite him, was thus accomplished: Albinus, governor of Judæa, being come into that country, Ananias found means to gain him by presents. Ananias, therefore, was considered as the first man of his nation by reason of his great riches, friends, and fortune. However, in his party were some violent persons, who plundered the country, and seized the tithes of the priests; and this they did with impunity, on account of the great credit of their master, and of his wealth at Jerusalem. At the same time, several companies of assassins infested Judæa, and committed great ravages. When any of their companions fell into the hands of the governors of the province, and were about to be executed, they failed not to seize some domestic or relation of the high-priest Ananias, that he might procure the liberty of their associates, in exchange for those, whom they detained. Having taken Eleazer, one of Ananias's sons, they did not release him till ten of their companions were liberated. By this means their number considerably increased, and the country was exposed to their ravages.

At length, Eleazer, the son of Ananias, heading a party of mutineers, seized the temple, and forbade any sacrifices for the emperor. Being joined by the assassins, he pulled down the house of his father. Ananias, with his brother, hid himself in the aqueducts belonging to the royal palace, but was soon discovered, and both of them were killed; the mutineers taking no notice, that Ananias was the father of their leader. Thus God smote this whited wall, in the very beginning of the Jewish wars. Josephus, lib. ii. de Bello, cap. 38: Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, vol. i. pp. 51—54.

ANANIAS, one of the first Christians of Jerusalem, who, with his wife Sapphira, sold an estate, and secreted part of the purchase-money. He then carried the remainder to St. Peter, and said that this was the whole price of his inheritance. The apostle, to whom the Holy Ghost revealed the falsehood, reproved him sharply, telling him that he had 'not lied unto men, but unto God.' Immediately, Ananias fell dead at the apostle's feet. About two or three hours after, his wife Sapphira, ignorant of what had happened, came in; and St. Peter having put the same question to her, as before to her husband, she was also guilty of the like falsehood, and was suddenly struck dead in the same manner. (Acts v. 1, 2, 3, &c.) This happened in the year of our Lord 33 or 34, a little time after the ascension. Some have been so curious, as to inquire in what the sin of Ananias and Sapphira consisted. Many of the ancients thought, that when the first Christians resolved to sell their estates, this resolution included a kind of vow to reserve nothing; and that Ananias and Sapphira having violated this vow, were guilty of perjury and sacrilege, and committed a mortal sin. If to this be added their lying to the Holy Ghost, and the affront in tempting him, their crime will appear considerably aggravated.

The Holy Spirit might be induced to punish the falsehood of Ananias and Sapphira, to give, in the infancy of the church, a solemn notoriety and self-evident sanction to the doctrines taught, not merely by miracles of advantage (as healing), but by miracles of punishment; to deter those, who through worldly motives of gain, or with a view to share in the profits of the goods sold, might join the Christian church; and to deter spies and false brethren, who after this event, must have been aware of the danger of detection. If Ananias alone had died, the collusion would have been less evident, and it might have been thought that it was a merely sudden, though natural death. By this punishment, the Gospel, in some degree, was assimilated to the law, which, immediately after the promulgation of the sabbath, ordered the sabbath-breaker to be stoned. (Numb. xv. 35.) After the consecration of the holy altar, the sons of Aaron, who offered profane fire in their censers, were destroyed. (Levit. x. 3.) The same is observable in the case of Achan. (Josh. vii.)

events, the spectators and civil magistrates must have been convinced, that some extraordinary power was exerted; for if Peter had himself slain Ananias, he would have been amenable to the laws as a murderer. But, if by declaration only he slew him, or, if by forewarning him he should die, and the prediction came to pass, it is evident that the power, which attended this word of Peter, was not from Peter, but from God. In like manner, the power, which opened the earth to swallow Korah, was not from Moses personally, but from him, in whose name he spake, though the people afterwards stupidly accused him of having killed the people of the Lord. (Numb. xvi. 32, 41.)

ANANIAS, a disciple of Jesus Christ, at Damascus, whom the Lord directed to visit Paul, then lately converted, and come to Damascus. Ananias answered, 'Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy saints at Jerusalem; and how he hath authority from the chief priests to bind all that call upon thy name.' But the Lord said unto him, 'Go thy way, for he is a chosen vessel unto me.' Ananias, therefore, went to the house, in which God had revealed unto him that Paul was, and putting his hands on him, said, 'Brother Saul, the Lord Jesus, who appeared unto thee in the way, hath sent me that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost.' (Acts ix. 10, 11, 12, &c.)

We are not acquainted with any other circumstance of the life of Ananias. The Apostolical Constitutions suppose him to have been a layman; Œcumenius, and some moderns, think that he was a deacon. St. Austin is of opinion, that he was a priest, but his arguments on this subject are so weak as to merit no attention. The modern Greeks maintain that Ananias was one of the seventy disciples, bishop of Damascus, a martyr, and buried in that city.

ANATH'EMA, 'Ανάθεμα, signifies something set apart, separated, devoted. It is understood principally to denote the absolute, irrevocable, and entire separation of one from the communion of the faithful, from the number of the living, or from the privileges of society; or, the devoting of any man, animal, city, or thing, to be extirpated, destroyed, consumed, and, as it were, annihilated. The Hebrew word חרם, cherem, signifies, properly, to destroy, exterminate, devote. Moses requires that the Israelites should devote, and utterly extirpate, those who sacrifice to false gods. (Exod. xxii. 20.) In like manner, God commands that the cities belonging to the Canaanites, which did not surrender, should be devoted. (Deut. vii. 2. 24.; xx. 17.) Achan having appropriated to his own use part of the spoil of Jericho, which had been devoted by God, was stoned, and what he had thus taken was destroyed by fire. (Josh. vi. 17, 21.; vii. 1, 2, 3, &c.) See ACHAN.

The word anathema is also taken for that which is irrevocably consecrated, vowed, or offered to the Lord, so that it may never be again employed in common uses. Hence things devoted to destruction could not be redeemed at any price. (Levit. xxvii. 28, 29.) Some assert that persons thus devoted were put to death, and quote Jephthah's daughter as an example. Sometimes particular persons or cities were devoted: as the Israelites devoted king Arad's country, (Numb. xxi. 2, 3.); the people at Mizpeh devoted all, who should not march against the tribe of Benjamin, (Judg. xxi. 5.); and Saul devoted those, who should eat before sun-set, whilst they were pursuing the Philistines. (1 Sam. xiv. 24.) It appears by the execution of these execrations, that they, who were so devoted, were put to death.

Sometimes particular persons devoted themselves, if they did not accomplish some certain purpose. More than forty persons bound themselves by an oath, that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul. (Acts xxiii. 12, 13.) Josephus says, that the Essenians were engaged by oaths to observe the statutes of their sect. Hence, such of them as incurred the guilt of excommunication, were driven from their assemblies, and generally starved to death, being obliged to feed on grass like beasts, and not daring to receive any food, which might be offered them, on account of their vows not to eat.

Moses and St. Paul in some sort anathematized themselves. Moses conjured God to forgive Israel; if not, to blot him out of the book, which he had written. (Exod. xxxii. 32.) St. Paul says, that he could wish to be accursed (anathematized, separated from life, devoted, and made over to death) for his brethren the Israelites, rather than see them excluded from the benefit of Christ's covenant, by their malice and obduracy. (Rom. ix. 3.) This is as much as if the apostle had said, he would, as it were, change places with them. They were now excluded from being the peculiar people of God; so he would be. They were devoted to wrath in the destruction of their state, Jerusalem, &c.; so he would be. They were excluded from the benefit of Christian society; so he would be, if it would benefit them. I could wish myself anathematized from the body of Christ, if that might advantage Israel.

Excommunication, and anathema, and excision, are said by some to be the greatest penalties that can be inflicted on any man in this world: whether by these terms we understand a violent and an ignominious death, or a separation from the society of saints, and communion in things sacred. Interpreters are much divided respecting these texts; but they agree, that Moses and Paul gave, in these instances, the most powerful proofs of a perfect charity, and in the strongest manner expressed their ardent desire to procure the happiness of their brethren.

Another kind of anathema, very peculiarly expressed, seems to have quite a different meaning from what has been above explained: 'if any man,' says St. Paul, 'love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maranatha.' (1 Cor. xvi. 22.) This is as much as if the apostle had said, He who does not love the Lord Jesus Christ will be accursed at his coming. The form is borrowed from the Jews, who, when unable to inflict so great a punishment as the crime deserved, devoted the offender to the immediate vindictive retribution of divine vengeance, both in this life, and in that which is to come. It is impossible to suppose that either Moses or St. Paul, could, in any degree, wish for such an imprecation to attach on himself. They better knew their duty and God's sovereignty. See MOSES and PAUL. Grot. on Rom. ix. 3; Isaiah xiv. 20; Bishop Patrick, on Deut. xxvii. 15; Dr. Doddridge on 1 Cor. xvi. 22.

Excommunication was a kind of anathema among the Hebrews, as it is among Christians. Anathema was the greatest degree of excommunication; and by it the criminal was deprived not only of communicating by prayers and other holy offices, but of admittance to the church, and of conversation with believers.

Among the Hebrews, they who were excommunicated, could not perform any public duty of their employments; could be neither judges nor witnesses; neither be present at funerals, nor circumcise their own sons, nor sit down in the company of other men, nearer than at the distance of four cubits. Also if they died under excommunication, they were denied the rites of burial; and a large stone was left on their graves, or a heap of stones was thrown over them, as over Achan, (Josh. vii. 26.) and Absalom, (2 Sam. xviii. 17.) See EXCOMMUNICATION.

ANATHOTH, ענתות, denotes the same as Anath. Anathoth, a city of the tribe of Benjamin, (Josh. xxi. 18.) was about three miles north of Jerusalem, according to Eusebius and St. Jerom; or twenty furlongs according to Josephus. It was the birth-place of the prophet Jeremiah. (Jer. i. 1.) It was given to the Levites of Kohath's family for their habitation, and as a city of refuge. This city has been destroyed; but its ruins are shown in a valley, in the middle of mountains.

AN'DREW, 'Ανδρέας, signifies a stout and strong man. Andrew, an apostle of Jesus Christ, was a native of Bethsaida, and the brother of Peter. He was first a disciple of John the Baptist, whom he left to follow our Saviour, after the testimony of John, 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.' (John i. 29.) He continued with Jesus from about four o'clock in the afternoon till it was night, and was the first disciple received by our Saviour. Andrew introduced his brother Simon, and they passed a day with Christ. They also went with him to the marriage in Cana, and afterwards returned to their ordinary occupation, not expecting, perhaps, to be farther employed in his service. However, some months after, Jesus meeting them, while fishing together, called them to a regular attendance on him, and promised to make them fishers of men. (Matt. iv. 19.) A few days before the passion of our Saviour, certain Gentiles, desirous to see Jesus Christ, addressed themselves to Philip, who mentioned it to Andrew; and both together told our Lord. (John xii. 22.) Two or three days after, St. Andrew and some other apostles, asked Jesus Christ when the destruction of the temple should happen. This is what the Gospel informs us concerning this apostle.

After our Saviour's ascension, the apostles having determined by lots what parts of the world they should take, Scythia and the neighbouring countries fell to St. Andrew. According to Eusebius, after this apostle had planted the Gospel in several places he came to Patræ, in Achaia, where, endeavouring to convert the pro-consul Ægeus, he was by that governor's orders first scourged, and then crucified. The time of his suffering martyrdom is not known; but all the ancient and modern martyrologies of the Greeks and Latins, agree in celebrating his festival on the 30th of November. His body was embalmed, and decently interred at Patræ, by Maximilla, a lady of great quality and estate. It was afterwards removed to Constantinople, by Constantine the Great, who buried it in the great church, which he had built to the honour of the apostles. It is not known for what reason painters represent St. Andrew's cross like an X. Peter Chrysologus says, that he was crucified upon a tree; and the spurious Hippolytus assures us, that it was an olive-tree. Nevertheless, the tradition, which describes him to have been nailed to a cross, is very ancient. Cave's Lives.

ANDRONA, a term used for that part in churches, which was destined for the men. Anciently, it was the custom for men and women to have separate apartments in places of worship, where they performed their devotions asunder. This method is still religiously observed in the Greek church. The androna was on the southern, and the women's apartment on the northern side of the church.

to the court of Epiphanes, was left by that prince to govern the city of Antioch, whilst he went into Cilicia, to reduce certain places which had revolted. Menelaus, the pretended high-priest, thought this circumstance might favour his design of getting rid of Onias, whose dignity he unjustly possessed, and who had come to Antioch to accuse him. For this purpose, he addressed himself to Andronicus with large presents. Onias, informed of this, reproached him with great sharpness, and, lest he should suffer from violence, kept himself close in the sanctuary of Daphne, a suburb of Antioch, in which was a famous temple, where Julian the apostate afterwards sacrificed.

Menelaus solicited Andronicus so powerfully to dispatch Onias, that he went himself to Daphne, and promised with solemn oaths not to injure Onias. By this means, Andronicus persuaded Onias to leave his place of refuge, and killed him. When the king returned from his expedition, and was acquainted with the fate of Onias, he shed tears, commanded Andronicus to be divested of the purple, to be led about the city in an ignominious manner, and put to death in the very place, in which he had killed Onias. (2 Maccab. iv. 31. 38.) This event happened in the year of the world, 3834, and before Jesus Christ, 170.

A'NER, עֲנִי, signifies answer, song, affliction of light. Aner and Eshcol were two Canaanites that joined their forces with Abraham, in pursuit of the kings Chedorlaomer, Amraphel, and their allies, who had pillaged Sodom, and carried off Lot, Abraham's nephew. They did not imitate the disinterestedness of that patriarch, but retained their share of the spoil taken from the conquered kings. (Gen. xiv. 24.)

ANGEL, ἄγγελος, in Greek, מַלְאָכִי, Mal'ac in Hebrew, signifies a messenger. In Scripture, we frequently read of missions and appearances of angels sent to declare the will of God, to correct, teach, reprove, or comfort. God gave the law to Moses and appeared to the patriarchs by the mediation of angels. (Acts vii. 30. 53.; Gal. iii. 19.; Heb. xiii. 2.) Angel, however, is properly a name of office, not referring to the nature of the person employed, but to his agency as a messenger; and it may be said without risk, that if the word messenger, envoy, or delegate, be mentally substituted by the reader for angel, where it occurs, the passage will lose nothing by the change.

Before the captivity of Babylon, we find no angel mentioned by name. The Talmudists say, they brought their names from Babylon. We find, indeed, many angels called by their names in the book of Enoch, but that is of no authority. Tobit is the first, who has called an angel by name. He mentions Raphael, who conducted Tobias into Media. (Tobit iii. 17.; xi. 2.) It is thought that Tobit lived at Nineveh, some time before the captivity of Judah. Daniel, who lived at Babylon, some time after Tobit, mentions the names of Michael and Gabriel. (Dan. x. 21.; viii. 16.; ix. 21.) The second book of Esdras speaks of Uriel; (2 Esdras iv. 36.;) but it is comparatively modern, and the author probably lived since Christ.

It has been already observed, that the word angel in Scripture is understood as a name of office, rather than of nature, and may denote an agent, an envoy, a deputy. If it be taken personally, it may signify him who performs the will of a superior; and if impersonally, that which performs what it is appointed to act. It seems, indeed, certain that personally taken, the sense of a messenger, or one deputed by another, to act for him, is a genuine idea of the word angel in both the Old and New Testament. Hence Christ Jesus may well be called, 'the angel of God;' for he is eminently the deputy from God to man, the great angel of the covenant, (Malachi iii. 1.) the agent for God. The word angel, impersonally taken, implies, that agent, which executes the will of another.

As the great natural agents of the world around us are wholly beyond the direction of man, and are, therefore, considered as exclusively obedient to God, the word angel imports that which is empowered or commissioned by God to do his will. 'The angel, which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads,' (Gen. xlviii. 16.) i. e. the protecting, preserving, guiding providence of God, which I have experienced during my life. 'The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him,' (Psalm xxxiv. 7.); i. e. his providence watching over them, secures them from evil. 'He cast upon them, (the Egyptians) the fierceness of his anger, &c. by sending evil angels among them.' (Psalm lxxviii. 49.) What those evil angels were, we learn sufficiently from the history of the plagues in Exodus. It is, therefore, indisputable, that extraordinary operations of Providence, though accomplished by natural means, are considered in Scripture as angels (agents) of God. The Almighty, if he chooses, 'can make winds (spirits) his angels,' to conduct his dispensations; and flames of fire his 'ministers,' or servants, to perform his pleasure. (Psalm civ. 4.) The same meaning seems to be attached to the word angel in the Apocrypha; and if we take the angel Raphael in Tobit, in the sense of 'Providential protection,' we shall probably be pretty near the intention of the author.

Besides agencies of natural powers, or providential angels, we have reason to believe, that there exists in the scale of beings, a series of created, intelligent powers, who are angels, inasmuch as they are occasionally agents of God towards mankind. These in capacities and abilities are greatly our superiors. Indeed they are so much superior to us, that in order to render them in any degree comprehensible to our ideas, their nature, offices, &c. are illustrated by a comparison between them, and what occurs among mankind. Thus, if a human prince have his attendants, his servants, his guards, this circumstance is employed to illustrate the nature of celestial angels, who are represented as attendants and servants of God. This principle is evidently the foundation of the apologue, which prefaces the poetical part of the book of Job: 'There was a day, when the sons of God came to present themselves (as it were at court) before the Lord,' &c. (Job i. 6.) The same may be observed of that delivered by the prophet Micah: 'I saw the Lord sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing by him, on his right hand, and on his left.' (1 Kings xxii. 19.) The vision of Isaiah, (chap. vi.) is to the same purpose; and our Lord continues this idea, especially when speaking of his glorious return: 'When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory.' (Matt. xxv. 31.) In reference to the services rendered by angels to mankind, the Scripture warrants us to adopt the idea, that they are servants of the great King, sent from before his throne, to execute his commissions. In such services, it is probable that some of them are always engaged, though invisible to us; and we may receive from them much good or evil, without being sensible of any angelic interference. Thus in Job, the activity of Satan, an evil agent, is represented as producing great effects by storms, &c. Job, however, knew not that it was Satan, but referred all his calamities to the good pleasure of God, acting by natural causes. In like manner, the angel might long have watched Abraham invisibly, before he forbade him to slay Isaac. In this sense, therefore, angels are ministering spirits, sent forth to perform a variety of services to the heirs of salvation.

If angels are engaged invisibly in the service of mankind, we may easily suppose that, on particular occasions, they have been commanded to make themselves known, as celestial intelligences. When they discovered themselves, it has commonly been after they had delivered their message, and always for the purpose of a sign to confirm the faith of those they had addressed. It is evident that the angel who appeared to Manoa, was considered both by him and his wife only as a prophet, till after he had delivered his message, he took his leave in a wonderful manner, to convince them of his extraordinary nature. See JOSHUA, GIDEON, &c.

In like manner, the angel that wrestled with Jacob, at length put the hollow of his thigh out of joint, as a proof that he was no mere man.

Sometimes, however, angels did not reveal themselves fully, but gave, as it were, obscure and very indistinct, though powerful, intimations of their presence. When angels were appointed to appear to certain persons only, others, who were in the company of those persons, had sensations, which indicated an extraordinary occurrence; and though the appearance was not to them, yet they seem to have felt its effects. 'I, Daniel, alone saw the vision: for the men that were with me saw not the vision; but a great quaking fell upon them, so that they fled to hide themselves.' (Dan. x. 7.) In like manner, 'The men, which journeyed with Saul, stood speechless, hearing a voice, but seeing no man.' (Acts ix. 7.) 'They that were with me, saw indeed the light, and were afraid; but they heard not the voice,' the distinct words, 'of him that spake to me.' (Id. xxii. 9.) From these and other instances we infer, that angels discovered themselves with different degrees of clearness, as best suited their errand. Sometimes they effected their purpose without being known, or, suspected to be angels. Sometimes they were conjectured to be angels, but did not advance those conjectures into certainty; and sometimes they left no doubt who and what they were, and together with their errand, declared their nature.

A certain splendour, or brightness, which accompanied their persons, seems to have been the general token of angelic presence; but this appears to have had either a distinction in degree, or a peculiarity, perhaps an identity, of appropriation. A dazzling splendour, as of lightning, might probably sometimes accompany angels; but whether the mild effulgence, the radiance of the benignant divine majesty, ever accompanied a created angel, or rather was not exclusively worn by a person, not only more than human, but also more than angelic, deserves much consideration. Such a one might be eminently 'the angel of the Lord,' the personator of the great Jehovah; and he might be thought, and be called Jehovah, and be really so connected with him, as to accept that sacred name without infringing on propriety.

It would seem that sometimes a person only, not a splendour, was seen; sometimes a splendour only, not a person; and sometimes both a person and his splendour. Of the person only, we have already given instances; of the splendour only, the burning bush is one instance, and the splendour in the sanctuary, &c. another. This splendour seems to have been worn by Jesus at his transfiguration, (Matt. xvii. 2. Mark ix. 2.); at his appearance to Saul, (Acts ix. xxvi. 13.); and when seen by John, (Rev. i.) It is probable, that this splendour, when worn by a person, was indicative of the presence of the great angel of the covenant.

We may, therefore, trace a gradation in the use of the word angel. 1. Human messengers, or agents for others; 2. Divine messengers, yet human persons, or agents for God, as prophets, (Haggai i. 13.); priests, (Mal. ii. 7. Eccles. v. 6.); 3. Officers for the churches, or agents for the churches; 4. Providence in a general sense, or the agency of divine dispensations, conducting natural causes; 5. Special providences, or the agency of divine dispensations apparent on remarkable occasions; 6. Created intelligences, or agents of a nature superior to men, performing the divine commands, in relation to the sons of men; and 7. The great angel between God and man, or the eminently deputed agent of God.

Some think, that angels, or created intelligences, were produced at the same time as the heavens, and that Moses included them under this name, saying, 'In the beginning God created the heaven.' Some are of opinion, that he intended them under the name 'light,' which God created on the first day. Others assert, that they were created before the world; and Job seems to favour this opinion: 'Where wast thou, when I laid the foundations of the earth?—When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy.' (Job xxxviii. 4. 7.) The Hebrews think that God created them on the second day of the world, and that he consulted with the angels, saying, 'Let us make man in our image, after our likeness.' (Gen. i. 26.) Others are of opinion, that the angels were created on the fifth day. Origen and other Greek and Latin fathers, thought they were created before the world; and Dr. Hyde is of opinion, that they must have existed a very long time before the world.

Many of the old fathers were led into a mistake respecting angels by the authority of the book of Enoch, and by a passage of Genesis, ill understood, in which it is said, 'The sons of God saw the daughters of men, that they were fair; and they took their wives of all which they chose.' (Gen. vi. 2.) From this passage they imagined that angels were corporeal, capable of sensual pleasures, and sensible of their allurements. Other fathers, indeed, and those in great number, have asserted angels to be purely spiritual; and this, at present, is the common opinion. On the same rank as to nature, though very different as to happiness, the Scripture places the angels, 'who kept not their first estate;' but their number, their economy, their powers, &c. are nowhere expressed. By sin they became the most vile and miserable of all God's creatures. They were expelled the regions of light, and with heaven, lost their heavenly disposition, and fell into a settled rancour against God, and malice against men. What their offence was, it is difficult to determine, as it is not mentioned in Scripture. Some think that it was envy, some unbelief, but most are of opinion, it was pride. As to the time of their sinning, some think that it was not before the sixth day of the creation, because on that day it is said, 'God saw every thing that he had made, and behold it was very good; but that it was not long after, as it must have preceded the fall of our first parents. It is certain from Scripture, that these fallen angels are in great numbers, and that among them are various orders, (Matt. xii. 24. Ephes. ii. 2.; vi. 12. Col. ii. 15. Rev. xii. 7.) One is considered as their prince, and called by the names of Beelzebub, Satan, or Sammael by the Jews, Aharimam by the Persians, and Eblis by the Mahometans. Their constant employment is not only doing evil themselves, but endeavouring by all arts to seduce and pervert mankind, by tempting them to sin, and reducing them to the same desperate state with themselves. (1 Pet. v. 8. Job i. 6.) It is supposed they will be restrained during the millennium, (Rev. xx. 2.); but afterwards again, for a short time, deceive the nations, (Ibid. 7.) and then be finally punished, (Matt. xxv. 41.)

Good angels are called angels of light, their habitation being in heaven, the region of light; they are clothed with light and glory; they stand before the throne of the Most High, and inspire men with good actions, actions of light and righteousness.—On the contrary, angels of darkness are the ministers of the devil, whose abode is in hell, the region of darkness. St. Paul says, that Satan sometimes transforms himself into an angel of light, (2 Cor. xi. 14.) in the same manner as our Saviour in the Gospel says, that wolves sometimes put on sheep's clothing, to seduce the simple. (Matt. vii. 15.) By their works, however, they are discovered; and sooner or later they betray themselves by deeds of darkness, in which they and their followers engage. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

ANGEL is also a title given to bishops of several churches. In this sense, some understand the words of St. Paul, when he says, women ought to be covered in the church, because of the angels, (1 Cor. xi. 10.) Dr. Prideaux observes, that the minister of the synagogue, who officiated in offering up the public prayers, being the mouth of the congregation, delegated from them, as their representative, messenger, or angel, to address God in favour of them, was therefore called, in the Hebrew language, the angel of the church. Hence the bishops of the seven churches of Asia, are designated, by a name borrowed from the synagogue, the angels of those churches. Prideaux's Connect. P. i. B. vi.

ANGELICS, an ancient sect of heretics, supposed by some to have obtained this appellation from their excessive veneration of angels; and by others, from maintaining that the world was created by angels.—It is also the name of a congregation of nuns, founded at Milan in 1534. Encyclop. Britan.

ANGELITES, a sect of Christian heretics, about the year 494, in the reign of the emperor Anastasius, and the pontificate of Symmachus. They received their denomination of Angelites from Angelium, a place in the city of Alexandria, where they held their first meetings. They were also called Severites from Severus, who was at the head of their sect, and Theodosians from Theodosius, whom they made Pope at Alexandria. They believed that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, are the same; that none of them exists of himself, and of his own nature; but that there is a common God or Deity existing in them all; and that each is God by relation to, or a participation of this Deity. Broughton's Hist. Lib. vol. i. p. 49.

ANGER, is a violent passion of the mind, arising on the receipt, or supposed receipt, of an injury, with a present purpose of revenge.

Anger has been considered as the great disturber of human life, and the chief enemy both of public happiness and private tranquillity. From this passion, in its full import, protracted into malevolence, and exerted in revenge, arise many of the evils, to which the life of man is exposed. By anger operating upon power are produced the subversion of cities, the desolation of countries, the massacre of nations, and all those dreadful and astonishing calamities, which fill the histories of the world, and which could not be read at any distant point of time, when the passions stand neutral, and every motive and principle is left to its natural force, without some doubt of the truth of the relation, did we not see the same causes still tending to the same effects, and acting only with less vigour for want of the same concurrent opportunities.

Pride is undoubtedly the origin of anger; but pride, like every other passion, if it once breaks loose from reason, counteracts its own purposes. A passionate man, on the review of his conduct, will have very few gratifications to offer to his pride, when he has considered how his outrages were caused, why they were borne, and in what they are likely to terminate.

Sudden bursts of rage generally break out on small occasions; for life, unhappy as it is, cannot supply great evils as frequently as the passionate man thinks it fit to be enraged. The first reflection on his own violence, therefore, must shew him that he is mean enough to be driven from his post by every petty incident, that he is the mere slave of casualty, and that his reason and virtue are in the power of chance. By frequently indulging his anger, a man will teach this passion, in a short time, to intrude before the summons, to rush upon him with resistless violence, and without any previous notice of its approach. He will find himself liable to be inflamed at the first touch of provocation, and unable to restrain his resentment, till he has a full conviction of the offence, to proportion his anger to the cause, or to regulate it by prudence or duty. When a man has once suffered his mind to be thus vitiated, he becomes one of the most hateful and unhappy of beings. He can give no security to himself that he shall not, at the next interview, alienate by some sudden transport his dearest friend; or break out, on some slight contradiction, into such terms of rudeness as can never be perfectly forgotten.

To suppress this passion, “we should consider,” says Dr. Paley, “the possibility of mistaking the motives, from which the conduct that offends us proceeded; how often our offences have been the effect of inadvertency, when they were construed into indications of malice; the inducement, which prompted our adversary to act as he did, and how powerfully the same inducement has, at one time or other, operated upon ourselves; that he is suffering perhaps under a contrition, which he is ashamed, or wants opportunity, to confess; and how ungenerous it is to triumph by coldness, or insult over a spirit already humbled in secret; that the returns of kindness are sweet, and that there is neither honour, nor virtue, nor use, in resisting them; for some persons think themselves bound to cherish and keep alive their indignation, when they find it dying away of itself. We may remember that others have their passions, their prejudices, their favourite aims, their fears, their cautions, their interests, their sudden impulses, their varieties of apprehension, as well as we: we may recollect what hath sometimes passed in our own minds, when we have got on the wrong side of a quarrel, and imagine the same to be passing in our adversary's mind now: when we became sensible of our misbehaviour, what palliations we perceived in it, and expected others to perceive; how we were affected by the kindness, and felt the superiority of a generous reception and ready forgiveness; how persecution revived our spirits with our enmity, and seemed to justify the conduct in ourselves, which we before blamed. Add to this the indecency of extravagant anger; how it renders us, whilst it lasts, the scorn and sport of all about us, of which it leaves us, when it ceases, sensible and ashamed; the inconveniences and irretrievable misconduct, into which our irascibility has sometimes betrayed us; the friendships it has lost us; the distresses and embarrassments, in which we have been involved by it; and the repentance, which, on one account or other, it always costs us.

"But the reflection, calculated above all others to allay that haughtiness of temper, which is ever finding out provocations, and which renders anger so impetuous, is that, which the Gospel proposes; namely, that we ourselves are, or shortly shall be, suppliants for mercy and pardon at the judgment-seat of God. Imagine our secret sins all disclosed and brought to light; imagine us thus humbled and exposed; trembling under the hand of God; casting ourselves on his compassion; crying out for mercy; imagine such a creature to talk of satisfaction and revenge; refusing to be entreated, disdaining to forgive; extreme to mark and to resent what is done amiss; imagine, I say, this, and you can hardly feign to yourself an instance of more impious and unnatural arrogance."

Anger or wrath is frequently attributed to God in Scripture: not that he is capable of those irregular emotions, which this passion produces; but figuratively speaking after the manner of men, and because he punishes the wicked with the severity of a superior provoked to anger.

Anger is often used for punishment or chastisement. The magistrate, says St. Paul, is 'a revenger to execute wrath,' that is, 'vengeance or punishment.' (Rom. xiii. 4.) 'There is wrath gone out from the Lord, and the plague is begun.' (Numb. xvi. 46.)

Anger is often joined with fury, even when God is spoken of; but this is to express more forcibly the effects of his anger, or what may be expected from the just occasions of his indignation. 'Now it is in mine heart,' says Hezekiah, 'to make a covenant with the Lord God of Israel, that his fierce wrath may turn away from us.' (2 Chron. xxix. 10.) The Hebrews place anger in the nose. 'Let not thy nose be disturbed, be inflamed.' Hence, a choleric man is called short-nosed; a patient man, long-nosed. This seems to be confirmed by several passages of Scripture. 'There went up a smoke out of his nostrils.' (2 Sam. xxii. 9.) See also Psalm xviii. 8, Job iv. 9. Deut. xxix. 20, &c. Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy; Johnson's Rambler.

ANIMAL, is an organized and living body, which is endowed with sensation. Minerals are said to grow or increase, plants to grow and live, and animals alone to have sensation.

The Hebrews distinguished animals into pure and impure, or clean and unclean; or those, which might be eaten and offered, and those, whose use was prohibited. The sacrifices, which they offered, were, (1.) of the beeve kind; a cow, bull, or calf. The ox could not be offered, because it was mutilated; and when it is said oxen were sacrificed, we are to understand bulls. (Levit. xxii. 18, 19.) Calmet thinks, that the mutilation of animals was neither permitted, nor used, among the Israelites. (2.) Of the goat kind; a he-goat, a she-goat, or kid. (Id. ibid. 24.) (3.) Of the sheep kind; a ewe, ram, or lamb. When it is said sheep are offered, rams are chiefly meant, especially in burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin; for as to peace-offerings, or sacrifices of pure devotion, a female might be sometimes offered, provided it was pure, and without blemish. (Ib. iii. 1.)

Besides these three sorts of animals used in sacrifices, many others might be eaten, wild or tame; as the stag, the roe-buck, and in general all that have cloven feet, or that chew the cud. (Levit. xi. 2, 3, &c.) All that have not cloven hoofs, and do not chew the cud, were esteemed impure, and could neither be offered nor eaten. The fat of all sorts of animals sacrificed was forbidden to be eaten. The blood of all kinds of animals generally, and in all cases, was prohibited on pain of death. (Ib. iii. 17.; vii. 23—27.) Neither did the Israelites eat animals, which had been taken and touched by a devouring or impure beast, as a dog, a wolf, a boar, &c. (Exod. xxii. 31.) Nor of any animal that died of itself. Whoever touched its carcase was impure until the evening, and till that time, and before he had washed his clothes, he did not return to the conversation of other Jews. (Levit. xi. 39, 40.; xvii. 15.; xxii. 8.)

Fish that had neither fins nor scales were unclean. (Levit. xi. 10.)

Birds, which walk on the ground with four feet, as bats; and flies that have many feet, were impure. The law, however, excepts locusts, which have their hind feet higher than those before, and rather leap than walk. These were clean, and might be eaten, (Id. ibid. 21, 22.) as they still are in Palestine.

Interpreters are much divided respecting the legal purity or impurity of animals. It is believed, that this distinction obtained before the flood, since God commanded Noah to carry into the ark seven couple of clean animals, and only two of unclean. (Gen. vii. 2.) Some are of opinion, that this distinction is altogether symbolical, and that it denotes the moral purity after which the Hebrews were to endeavour, or that impurity, which they were to avoid, according to the nature of these animals. For example, if a hog signified gluttony, a hare lasciviousness, a sheep gentleness, a dove simplicity, &c. the principal design of Moses in prohibiting the use of swine's flesh, was to condemn gluttony, and excess in eating and drinking ; or in allowing sheep or doves, was to recommend gentleness, &c.

Others believe, that God intended to preserve the Hebrews from the temptation of adoring animals, by permitting them to eat the generality of those, which were regarded as gods in Egypt ; and by obliging them to look with horror on others, to which also divine honours were paid. They had no idea of worshipping the animals they ate ; and still less of adoring those, which they could not persuade themselves to use even for nourishment. Tertullian thought, that God, by enjoining the Hebrews to deprive themselves of certain sorts of food, proposed to accustom them to temperance.

Many commentators allow nothing unclean in the animals that are forbidden, beyond some natural qualities, which are really hurtful, or which at least are thought hurtful by some persons. Moses forbade the use of those beasts, birds, and fishes, which are wild, dangerous, or venomous, and the flesh of which is supposed injurious to health. God also, who designed to separate the Hebrews from other people, as a nation consecrated to his service, seems to have interdicted them the use of certain animals, which were considered as unclean, that by this figurative purity, they might be inclined to another purity real and perfect. This he himself intimates in the book of Leviticus. (xx. 24, 25, 26.)

It appears probable, that we ought to combine all these ideas, as reasons for the legal purity or impurity of animals, since those, which were naturally hurtful, might also be regarded as typically hurtful. As providence has thus varied the natures of animals, the domesticity of some might render them clean, while the savage and dangerous disposition of others forbade them from the table and the altar. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

ANISE, in the Linnæan system of botany, is a genus of the pentandria digynia class of plants. It has a fine aromatic smell, and is used by confectioners and perfumers. From it are distilled an oil, which answers all the purposes of the seed itself, and a water, which is a celebrated cordial and carminative.

Our Lord reproaches the Pharisees with their scrupulous exactness in paying tithe of anise, mint, and cummin, while they neglected justice, mercy, and faith, which were the more essential principles and practices of religion. (Matt. xxiii. 23.) Anise, mint, and cummin, are perhaps, strictly speaking, not garden herbs in the East, but wild and uncultivated. Scripture Illustrated.

ANNA, or HANNAH, חַנָּה, signifies gracious, merciful ; or, one that gives. Anna, the wife of Tobit, of the tribe of Naphthali, was carried captive to Nineveh, by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria. (Tobit i. 9.) After Tobit had lost his sight, and was become poor, Anna was obliged to procure a livelihood for herself and family by spinning. One day having received a kid as a present, she brought it home. Tobit hearing it, said, take care that this kid be not stolen, send it back to those who own it. To this, Anna, with great warmth, replied, where are thine alms, and thy righteous deeds ? behold thou, and all thy works are known. (Id. ii. 11, 12, &c.) Thus was the patience of Tobit tried amid his other afflictions.

Some time after this, Tobit, believing himself near his end, called his son Tobias, and charged him to maintain a great respect for his mother, and to remember all she had done and suffered for him. He added, when her life is finished, bury her near me. However, Tobit lived long after this, and Anna, his wife, survived him. (Id. xiv. 12.) Some few moments before his death, he repeated his request that his wife should be placed near him in his grave. Tobit died about the year of the world 3363, and before Jesus Christ 641 ; and Anna in all probability, before the year 3378.

ANNA, the daughter of Phanuel, a prophetess and widow, of the tribe of Asher. (Luke ii. 36, 37.) She was married early, and lived only seven years with her husband. Being disengaged, she thought only of pleasing the Lord, and continued, without ceasing, in the temple, serving God day and night, with fasting and prayers. However, Dr. Prideaux observes, that her serving God in the temple, day and night, is to be understood no otherwise than that she constantly attended the morning and evening sacrifice at the temple, and then with great devotion offered up her prayers to God ; for the time of morning and evening sacrifice was the most solemn time of prayer among the Jews, and the temple the most solemn place.

She was fourscore years of age, when Mary came to present Jesus in the temple ; and entering while Simeon was pronouncing his thanksgiving, Anna also began to praise God, and to speak of the Messiah to all, who waited for the redemption of Israel. We know nothing more of this holy prophetess.

AN'NAS, ʿAvvag, signifies one that answers, that afflicts, and humbles. Annas, or Ananus, as Josephus calls him, was the son of Seth, and high-priest of the Jews. He succeeded Joazar the son of Simon, enjoyed the high-priesthood eleven years, and was succeeded by Ishmael, the son of Phabi. After he was deposed, he still preserved the title of high-priest, and had a great share in the management of public affairs. He is called high-priest in conjunction with Caiaphas, when John the Baptist entered upon the exercise of his mission, though Calmet thinks, that at that time he did not, strictly speaking, possess or officiate in that character. (Luke iii. 2.) On the contrary, Macknight and some others are of opinion, that at this time Caiaphas was only the deputy of Annas. He was father-in-law to Caiaphas; and Jesus Christ was carried before him, directly after his seizure in the garden of Olives. (John xviii. 13.) Josephus remarks, that Annas was considered as one of the happiest men of his nation: for five of his sons were high-priests; and he himself possessed that great dignity many years. This was an instance of good fortune, which till that time had happened to no person. See CAIAPHAS. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 8.

ANNIHILATION, the act of reducing any created being into nothing. How widely have the sentiments of mankind differed as to the possibility or impossibility of annihilation! According to some, nothing is so difficult; it requires the infinite power of the Creator to effect it. According to others, nothing is so easy. Existence, say the last, is a state of violence; all things are continually endeavouring to return to their primitive nothing; it requires no power to effect it; it will accomplish it of itself; nay more—it requires an infinite power to prevent it.

That the soul of man is immortal, and not liable to annihilation, is a truth founded on reason, and confirmed by revelation. If all die with the body, who has been able to persuade men of every age, and every country, that their souls are immortal? The persuasion of a future life sprang not from the refinements of science, or the speculations of philosophy, but from the natural sentiments of the human heart. Hence it is common to the philosopher and the savage, and may be found in the most barbarous, as well as in the most civilized regions. This universal consent proves that this great truth is congenial to man, and plainly indicates an original determination given to the soul by its Creator. Our own breasts afford us various anticipations, and presages of future existence. The ambitious and the humble, the high and the low, the good and the wicked, all interest themselves in what is to happen after they shall have left the earth. The passion for fame, which inspires so much the activity of man, is plainly animated by the persuasion, that consciousness is to survive the dissolution of the body. The virtuous are supported by the hope, and the wicked tormented with the dread of a future state of existence. As death approaches, the hopes of the one, and the fears of the other, redouble; and the soul, when issuing hence, seems more clearly to discern its future abode. All the operations of conscience proceed on the belief of immortality. To suppose this universal and powerful belief to be void of foundation in truth, is to suppose, that a principle of delusion was interwoven with the nature of man; is to suppose, that his Creator was reduced to the necessity of impressing his heart with a falsehood, to make him answer the purposes of his being.

Man, fallen from his primæval felicity, is now undergoing probation and discipline for his final state. If we suppose that annihilation will succeed the present life, the whole state of man becomes not only inexplicable, but contradictory and inconsistent. Endowed with capacities, which extend far beyond his present sphere, and fitted by his rational nature for immortality, he is stopped at his very entrance. He is active in pursuits, which he perceives to be vain. He languishes for knowledge, which is placed beyond his reach. He thirsts after a happiness, which he is doomed not to enjoy. The Almighty would never have called into existence this magnificent structure, which he has adorned with so much beauty and splendour, and surrounded with such glorious luminaries, only that some generations of mortal men might arise to behold these wonders, and then for ever disappear. In such a case, how unsuitable would be the habitation to the wretched inhabitant! How contradictory were every thing, which concerns the state of man, to the wisdom and perfection of his Maker!

To the arguments afforded by reason against annihilation, the Gospel adds the most irrefragable proofs. By its life and immortality are brought to light. The resurrection of Christ from the grave is a sensible evidence, that death infers not a final extinction of the living principle. He rose, in order to show, that, in our name, he had conquered death, and was 'become the first fruits of them that sleep.' By ascending to heaven in a visible form, before many witnesses, he afforded an ocular demonstration of the transition from this world into the region of the blessed. 'In my Father's house,' says he, 'are many mansions. I go to prepare a place for you; I will come again, and receive you to myself, that where I am, there ye may be also.' The circumstances of his coming again, are distinctly foretold. The sounding of the last trumpet, the resurrection of the dead, the appearance of the judge, and the solemnity, with which he shall discriminate the good from the bad, are all described. The very words, in which he shall pronounce the final sentence, are recited. The holy and the good shall be 'caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air.' They shall enter with him into the 'city of the living God,' and shall possess the 'new earth and new heavens, wherein dwelleth righteousness.' By recording such a train of striking circumstances and facts, the Gospel not only completely destroys every idea of our annihilation, but even familiarizes us with a future state. Massillon's Sermons, vol. i. p. 213; Blair's Sermons, vol. i. p. 461, &c.

ANNUNCIATION, the tidings brought by the angel Gabriel to the Virgin Mary, of the incarnation of Christ. The angel Gabriel first announced the approach of this event to Zacharias, telling him that his son should be the forerunner and prophet of the Messiah. Six months after, Gabriel was sent to Nazareth, to the Virgin Mary, of the tribe of Judah, and family of David. The angel said to her 'Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women. When Mary saw him, she was troubled at his saying, and considered with herself what this salutation could mean. The angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary; for thou hast found favour with God. And behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest. Mary said to the angel, How shall this be, seeing I know not a man?' The angel answered, The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee: and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also, that holy thing, which shall be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God. And behold, thy cousin Elizabeth, she hath also conceived a son in her old age; and this is the sixth month with her, who was called barren. For with God nothing shall be impossible. And Mary said, Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it unto me according to thy word.' (Luke i. 5. 26, 27, &c.) Then the angel departed, and by the operation of the Holy Ghost, Mary conceived the only Son of the Father, who had been expected four thousand years, and was to be the happiness, the light, the salvation of men. The Church celebrates this festival on the twenty-fifth of March.

As the history of the annunciation, as a part of the miraculous conception, has been lately impugned, it may be necessary to say something in its support. Mahomet, previously to his narrating the history of the annunciation, says, 'Remember what is written.' These words prove, that Mahomet had found it in some ancient writings. He could scarcely have adopted the history, had it not been the general belief prior to his time; as its primary aspect is so favourable to Christianity. It is therefore evident, that it was extant in other authorities, besides our present Gospels. The story has considerable resemblance to that of the annunciation of the birth of Samson, in which the angel was taken for a mere man, a prophet, and was not discovered till after his message had produced its effect. In like manner, an angel announced to Sarah the birth of Isaac, but was not then known to be an angel. It does not appear that Mary knew Gabriel to be an angel, for she did not at first credit what he said; but after he had, as a sign, given her information, that her cousin Elizabeth was pregnant, he departed. Now, if there appears no reason against the predictions of the birth of Samson, of Isaac, and of John the Baptist, why should the prediction of the birth of Jesus, the Messiah, be thought unlikely to employ a heavenly messenger? Gabriel was so human in appearance, that, like his fellows in ancient time, he was not discovered, perhaps not suspected, till after he had delivered his message. It ought also to be observed, that in the cases of the wives of Abraham, of Manoaah, and of Zacharias, they were all married women, and advanced in years; but in the case of Mary, her youth, her consequent inexperience, and the absence of the ordinary intercourse with her husband, rendered it necessary for her to receive some kind of information. Without such notice she could not have accounted for the circumstances that followed. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

ANOINTERS, a religious sect, who were so called from the ceremony they used of anointing all persons before they admitted them into their church. They founded their opinion of anointing, on the following passage of James: 'Let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord.' (James v. 14.)

ANOINTING, signifies to pour on oil. (Dan. x. 3. Gen. xxviii. 18.) It was a ceremony generally used among the Jews, in consecrating or setting apart to an office, and denoted that the person was endued with the gifts and graces of the Spirit. (Exod. xxviii. 41.) It also denoted the spiritual means of saving knowledge. (Rev. iii. 18.) Hence the Holy Ghost is called an unction or anointing. Thus, anointing denoted one particularly designed and chosen by God to be the king, priest, and prophet of his church; namely, Jesus Christ, who was filled with the Holy Ghost in an extraordinary manner, and thereby consecrated to his office of Messiah. (Psalm ii. 2. Acts iv. 27.) 'Touch not mine anointed,' (Psalm cv. 15.) signifies, hurt not the people consecrated to myself by the gifts and graces of my Spirit, and especially those, to whom I familiarly reveal my mind and will, that they may teach others.

The holy anointing oil, made by Moses, (Exod. xxx. 22, 23.) for the consecrating of the high-priest, and of all the sacred vessels used in the house of God, was one of those things, which the second temple wanted. The oil made and consecrated for this purpose, was ordered to be kept by the children of Israel throughout their generations, and was, therefore, preserved in the holy place. Prideaux's Connect. p. i. b. 3.

ANOMŒANS, the name, by which the pure Arians were called in the fourth century, in contradistinction to the Semi-Arians. The word is formed from the Greek ἀνόμοιος, different. For the pure Arians asserted, that the Son was of a nature different from, and in nothing like that of the Father: whereas the Semi-Arians acknowledged a likeness of nature in the Son; at the same time that they denied, with the pure Arians, the consubstantiality of the Word. The Semi-Arians condemned the Anomœans in the council of Seleucia; and the Anomœans, in their turn, condemned the Semi-Arians in the councils of Constantinople and Antioch, erasing the word like, out of the formula of Rimini and Constantinople. *Encyclop. ANT, a well known insect much celebrated for its industry and economy. The ant hath afforded Solomon a symbolical expression, representing a diligent and laborious life. (Prov. vi. 6, 7, 8.) In another passage of the book of Proverbs, the same character of foresight is given to the ant, apparently by a different writer from Solomon, (xxx. 25.) In these places the prudence of this little animal is commended for collecting in summer what is necessary for its subsistence in winter. From these testimonies, and from many others among the ancients, we may conclude, that, in warmer climates, ants do not sleep during winter, but continue more or less in activity, and during this season enjoy the advantages arising from their summer stores. This does not invalidate the remark of our naturalists, that in this colder climate, ants are torpid during winter. We know, that in our hot-houses, they are not torpid. Scripture Illustrated.

ANTEDILUVIANS, a general name for all mankind who lived before the flood, including the whole human race from Adam to Noah and his family. See DELUGE.

ANTHROPOMORPHITES, a sect of ancient heretics, who were so denominated from two Greek words ἄνθρωπος, man, and μορφή, shape. They understood every thing spoken of God in Scripture in a literal sense, and particularly that passage of Genesis, in which it is said, 'God made man after his own image.' Hence they maintained, that God had a human shape. Mosheim, vol. ii. p. 227; Broughton's Hist. Lib. vol. i. p. 55.

ANTIBURGHERS, a numerous body of dissenters from the church of Scotland, who differ from the established church chiefly in matters of church government. They also differ from the Burgher seceders, with whom they were originally united, principally, if not solely, respecting the taking of the burgh oath. On certain occasions, the Antiburgers have betrayed an intolerant spirit towards those who differ from them in opinion. They excommunicated the Burghers in a most solemn manner. The form of excommunication used by this people is as follows: A day is appointed for a fast, and a tent erected in the fields, where several inflammatory sermons are preached to crowds of poor persons, who have left their employments to witness the solemn scene. After the sermon follows a long prayer. Then the preacher, who is to repeat the excommunication, ascends the pulpit, and orders the hundred and ninth psalm to be sung, in which so many dreadful curses are imprecated on the enemies of God. Every passage, in which they find the enemies of God mentioned, they apply to the enemies of the church, under the Gospel, though it relates only to those heathen nations, who fought against the Jews. After the psalm is ended, the minister prays for a blessing on the curse he is about to pronounce. Then all the people standing up, he reads the crime of which the offender is guilty, and says, 'For these, and for all other acts of disobedience to the church, I, being a minister of Jesus Christ, and having power and authority from him, do, in his name, and by his authority, excommunicate and cast out of the true church of God, A. B., and deliver him up to Satan to be tormented in the flesh, that his soul may be saved in the day of the Lord.' He concludes, by praying that God would ratify, seal, and confirm the sentence he has pronounced. See SECEDERS. Hurd on Religious Customs and Ceremonies.

ANTICHRIST, the man of sin, who is to precede the second coming of our Saviour, and who is represented in Scripture as the epitome of every thing impious, cruel, and abominable. St. Paul says, 'That day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God. Remember ye not, that, when I was yet with you, I told you these things? And now ye know what withholdeth, that he might be revealed in his time. For the mystery of iniquity doth already work: only he, who now letteth, will let, until he be taken out of the way. And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming: even him whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie.' (2 Thess. ii. 3, 4, 5, &c.)

This terrible picture of Antichrist appeared to Grotius to pourtray Caius Caligula, the Roman emperor, whom he supposed to be 'the man of sin;' but, according to the best chronologers, this epistle was not written till about twelve years after the death of that emperor, and therefore could not foretell the folly and wickedness of Caligula.

Dr. Hammond supposes Simon Magus and the Gnostics to be here intended; but Simon Magus had already shown himself an enemy to Christianity, and was not therefore yet 'to be revealed.' The interpretation respecting the Gnostics has been sufficiently confuted by Baxter, Whitby, Le Clerc, and others.

Those, who apply this prophecy to the unbelieving Jews before the destruction of Jerusalem; to the unbelieving Jews, who revolted from the Romans, and to the Jewish converts, who apostatized from Christianity; to Mahomet, who lays no claim to miracles; to heathen Rome, which hath been already revealed; or to the Protestants, who are not united under one common visible head on earth; seem to have little or no foundation for their opinion. St. John informs us that in his time were many antichrists, (1 John ii. 18.); but he meant only heretics and persecutors. In the book of Revelation, he describes Antichrist under the name of the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit, killeth the two witnesses, and maketh war with the saints. (Rev. xi. 7, &c.) He afterwards represents him as a beast rising up out of the sea, having seven heads with ten horns, and ten crowns upon his horns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy. The dragon, or the devil, is said to have given him his strength and power. (Ib. xiii. 1, &c.) In another place he speaks of the number of the beast, and says that it is six hundred threescore and six. (Ib. xiii. 18.) Some believe the number 666, to be that of the letters in the name of Antichrist, according to their numerical valuation.

That the Pope of Rome, or Rome Christian, is St. Paul's 'man of sin,' appears pretty evident. Hath not the Church of Rome fallen away from the simplicity of the true Christian faith, and, instead of worshipping God, through Jesus Christ the only Mediator, substituted the doctrine of demons, and invoked the Virgin Mary and their other saints? Is the worship of the Romish Church at this day, a worship in spirit and in truth? When this apostasy should begin, then should appear the 'man of sin;' not one individual, but a regular succession of men, whose uniformity of character should perpetuate to them this title. This apostate power, the adversary, exalteth himself above every one that is called god, above the majesty of Cæsar, the Roman emperor, the highest of earthly gods; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, that is, in the church of Christ, assuming at least the profession of a Christian. When it is announced, that the man, who fills the papal chair, is above all kings and emperors; that he can command the elements by the consecration of images, which are empowered by him to restrain the voice of thunder, or to dim the glare of lightning; and that he is the proprietor and disposer of the kingdoms of the earth, so that foreign princes wait on him as domestic servants, and permit him to tread upon their necks; we acknowledge, in all these circumstances, 'the mouth of a man speaking great things, the look of a man more stout than his fellows.' To prevent the Thessalonians from being deceived in this matter, St. Paul mentions an obstacle to the appearance of this man of sin, which the best interpreters explain by the dominion of the Roman empire; for if he had openly foretold the fall of the imperial sceptre, such a prediction would have subjected him to the charge of high-treason against Rome. The removal of this empire, as the apostle foretold, prepared the way for the promotion of the Roman pontiff, who is here emphatically called 'the man of sin,'—'the wicked or lawless one,'—'the son of perdition.' Have not the Roman pontiffs been literally 'men of sin?' History represents many of them as infamous for their flagitious lives and corrupt morals; whilst, by exerting their pretended privilege of granting pardons and indulgences, they in reality encouraged wickedness in others. Is he not justly styled 'the lawless one,' who claims the power of dispensing with all laws, and acts according to his own will? Is he not called (by an Hebrew idiom signifying one who deserves to perish, a person who justly incurs the punishment of death) the son of perdition, whose destruction is inevitable, who is to die 'without hand,' the object of Divine vengeance? His coming was after the working of Satan, almost invisible and imperceptible, yet powerful and effectual 'among them that were doomed to destruction;' because 'they received not the love of the truth,'—did not love and cherish a sincere regard for the Gospel truth, and 'had pleasure in unrighteousness,' or acquiesced in many measures of injustice, as objects of their choice.

The ostentation of miracles appertains to this man of sin, 'with all power, and signs, and lying wonders.' The Romanists assert, that churches have been carried through the air into distant countries; that images have occasionally nodded, smiled, frowned, or spoken; that pictures of Madonnas have opened and shut their eyes; that crucifixes have moved their eye-lids; that St. Anthony of Padua collected a vast number of fishes, which devoutly listened to the word of God; and that St. Francis preached with great success to birds and beasts. These and similar subjects embellish the history of papal Rome. The legends, in which they are registered, are richly fraught with vain and idle visions; with apparitions of souls from purgatory; pretended ecstasies; and conferences with angels, the Virgin Mary, and Jesus Christ himself!!

The apostle concludes by remarking, that God, for wise and gracious purposes, would permit this strong delusion to operate on the minds of those, who have rejected the truth, so that they should believe a lie, or the lie. Dr. Macknight thinks, that the lie here intended by the Spirit of God, is the monstrous lie of transubstantiation, or the conversion of the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, into the real and identical body and blood of Christ, through the will of the priest accompanying the pronouncement of the words of the institution, though no change whatever is produced in the accidents or sensible qualities of these substances. The final destruction of this anti-christian power is described in strong language: 'Whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming.' This signifies, that the Lord shall consume him by the power of his evangelical word, and, by the brightness of his Divine appearance, the clear and glorious manifestation of the sacred truths of his religion, reduce him to a state of weakness, so that his interest, his influence, and his impostures, shall be totally annihilated.

This gradual decline is happily expressed by a Greek word, which denotes a lingering consumption, similar to the waste of time, the dissipation of an estate, and the slow death of being eaten up by worms.

The beast described in the Revelations as rising out of the sea, denotes a tyrannical and usurping power arising in times of great trouble and distress. Such was the papal government, which arose immediately on the dissolution of the Roman empire into several lesser kingdoms, and consequently in a season of great tumult and confusion. This beast is said to have 'seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy.' The seven heads are the seven mountains, upon which Rome was built, or the seven forms of government, to which at different times it was subject;—namely, kings, consuls, dictators, decemvirs, military tribunes, emperors, and popes. The ten horns are the ten kingdoms, into which the Roman empire was dismembered. The name of blasphemy affixed to the heads of the beast, implies the exercise of its authority, establishing the blasphemy of idolatry in all the places of its jurisdiction. All these symbols designate papal Rome, the empire of which was to appear at a future time. The dragon is said to give the beast his power, his seat, and great authority. Satan, the inveterate enemy of mankind, represented under the figure of a serpent or dragon, promoted the interest of this new power, gave him his imperial throne, and invested him with his own great authority. We may presume that the dragon seemed to the prophet, by some solemn act of investiture, to delegate to the beast his dominion and power. The coming of the wicked one was to be after the working of Satan with all power, and signs, and lying wonders. The devil exercised his idolatrous tyranny over pagan Rome, and resigned his authority and jurisdiction to the power that presides over Rome Christian.

In the book of Daniel it is foretold, that this power should exercise dominion until a time and times and the dividing of time. (Dan. vii. 25.) This expression is generally admitted to denote 1260 years. The papal power was completely established in the year 755, when it obtained the exarchate of Ravenna. Some, however, date the rise of Antichrist in the year of Christ 606; and Mede places it in 456. If the rise of Antichrist be not reckoned till he was possessed of secular authority, his fall will happen when this power shall be taken away. If his rise began, according to Mede in 456, he must have fallen in 1716; if in 606, it must be in 1866; if in 755, in 2015. If, however, we use prophetic years, consisting of 360 days, and date the rise of Antichrist in the year 755, his fall will happen in the year of Christ 2000, and of the world about 6000; a period which remarkably coincides with a tradition among the Jews, that the Messiah shall then come, and the reign of the saints on earth commence. The power of the Pope has been greatly shaken: his dominion is, in a great measure, taken from him; and every thing seems gradually proceeding towards a termination of his authority. It seems, indeed, extremely probable, that, at or before the completion of the year of Christ 2000, Antichrist shall be finally destroyed. Dr. Zouch's Attempt to illustrate some of the Prophecies of the Old and New Testament; Benson's Essay on the Man of Sin; Bishop Newton on the Prophecies.

ANTIDORON, a name given by the Greeks to the consecrated bread, out of which the middle part marked with the cross, in which the consecration resides, being taken away by the priest, the remainder is distributed after mass to the poor. The word is formed from δωρον, 'a gift,' as being given in charity. Some suppose that the antidoron is distributed instead of the sacrament, to such as are prevented from attending at the celebration.

ANTINOMIANS. The Antinomians derive their name from αντι, against, and νόμος, a law; their favourite tenet being that the law is not a rule of life to believers under the Gospel; but it is not easy to determine what is meant by this position, and, indeed their very name is ambiguous. They are also sometimes called Solifidians, from solus, alone, and fides, faith, because they seem to carry the doctrine of faith without works so far as to separate practical holiness from Christian faith, and to injure, if not wholly destroy, every obligation to moral obedience.

The Antinomian or Solifidian heresy, which asserts that faith in Christ is the only thing required in man's salvation, and which originated from a perversion and misunderstanding of some passages in St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, was one of the first that disturbed the Christian church; and hence St. Austin says, that not only the Epistle of St. James, but also those of St. Peter, St. John, and St. Jude, were written to guard the faithful against its pernicious influences. Since the apostolic age, so many have been the heresies, in the composition of which this opinion has been a principal ingredient, that there has never perhaps been a time, in which the state of the Christian church has not required its ministers to urge the doctrine of St. James, that faith without works is dead, or to warn the people against turning the grace of God into lasciviousness.

Modern Antinomianism may be traced to the period of the Reformation. Its founder was John Agricola, who was a native of Aiseleben, a contemporary, and originally a disciple of Luther, and who, being of a restless temper, wrote against Melancthon, and, about the year 1535, first taught Antinomianism at Wittemberg.

The supporters of the popish doctrines deduced a considerable portion of the arguments, on which they rested their defence, from the doctrines of the old law. The too zealous reformer was encouraged by the success of his master to attack the very foundation of their arguments, and to deny that any part of the Old Testament was intended as a rule of faith, or of practice, to the disciples of Christ. Thus he not only rejected the moral authority of the ten commandments; but he and his followers understood some expressions in the writings of the apostles in too literal a sense, and produced a system, which appears in many respects scarcely consistent with the moral attributes of the Deity.

The principal doctrines, which at present are termed antinomian, are said to be as follows: 1. The law ought not to be proposed to the people as a rule of manners, nor used in the church as a means of instruction; and the Gospel alone ought to be inculcated and explained, both in the churches and in the schools of learning. 2. The justification of sinners is an immanent and eternal act of God, not only preceding all acts of sin, but the existence of the sinner himself. Some, however, suppose that the elect were justified at the time of Christ's death. 3. Justification by faith is only a manifestation to us of what was done before we existed. 4. Men ought not to doubt of their faith, nor question whether they believe in Christ. 5. God sees no sin in believers, and they are not bound to confess sin, mourn for it, or pray that it may be forgiven. 6. God is not angry with the elect, nor does he punish them for their sins. 7. By God's laying our iniquities upon Christ, he became as completely sinful as we, and we as completely righteous as Christ. 8. Believers need not fear either their own sins or the sins of others, since neither can injure them. 9. The new covenant is not properly made with us, but with Christ; and this covenant is all of it a promise, and has no conditions for us to perform: for faith, repentance, and obedience, are not conditions on our part, but Christ's; and for us he repented, believed, and obeyed.

It does not appear that there were any Antinomians in England till after the reformation, and few of them till the time of the civil wars. They were opposed by the Scotch Presbyterians, and by Rutherford in particular. Rutherford was learnedly answered by several clergymen, among whom were Dr. Crisp, and Mr. Saltmarsh, of Magdalen College. In the sermons published by Dr. Crisp's executors, it is asserted that Christ was even sin itself. It is true the apostle observes, He hath made him to be sin for us; but in another place he explains this by saying, 'He suffered the just for the unjust.' Had Christ been sin itself, how could he have atoned for sin? The words mean only a vicarious sacrifice, by which Christ was substituted in the room of sinners.

From the time of the civil wars till the rise of Methodism, the Antinomians were not much heard of in England. At that time they believed that the whole work of man's salvation was accomplished by Jesus Christ upon the cross; that faith alone is required in order to justification and salvation; that there is only one duty, which is that of believing; that we are justified by submitting our judgments to the truth of God's grace in Christ Jesus; that God forbids us to work for justification, and when the apostle Paul pressed men to believe, it was as much as if he had bid them not to work; that the moral law is nothing to man, and that he is not bound to obey it; that a spiritual man beholdeth justifying grace in believing, without his obedience to commands for external worship and good works; that outward things avail nothing to salvation: that if love to God, and love to our neighbour, and relieving the poor, be altogether unprofitable either to justification or salvation, then these outward works, in submitting to outward ordinances, viz. the ordinances of Christ, are much less available; that a believer has no inherent righteousness, and that our righteousness is only the imputation of Christ's righteousness; that the trials of the spirit, commonly called sanctification, such as love, gentleness, long-suffering, goodness, meekness, temperance, do not render us holy before God, or in our own consciences, that is, we are not made good or holy by any inward qualities or dispositions, but being made pure and holy in our consciences by believing in Christ, we bear forth inwardly and outwardly the fruits of holiness; that entire justification, and entire sanctification, are in the same instant, and, therefore, neither of them is capable of increase or decrease; that the very moment a believer is justified, he is wholly sanctified, and is neither more nor less holy from that hour to the day of his death; and that a new born babe is as pure in heart as a father in Christ.

It would seem at present, that the Antinomians are decreasing. God has implanted something in human nature, which teaches even the Heathens to shudder at the thoughts of a religion, which does not inculcate morality. Christ taught his followers to do good, and pointed out to them the necessity of holiness; and all the apostolical epistles abound with injunctions of a similar nature. Religion has been defined by a learned divine to be a dedication of the whole man to the will of God. The sanctions of all religions are obligations to duty; and duty implies three things, namely, our duty to God, our neighbour, and ourselves. Our duty to God implies our attendance on such divine ordinances as are prescribed in his word, and to keep ourselves pure from all manner of pollution; and our duty to our neighbour requires us to render him all the good we can, consistently with our consciences. These things, however, are despised by the Antinomians, who teach that men may sin as much as they please; because, though God may hate sin, yet he takes pleasure in forgiving it.

It appears, that whilst the Unitarians place the whole of religion in morality, to the disregard of Christian faith, the Antinomians rely so much on faith as to undervalue morality. At least, their doctrines have had that appearance; and it has been said, that their teachers have been thought to discharge the whole of their duty, if they inculcated the necessity of faith, and displayed the benefits of the new covenant.

Both the Mystics and the Antinomians conceive themselves free from sin. The Mystics become free from sin by the intimate union of their souls with God and Jesus Christ; and the Antinomians, by having all their sins laid on Jesus Christ. The Mystic does not purposely do any thing, which we should call wrong;—the Antinomian performs things, which are wrong in themselves, but which, as they are done by him, who is a true Christian, are right; insomuch that if he should steal, the act of theft would in him lose its criminal nature.

It does not appear that any set of Christians ever called themselves Antinomians, which is a term of opprobrium or reproach. Some of the chief of those, who have been charged with favouring Antinomianism, since the time of Agricola, or whose works at least have had that tendency, are Dr. Crisp, Messrs. Richardson, Saltmarsh, Hussey, Eaton, Town, Huntington, &c.

It is, indeed, more than probable, that some, who have been charged with Antinomian principles, should not be ranked among the Antinomians. When, however, they have asserted justification to be eternal, without distinguishing between the secret determination of God in eternity, and the execution of it in time; when they have spoken lightly of good works, or asserted that believers have nothing to do with the law of God, without fully explaining what they mean; when they assert that God is not angry with his people for their sins, nor in any sense punishes them for them, without distinguishing between fatherly corrections, and vindictive punishment; these expressions, whatever be the private sentiments of those, who advance them, have a tendency to injure the minds, if not the morals, of others.

There was a time when faith and a good life were synonymous terms, or when no one was accounted a believer, who was not a practical Christian; and though the opinions of men may change, and heresies be found to make their periodical revolutions in the 'Church,' like comets in the heavens, 'nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure;'—with the faith of the Gospel, as with the Father of lights, there is no 'variableness, neither shadow of turning,' and that only is true and saving faith, 'which makes us to love God, to do his will, to suffer his impositions, to trust his promises, to see through a cloud, to overcome the world, to resist the devil, to stand in the day of trial, and to be comforted in all our sorrows.' This is that precious faith so mainly necessary to be insisted on, that by it we may be sons of the free woman.—There are but three things that make the integrity of Christian faith; believing the word of God, confiding in his goodness, and keeping his commandments.' Bishop Taylor's Sermons, fol. p. 43; Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. ii. pp. 261, 262, &c.; Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. ii. p. 442; Hurd's Religious Customs and Ceremonies, p. 778, &c.

ANTIOCH. According to Dr. Wells, there were no fewer than sixteen cities of this name in Syria and other countries. However, the Scripture mentions only that Antioch, which was the capital of Syria, and another Antioch in Pisidia. Antioch of Syria, if we may believe St. Jerom, was formerly called Riblath or Riblatha. Antioch is mentioned only in the books of the Maccabees, and in the New Testament; but Riblath, or Riblath, is found in the book of Numbers, (xxxiv. 11.); in the books of Kings, (2 Kings xxiii. 33.; xxv. 6, 20, 21.) and in Jeremiah, (xxxix. 5.; lii. 9, 10, 26, 27.) Theodoret says, that in his time was a city called Riblah, near Emesa, in Syria; this is very contrary to St. Jerom's opinion. However this may be, it is certain that Antioch was not known under this name, till after the reign of Seleucus Nicanor, who built it, and called it Antioch, in memory of his father Antiochus, before Jesus Christ 301. The kings of Syria, successors to Alexander the Great, generally resided at Antioch. Here the disciples of Jesus Christ were first called Christians. (Acts xi. 26.)

This city was by some called Antiochia Epidaphne, from its neighbourhood to Daphne, a village so denominated from its containing a temple of Daphne. In the flourishing times of the Roman empire, Antioch was the ordinary residence of the prefect or governor of the eastern provinces, and was also honoured with the residence of several of the Roman emperors, especially of Verus and Valens, who spent here the greatest part of their time. This city was situated on both sides of the river Orontes, about twelve miles distant from the Mediterranean Sea. It was almost square; and part of it on the north side stood upon a high mountain. It was admirably fortified by nature and art: and it was adorned in former times with galleries and fine fountains, sumptuous palaces, and magnificent temples. Ammianus Marcellinus says, that it was celebrated throughout the world, and that no city exceeded it either in fertility of soil, or richness of trade. The emperors Vespasian, Titus, and others, granted to it important privileges; but it has been exposed to very great revolutions. It was almost demolished by earthquakes in the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries. In 548, it was taken and burnt by the Persians, and the inhabitants were massacred; four years after, Justinian rebuilt it in a more beautiful and regular manner than before. However, the Persians took it a second time in 574, and destroyed its walls. In 588, it suffered by another dreadful earthquake, in which 60,000 persons perished. It was again rebuilt, and again exposed to calamities. In 637, it was taken by the Saracens. In 966, Nicephorus Phocas, retook it from the Saracens. The Saracens afterwards again subdued it, and rendered it almost impregnable. However the Christians, in the crusade, captured this place in 1098: but it was afterwards retaken and demolished by the Saracens, in 1268. It has ever since lost its reputation and magnificence, and has groaned under the dominion of the Turks. The present state of Antioch is thus described: "This city, anciently renowned for the luxury of its inhabitants, is now no more than a ruinous town, whose houses, built with mud and straw, and narrow and miry streets, exhibit every appearance of misery and wretchedness."

Antioch abounded with great men, and the church in this city was long governed by illustrious prelates. It was the birth-place of St. Luke the Evangelist, and of Theophilus, hence surnamed Antiochenus, and had St. Ignatius the martyr for its bishop. It, however, suffered much on several occasions, being sometimes exposed to the violence of heretics, and at other times rent by deplorable schisms. Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 239; Volney's Travels.

ANTIOCH of Pisidia, a city whither Paul and Barnabas came from Perga. It was also one of the cities built by Seleucus in honour of his father Antiochus. Here was a synagogue of the Jews, in which St. Paul preached an excellent sermon; but the Jews, who were angry to see that some of the Gentiles received the Gospel, raised a sedition against Paul and Barnabas, and compelled them to leave the city. (Acts xiii. 14, 16, &c.)

ANTI'OUCHUS, 'Αντίοχος, one who is equal in speed with a chariot.

ANTIOCHUS SOTER, was the son of Seleucus Nicanor, and obtained the surname of Soter, or Saviour, from having hindered the invasion of Asia by the Gauls. Some think that it was on the following occasion; the Galatians having marched to attack the Jews in Babylon, whose army consisted only of eight thousand men, reinforced with four thousand Macedonians, the Jews defended themselves with so much bravery, that they killed one hundred and twenty thousand men. (2 Maccab. viii. 20.) It was perhaps, too, on this occasion, that Antiochus Soter made the Jews of Asia free of the cities belonging to the Gentiles, and permitted them to live according to their own laws. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 3.

ANTIOCHUS THEOS, or the Divine, was the son and successor of Antiochus Soter. He married Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt. Laodice, his first wife, seeing herself despised, poisoned Antiochus, Berenice, and their son, who was intended to succeed in the kingdom. After this, Laodice procured Seleucus Callinicus, her son by Antiochus, to be acknowledged king of Syria. These events were foretold by Daniel: "And in the end of years, the king of Egypt, or of the South, and the king of Syria, or of the North, shall join themselves together; for the king's daughter of the South shall come to the king of the North to make an agreement: but she shall not retain the power of the arm, neither shall he stand, nor his arm; but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that begat her, and he that strengthened her in these times. (Dan. xi. 6.)

ANTIOCHUS THE GREAT, was the son of Seleucus Callinicus, and brother to Seleucus Ceraunus, whom he succeeded, in the year of the world 3781, and before Jesus Christ 223. He made war against Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt, but was defeated near Raphia. (3 Maccab. i.) Thirteen years after, Ptolemy Philopator being dead, Antiochus resolved to become master of Egypt. He immediately seized Cœle-Syria, Phenicia, and Judæa; but Scopas, general of the Egyptian army, entered Judæa while Antiochus was occupied by the war against Attalus, and retook those places. However, he soon lost them again to Antiochus.

On this occasion happened what Josephus relates of this prince's journey to Jerusalem. After a victory, which he had obtained over Scopas, near the springs of Jordan, he became master of the strong places in Cœle-Syria and Samaria; and the Jews submitted freely to him, received him into their city, and furnished his army plentifully with provisions. In reward for their affections, Antiochus granted them, according to Josephus, 20,000 pieces of silver, to purchase beasts for sacrifice, 1460 measures of meal, and 375 measures of salt, to be offered with the sacrifices; and timber to rebuild the porches of the Lord's house. He exempted the senators, scribes, and singing men of the temple, from the capitation-tax; and he permitted the Jews to live according to their own laws, in every part of his dominions. He also remitted the third part of their tribute, to indemnify them for their losses in the war; he forbade the heathens to enter the temple without being purified, and to bring into the city the flesh of mules, asses, and horses to sell, under a severe penalty.

In the year of the world 3815, Antiochus was overcome by the Romans, and obliged to cede all his possessions beyond Mount Taurus, to give twenty hostages, among whom was his own son Antiochus, afterwards surnamed Epiphanes, and to pay a tribute of twelve thousand Eubœic talents, each fourteen Roman pounds in weight. To defray these charges, he resolved to seize the treasures of the temple of Belus, at Elymais; but the people of that country, informed of his design, surprised and destroyed him, with all his army, in the year of the world 3817, and before Jesus Christ 187. He left two sons, Seleucus Philopator, and Antiochus Epiphanes, who succeeded him. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 3.; Polyb. lib. iii. xvi.; Tit. Liv. lib. xxxiii.

ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES, the son of Antiochus the Great, having continued an hostage at Rome fourteen years, his brother

Seleucus resolved to procure his return to Syria, and sent his own son Demetrius to Rome, in the place of Antiochus. Whilst Antiochus was on his journey to Syria, Seleucus died, in the year of the world 3829. When, therefore, Antiochus landed, the people received him as some propitious deity come to assume the government, and to oppose the enterprises of Ptolemy king of Egypt, who threatened to invade Syria. For this reason, Antiochus obtained the surname of Epiphanes, the Illustrious, or of one appearing like a god.

Antiochus quickly turned his attention to the possession of Egypt, which was then enjoyed by Ptolemy Philometor, his nephew, son to his sister Cleopatra, whom Antiochus the Great had married to Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt. He sent Apollonius, one of his officers, into Egypt, apparently to honour Ptolemy's coronation, but in reality to obtain intelligence whether the great men of the kingdom were inclined to place the government of Egypt in his hands, during the minority of the king his nephew. (2 Maccab. iv. 21, &c.) Apollonius, however, found them not disposed to favour his master; and this obliged Antiochus to make war against Philometor. He came to Jerusalem in 3831, and was received there by Jason, to whom he had sold the high-priesthood. He designed to attack Egypt, but returned without effecting any thing.

The ambition of those Jews, who sought the high-priesthood, and bought it of Antiochus, was the beginning of those calamities, which overwhelmed their nation under this prince. Jason procured himself to be constituted in this dignity in the stead of Onias III.; but Menelaus offering a greater price, Jason was deprived, and Menelaus appointed in his place. These usurpers of the high-priesthood, to gratify the Syrians, assumed the manners of the Greeks, their games, and exercises, and neglected the worship of the Lord, and the temple-service.

War soon broke out between Antiochus Epiphanes and Ptolemy Philometor. Antiochus entered Egypt in the year of the world 3833, and reduced almost the whole of it to his obedience. (2 Maccab. v. 3, 4, 5.) The next year he returned, and whilst he was engaged in the siege of Alexandria, a false report was spread of his death. The inhabitants of Jerusalem testifying their joy at this news, Antiochus, when returning from Egypt, entered this city by force, treated the Jews as rebels, and commanded his troops to slay all they met. Eighty thousand were killed, made captives, or sold on this occasion. Antiochus, conducted by the corrupt high-priest Menelaus, entered into the holy of holies, whence he took, and carried off, the most precious vessels of that holy place, to the value of 1800 talents.

In the year 3835, Antiochus made a third expedition against Egypt, which he entirely subdued. The year following, he sent Apollonius into Judæa, with an army of 22,000 men, and commanded him to kill all the Jews who were of full age, and to sell the women and young men. (2 Macc. v. 24, 25.) These orders were too punctually executed. It was on this occasion, that Judas Maccabæus retired into the wilderness, with his father and brethren. (2 Macc. v. 29.) These misfortunes were only preludes of what they were to suffer. Antiochus apprehended, that the Jews would never be constant in their obedience to him, unless he obliged them to change their religion, and to embrace that of the Greeks. He, therefore, issued an edict, enjoining them to conform to the laws of other nations, and forbidding their usual sacrifices in the temple, their festivals, and their sabbath. The statue of Jupiter Olympus was placed upon the altar of the temple; and the abomination of desolation was seen in the temple of God. Many corrupt Jews complied with these orders, but others opposed them. Mattathias and his sons retired to the mountains. Old Eleazar, and the seven brethren, with their mother, suffered death with great courage at Antioch. (2 Macc. vii.)

Mattathias being dead, Judas Maccabæus headed those Jews, who continued faithful, and opposed with success the generals, whom king Antiochus sent into Judæa. The king, informed of the valour and resistance of Judas, sent new forces; and finding his treasures exhausted, he resolved to go into Persia, to levy tributes, and to collect large sums which he had agreed to pay to the Romans. (1 Macc. iii. 5—31; 2 Macc. ix. 1, &c.; 1 Macc. vi. 1, &c.) Knowing that very great riches were lodged in the temple of Elymais, he determined to carry them off; but the inhabitants of the country made so vigorous a resistance, that he was forced to retreat towards Babylonia. When he was come to Ecbatane, he was informed of the defeat of Nicanor and Timotheus, and that Judas Maccabæus had retaken the temple of Jerusalem, and restored the worship of the Lord, and the usual sacrifices.

On receiving this intelligence, the king was transported with indignation, and threatening to make Jerusalem a grave for the Jews, commanded the driver of his chariot to urge the horses forward, and to hasten his journey. However, Divine vengeance soon overtook him; he fell from his chariot, and bruised all his limbs. He was also tormented with such pains in his bowels, as allowed him no rest; and his disease was accompanied by grief and vexation. In this condition he wrote to the Jews very submissively, promised them many things, and engaged even to turn Jew, if God would restore him to health. He earnestly recommended to them his son Antiochus, who was to succeed him, and entreated them to favour the young prince, and to continue faithful to him. He died, overwhelmed with pain and grief, in the mountains of Paratacene, in the little town of Tabes, in the year of the world 3840, and before Jesus Christ 164.

ANTIOCHUS EUPATOR, son of Antiochus Epiphanes, was only nine years old when his father died, and left him the kingdom of Syria. Lysias, who governed the kingdom in the name of the young prince, led against Judæa an army of one hundred thousand foot, twenty thousand horse, and thirty elephants. (1 Macc. vi.; 2 Macc. xiii.) He besieged and took the fortress of Bethsura, and thence marched against Jerusalem. The city was ready to fall into his hands, when Lysias received the news that Philip, whom Antiochus Epiphanes had entrusted with the regency of the kingdom, had come to Antioch, to take the government, according to the disposition of the late king. He therefore proposed an accommodation with the Jews, that he might return speedily to Antioch, and oppose Philip. After concluding a peace, he immediately returned into Syria, with the young king and his army.

In the meantime, Demetrius Soter, son of Seleucus Philopator, and nephew to Antiochus Epiphanes, to whom by right the kingdom belonged, having escaped from Rome, came into Syria. Finding the people disposed for revolt, Demetrius headed an army, and marched directly to Antioch, against Antiochus and Lysias. However, the inhabitants did not wait till he besieged the city, but opened the gates, and delivered to him Lysias and the young king Antiochus Eupator, whom Demetrius caused to be put to death, without suffering them to appear in his presence. Antiochus Eupator reigned only two years, and died in the year of the world 3842, and before Jesus Christ 162.

ANTIOCHUS THEOS, or the Divine, the son of Alexander Balas, king of Syria, was brought up by the Arabian prince Elmachuel, or, as he is called in the Greek, Simalcue. (1 Macc. xi. 39, 40, &c.) Demetrius Nicanor, king of Syria, having rendered himself odious to his troops, one Diodotus, otherwise called Tryphon, came to Zabdiel, a king in Arabia, and desired him to entrust him with young Antiochus, whom he promised to place on the throne of Syria, which was then possessed by Demetrius Nicanor. After some hesitation, Zabdiel complied with the request; and Tryphon carried Antiochus into Syria, and put the crown on his head. The troops dismissed by Demetrius, came and joined Tryphon, who, having formed a powerful army, defeated Demetrius, and forced him to retreat to Seleucia. Tryphon seized his elephants, and rendered himself master of Antioch, in the year of the world 3859, and before Jesus Christ 145.

Antiochus Theos, to strengthen himself in his new acquisition, sent letters to Jonathan Maccabæus, high-priest and prince of the Jews, confirming him in the high-priesthood, and granting him four toparchies, or four considerable places in Judæa. He also received Jonathan into the number of his friends, sent him vessels of gold, permitted him to use a gold cup, to wear purple, and a golden buckle; and he gave his brother, Simon Maccabæus, the command of all his troops on the coast of the Mediterranean, from Tyre to Egypt. Jonathan, engaged by so many favours, declared resolutely for Antiochus, or rather for Tryphon, who reigned under the name of this young prince; and on several occasions, he attacked the generals of Demetrius, who still possessed many places beyond Jordan, and in Galilee. (1 Macc. xi. 63, &c.; xii. 24. 34.)

Tryphon seeing young Antiochus in peaceable possession of the kingdom of Syria, resolved to usurp his crown. He thought it necessary, in the first place, to secure Jonathan Maccabæus, who was one of the most powerful supporters of Antiochus's throne. He came, therefore, with troops into Judæa, invited Jonathan to Ptolemais, and there, on frivolous pretences, made him prisoner. However, Simon, Jonathan's brother, headed the troops of Judæa, and opposed Tryphon, who intended to take Jerusalem. Tryphon, being disappointed, put Jonathan to death at Bassa or Basama, and returned into Syria where, without delay, he executed his design of killing Antiochus. He corrupted the royal physicians, who, having published that Antiochus was tormented with the stone, murdered him, by cutting him without any necessity. Thus Tryphon was left master of Syria, in the year of the world 3861, and before Jesus Christ 143.

ANTIOCHUS SIDETES, or Soter the Saviour, or Eusebes the Pious, was the son of Demetrius Soter, and brother to Demetrius Nicanor. Tryphon, the usurper of the kingdom of Syria, having rendered himself odious to his troops, they deserted him, and offered their services to Cleopatra, the wife of Demetrius Nicanor. She lived in the city of Seleucia, shut up with her children, while her husband Demetrius was a prisoner in Persia, where he had married Rodoguna, the daughter of Arsaces, king of Persia. Cleopatra, therefore, sent to Antiochus Sidetes, her brother-in-law, and offered him the crown of Syria, if he would marry her; to which Antiochus consented. This prince was then at Cnidus, where his father, Demetrius Soter, had placed him with one of his friends. He came into Syria, and wrote to Simon Maccabæus, to engage him against Tryphon. (1 Macc. xv. 1, 2, 3, &c.) He confirmed the privileges, which the kings of Syria had granted to Simon, permitted him to coin money with his own stamp, declared Jerusalem and the temple exempt from royal jurisdiction, and promised other favours as soon as he should obtain peaceable possession of the kingdom, which had belonged to his ancestors. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. xii.

Antiochus Sidetes having married his sister-in-law, Cleopatra, in the year of the world 3865, the troops of Tryphon resorted to him in crowds. Tryphon, thus abandoned, retired to Dora, in Phœnicia, whither Antiochus pursued him with an army of 120,000 foot, 8000 horse, and a powerful fleet. Simon Maccabæus sent Antiochus two thousand chosen men, but the latter refused them, and revoked all his promises. He also sent Athenobius to Jerusalem, to oblige Simon to restore to him Gazara and Joppa, with the citadel of Jerusalem; and to demand of him five hundred talents more, as reparation for injuries the king had suffered, and as tribute for his own cities. At the same time he threatened to make war upon him if he did not comply. Simon showed Athenobius all the lustre of his wealth and power, told him he had in his possession no place, which belonged to Antiochus, and said that although the cities of Gazara and Joppa had greatly injured his people, yet he would give the king for the property of them one hundred talents.

Athenobius returned with great indignation to Antiochus, who was extremely offended at Simon's answer. In the mean time, Tryphon having escaped privately from Dora, embarked in a vessel and fled. Antiochus pursued him, and sent Cendebeus with troops into the maritime parts of Palestine, and commanded him to rebuild Cedron, and fight the Jews. John Hyrcanus, son of Simon Maccabæus, was then at Gaza, and gave notice to his father of the coming of Cendebeus. Simon furnished his sons, John Hyrcanus, and Judas, with troops, and sent them against Cendebeus, whom they routed in the plain, and pursued to Azotus.

Antiochus followed Tryphon till he forced him to kill himself, in the year of the world 3869. After this, Antiochus thought only of reducing to his obedience, those cities, which, in the beginning of his father's reign, had shaken off their subjection. Simon Maccabæus, prince and high-priest of the Jews, being treacherously murdered by Ptolemy, his son-in-law, in the castle of Docus, near Jericho, the murderer immediately sent to Antiochus Sidetes to demand troops, that he might recover for him the country and cities of the Jews. Antiochus came in person with an army, and besieged Jerusalem, which was bravely defended by John Hyrcanus. The siege was long protracted; and the king divided his army into seven parts, and guarded all the avenues of the city. It being the time for celebrating the Feast of Tabernacles, the Jews desired of Antiochus a truce for seven days. The king not only granted this request, but sent them bulls with gilded horns, and vessels of gold and silver filled with incense, to be offered in the temple. He also ordered such provisions as they wanted, to be given to the Jewish soldiers. This courtesy of the king so won the hearts of the Jews, that they sent ambassadors to treat of peace, and to desire that they might live according to their own laws. Antiochus required that they should surrender their arms, demolish the city walls, pay tribute for Joppa and the other cities they possessed out of Judæa, and receive a garrison into Jerusalem. To these conditions, except the last, the Jews consented; for they could not be induced to see an army of strangers in their capital, and chose rather to give hostages and five hundred talents of silver. The king entered the city, beat down the breast-work above the walls, and returned to Syria, in the year of the world 3870, and before Jesus Christ 134.

Three years after, Antiochus marched against the Persians, or Parthians, and demanded the liberty of his brother Demetrius Nicanor, who had been made prisoner long before by Arsaces, and was detained for the purpose of being employed in exciting a war against Antiochus. This war, therefore, Antiochus thought proper to prevent. With an army of eighty thousand, or, as Orosius says, of one hundred thousand men, he marched towards Persia, and no sooner appeared on the frontiers of that country, than several eastern princes, detesting the pride and avarice of the Persians, came and surrendered. Antiochus defeated his enemies in three engagements, and took Babylon. He was accompanied in these expeditions by John Hyrcanus, high-priest of the Jews, who, it is supposed, obtained the surname of Hyrcanus, from some gallant action, which he performed.

As the army of Antiochus was too numerous to continue assembled in any one place, he was obliged to divide it, to put it into winter quarters. These troops behaved with so much insolence, that they alienated the minds of all men. The cities, in which they were, privately surrendered to the Persians; and all resolved to attack, in one day, the garrisons they contained, that the troops being separated might not assist each other. Antiochus at Babylon, obtained intelligence of this design, and with the few soldiers about him, endeavoured to succour his people. He was attacked in the way by Phraates, king of Persia, whom he fought with great bravery; but being at length deserted by his own forces, according to the generality of historians, he was overpowered and killed by the Persians or Parthians. Appian, however, says, that he killed himself, and Eliau, that he threw himself headlong from a precipice. The event took place in the year of the world 3874, and before Jesus Christ 130. After the death of Sidetes, Demetrius Nicanor, or Nicetor, re-ascended the throne of Syria. Justin. lib. xxxviii. xxxix.; Joseph. lib. xiii. cap. 16; Euseb. in Chronic. Oros. lib. v. cap. 10; Eliau. de Animal. lib. x. cap. 34.

After the princes already mentioned, two brothers, of the name of Antiochus, ascended the throne of Syria. One of them was Antiochus Gryphus, or Philometor, the son of Demetrius Nicanor and Cleopatra; the other, Antiochus of Cyzicus, the son of Cleopatra and Antiochus Sidetes. But as these princes are not mentioned in the Scriptures or apocryphal writings, to give any account of them would be foreign to our plan.

ANTIPÆDOBAPTISTS, a distinguishing denomination given to those, who object to the baptism of infants. The word is derived from ἀντι, 'against,' παῖς, παιδὺς, 'a child,' and βαπτίζω, 'I baptize.'

ANTIPAS "Ἀντίπας, signifies for all, and against all. Antipas-Herod, or Herod-Antipas, was the son of Herod the Great, and Cleopatra of Jerusalem. Herod the Great, in his first will, declared him his successor in the kingdom; but he afterwards named his son Archelaus king of Judæa, and gave to Antipas only the title of tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa. Archelaus going to Rome, to persuade the emperor to confirm his father's will, Antipas also went thither. The emperor bestowed on Archelaus one moiety of what had been assigned him by Herod, with the quality of ethnarch, and promised to grant him the title of king, when he had shown himself deserving of it by his virtues. To Antipas Augustus gave Galilee and Peræa; and to Philip, Herod's other son, Batanæa, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, with some other places. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 13.

Antipas returning to Judæa, took great pains in adorning and fortifying the principal places of his dominion. He married the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia, whom he divorced about the year of our Lord 33, that he might marry his sister-in-law Herodias, the wife of his brother Philip, who was still living. John the Baptist, exclaiming against this incest, was seized by order of Antipas, and imprisoned in the castle of Machærus. Josephus says, that Antipas caused John to be taken, because he drew too great a concourse after him; and Antipas was afraid he should use his influence over the people to induce them to revolt. But Josephus has reported the pretence for the true cause. The evangelists, who were better informed than Josephus, as being eye-witnesses of what passed, and particularly acquainted with John and his disciples, assure us, that the true reason of imprisoning John, was the aversion of Herod and Herodias against him, on account of his liberty in censuring their scandalous marriage, (Matt. xiv. 3, 4; Mark vi. 14, 17, 18; Luke iii. 19, 20.) Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2.

Even Herod feared and respected the virtue and holiness of John. He also did many things from regard to the Baptist; but the passion of Herod for Herodias had certainly much sooner prevailed against his life, had he not been restrained by his fear of the people, who universally esteemed John as a prophet. When the king was celebrating his birth-day, with the principal persons of his court, the daughter of Herodias danced before them, and pleased him so well, that he swore to give her whatever she should ask. She consulted her mother, who advised her to ask the head of John the Baptist. Returning, therefore, to the hall, she addressed herself to the king, and said, 'Give me here John Baptist's head in a charger.' The king was afflicted at this request; but in consideration of his oath, and of the persons at table with him, he sent one of his guards, who beheaded John in prison. The head was brought in a large basin, and given to the young woman, who delivered it to her mother. (Matt. xiv. 5, 6, &c.)

Aretas, king of Arabia, to revenge the affront, which Herod had offered to his daughter, declared war against him, and vanquished him in a very obstinate contest. Josephus tells us, that the Jews attributed the defeat of Antipas to the death of John the Baptist. In the year of the Christian æra 39, Herodias being jealous of the prosperity of her brother Agrippa, who from a private person had become king of Judæa, persuaded her husband Herod-Antipas to visit Rome, and desire the same dignity of the emperor Caius. She resolved to accompany him, and hoped that her presents and appearance would contribute to procure the emperor's favour. However, Agrippa obtaining intelligence of this design, wrote to the emperor, and accused Antipas. The messenger of Agrippa arrived at Baïæ, where the emperor was, at the very time when Herod received his first audience. Caius, on the delivery of Agrippa's letters, read them with great earnestness. In these letters, Agrippa accused Antipas of having been a party in Sejanus's conspiracy against Tiberius, and said that he still carried on a correspondence with Artabanus, king of Parthia, against the Romans. As a proof of this, he affirmed that Antipas had in his arsenals arms for seventy thousand men.

Caius being angry, demanded hastily of Antipas, if it were true that he had such a quantity of arms? The latter not daring to deny it, was instantly banished to Lyons in Gaul. The emperor offered to forgive Herodias, in consideration of her brother Agrippa; but she chose rather to follow her husband, and to share his fortune in banishment. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 9.

This is that Antipas, who, being at Jerusalem at the time of our Saviour's passion, ridiculed Jesus, whom Pilate had sent to him, dressed him in worn-out royalty, and sent him back to Pilate as a mock king, whose ambition gave him no umbrage. (Luke xxiii. 7. 11.) The year of the death of Antipas is unknown; but it is certain that he, as well as Herodias, died in exile. Josephus says, that he died in Spain, whither Caius, on his coming into Gaul the first year of his banishment, might order him to be sent.

ANTIPAS, the faithful martyr or witness mentioned in the book of Revelation, (ii. 13.) He is said to have been one of our Saviour's first disciples, and to have suffered martyrdom at Pergamus, of which he was bishop. His Acts relate that he was burnt in a brazen bull.

Though ancient ecclesiastical history furnishes no account of this Antipas, yet it is certain that, according to all the rules of language, what is said concerning him by St. John, must be understood literally, and not mystically, as some interpreters have done. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Theology, vol. i. p. 509; Lowman's Paraphrase on the Revelation, p. 16.

ANTIPATRIS must denote on behalf of the father. It was a town of Palestine, (Acts xxiii. 31.) and, according to Josephus, was anciently called Caphar Saba, but was named Antipatris, by Herod the Great, in honour of his father Antipater. It was situated in a pleasant valley near the mountains, in the way from Jerusalem to Cæsarea. Josephus says, it was about one hundred and fifty furlongs, or seventeen miles from Joppa. Dr. Wells calls its ancient name Capharsalma. Wells's Geog. vol. ii. p. 289; Sac. Geog.

ANTISABBATARIANS, a modern religious sect, who deny the necessity of observing the sabbath-day. Their principal arguments are, that the Jewish sabbath was only of ceremonial, not of moral obligation, and, consequently, is abolished by the coming of Christ; that no other sabbath was appointed to be observed by Christ or his apostles; that the New Testament does not contain a word respecting the breaking of the sabbath; that no command was given to Adam or Noah to keep any sabbath; and that, therefore, although Christians are commanded 'not to forsake the assembling of themselves together,' they ought not to consider one day more holy than another. See SABBATARIANS and SABBATH.

ANTITACTÆ, a branch of the Gnostics, who held that God was good and just, but that a creature had created evil, and that we are therefore to oppose this author of evil, in order to avenge God of his adversary.

ANTITRINITARIANS, those who deny the Trinity, and teach that there are not Three Persons in the Godhead. The Samosatenians, who do not believe the distinction of persons in God; the Arians who deny the divinity of the Word; and the Macedonians, who deny that of the Holy Spirit; are all properly Antitrinitarians. Among the moderns, by Antitrinitarians are principally understood Socinians, called also Unitarians. See TRINITARIANS and TRINITY.

ANTITYPE, a Greek word, properly signifying a type or figure corresponding to some other type. The original word occurs twice in the New Testament; viz. in the epistle to the Hebrews, (ix. 24.) and in the first epistle of St. Peter, (iii. 21.) where its genuine import has been much controverted. The former says, that 'Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are ἀντίτυπα, the figures or antitypes of the true—now to appear in the presence of God for us.' Now τύπος signifies the pattern by which another thing is made; and as Moses was obliged to make the tabernacle, and all things in it, according to the pattern, shown him on the Mount, the tabernacle so formed was the antitype of what was shown to Moses. Any thing, therefore, formed according to a model or pattern, is an antitype. In the latter passage, the apostle speaking of Noah's flood, and the deliverance of only eight persons in the ark from it, says, ὡς καὶ ἡμεῖς ἀντίτυπον τὸν σώζει βάπτισμα, 'Baptism, being an antitype to that, now saves us, (not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience towards God, &c.) the meaning is, that righteousness, or the answer of a good conscience towards God, now saves us, by means of the resurrection of Christ; as formerly righteousness saved those eight persons by means of the ark during the flood. The word antitype, therefore, signifies in this place a general similitude of circumstances; and the relative ὃ 'to which,' refers not to the immediate antecedent ὕδατος, 'water,' but to all that precedes.

ANTO'NIA, a tower or fortress at Jerusalem, situated on the west and north angle of the temple, and built by Herod the Great, in honour of his friend Marc Antony. It stood upon an eminence cut steep on all sides, and inclosed by a wall three hundred cubits high. It was in the form of a square tower, and had a tower at each of the four corners. It was so high, that from it was a full view of the temple; and there was a covered way of communication between it and the temple: so that as the temple was, in some sort, a citadel to the town, the tower of Antonia was a citadel to the temple. The Romans generally kept a garrison in this tower; and from it the tribune ran with his soldiers, to rescue Paul out of the hands of the Jews, who had seized him in the temple, and intended to kill him. (Acts xxi. 31, 32.)

ANTOSIANDRIANS, a sect of rigid Lutherans, who opposed the doctrines of Osiander relating to justification. They are otherwise denominated Osiandromastiges. The Antosiadrians deny that man is made just, with that justice, with which God himself is just; that is, they assert that he is not made essentially, but only imputatively just, or that he is not really made just, but only so pronounced.

APE, or MONKEY, Simia, in Hebrew קוף Koph. It is a genus of quadrupeds of the order of the anthropomorpha, or quadrupeds that resemble the human figure. The Ourang Outang makes the nearest approaches to man, and is said to possess surprising swiftness, address, and ferocity. Baboons constitute the second division of the ape kind, and form a large, fierce, and formidable race. The baboon properly so called, grows to the height of from three to four feet. Monkeys form the last division of the ape kind, and are discriminated by the length of the tail; an appendage which in the former two divisions is either very short, or entirely wanting.

The Scripture says, that Solomon's fleet brought ivory and apes. (1 Kings x. 22.) It is likely that the kophim here mentioned were now for the first time seen in Judea? If so, and if they were apes, the monkeys and apes brought into Egypt by the African caravans must have singularly escaped the notice of the Jews. It is certain that no former hint respecting them occurs in Scripture. If then apes be really the creatures meant by the word kophim, they were probably a species of a scarcer and more uncommon nature, than Africa could furnish by the way of Egypt. But this is founded on the supposition that they were now first seen in Judæa; which we can neither affirm nor deny. Scripture Illustrated.

APIS, an Egyptian deity, which was either an ox or a bull. To this animal great honours were paid during its life, but much greater after its death. When it died, a general mourning was observed, and its funeral was celebrated with extraordinary magnificence. At Heliopolis, the Egyptians maintained an ox, which they called Mnevis, and which was consecrated to the sun; and at Memphis, another named Apis, dedicated to the moon. On the death of one of these animals, the Egyptians sought a successor. The marks, by which they distinguished it from the rest of its species, were a white spot on its forehead, in the shape of a half-moon; the figure of an eagle on its back; and that of a beetle under its tongue. When they found a calf with these marks, their mourning for the former animal was turned into joy; and they brought the new deity to Memphis, where it was installed with great ceremony. The Egyptians sacrificed bulls to Apis, and were so scrupulous in the choice of them, that if they found on them only a single black hair, they were deemed improper victims. Herodot. lib. iii. cap. 38; Pliny, lib. viii. cap. 46; Strabo, lib. xvii.

Under this animal the Egyptians pretended to worship Osiris, whose soul, they said, migrated into a bull, and, by a successive transmigration, passed from one into another. It has been generally thought, that the golden calf, which Aaron made for the Israelites in the wilderness, and the calves set up by Jeroboam to be worshipped by the ten tribes, were imitations of the Egyptian Apis. See CALF, CHERUB.

APOC/ALYPSE, Ἀποκάλυψις, signifies revelation. It is, however, particularly applied to the revelation, which St. John had in the isle of Patmos, whither he was banished. The Apocalypse is a canonical book of the New Testament. Irenæus thinks that it was written about the year of Christ 96, in the isle of Patmos, whither St. John was banished by Domitian. Sir Isaac Newton is of opinion, that this book was written in the time of Nero. In support of this opinion, he alleges the sense of the earliest commentators, and the tradition of the churches of Syria, which is preserved in the title of the Syriac version of that book, and is as follows: 'The revelation, which was made to John the Evangelist by God in the island of Patmos, into which he was banished by Nero the Cæsar.' This opinion he tells us is further confirmed by the allusions in the Apocalypse to the temple and altar, and holy city, as then standing; and also by the style of the book, which contains more Hebraisms than his Gospel. Hence he infers that it was written when John had lately left Judæa. But why should the churches of Syria be alleged respecting the time of writing the Apocalypse, when that book was not generally received by them? Besides, in the titles of the books of the New Testament received by them, are manifest errors; and we know not when the Syriac version of the Apocalypse was made. On the whole, there does not appear much weight in any of the arguments of Sir Isaac Newton on this subject. It seems right to adhere to the common opinion, that St. John was banished into Patmos, in the reign of Domitian, and by virtue of his edicts for persecuting the Christians, in the latter part of his reign. 'All antiquity is agreed,' says Mr. Lampe, 'that St. John's banishment was by order of Domitian.' It appears from the book itself, that churches had already existed in Asia for some time; as St. John, in the name of Christ, reproves faults, which do not immediately happen. The church of Ephesus had left her first love; and that of Sardis had a name to live, but was dead. The church of Laodicea was fallen into lukewarmness and indifference. But the church of Ephesus was not founded by St. Paul, before the last years of Claudius; and in 61 or 62, when St. Paul wrote to them from Rome, instead of reproving them, he commends their love and faith, (i. 15.) It appears from the Revelation, that the Nicolaitans were a sect, when this book was written, since they are expressly named; whereas, they were only foretold, and described in general terms by St. Peter in his second epistle, written after the year sixty, and in St. Jude's about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem by Vespasian. It is evident, from different places of the Revelation, that there had been an open persecution in the provinces; and it is certain that Claudius did not persecute the Christians, and that the persecutions of Nero did not reach the provinces. On the whole, the visions here recorded, and the publication of them in this book, must be assigned, says Lardner, to the years of Christ, 95 and 96, or 97.

Some have attributed this book to the arch-heretic Cerinthus; but the ancients unanimously ascribe it to John the son of Zebedee, and brother of James. The Revelation has not at all times been esteemed canonical. St. Jerom informs us, that it was not received by many churches of Greece; and it is not to be found in the catalogue of the canonical books prepared by the council of Laodicea, nor in that of St. Cyril of Jerusalem. However, Justin, Irenæus, Origen, Cyprian, Clemens of Alexandria, Tertullian, and all the fathers of the fourth, fifth, and following centuries, quote the Revelations as a book acknowledged to be canonical. The Alogians, Marcionites, Cerdonians, and even Luther himself, rejected this book: but in this particular the Protestants have forsaken Luther, and Beza has strongly maintained against his objections, that the Apocalypse is authentic and canonical. On the whole it appears, that this book has been generally received in all ages, though some have doubted it, or rejected it, particularly the Syrians, and other Eastern Christians. It may, however, be questioned whether their exceptions, founded on the difference of style, &c. or any other criticisms whatever, can be sufficient to create a doubt concerning the author of this book, which was acknowledged as a writing of John, the apostle and evangelist, as far as we know, before the most early of those, who disputed its authenticity.

The genuineness of the Revelation appears also from its internal evidence. 1. 'The Revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to show unto his servants things, which must shortly come to pass; and he sent, and signified it by his angel, unto his servant John.' (Rev. i. 1.) Hence, it is argued, that John calls himself the servant of Christ, in a sense not common to all believers, but peculiar to those, who are especially employed. In like manner, Paul, and other apostles, call themselves servants of God and of Christ. (Rom. i. 1. James i. 1. 2 Pet. i. 1. Jude 1.) This observation tends to show that the writer is an apostle. 2. 'Who bare record of the word of God, and of the testimony of Jesus Christ, and of all things that he saw.' Some think, that the writer in this passage refers to the written Gospel of St. John, and that he says, he had already borne testimony concerning the word of God, and Jesus Christ. But the expression is ambiguous, and may be understood of the book of Revelation, and the matters it contains. 3. It is argued in favour of the genuineness of this book, that it contains many instances of conformity, both in sentiment and expression, between the Revelation and the uncontested writings of St. John. Our Saviour says, 'Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world,' (John xvi. 33.) In St. John's first Epistle, Christian firmness under trials is frequently represented by overcoming the world, or overcoming the wicked one, (ii. 13, 14.; iv. 4.; v. 4, 5.) This language is peculiar to St. John, and is found in no other books of the New Testament. In the Revelation, our Saviour says, 'To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne, (iii. 21.) Compare also ii. 7. 11. 17. 26.; iii. 5. 12. and xxi. 7. Lardner's History of the Apostles and Evangelists, in Bishop Watson's Theolog. Tracts, vol. ii. p. 500.

The book of the Revelation contains twenty-two chapters. The first three are epistolary admonitions and instructions to the angels of the seven churches in Asia Minor; Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea. The next fifteen chapters contain representations of the persecutions, which the church was to suffer from Jews, Heretics, and Heathens, particularly from the emperors Dioclesian, Maximin, Herculus, Severus, Maxentius, Maximinus, Licinius, and Julian the Apostate. After this, we have a display of the divine vengeance against its persecutors, the Roman empire, and the city of Rome, which is described under the name of Babylon, the great whore, seated upon seven hills. The whole is terminated by a description of the victories of the church, and its triumph over its enemies; of the marriage of the Lamb, and the celestial happiness of the church triumphant. It has been observed that the Revelation of St. John is written in the same style and language as the prophecies of Daniel, to which it bears relation; and that all of them together form one consistent prophecy, and point out the various revolutions that would attend both Church and State.

Several other Apocalypses have been ushered into the world at different times, and under different names, but they are now considered as spurious. 1. The Apocalypses, or Revelations of St. Peter, mentioned by Eusebius and St. Jerom, and cited by Clemens of Alexandria in his Hypotyposes; but we know of none of them that are extant. 2. The Apocalypses or Revelation of St. Paul, an apocryphal book, used among the Gnostics and Cainites. This book, as they pretended, contained those ineffable things, which the apostle saw during his ecstasy, and which, he informs the Corinthians, he was not permitted to divulge, (2 Cor. xii. 4.) 3. The Apocalypse of St. John, different from the true Apocalypse, and of which there is a manuscript in the library of the emperor of Austria. 4. The Apocalypse of Cerinthus, who composed certain Revelations, in which he spoke of an earthly kingdom, and certain sensual pleasures, which the saints should enjoy at Jerusalem for a thousand years. It has been already observed, that some of the ancients suspected Cerinthus to be the author of St. John's Revelation; perhaps this mistake arose from this imitation by him of that work, and the ill use he made of the apostle's writings, the better to authorize his own visions. 5. The Apocalypse of St. Thomas, known only by Pope Gelasius's decree, which ranks it among the apocryphal books. 6. The Apocalypse of Adam, forged by the Gnostics, probably from what is said in Genesis, of the Lord's causing a deep sleep to fall on Adam, or, according to the Septuagint, an ecstasy. 7. The Apocalypse of Abraham, which was forged by the Sethian heretics, and, as Epiphanius informs us, abounded with filth and nastiness. 8. The Apocalypse of Moses, which, Cedrenus says, some authors assert to be the same work as Genesis the Less, another apocryphal book extant among the ancients. Syncellus, speaking of this Apocalypse, says, that from it is taken the following passage of St. Paul to the Galatians: 'Neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature,' (vi. 15.) 9. The Apocalypse of Elias, from which, St. Jerom says, the following passage of St. Paul is borrowed : ' Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.' (1 Cor. ii. 9.) Origen, in his citation of them, tells us that these words are no where found, but in the secret books of Elias.

APOC'RYPHAL, 'Αποκρυφος, signifies hidden or concealed, and is an epithet given to those books, which are not admitted into the canon of Scripture, and which are either spurious, or at least not acknowledged as divine. But it is not known why those books, which are not comprehended in the canon of Scripture, and which nevertheless are esteemed by some as sacred, are called apocryphal. St. Austin says, that they are so denominated, because their origin was unknown to the fathers of the first ages. St. Jerom calls those books apocryphal, which do not belong to the authors, whose names are prefixed to them, and which contain dangerous forgeries. In other places, he seems to restrain the word apocryphal to the books of heretics; and it is in this sense, that Pope Gelasius understands it in his decretal. Some say the apocryphal books were so denominated because they were concealed, and not read commonly, or in public; others, that they were so called, because they deserve to be concealed, or forgotten. St. Epiphanius seems to have had a peculiar notion of the origin of this title, when he says, 'The books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus are not reckoned among the sacred writings, because they were not deposited in the ark of the covenant.' By the ark of the covenant is probably meant the ark or chest, in which the Jewish archives were preserved in the temple. Hence it appears that the apocryphal books are so called ἀπὸ τῆς κρυπτης, because they were not contained in the chest, in which the sacred writings were deposited; or more probably from the verb ἀποκρύπτω, to hide or conceal, because they were concealed from the generality of readers, their authority not being recognised by the church, and because they are books, which are destitute of proper testimonials, their originals being obscure, their authors unknown, and their character either heretical or suspected.

The apocryphal books, according to the sixth article of the church of England, are the following :—

- The Third Book of Esdras,
- The Fourth Book of Esdras,
- The Book of Tobit,
- The Book of Judith,
- The Rest of the Book of Esther,
- The Book of Wisdom,
- Jesus the Son of Sirach,
- Baruch the Prophet,
- The Song of the three Children,
- The Story of Susanna,

The Story of Bel and the Dragon,
The Prayer of Manasses,
The First Book of Maccabees,
The Second Book of Maccabees.

These, however, in the language of the article, "the church reads for example of life and instruction of manners, but doth not apply them to establish any doctrine." They possess no authority, internal or external, to procure their admission into the sacred canon. They contain no prophecy or other authentic mark of inspiration; they were all written subsequently to the cessation of the prophetic spirit, but previously to the promulgation of the Gospel; they were not included in the Jewish canon, and therefore received no sanction from our Saviour; they are not cited nor alluded to in any part of the New Testament, they are not mentioned as inspired writings by any ecclesiastical writer of the first three centuries; and they are expressly rejected by Athanasius and Jerom in the fourth century. Though these two fathers, and several subsequent authors, speak of these books with respect, yet the same authority was never ascribed to them as to the Old and New Testament, till the council of Trent, at its fourth session, admitted them all, except the prayer of Manasses, and the third and fourth books of Esdras, into their canon. This still continues one of the many points of difference between the church of Rome and that of England. No reason, therefore, exists for applying the books of the Apocrypha to establish any doctrine. They are highly valuable as ancient writings, which throw considerable light on the phraseology of Scripture, and on the history and manners of the East; and as they contain many noble sentiments and useful precepts, our church, in imitation of the primitive church of Christ, doth read them for example of life and instruction of manners. But our church does not read all the books of the Apocrypha: it reads no part of either book of Esdras, or of the Maccabees, or of the book of Esther; and it does not read the Song of the Three Children, nor the Prayer of Manasses. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Theology, vol. ii. p. 197, 198, 199.

APOLLINARIANS, or APOLLINARISTS, or, as they are called by Epiphanius, Dimarita; a sect, who derived their principal name from Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea, in the fourth century. Apollinaris strenuously defended the divinity of Christ against the Arians; but, by indulging too freely in philosophical distinctions and subtilties, he denied in some measure his humanity. He maintained that the body, which Christ assumed, was endowed with a sensitive, and not a rational soul, and that the Divine nature performed the functions of reason, and supplied the place of the intellectual principle in man. Hence it seemed to follow, that the Divine nature in Christ was blended with the human, and suffered with it the pains of crucifixion and death. Apollinaris, and his followers, have been charged with other errors, by certain ancient writers; but it is not easy to determine how far their charge is deserving of credit. It would appear that the inference drawn from the doctrine of Apollinaris, that the divine nature suffered with the human, is not just; for if the human soul does not suffer death by the dissolution of the body, neither can the divine nature. The doctrine of Apollinaris was first condemned by a council at Alexandria in 362, and afterwards in a more formal manner by a council at Rome in 375, and by another council in 378, which deposed Apollinaris from his bishopric. In short, it was attacked at the same time by the laws of the emperors, the decrees of councils, and the writings of the learned, and sunk, by degrees, under their united force. Mosheim's Eccles. History, vol. i. p. 344.

APOLLO'NIUS, an officer belonging to Antiochus Epiphanes, whom Grotius, as he is called Mysarches in the Greek, supposes to have been governor of Mysia. Antiochus having resolved to draw great sums from Jerusalem, sent thither Apollonius, to execute his design, in the year of the world 3836, and before Jesus Christ 168. Apollonius went, at the head of twenty-two thousand men, and pretended he would continue in Jerusalem without giving any disturbance. He remained quiet till the Sabbath-day, when, attacking the people, he put great numbers to the sword, burnt and pillaged the city, and carried away ten thousand captives. (1 Macc. i. 30, 31. 2 Macc. v. 24, &c.) Two years after, Judas Maccabæus having collected an army of six thousand Jews, Apollonius, who was at that time in Samaria, marched against him, but was killed in the engagement, and his troops were either dispersed or cut to pieces. (1 Macc. iii. 10, &c.)

APOLLONIUS DAUS, governor of Cœle-Syria, having abandoned the party of Alexander Balas, and joined Demetrius Nicanor, headed a powerful army to compel the Jews to declare for Demetrius. He encamped at Jamnia, and wrote to Jonathan Maccabæus, challenging him to descend into the plain, and reproaching him for continuing among rocks and mountains. Jonathan, stung with these reproaches, sat down before Joppa, with his brother Simon, and ten thousand chosen troops. The garrison, which was composed of the troops of Apollonius, shut the gates; but the citizens, perceiving that Jonathan intended to force them, opened the gates, and received him. (1 Macc. x. 69, &c.) Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 8.

Apollonius, informed that Jonathan had taken Joppa, advanced to Azotus, with three thousand horse, and eight thousand foot; having left one thousand horse in ambuscade near a brook, to attack the Jews in their rear. But Jonathan having received intelligence of this design, ranged his troops in such a manner, that they could face the enemy on each side, and forbade them to quit their ranks; commanding them to stand firm, and receive the first onset. Apollonius's horse tired themselves all day, with throwing darts and arrows against Jonathan's troops, who received them on their bucklers, and were very little incommoded by them. Towards evening, Jonathan charged the enemy, and completely defeated them. Some who escaped threw themselves into the temple of Dagon, near Azotus, whither Jonathan pursued them, and burnt them with the temple. He also took the city of Azotus, which he pillaged and burnt. In this action, Apollonius lost eight thousand men. See DEMETRIUS, JONATHAN, &c.

APOL'LOS, Ἀπολλῶς, signifies one that destroys and lays waste. Apollos was a Jew of Alexandria, who came to Ephesus in the year of our Lord 54, during the absence of St. Paul, who had gone to Jerusalem. (Acts xviii. 24.) He was an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures, and taught diligently the things of the Lord; but as he knew only the baptism of John, he was no more than a catechumen, and not fully informed of the higher branches of Gospel doctrine. However, he knew that Jesus Christ was the Messiah, and declared himself openly as his disciple. At Ephesus, therefore, he began to speak boldly in the synagogue, and demonstrated by the Scriptures that Jesus was the Christ. Aquila and Priscilla having heard him there, took him with them, and instructed him more fully in the ways of God.

Some time after, he inclined to go into Achaia, and the brethren wrote to the disciples there, desiring them to receive him. He was very useful at Corinth, where he watered what St. Paul had planted. (1 Cor. iii. 6.) It has been supposed, that the great fondness of his disciples for him, almost produced a schism; some said, I am of Paul; some, I am of Apollos; and others, I am of Cephas. But this division, which St. Paul mentions and reproves in his first Epistle to the Corinthians, did not prevent Paul and Apollos, personally, from being closely united by the bands of Christian charity and affection. Apollos, hearing that the apostle was at Ephesus, went to meet him, and was there when St. Paul wrote the first Epistle to the Corinthians, in which he observes, that he had earnestly entreated Apollos to return to Corinth, but though he had not prevailed with him, Apollos gave him room to hope, that he would visit that city at a favourable opportunity. Some have supposed, that the apostle names Apollos and Cephas, not as the real persons, in whose names parties had been formed at Corinth, but that, in order to avoid provoking a temper, which he wished to subside, he transfers by a figure, to Apollos and himself, what was really meant of other parties, whom from prudence he declines to mention. However this might be, the reluctance of Apollos to return to Corinth, seems to countenance the general opinion.

St. Jerom says, that Apollos was so dissatisfied with the division, which had happened on his account at Corinth, that he retired into Crete, with Zeno, a doctor of the law; but that this interruption of Christian harmony having been appeased by the letter of St. Paul to the Corinthians, Apollos returned to that city, of which he was afterwards bishop. The Greeks say that he was bishop of Duras; some, that he was bishop of Iconium, in Phrygia; and others, of Cæsarea.

APOSTASY, a forsaking or renouncing our religion, either by an open declaration in words, or a virtual declaration by our actions. The primitive Christian church distinguished several kinds of apostasy: the first, of those who went entirely from Christianity to Judaism; the second, of those who mingled Judaism and Christianity together; the third of those who complied so far with the Jews, as to communicate with them in many of their unlawful practices, without formally professing their religion; and the fourth, of those who, after having been some time Christians, voluntarily relapsed into Paganism.

Other degrees of apostasy are the following: 1. Indifference in religious matters, and the want of all concern respecting religion. 2. The withdrawing from the public testimonies of the profession of religion, by forsaking the assemblies of Christians convened for the worship and service of God. 3. A departure from the purity of the Christian doctrine and worship, in a gross and notorious manner. 4. The renouncing and forsaking of Christianity, or of some essential part of Christianity.

The sin of apostasy must be confessed to be very great. When God has revealed his will to mankind, and sent his own Son to declare this will, and afforded such testimonies to him by 'signs and wonders, and divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost;' when he has transmitted to us so faithful a record of this revelation, and of the miracles wrought to confirm it, in the Scriptures; and when we ourselves have so often declared our firm belief of this revelation; to apostatize and deny it, or to embrace doctrines and practices plainly contrary to what it teaches, is the greatest contempt of the testimony of God. In fact, it is to declare that we either do not believe the authority of God, or pay no regard to the Creator of the universe. 'He that believeth not God, hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record which God gave of his Son.' He, who apostatizes from his religion, or any principle of it, on any other account than a full conviction of its falsehood, is either an atheist, or a profane and wicked person, who though he believes his religion to be true, yet exchanges it for another, which he believes to be false, merely for the sake of some temporal advantage. He who, without thorough conviction, abandons the profession of his religion whether true or false, forfeits all the rewards, and incurs all the penalties, which true religion promises and denounces. He, who viciously abandons his religion, betrays God, and falsifies to him his trust. He, who renounces his religion, through fear of being disappointed in some covetous and ambitious hope, is an instance of the greatest baseness and impiety. See FALL OF MAN. Tillotson's Sermons; Sherlock's Sermons; Scof's Christian Life; Sharpe's Sermons.

APOST/TLE, 'Ἀπόστολος, properly signifies a messenger, or person sent by another on some business. Hence, by way of eminence, it denotes one of the disciples commissioned by Jesus Christ to preach the Gospel. Out of the number of his disciples our blessed Lord selected twelve to be invested with the apostleship. (Matt. x. 1.; Mark vi. 7.; Luke ix. 1.) Their names were Simon Peter, Andrew, James the Greater, John, Philip, Bartholomew, Thomas, Matthew, James the Less, Jude, surnamed Lebbeus or Thaddeus, Simon the Canaanite, and Judas Iscariot. Of these, Simon, Andrew, James the Greater, and John, were fishermen; and Matthew was a publican, or receiver of the public revenues. Of what profession the rest were, we are not told in Scripture, though it is probable they were fishermen.

There are various conjectures with respect to the reason of our Saviour's choosing twelve apostles. The most probable is, that it was in allusion to the twelve patriarchs, as the founders of their several tribes, or to the twelve chief heads, or rulers of those tribes, of which the body of the Jewish nation consisted. This opinion seems to be countenanced by what our Saviour tells his disciples, that 'when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory, they shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.' (Matt. xix. 28.)

Our Lord's first commission to his apostles was in the third year of his public ministry, about eight months after their solemn election, when he sent them out by two and two. They were to provide no money for their subsistence in their journey, but to expect it from those, to whom they preached. (Matt. x. 5 &c.) They were to declare that the kingdom of heaven, or the Messiah, was at hand, and to confirm their doctrine by miracles. They were not to go either to the Gentiles, or the Samaritans, but to confine their preaching to the people of Israel. In obedience to their Master's directions, the apostles went into all the parts of Palestine inhabited by the Jews, preaching the Gospel, and working miracles. (Mark vi. 12.) The evangelical history is silent as to the particular circumstances attending this first preaching of the apostles, and only informs us, that they returned, and told their Master all that they had done. (Luke ix. 10.)

Their second commission, just before our Lord's ascension into heaven, was of a more extensive and particular nature. They were now not to confine their preaching to the Jews, but to 'go and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.' (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20.) Accordingly, they began publicly, after our Lord's ascension, to exercise the office of their ministry, daily working miracles in proof of their mission, and converting great numbers to the Christian faith. This alarming the Jewish Sanhedrim, the apostles were apprehended, and being examined before the high-priest and elders, were commanded not to preach any more in the name of Christ. (Acts iv.) But this injunction did not terrify them from persisting in the duty of their calling; for they continued daily, in the temple, and in private houses, teaching and preaching the Gospel.

After the apostles had exercised their ministry for twelve years in Palestine, they resolved to disperse themselves in different parts of the world, and agreed to determine by lot what parts each should take. According to this division, St. Peter went into Pontus, Galatia, and other provinces of the Lesser Asia. To St. Andrew were allotted the vast countries of Scythia and Sogdiana. St. John's portion was partly the same as Peter's, namely, the Lesser Asia. To St. Philip was assigned Upper Asia, with some parts of Scythia and Colchis. Arabia Felix fell to the lot of St. Bartholomew. St. Matthew preached in Chaldæa, Persia, and Parthia. St. Thomas preached also in Parthia, as well as to the Hyrcanians, Bactrians, and Indians. St. James the Less continued in Jerusalem, of which church he was bishop. To St. Simon were allotted Egypt, Cyrene, Libya, and Mauritania; to St. Jude, Syria and Mesopotamia; and to St. Matthias, who was chosen in the room of the traitor Judas, Cappadocia and Colchis. Thus, by the dispersion of the apostles, Christianity was very early planted in very many parts of the world. Of their travels and actions we have only short and imperfect accounts.

In order to qualify the apostles for the arduous task of converting the world to the Christian religion, they were in the first place, miraculously enabled to speak the languages of the several nations, to whom they were to preach, (Acts ii.); and in the second place, they were endowed with the power of working miracles, in confirmation of the doctrines they taught. These gifts were unnecessary, and therefore ceased, in the after ages of the church, when Christianity was established by the civil power.

St. Paul is frequently called the apostle by way of eminence, and the apostle of the Gentiles, because his ministry was used for the conversion chiefly of the Gentile world. St. Peter was employed in converting the Jews, and was therefore called the apostle of the circumcision. The several apostles are usually represented with their respective badges or attributes: St. Peter is seen with the keys; St. Paul, with a sword; St. Andrew, with a cross; St. James the Less, with a fuller's pole; St. John, with a cup, out of which a dove is flying; St. Bartholomew, with a knife; St. Philip, with a long staff, the upper end of which is formed into a cross; St. Thomas, with a lance; St. Matthew, with a hatchet; St. Matthias, with a battle-axe; St. James the Greater, with a pilgrim's staff and a gourd-bottle; St. Simon, with a saw; and St. Jude, with a club.

The appellation of apostle was also given to the ordinary travelling ministers of the church. Thus, St. Paul says, 'Salute Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen, and my fellow prisoners, who are of note among the apostles.' (Rom. xvi. 7.) It was also a title given to those, who were sent by the churches to carry their alms to the poor of other churches. This usage was borrowed from the synagogues, who called those sent on this message by the same name. Thus St. Paul tells the Philippians, that Epaphroditus their apostle, or messenger, had ministered to his wants. (Phil. ii. 25.)

The appellation is given in like manner to those, who first planted the Christian faith in any place. Thus, Dionysius of Corinth is called the apostle of France; Xavier, the apostle of the Indies; and in the East Indies, the Jesuit missionaries are styled apostles.

Apostle is also used among the Jews for an officer anciently sent into the several parts and provinces in their jurisdiction, by way of visitor or commissary, to see that the laws were duly observed, and to receive the monies collected for the reparation of the temple, and the tribute payable to the Romans. These apostles were a degree below the officers of the synagogue called patriarchs, from whom they received their commissions. Apostle, in the Greek liturgy, is used for a book containing the epistles of St. Paul, printed in the order in which they are to be read in churches, through the course of the year.

APOSTLES' CREED, a formula or summary of the Christian faith. Ruffinus says, that it was drawn up by the apostles themselves, who during their stay at Jerusalem, soon after our Lord's ascension, agreed upon this creed, as the rule of faith, and a word of distinction, by which, they might know friends from foes. Baronius, and some other authors, conjecture, that they did not compose it till the second year of the reign of Claudius, a little before their dispersion. With respect to the manner of composing it, some imagine, that each apostle pronounced his article, and that this is the reason of its being called symbolum apostolicum, it being formed of sentences jointly contributed, after the manner of persons paying each their quota (symbolum) or share of a reckoning.

But there are reasons, which may induce us to doubt whether the apostles composed any such creed. These reasons, according to Du Pin, are as follow: First, neither St. Luke in the Acts, nor any other ecclesiastical writer before the fifth century, mentions an assembly of the apostles, for the purpose of composing a creed. Secondly, the fathers of the first three centuries, in disputing against the heretics, endeavoured to prove, that the doctrine contained in this creed was the same as the apostles taught; but they never pretend, that it was composed by the apostles. Thirdly, if the apostles had composed this creed, it would have been the same in all churches, and in all ages; and all authors would have cited it after the same manner. But the case is quite otherwise. In the second and third ages of the church, there were as many creeds as authors; and one and the same author quotes the creed after a different manner, in several places of his works. This is an evidence, that there was not at that time any creed, which was reputed to be that of the apostles. In the fourth century, Ruffinus compares together the three ancient creeds of the churches of Aquileia, Rome, and the East, which differed very considerably in the terms. Besides, these creeds differed not only in the terms and expressions, but also in the articles, some of which were omitted in one or other of them; as those of the 'descent into hell,' the 'communion of saints,' and the 'life everlasting.' From these reasons it appears that, though this creed may be said to be that of the apostles, with respect to the doctrines contained in it, yet it is not to be referred to them as the authors and composers of it. Who was the true author of it is not so easy to determine; though its great antiquity may be hence inferred, that the whole form, as it now stands in the English liturgy, is to be found in the works of St. Ambrose and Ruffinus, who lived in the fourth century. Bishop of Lincoln's Elem. of Theol. vol. ii. p. 226.

The primitive Christians did not publicly recite the creed, except at the times of baptism, which, unless in cases of necessity, were only at Easter and Whitsuntide. The constant repeating of it was not introduced into the church till the end of the fifth century. About that time, Petrus Gnapheus, bishop of Antioch, prescribed the recital of it every time divine service was performed.

APOSTOLIC, APOSTOLICAL, something that relates to the apostles, or descends from them. Thus we say, the apostolical age, apostolical character, apostolical doctrine, constitutions, traditions, &c.

In the primitive church, it was an appellation given to all such churches as were founded by the apostles, and even to the bishops of those churches, as the reputed successors of the apostles. These were confined to four; Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. In succeeding ages, the other churches assumed the same quality, on account, principally, of the conformity of their doctrine with that of the churches, which were apostolical by foundation, and because all bishops held themselves successors of the apostles, or acted in their dioceses with the authority of apostles.

The first time the term apostolical is attributed to bishops, is in a letter of Clovis to the council of Orleans, held in 511, though that king does not in it expressly denominate them apostolical, but apostolicâ sede dignissimi, highly worthy of the apostolical see. In 581, Guntram calls the bishops assembled at the council of Maçon apostolical pontiffs. In progress of time, the bishop of Rome increasing in power above the rest, and the three patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, having fallen into the hands of the Saracens, the title apostolical was restrained to the pope and his church alone. At length, some of the popes, and St. Gregory the Great, not content to hold the title by this tenure, began to insist, that it belonged to them by another and peculiar right, as the successors of St. Peter. In 1049, the country of Rheims declared, that the pope was the sole apostolical primate of the universal church. Hence a great number of apostolicals; apostolical see, apostolical nuncio, apostolical notary, apostolical chamber, apostolical brief, apostolical vicar, &c. Chambers's Cyclopædia, vol. i.

APOSTOLIC CANONS, rules or laws, for the government of the Christian church, supposed by some to have been drawn up by the apostles themselves. Baronius and Bellarmine rejected the last thirty-five as apocryphal, but admitted the first fifty as genuine. Dr. Beveridge, with others, is of opinion that though these canons were not written by the apostles, yet they were very ancient, and were properly a collection of the canons of several councils held before that of Nice. Mr. Daillé pretends that these canons are of a more modern date, and were not collected till about the latter end of the fifth century. To prove that these canons did not proceed from the apostles themselves, Du Pin observes, that they contain many things, which never could have been established by the apostles. In particular, the first canon orders, that a bishop shall not be ordained, except by two or three bishops; whereas, in the apostles' days, one bishop was sufficient to ordain another. In the 34th and 35th, mention is made of the jurisdiction of metropolitans, an order not established in the time of the apostles. The 52d is against the error of the Montanists and Novatians; and many of them relate to questions, which could not have been debated till several years after the death of the apostles.

APOSTOLIC FATHERS, an appellation usually given to the writers of the first century, who employed their pens in the cause of Christianity. The apostolic fathers are five in number, namely, Barnabas, Clement, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp. Of their writings, Cotelerius, and after him Le Clerc, have published a collection in two volumes, accompanied by their own annotations, and the remarks of other learned men. Archbishop Wake also published the genuine epistles of the apostolic fathers.

It has been observed, that the apostolical fathers were not remarkable for their learning or their eloquence. On the contrary, they express the most pious and admirable sentiments in the plainest style. This, indeed, is rather a matter of honour, than of reproach to the Christian cause; as it proves, that the progress of Christianity is not to be attributed to human means, but to a divine power. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 92.

APOSTOLICI, or APOSTOLICS, a name assumed by three different sects, on account of their pretending to imitate the manner and practice of the apostles.

The first apostolici, otherwise called apotactitæ and apotactici, sprang from the En-crates, and Cathari, in the second century. They professed to abstain from marriage, and the use of wine, flesh, money, &c.

The second sect of the apostolici belonged to the twelfth century. Their religious doctrine, as St. Bernard, who wrote against them, says, was free from error, and their lives and manners were irreproachable and exemplary. Yet they were reprehensible on account of the following peculiarities :

1. They held it unlawful to take an oath.
2. They permitted their hair and beards to grow to an enormous length.
3. They preferred celibacy to wedlock, and called themselves the chaste brethren and sisters.
4. Each man, however, after the manner of the apostles, had a spiritual sister, with whom he lived in a domestic relation.

Gerhard Sagarelli was the founder of the third sect. He obliged his followers to travel from one place to another as the apostles did, and to wander about clothed in white, with long beards, dishevelled hair, and bare heads, accompanied by women, whom they called their spiritual sisters. They also renounced all kinds of property and possessions, inveighed against the increasing corruptions of the church of Rome, and predicted its overthrow, and the establishment of a purer church on its ruins. Sagarelli was burnt at Parma, in the year 1300. He was succeeded by a bold and enterprising man, named Dulcinus, a native of Novara, who published his predictions with more courage, and maintained them with greater zeal, than his predecessor. He appeared at the head of the apostles; and acting not only in the character of a prophet, but also in that of a general, he assembled an army to maintain his cause. He was opposed by Raynerius, bishop of Vercelli, who defended the interest of the Roman pontiff, and, for more than two years, carried on a bloody and dreadful war against this chief of the apostles. The issue of the contest was fatal to Dulcinus, who, after several battles, fought with obstinate courage, was at length taken prisoner, and put to death at Vercelli, in the most barbarous manner, in the year 1307. The death of Dulcinus was not immediately followed by the downfall of his sect, which subsisted in France, Germany, and other countries, till the beginning of the fifteenth century, when, under the pontificate of Boniface IX. it was totally extirpated. Mosheim, vol. iii. pp. 132, 133.

APOSTOOLIANS, a sect of the Mennonites, which first sprang up in the year 1664, and derived its name from Samuel Apostool, an eminent minister among the Mennonites at Amsterdam. They not only zealously defended the doctrine generally received among the Mennonites, respecting the divinity of Christ and the fruits of his death, but also maintained the ancient hypothesis of a visible and glorious church of Christ on earth. They admitted to their communion those only, who professed to believe all the points of doctrine, which are contained in their public confession of faith. Mosheim, vol. v. p. 50.

APOTACTITÆ, or APOTACTICI, an ancient sect, who affected to follow the examples of the apostles, and renounced all their effects and possessions. It does not appear, that at first they held any erroneous opinions; but they afterwards taught, that the renouncing of all riches was not a matter of counsel and advice only, but of precept and necessity. Encyclop. Britan.

APPLE, a well known fruit, consisting of a rind or skin, a pulp or parenchyma, the branchery or seed-vessels, and the core. It is produced by a tree of the same name. The apple, however, is an appellation given to several other fruits, on account of their resemblance to the common apple. This fruit is frequently mentioned in Scripture. Solomon says, that 'a word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver;' but in the Hebrew it is, 'apples of gold in baskets (or net work) of silver.' Some think these golden apples were probably oranges or citrons. The first fruits, say the Rabbins, were carried to the temple in silver baskets.

With every disposition to render the taphuach of the Hebrews by the citron, as is now generally done, the testimony of M. Forskall is a very great impediment. The name is undoubtedly the same; and it is a name remarkable in its formation. Celsus thought that the apples of Scripture were quinces, which he shows from ancient authors were golden in colour, delicious in taste, fragrant in smell, and refreshing beyond our quinces in England. The apple-tree was extremely rare; yet in Joel, it is enumerated among the valuable, but not uncommon, garden-trees, the vine, the fig, the pomegranate, and the palm, (i. 12.) Does the apple, the citron, or the quince, best coincide with these? It is probable, that the apple was cultivated by Solomon with peculiar care; and as it grows with difficulty in hot countries, he might bestow on it uncommon attention. Taylor's Scripture Illustrated, p. 26.

APIES a king of Egypt, called in the sacred writings Pharaoh Hophrah. (Jerem. xlv. 30.) Apries was the son of Psammis, and grandson of Necho, or Nechao, who waged war against Josiah, king of the Jews. He reigned twenty-five years, and was long considered as one of the happiest princes in the world; but having equipped a fleet for the reduction of the Cyrenians, he lost in this expedition almost the whole of his army. The Egyptians resolved to make him responsible for this ill success, rebelled, and pretended that he undertook the war only to get rid of his subjects, and that he might govern the remainder more absolutely. Apries deputed Amasis, one of his officers, to suppress the rebellion, and induce the people to return to their allegiance. But, while Amasis was haranguing them, one of the multitude placed a diadem about his helmet, and proclaimed him king. The rest applauded him, and Amasis, having accepted their offer, continued with them, and confirmed them in their rebellion. Amasis put himself at the head of the rebels, and marched against Apries, whom he defeated and took prisoner. Amasis treated him with kindness; but the people were not satisfied till they had taken him from Amasis, and strangled him. Such was the end of Apries, according to Herodotus. Jeremiah threatened this prince with being delivered into the hands of his enemies, as he had delivered Zedekiah, king of Judah, into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. (Ibid.)

Apries had made a league with Zedekiah, and promised him assistance. (Ezek. xvii. 15.) Zedekiah, therefore, relying on his forces, revolted from Nebuchadnezzar, in the year of the world 3414, and before Jesus Christ 590. Early in the year following, Nebuchadnezzar marched against Zedekiah; but as other nations of Syria had shaken off their obedience, he first reduced them to their duty, and towards the end of the year besieged Jerusalem. (2 Kings xxv. 5. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17. Jerem. xxxix. 1. lii. 4.) Zedekiah defended himself in Jerusalem, long and obstinately, that he might give time to Pharaoh Hophrah, or Apries, to come to his assistance. Apries advanced with a powerful army; and the king of Babylon raised the siege, and marched to meet him. But Apries, not daring to hazard a battle against the Chaldeans, retreated into Egypt, and abandoned Zedekiah. Ezekiel reproaches Egypt severely with this baseness, and says, that it had been a staff of reed to the house of Israel, and an occasion of falling; for when they took hold of it by the hand, it broke and rent all their shoulder. He, therefore, prophesies, that Egypt should be reduced to a solitude, and that God would send against it the sword, which would destroy in it man and beast. (Ezek. xxix.) This was afterwards accomplished, first, in the person of Apries; and secondly, in the conquest of Egypt by the Persians. To this king, likewise, some apply the following words of Habbakuk: 'Woe unto him that giveth his neighbour drink, that putteth thy bottle to him, and maketh him drunken also, that thou mayest look on their nakedness.' (Habbak. ii. 15.)

AQUARIANS, a sect of Christians in the primitive church, who consecrated water in the eucharist instead of wine. This they did under pretence of abstinence or temperance; or, because they thought it universally unlawful to eat flesh or drink wine. Epiphanius calls them Enkratites, from their abstinence; St. Austin, Aquarians, from their use of water; and Theodoret, who says they sprang from Tatian, Hydroparastatae, because they offered water instead of wine.

Besides these, there was another sort of Aquarians, who did not reject the use of wine as unlawful; for they administered the eucharist in wine at evening service: but in the morning assemblies they used water, lest the smell of wine should discover them to the heathens.

St. Cyprian, who gives a long account of the Aquarians, in one of his epistles, says, that it was the custom of the church to use water mixed with wine, because the water represents the people, as the wine does the blood of Christ; and when both are mixed together in the cup, Christ and his people are united. Heckford's Account of all Religions, p. 375.

AQUILA, a native of Pontus in Asia Minor, who, together with his wife Priscilla, was converted by St. Paul to the Christian faith. As Aquila was by trade a tent-maker, which was also the occupation of St. Paul, the apostle lodged with him at Corinth, (Acts xviii. 2, &c.) Aquila had come thither from Italy, not long before, being obliged to leave Rome, by the edict of the emperor Claudius, which banished all Jews from that city. St. Paul afterwards quitted the house of Aquila, and abode with Justus, near the Jewish synagogue at Corinth. Calmet thinks, that St. Paul was induced to this, because Aquila was a convert from Judaism, and Justus from Paganism: on which account the Gentiles might come and hear him with more liberty. When the apostle departed from Corinth, Aquila and Priscilla accompanied him to Ephesus, where he left them to profit that church by their instructions and example, while he went to Jerusalem. They rendered St. Paul very great services in this city, and even exposed their own lives to preserve his. They had returned to Rome, when the apostle wrote his epistle to the Romans; for in it he salutes them with great encomiums, (Rom. xvi. 3, 4.) However, they did not continue at Rome, for they had come back to Ephesus, when St. Paul wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy, in which he desires him to salute them in his name, (2 Tim. iv. 19.) What became of them afterwards is not known. The Greeks call Aquila bishop and apostle.

AR, ער, signifies awaking, watching, evacuation, uncovering. Ar, Ariel of Moab, or Rabbath-Moab, was the capital of the Moabites, and was situated upon the river Arnon, which divided it into two parts, (Numb. xxi. 28. Isaiah xxix. 1. Deut. iii. 11, &c.) On coins it was denominated Rabbath Moma; and Eusebius says it was called Areopolis in his time. St. Jerom relates, that this city was entirely destroyed by an earthquake, when he was a young man.

ARABIA, ארביים, Arabim, Arabians, signifies the evening; or, a place wild and desert; or, hostages, pledges, ravens, mixtures, mild. It is possible, that Arabia might take its name from the different tribes of people, which have mingled themselves in this country, and which sometimes still unite into one body, or separate themselves from other tribes, as circumstances occur. Arabia is a very extensive country of Asia, and is bounded on the north by Judæa, on the east by Persia and the Gulf of Persia, on the south by the Indian Ocean, and on the west by the Red Sea, and the Isthmus of Suez. It is divided into three parts; viz. Arabia Deserta, Arabia Petræa, and Arabia Felix.

ARABIA DESERTA is situated between the Euphrates on the east and the mountains of Gilead on the west. It comprehends the Ituræans, the Edomites, the Nubathæans, the people of Kedar, and others, who lead a wandering life, and have no cities, houses, or fixed habitations, but dwell wholly in tents, and, in modern Arabic, are called Bedoweens. This country seems to be described in Scripture by the word Arab, which signifies, properly, in Hebrew, the west, or people gathered together. They may have taken the name of Arabim, or western, from their situation, being west of the river Euphrates; and if so, their name Arab is prior to the settlement of Israel in Canaan. In Eusebius, and authors of that and the following ages, the country, and the greater part of the cities beyond Jordan, and of what they called the third Palestine, are considered as parts of Arabia. It has been observed, that, as Arabia Deserta extended to the neighbourhood of Damascus, it is not to be questioned, but this was the peculiar part of Arabia, into which St. Paul retired after his conversion. (Gal. i. 17.) Dr. Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 230.

ARABIA PETRÆA is situated south of Palestine. Its capital was Petra. This country contained the southern Edomites, the Amalekites, the Cushites, who are improperly called the Ethiopians, the Hivites, the Meonians or Maonim, &c. These people are at present known by the general name of Arabians; but it is of consequence to notice the ancient inhabitants of these districts as they are mentioned in the text of Scripture. In this country were Kadesh-barnea, Gerar, Beersheba, Lachish, Libnah, Paran, Arad, Hasmona, Oboth, Phunon, Dedan, Segor, &c. Here also is Mount Sinai, where the law was given to Moses.

ARABIA FELIX lies still further south, and is bounded on the east by the Persian Gulf, on the south by the ocean, and on the west by the Red Sea. As this Arabia did not immediately adjoin to the Holy Land, it is not so frequently mentioned in Scripture as the former Arabias. It is thought, that the queen of Sheba, who visited Solomon, was queen of a part of Arabia Felix. (1 Kings x. 1.) This country abounded with riches, and particularly with spices.

The Scripture frequently mentions the Arabians (meaning those adjoining to Judæa) as a powerful people, who valued themselves on their wisdom. Their riches consisted principally in flocks of cattle. They paid king Jehoshaphat an annual tribute of seven thousand seven hundred sheep, and as many goats. (2 Chron. xvii. 11.) The kings of Arabia furnished Solomon with a great quantity of gold and silver. (Ib. ix. 14.) They loved war, but carried it on rather like thieves and plunderers, than soldiers. (Ibid. xxii. 1.) They lived at liberty in the field, or in the desert, concerned themselves little about cultivating the earth, and were not very obedient to established governments. This is the idea given of them in Scripture, (Isaiah xiii. 20.) and the same is their character at this day.

The inhabitants of Arabia, before Abraham came into Canaan, were descended from Ham. (1 Chron. iv. 40, 41.) We find there the Midianites of the race of Cush, among whom Moses retired. It is known, that Abimelech, king of Gerar, lived in the time of Abraham; and the Amalekites, in that of Moses. The Hivites, the Amorites, Meonians or Mahonians, extended themselves a good way into Arabia Petræa; and the Horim occupied the mountains which lie south of the land of Canaan, and east of the Dead Sea. The Rephaim, Emim, Zuzim, and Zanzummim, inhabited the country afterwards called Arabia Deserta, and peopled by the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites. (Gen. xiv. 5. Deut. ii. 8, 9, &c.).

Arabia is, in general, stony, rocky, and mountainous; principally in parts remote from the sea, though formerly adjacent to it! In the course of ages, a vast plain has been interposed between the mountains, now in the midst of the country, and the sea, which has gradually retired from them. This is now the most fruitful, and best cultivated, but the hottest part; for towards the mountains, which contain plants and animals of a different kind, the air is much cooler than in the plains. The plain is denominated Tehama, or the levels.

Arabia Petræa, and Arabia Felix, were possessed by the descendants of Ishmael, who were more particularly known by the name of Arabians. See ISHMAEL.

The first people of Arabia, according to the history of that country, were called by the present inhabitants pure and unmixed Arabians. They were descended from Cahlan, or Joktan, the son of Eber, and brother of Peleg, who, after the division of languages, peopled this peninsula of Asia. The second Arabians, who succeeded these, were the descendants of Ishmael, the son of Abraham and Hagar, who came and settled among the ancient Arabians, and was father of the mixed Arabians, or Mota-Arabes, or Mosta-Arabes, or Ishmaelites.

It is observable, that they are very different from the modern Mosarabians, or Mostarabians, who are so denominated, by the Spaniards, because they are Arabians blended with other nations. Among the Malays, and other natives of the islands, &c. in the Indian Ocean, to call a person 'an Ishmaelite' is a term of very great offence and reproach, and would be punished by the death of the offender. This may seem to imply, that in ancient times Ishmael and his descendants had settled themselves by force in some parts of these countries, and expelled the original inhabitants, and that the animosity arising from this act still subsists, though the cause is forgotten. It seems congenial with the character of Ishmael, as a wild man, whose hand was against other men, &c.

The pure and ancient Arabians were divided into tribes, as well as the descendants of Ishmael. Some of these tribes still exist in Arabia, others are lost and extinct. The Ishmaelites formed twelve tribes, according to the number of the sons of Ishmael, Nebajoth, Kedar, Adbeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadar, Tema, Jetur, Naphish, and Kedemah (Gen. xxv. 13, 14.) But though these people very carefully preserve their genealogy, yet they cannot retrace it to Ishmael. They are obliged to stop at Adnam, one of his descendants; and the genealogy even of Mahomet rises no higher.

Besides the descendants of Ishmael, who peopled the greater part of Arabia, the sons of Abraham and Keturah, of Lot, of Esau, of Nahor, and others, dwelt in the same country, and mixed with, or expelled the ancient inhabitants.

The present inhabitants of Arabia are divided into those, who dwell in cities, and those, who live in the fields and deserts. The latter abide continually in tents, and are much more honest and simple than those, who live in towns. The Arabians are also divided into Gentiles and Mussulmans. The former preceded Mahomet, and are now called among them Arabians of the Days of Ignorance. The latter have received the doctrines preached by Mahomet, and are called Moslemoun, or Mussulmans, that is, believers. These are the people, who conquered, and who still possess, great part of Asia and Africa; and who, not to mention lesser kingdoms, founded the four great monarchies of the Turks, the Persians, Morocco, and Mogul.

Arabia Deserta is called Hegiaz, and is become the most celebrated, by reason of the cities of Mecca and Medina, which it contains. Arabia Petræa is now known by the name of Hagar, or Hagiari, which signifies a stone or rock; but Arabia Deserta, as understood by the ancients, extended much farther towards Syria and the Euphrates. Arabia Felix is called Yemen.

Joktan, the son of Eber, having settled in Yemen, erected there a kingdom, and was himself the first monarch. He was succeeded by his son Jarab, who introduced the Arabian language, which, as well as the country, derived from him its name. The third king was Jaschab; and the fourth Abdalschams, surnamed Sobas, from whom the old Sabæans derived their name. His descendants reigned in Yemen above two thousand years before the rise of Mahometanism.

In general, the Arabians are cunning, witty, generous, and ingenious, lovers of eloquence and poetry; but they are superstitious, vindictive, sanguinary, and fond of robbing those, who are not under the protection of some of their own people. Robbery, indeed, they think allowable, because Abraham, the father of Ishmael, they say, gave his son nothing. (Gen. xxv. 5, 6.)

The ancient Arabians were idolaters, and worshipped a stone, which, they say, was originally white, but has wept itself black on account of the sins of mankind. Herodotus says, they had only two deities; Bacchus and Venus, Alilat, or Alilatta. Strabo tells us, that they adored only Jupiter and Bacchus, and that Alexander the Great, being informed of this, resolved to subdue them, that he might oblige them to worship him as their third deity.

The modern Arabians, descended from Ishmael, mention the following names of ancient deities worshipped in Arabia: Lakiah, whom they invoked for rain; Hafedah, for preservation from bad accidents in journeys; Razora, for the necessities of life; Lath, or Ablat, which is a diminutive of Abla, the name of the true God; Aza, or Uza, from Aziz, which signifies the mighty God; Menan, from Menat, the distributor of favours. It is very probable, that they adored also the two golden antelopes, which are frequently mentioned in their histories, and which were consecrated at the temple of Mecca. The ancient Midianites, among whom Moses retired, when he was received by Jethro, worshipped Abda and Hinda. Urotalt, mentioned by Herodotus, probably denotes the sun; and Alilat, the moon. The first of these words may signify the god of light; and the second, the god or goddess eminently.

The idolatry of the Arabians, as Sabæans, consisted chiefly in worshipping the fixed stars and planets, and the angels and their images, which they honoured as inferior deities, and whose intercession they entreated as their mediators with God. For they acknowledged one supreme God, the creator and lord of the universe, whom they called Allah Taala, the most high God; and their other deities, who were subordinate to him, they called simply Al Habat, or the goddesses.

Since the time of the Gospel, many Arabians have embraced Christianity; though by far the greater part profess the faith of Mahomet. In Origen's time, a council was held here against certain heretics. The Mahometans acknowledge, that before Mahomet, there were three tribes in this country, which professed Christianity, viz. those of Thanouk, Bahora, and Naclab. That of Thanouk having had some difference with their neighbours on the subject of religion, retired to the province of Baharain, on the Persian Gulf.

ARABICI, a sect which sprang up in Arabia about the year 207. They denied the immortality of the soul, which they believed to perish with the body, but maintained, at the same time, that it would be recalled to life with the body, by the power of God. Origen was requested to come from Egypt to stop the progress of this rising sect; and he disputed against them, in a full council, with such success, that they abandoned their erroneous sentiments, and returned to the received doctrine of the church. Mosheim, vol. i. p. 249.

A'RAD, עיר, signifies wild ass; in Syriac, a dragon. It was the name of a king and also of his city lying to the south of the tribe of Judah, and the land of Canaan, in Arabia Petræa. The Israelites having advanced towards Canaan, king Arad opposed their passage, defeated them, and took from them a great booty. (Numb. xxi. 1.) But they devoted his country as accursed, and destroyed all its cities, when they became masters of the land of Canaan. (Numb. xxxiii.) Arad was rebuilt, and Eusebius places it in the neighbourhood of Kades, four miles from Malathis, and twenty from Hebron. The Israelites, in their passage through the wilderness, having departed from Sepher, came to Arad, and thence to Makkelath.

A'RAM, ארם, signifies elevation, magnificence; or, one that deceives; or, their curse. Aram, the fifth son of Shem, was father of the people of Syria, who, from him, are called Aramæans or Aramites. The Scripture distinguishes many countries of this name: Aram Naharim, or Syria of the two rivers, that is Mesopotamia; Aram of Damascus; Aram of Soba; Aram of Bethrohob, Aram of Maachah; because the cities of Damascus, Soba, Bethrohob, and Maachah, were in Syria, or, at least, because Syria contained the provinces of Soba, Maachah, &c. Homer and Hesiod called by the name of Aramæans those, whom the more modern Greeks denominate Syrians. The prophet Amos seems to say, that the first Aramæans dwelt in the country of Kir in Iberia, where the river Cyrus runs; and that God brought them thence, as he did the Hebrews out of Egypt. (Amos ix. 7.) But when this migration took place is not known. Moses always called the Syrians and inhabitants of Mesopotamia, Aramites. The Aramæans often warred against the Hebrews. David subdued them, and obliged them to pay him tribute. Solomon preserved the same authority. It does not, however, appear, that, after the separation of the ten tribes, the Syrians were generally subject to the kings of Israel, unless, perhaps, under Jeroboam II., who restored the kingdom of Israel to its ancient boundaries. (2 Kings xiv. 25.)

ARARAT, אֲרָרַט, 'Arapà, signifies the curse of trembling, and according to the Syriac, the light of him that runs. Perhaps it rather denotes mount of trembling, of great perplexities and confusion. Some, however, think that this word may denote the mountain of mucilage, or very soft mud; as this is a just description of a mountain lately overspread by a flood, and now covered with a sediment left by the waters.

Ararat is a famous mountain in Armenia, upon which Noah's ark is said to have rested, after the deluge. (Gen. viii. 4.) It is affirmed, but without proof, that there are still remains of Noah's ark upon the top of this mountain. M. de Tournefort, who visited this spot, says that nothing of the kind is to be seen, and that the top of mount Ararat is inaccessible, both by reason of its great height, and of the snow, with which it is perpetually covered. Mount Ararat is twelve leagues east of Erivan, and is situated in a vast plain, in the midst of which it rises.

That part of the mountain of Ararat, upon which the ark rested, is called by the Greek and Latin writers the Gordiæan mountains, or, with some variation, the Cordyæi, Cordueni, Carduchi, Curdi, &c. By many of the eastern nations it is denominated Ar-dag, or Parmak-dagh, the finger-mountain; because it is straight, and stands by itself, like a finger held; or perhaps it denotes the mountain of Dag. It is visible at the distance of ten days' journey; and not far from it is the city of Tauris.

Tavernier says, that there are many monasteries upon mount Ararat; and that the Armenians call it Meresoussar, because the ark there rested. It is, as it were, separated from the other mountains of Armenia, which form a long chain. From the top to the middle it is often covered with snow three or four months of the year.

Some authors, however, maintain that the ark rested upon mount Caucasus, near Apamea, in Phrygia; but it does not appear, says Dr. Wells, that this opinion is well founded. First, if we suppose it true, that in the more early ages of the world, after the flood, there were to be seen upon the Gordiæan mountains the remains of a very large vessel, which by their form might be reasonably conjectured to have been relics of the ark, it would evidently appear that the ark had there rested. Secondly, since the ark is supposed to have been built somewhere in Eden, or the parts adjoining, would not mount Caucasus be at too great a distance for such a vessel reaching it in the space of the flood's rising? Thirdly, the waters of the ocean, breaking in upon the land in these parts from the south, would naturally carry the ark northward; whereas mount Caucasus is not only farther northward, but also much more eastward, than the Gordiæan are westward, with respect to the place, whence the ark was carried. Fourthly, it may be reasonably conjectured, that the waters of the Caspian Sea, as well as of the main ocean, overflowed, and therefore ran from the Caspian Sea itself southwards and eastwards. Consequently, by their thus running, they must have kept the ark from coming to mount Caucasus, at least to that part of it where the ark is supposed to have rested. On the whole, the opinion that the ark rested upon the Gordiæan mountains seems most probable, and is therefore most generally received.

"Agridagh is the name given to this sublime mountain by the Turks; the Armenians call it Macis; but all unite in reverencing it as the haven of the great ship, which preserved the father of mankind from the waters of the deluge. The height of Ararat has never yet been measured with any satisfactory degree of accuracy, though captain Monteith of the Madras engineers, has gone nearer to the mark, perhaps, than any other traveller. The following are the results of several trigonometrical observations, which he made at Erivan, and was so kind as to communicate to me. From that place to the highest point of the loftiest head, he found 52,000 yards; and from the same spot to the minor head 55,000 yards. This head, which is distinguished by the appellation, Little Ararat, while the higher part is called Great Ararat, is distant from the other, from peak to peak, 12,000 yards. These inaccessible summits have never been trodden by the foot of man since the days of Noah, if even then; for my idea is, that the ark rested in the space between these heads, and not on the top of either. Various attempts have been made, in different ages, to ascend these tremendous mountain pyramids, but in vain. Their form, snows, and glaciers, are insurmountable obstacles: the distance being so great, from the commencement of the icy region, to the highest points, cold alone would be the destruction of any person, who should have the hardihood to persevere. On viewing mount Ararat from the northern side of the plain, its two heads are separated by a wide cleft, or rather glen, in the body of the mountain. The rocky side of the greater head runs almost perpendicularly down to the north-east, while the lesser head rises from the sloping bottom of the cleft, in a perfectly conical shape. Both heads are covered with snow. The form of the greater is similar to the less, only broader and rounder at the top, and shows to the north-west a broken and abrupt front, opening about half way down into a stupendous chasm, deep, rocky, and peculiarly black. At that part of the mountain the hollow of the chasm receives an interruption from the projection of minor mountains, which start from the sides of Ararat, like branches from the root of a tree, and run along its undulating progressions, till lost in the distant vapours of the plain." Sir R. Ker Porter's Travels in Persia, &c. vol. i. pp. 183, 184; Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study of the Holy Scriptures, vol. iii. pp. 512, 513; Dr. Wells's Geography, vol. i. pp. 30, 31.

ARAU'NAH, or ARUNA, אֲרֻנָּה, signifies ark; otherwise, song, joyful cry, curse. During a pestilence, which ravaged Jerusalem, the angel of the Lord directed the prophet Gad, to bid David go, and raise an altar to the Lord, in the threshing-floor of Araunah, or Ornan, the Jebusite. (1 Chron. xxi. 18, &c.; 2 Sam. xxiv. 18.) It is probable, that this Araunah, or Ornan, was an ancient inhabitant of Jerusalem, whose habitation and threshing-floor were situated upon mount Moriah, where the temple was afterwards built. David went immediately towards the residence of Araunah, to execute this order. When Araunah perceived him, he ran to meet him, prostrated himself, and asked what it was he desired? David answered, that he came to purchase the threshing-floor, with an intention of erecting there an altar to the Lord, that he might be pleased to stop the plague. Araunah offered him not only the threshing-floor, but also wood and oxen for a burnt-sacrifice. But the king would not accept them till he had settled their price; for he said, God forbid that I should offer to the Lord, of that which cost me nothing. David therefore bought the threshing-floor and the oxen for fifty shekels of silver; and to these he afterwards added the grounds about the threshing-floor. The whole of the two purchases together, as the Chronicles import, amounted to six hundred shekels of gold.

ARBACES, general of the Medes, and governor of Media, under Sardanapalus, king of Assyria. Observing the softness and effeminate manners of Sardanapalus, he could not brook obedience to him any longer. He therefore took arms in conjunction with the principal officers of the Median army; and he also entered into an alliance with Belesis, or Baladan (as the Scripture calls him), governor of Babylon. They united their forces, and attacked Sardanapalus with an army of four hundred thousand men. In the first three battles, which were fought against the king, Arbaces was worsted; but in the fourth, the Bactrians deserting to him, he attacked Sardanapalus suddenly in the night, and drove him from his camp. The king retired to Nineveh, and gave the command of his army to Salamenes, his wife's brother. Salamenes lost two battles against the conspirators, and almost the whole of his army. Nineveh was besieged three years, from the year of the world 3254 to 3257. In this last year the river Tigris being swelled in an extraordinary manner, by the rains, overflowed its banks, and beat down twenty-two furlongs, or two thousand five hundred and fifty paces of the city wall. The conspirators entered the breach, and selected their principal commander, Arbaces, as king. But Arbaces was content with having restored liberty to his country, and refused the title of king. After his death was an interregnum, which continued till the year of the world 3296, when Dejoces was acknowledged king of the Medes.

Dr. Prideaux asserts, that Tiglath-pileser and Arbaces are the same person, denoted under two distinct names. This is contrary to the opinion of Archbishop Usher, who supposes that the one possessed Media, and the other Assyria. Diodorus Siculus says positively, that Arbaces had Assyria, as well as Media, for his share in the partition of the former empire. If so, there is no room, says Prideaux, for a Tiglath-pileser, or a Ninus Junior, distinct from him, to reign in Assyria during his time. Prideaux Connect. Part I. Book I.

ARCH, TRIUMPHAL. It is said in our English translation of the Bible, (1 Sam. xv. 12.) that Saul, after the defeat of the Amalekites, 'set him up a place,' which is understood to mean a triumphal arch or monument. In the Hebrew, it signifies, 'he lifted up an hand.' We know not the nature or form of this monument; but it was probably some heap of stones, or a column, to preserve the memory of his victory. It is said, indeed, by the author of the Hebrew traditions on the Books of Kings, that Saul's triumphal arch was composed of branches of myrtle, palm, and olive-trees. The story acquires additional force, by this notice of the trophy; since we find that Saul, in the midst of his triumph, was punished by the predictions, &c. of Samuel. Perhaps the hand erected by Moses on, or over against, the throne of the Lord, (Exod. xvii. 15, 16.) might be of the same nature as this hand erected by Saul. Add. margin to Calmet's Dict.

ARCHANGEL, according to some divines, means an angel occupying the higher rank in the celestial hierarchy; but others, including Bishop Horsley, reckon it a title applicable only to our Saviour. Compare Jude 9. with Dan. xii. 1. and 1 Thess. iv. 16.

ARCHBISHOP, the chief or metropolitan bishop, who has under him several suffragans. Archbishops were not known in the east till about the year 320; and though soon after this there were some, who possessed the title, yet that was only a personal honour, by which the bishops of considerable cities were distinguished. Athanasius appears to have been the first, who used the title of archbishop.

The archbishop, besides the inspection of the bishops and inferior clergy in the province, over which he presides, exercises episcopal jurisdiction in his own diocese. He exercises ecclesiastical jurisdiction in his province, and is guardian of the spiritualties of any vacant see, as the king is of the temporalties. He is entitled to present by lapse to all the ecclesiastical livings in the disposal of his diocesan bishop, if not filled within six months. He has also a customary prerogative, on consecrating a bishop, to name a clerk or chaplain to be provided for by such bishop; instead of this, it is now usual to accept an option. He is said to be enthroned when vested in the archbishopric; whilst bishops are said to be installed.

The ecclesiastical government of England is divided into two provinces, Canterbury and York. To Canterbury appertain twenty-one; and to York, four suffragan bishoprics. The first archbishop of Canterbury was Austin, who was appointed by king Ethelred, on his conversion to Christianity, about the year 598. His grace of Canterbury is the first peer of England, and next to the royal family, having precedence of all dukes, and of all officers of the crown. It is his privilege by custom to crown the kings and queens of this kingdom. By common law, he possesses the power of probate of wills and testaments, and of granting letters of administration. He has also a power to grant licences and dispensations in all cases formerly sued for in the court of Rome, and not repugnant to the law of God. Accordingly, he issues special licences to marry, to hold two livings, &c.; and he exercises the right of conferring degrees.

The archbishop of York possesses the same rights in his province, as the archbishop of Canterbury. He has precedence of all dukes not of the royal blood, and of all officers of state, except the lord high chancellor. He has also in certain parts the rights of a count palatine. The first archbishop of York was Paulinus, who was appointed by Pope Gregory about the year 622. He had formerly jurisdiction over all the bishops of Scotland; but in the year 1470, pope Sixtus IV. created the bishop of St. Andrew's archbishop and metropolitan of all Scotland. Hurd on Religious Rites, Ceremonies, &c. p. 630.

ARCHDEACON, a priest invested with authority or jurisdiction over the clergy and laity, next to the bishop, either through the whole, or only a part of the diocese. In England are sixty archdeacons, whose office is to visit every two years in three, to inquire into the reparations and moveables belonging to the church, to reform abuses in ecclesiastical matters, and bring the more weighty affairs before the bishop. They have also a power to suspend and excommunicate; in many places to prove wills, and to induct all clerks within their respective jurisdictions. Hurd on Religious Rites, Ceremonies, &c. p. 633.

ARCHELA'US, Ἀρχέλαος, signifies prince of the people. Archelaus was the son of Herod the Great, and Malthace his wife. Herod having put to death his sons Alexander, Aristobulus, and Antipater, and expunged from his will Herod Antipas, whom he had declared king, substituted Archelaus, and gave Antipas only the title of tetrarch. After the death of Herod, Archelaus ordered that king's will to be read, in which he, Archelaus, was declared king, on condition that Augustus consented. Upon this, the whole assembly cried, 'Long live king Archelaus!' and the soldiers promised the same fidelity to him, as they had shown to his father. Archelaus buried his father magnificently, and came to Jerusalem, where, according to custom, he mourned seven days. He then gave a splendid entertainment to the people. He went to the temple, harangued the multitude, promised them good treatment, and declared that he could not assume the title of king till it had been confirmed by the emperor. These events took place in the year of the world 4001.

Though the people declared so readily for Archelaus, yet they assembled in a tumultuous manner, and demanded the execution of those, who advised Herod to slay certain zealots, that had pulled down a golden eagle from one of the temple gates. They also required Archelaus to divest Joazas of the high-priesthood; and they vehemently reproached the memory of the late king. Archelaus ordered some troops to march against the seditious people, of whom they killed near three thousand about the temple. After this, he embarked at Cæsarea for Rome, to procure from Augustus a confirmation of Herod's will. Antipas, his brother, went also to Rome, to dispute his title, pretending that Herod's first will should be preferred to his last, which, he said, had been made when his understanding was not entire.

The two brothers, Archelaus and Antipas, procured able orators to display their pretensions before the emperor; and when they had finished speaking, Archelaus threw himself at Augustus's feet. Augustus gently raised him, and said he would do nothing contrary to Herod's intention, or his interest, but refused to decide the matter at that time. Not long after this, the Jews sent a solemn embassy to Rome, desiring that Augustus would permit them to live according to their own laws, and continue them as a Roman province, without subjecting them to kings of Herod's family, and only to the governors of Syria. Augustus heard them, and also Archelaus in reply, and then dismissed the assembly without declaring himself. After some days, he sent for Archelaus, and gave him the title not of king, but of ethnarch, with one moiety of the territories, which his father Herod had enjoyed. He also promised him the crown, if he should deserve it by his conduct. Archelaus returned to Judæa, and, under pretence that Joazas had countenanced the seditions against him, deprived that high-priest of his dignity, which he gave to his brother Eleazar. Archelaus governed Judæa with so much violence, that, seven years after his return from Rome, the chiefs of the Samaritans and Jews accused him before Augustus. The emperor immediately sent for his agent at Rome, and, without condescending to write to that prince himself, commanded the agent to depart instantly for Judæa, and order Archelaus to Rome, that he might give an account of his conduct.

On the arrival of Archelaus at Rome, the emperor called for his accusers, and permitted him to defend himself. His defence, however, was so insufficient, that Augustus banished him to Vienne in Gaul, where he continued, in exile, to the end of his life. The exact time of his death has not been ascertained. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 10. et ult.; et de Bello. lib. i. cap. 6.

Joseph, on his return from Egypt, with the young child Jesus and his mother, having heard that Archelaus reigned in Judæa, in the room of his father Herod, was afraid to go thither; but being warned by God in a dream, he turned aside into the parts of Galilee, and dwelt in the city of Nazareth. (Matt. ii. 22.)

ARCHISYNAGOGUS, chief of the synagogue; the title of an officer among the Jews. There were generally several men of eminence, who presided in the synagogues, and in all assemblies held in them. Their number was not fixed, nor the same in all places, but depended on the extent of the cities where they were, or on the number of the people, who frequented the synagogue. In some synagogues there might be seventy elders who presided; in some, perhaps, ten; in some, four or five; and in others no more than one head, or archisynagogus. They are sometimes called by the Jews angels or princes of the synagogue, and also Chachamim, or wise men. They presided in the religious assemblies, and invited those to speak, who were thought capable of that office. They also judged of affairs relating to money, of thefts, and some other matters. They had a right to inflict whipping or other punishments on those convicted of acting contrary to the law. They could also excommunicate and expel from the synagogue those who deserved this punishment. Basnage's Hist. of the Jews, lib. vii. cap. 7.

ARCHITRICLINUS, Ἀρχιτρικλινος, signifies prince of the triclinium, or three beds. It is generally translated steward, but seems rather to denote the master or intendant of the feast. He was one, who was the husband's friend, and was commissioned to conduct the order and economy of the feast. He gave directions to the servants, superintended every thing, and, as he thought proper, commanded the tables to be covered or cleared of the dishes. Hence, his name as regulator of the triclinium, or festive-board. The author of Ecclesiasticus describes this office as follows: "If thou be made the master of a feast, lift not thyself up, but be among them as one of the rest; take diligent care of them, and so sit down. And when thou hast done all thy office, take thy place, that thou mayest be merry with them, and receive a crown for the well-ordering of the feast," (xxxii. 1, 2.) This office is mentioned in John ii. 8, 9. Theophylact well observes as follows: 'That no one,' says he, 'might suspect that their taste was vitiated, by having drunk to excess, so as not to know water from wine, our Saviour orders it to be first carried to the governor of the feast, who was certainly sober; for those, who on these occasions are entrusted with this office, observe the strictest sobriety, that they may be able properly to regulate the whole.'

ARCHONTICS, a sect which arose towards the close of the second century. They received their name from the Greek word ἀρχοντες, principalities, or hierarchies of angels; because they held that the world was not created by God, but by angels, called archontes. They also denied the resurrection of the body. They were a branch of Valentinians. Encycl. Brit. in verb.

ARCHPRIEST, or Archpresbyter, a priest established with a superiority over the rest. Anciently, the archpriest was the first person after the bishop. He was seated in the church next the bishop, and, during his absence, acted as his vicar in all spiritual concerns. In the sixth century there were several archpriests in the same diocese; and from this time, some are of opinion, that they were the same as our deans in cathedral churches. In the ninth century, they distinguished two kinds of cures or parishes: the smaller governed by simple priests; and the baptismal churches by archpriests. These last, besides the immediate concern of the cure, had the inspection of the inferior priests, and gave an account of them to the bishop, who governed in person the chief or cathedral church. In the Greek church are still archpresbyters, vested with most of the functions and privileges of chorepiscopi, or rural deans. Encyclop. Britan. in verb.

ARCTURUS, vy, Hasch, signifies properly the bear's tail, and denotes a star behind the great bear's tail. This star is of the first magnitude, and is situated at some distance from the great bear, and between the thighs of Bootes. Arcturus rises about the twelfth of September, and sets about the twenty-fourth of May; and its rising and setting are said to presage storms and bad weather. Speaking of the power of God, Job says, 'Which maketh Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and the chambers of the south,' (ix. 9.) In another place he says, 'Canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons?' (xxxviii. 32.) Hence some commentators think, that 'from this term of sons, Pleiades must be the constellation meant in this last passage, which our translators have rendered Arcturus.'

On this subject Costard says, Aish or Hasch, mentioned twice in the book of Job, signifies nothing more than a cluster; and therefore seems to be the same constellation as the Pleiades of the Greeks. As it is described along with its sons, these may mean the rest of the stars attending or following them; for the year began in those early times, with the heliacal risings of the Pleiades. Astron.

Niebuhr observes, that some of the Arabs call the Great Bear Ash, Nash, or Benat Nash; and from the conversation he had with Jewish astrologers, he is of opinion, that Ash signifies the Great Bear (Ursa Major), which is often called a chariot, Charles's wain; or rather, the four greater stars, or wheels of the wain, or waggon. Though what Niebuhr urges seems extremely probable, yet the Septuagint call Ash, or Aish, the Pleiades; but the most part, says Scheuzer, think that it denotes the Pole-star.

Pliny says, that Arcturus seldom rises without bringing hail and tempests; but the ancients were mistaken in this idea, for the rising, &c. of this and some other stars marked only that time of the year when storms might naturally be expected. Scripture Illustrated.

AREOPAGUS, Ἀρεοπαγος, signifies the hill of Mars. It was a sovereign tribunal at Athens, famous for the justice and impartiality of its decisions. In this court, the Areopagites, the celebrated and supreme judges of Athens, assembled. Authors are not agreed with respect to the number of judges that composed this august court; some reckoning thirty-one, some fifty-one, and others five hundred. It is probable, however, that their number was not always the same. At first, this tribunal consisted of only nine persons, who had all filled the office of archon, and had proved, in a solemn examination, that they had discharged their duty with equal zeal and fidelity. Their salary was equal, and paid from the treasury of the republic; and they received for each cause three oboli. The members held their office for life. They sat in judgment in the open air; and they met during the night, that their minds might be more attentive, and that no object of pity or aversion might influence them in favour of either the criminal or the accuser. The pleadings before them were in the simplest and most artless manner. At first, they took cognizance of criminal causes only, but in time their jurisdiction became very extensive.

Mr. Spon, who examined the antiquities of Athens, found some remains of the Areopagus still existing in the middle of the temple of Theseus. This building was once in the midst of the city, but is now without the walls. He says, that the foundation of the Areopagus is a semi-circle, with an esplanade of one hundred and forty paces round it, which properly formed the hall of the Areopagus. A tribunal is cut in the middle of a rock, with seats on each side, where the Areopagites sat exposed to the open air. It appears, however, from 'Stuart's Ruins of Athens,' that, though some small remains of the foundation of buildings are still visible upon the eminence, where the Areopagus was situated, yet there is nothing by which to determine its form or construction.

It is uncertain when this court was instituted; but its existence may be traced back to the time of Cecrops, who was probably its founder. Some, however, have asserted, that it was instituted by Solon, though it was certainly of a more ancient date.

St. Paul having preached at Athens against a plurality of gods, and declared that he came to reveal to the Athenians that God, whom they adored without knowing him, was carried before the Areopagites, as the introducer of a new religion. He spoke on this occasion with so much wisdom, that he converted Dionysius, one of his judges, and was dismissed without any interference on their part. (Acts xvii. 19, &c.) It is observable, that our translation, by calling it 'Mars'-hill,' has lost the correct representation of the passage, since Mars'-hill might not be a court of justice. The station of Dionysius, as one of the Areopagites, is also lost on the reader.

The appearance of the Areopagus is thus described by Dr. E. D. Clarke:—"It is not possible to conceive a situation of greater peril, or one more calculated to prove the sincerity of a preacher, than that in which the apostle was here placed: and the truth of this, perhaps, will never be better felt than by a spectator, who from this eminence actually beholds the monuments of pagan pomp and superstition, by which he, whom the Athenians considered as the setter forth of strange gods, was then surrounded: representing to the imagination the disciples of Socrates and of Plato, the dogmatist of the porch, and the sceptic of the academy, addressed by a poor and lowly man, who, rude in speech, without the enticing words of man's wisdom, enjoined precepts contrary to their taste, and very hostile to their prejudices. One of the peculiar privileges of the Areopagitæ seems to have been set at defiance by the zeal of St. Paul on this occasion; namely, that of inflicting extreme and exemplary punishment upon any person, who should slight the celebration of the holy mysteries, or blaspheme the gods of Greece. We ascended to the summit by means of steps cut in the natural stone. The sublime scene here exhibited is so striking, that a brief description of it may prove how truly it offers to us a commentary upon the apostle's words, as they were delivered upon the spot. He stood upon the top of the rock, and beneath the canopy of heaven. Before him there was spread a glorious prospect of mountains, islands, seas, and skies; behind him towered the lofty Acropolis, crowned with all its marble temples. Thus every object, whether in the face of nature, or among the works of art, conspired to elevate the mind, and to fill it with reverence towards that BEING, who made and governs the world, (Acts xvii. 24. 28.) who sitteth in that light, which no mortal eye can approach, and yet is nigh unto the meanest of his creatures; in whom we live, and move, and have our being." Dr. Clarke's Travels, vol. vi. pp. 263—265; Horne's Introduction to the Holy Scriptures, vol. iii. pp. 125, 126; Additions to Calmet's Dictionary.

ARE'TAS, 'Αρέτας, signifies one that is agreeable, that pleases, that is virtuous. Aretas, who was before called Æneas, succeeded Obodas, in the kingdom of Arabia. One Syllæus having prejudiced Augustus against him, by accusing him of assuming the crown of Arabia without waiting for the emperor's consent, Aretas was for some time very much perplexed, as he was at too great a distance to vindicate himself, and confute the calumnies of his enemy. At length, however, the emperor discovered the impostures of Syllæus, and confirmed Aretas in the kingdom. In the year of the world 3998, Herod Antipas married the daughter of Aretas; but he divorced her some time after, and took Herodias, his sister-in-law, the wife of his brother Philip. Aretas's daughter retiring to her father, he declared war against Antipas, under pretence of difficulties concerning the limits of Gamala. Antipas was entirely defeated; and every one considered this as a just punishment for the murder of John the Baptist, whom Herod had beheaded for reproving his incest. Additions to Calmet's Dict.

Antipas wrote to Tiberius an account of this war, and what had happened. The emperor was so much provoked, that he ordered Vitellius, then governor of Syria, to make war against Aretas, and if he could take him alive, to send him in person; but if not, to send his head. Vitellius advanced with his army to Ptolemais; and the Jews entreating him not to go through their country with his troops, by reason of the images borne on their standards, he marched through the great plain, and probably intended to pass the Jordan at Scythopolis. Vitellius himself went with his friends to Jerusalem, where he continued three days. During his stay here, news was brought that Tiberius was dead, and that Caius was elevated to the empire. Vitellius, therefore, being unwilling to commence this war without orders from the new emperor, commanded his army to return.

The following year, the apostle Paul, who had been some time at Damascus, and preached the Gospel with much zeal, was persecuted by the Jews of that city, then under the dominion of Aretas. They prevailed with the governor to keep the gates shut day and night, to prevent Paul from escaping. However, the apostle, being informed of their design, was let down in a basket over the city walls by the brethren, and so happily avoided their snares. (Acts ix. 23, 24, &c.; 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33.)

ARIANISM, the heresy of Arius, a presbyter of the church of Alexandria, about the year 315. He maintained, that the Son of God was totally and essentially distinct from the Father; that he was the first and noblest of those beings, whom God had created, the instrument by whose subordinate operation the Almighty Father formed the universe, and therefore inferior to the Father both in nature and dignity. His opinions concerning the Holy Ghost are not so well known.

The Arians acknowledged that the Son was the Word, but denied that Word to have been eternal. They held, that Christ had nothing of man in him but the flesh, to which was joined the Λόγος, or Word, the same as the soul in us. The opinions of Arius were no sooner divulged, than they found in Egypt, and the neighbouring provinces, a number of abettors, among whom were many distinguished as well by the superiority of their learning and genius, as by their rank and station. On the other hand, Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, in two councils assembled at that place, accused Arius of impiety, and caused him to be expelled from the communion of the church. Arius received this sentence with great firmness, and retired into Palestine, whence he wrote to the most eminent men of those times, and endeavoured to demonstrate the truth of his opinions. In this attempt he was so successful, that great numbers were induced to join him, and among these, Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, a man distinguished in the church by his influence and authority. The many disputes occasioned by the heresy of Arius, created so much disturbance in the church, that the emperor Constantine the Great, found himself under the disagreeable necessity of interposing between the contending parties. In the year 325 he assembled the famous council of Nice, in Bithynia, to which the deputies of the church universal were summoned, to put an end to this controversy. At this council were present three hundred and eighteen bishops, besides a vast number of other officers. Arius being ordered to appear, boldly supported his opinions. However, the sentence of excommunication, pronounced against him by Alexander, was confirmed. To this was added a decree of the emperor, which excluded him and all his followers from places either ecclesiastical or civil. At the same time they were condemned to perpetual banishment.

However, this severity did not long continue; for about three years after, all the Arian bishops were restored to their sees, and Arius himself was also recalled. Being permitted to wait on the emperor, Arius presented him with a confession of his faith, so artfully drawn up, that Constantine was satisfied. However, Athanasius, who was now advanced to the see of Alexandria, refused to admit him and his followers to communion. This so enraged the Arians, that, by their interest at court, they procured that prelate to be deposed and banished. But the church of Alexandria still refusing to admit Arius into their communion, the emperor sent for him to Constantinople; and on his delivering a fresh confession of his faith, in terms less offensive, the emperor commanded Alexander, the bishop of that church, to receive him the next day into his communion. However, that very evening Arius died. The manner of his death was very extraordinary: as his friends were conducting him in triumph to the great church of Constantinople, Arius, pressed by a natural necessity, stepped aside to ease himself; and his bowels gushing out, he expired on the spot. It is probable, that his death was occasioned by poison or some other violence. But this heresy did not die with the heresiarch. The Arian party found a protector in Constantius, who succeeded his father in the empire of the east; and the zeal with which he abetted them, produced many animosities and tumults to the time of his death, in the year 362. Under succeeding emperors they underwent various revolutions, sometimes persecuting, and at other times persecuted, according to the degree of interest they possessed in the civil powers, till at length Theodosius the Great exerted every possible means to suppress and disperse them. In their sentiments, the Arians acknowledged one God the Father; that the Son was a created being; and that the Holy Ghost was a ray or emanation of the Deity.

In the fifth century, Arianism was carried into Africa under the Vandals; and into Asia under the Goths. Italy, the Gauls, and Spain, were also deeply infected with it; and towards the commencement of the sixth century, it was triumphant in many parts of Asia, Africa, and Europe. But it sank almost at once, when, by the arms of Justinian, the Vandals were driven from Africa, and the Goths from Italy. However, it revived in Italy under the Lombards in the seventh century, and was not extinguished till about the end of the eighth. In 1531, Servetus, a Spaniard, revived Arianism again in the west, for which he suffered death. After his death, a new system of Arianism, which greatly perplexed Calvin, was formed at Geneva. From Geneva, the new Arians removed to Poland, where they gained considerable ground; but at length they became Socinians. It is thought that Erasmus, in his Commentaries on the New Testament, aimed to revive Arianism, and that the learned Grotius adopted the same doctrines.

The appellation of Arian has been indiscriminately applied in more modern times to all those, who consider Jesus Christ as inferior and subordinate to the Father; but it is evident that their sentiments cannot be supposed to coincide exactly with those of the ancient Arians. The most eminent writers among the Arians in the seventeenth century were Saudres and Biddle, though the latter may be more properly classed among the Socinians. Mr. Whiston was one of the first divines, that revived this controversy in the beginning of the eighteenth century. This learned visionary and upright man suffered considerably for his opinions. He was removed not only from his theological and pastoral functions, but also from his mathematical professorship at Cambridge, as if Arianism could extend its baneful influence even to the science of lines, angles, and surfaces! He was of opinion that at the incarnation of Christ, the Logos, or eternal wisdom, supplied the place of the rational soul; that the eternity of the Son of God was not a real distinct existence, as of a Son properly co-eternal with his Father by a true generation, but rather a metaphysical existence in potentia, or in some sublimer manner in the Father, as his wisdom or word; and that Christ's real creation, or generation, both of which are terms used by the earliest writers, took place some time before the creation of the world.

He was followed by Dr. Samuel Clarke, who published his famous book, entitled, 'The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity,' &c. To avoid Tritheism, he denied the self-existence of the Son and Holy Ghost, and maintained that they were derived from, and subordinate to, the Father. To avoid Sabellianism, he acknowledged the personality and distinct agency of the Son and Holy Ghost; and to escape from the dangers of Arianism, he asserted the eternity of the two divine subordinate persons. He maintained an equality of perfections between the three persons, but a subordination of nature in point of existence and duration. But though the doctor was so circumspect, yet his work was censured, and he was reproached with the title of Semi-Arian. He was also threatened by the convocation, and combated by argument. The learned Dr. Waterland was one of his principal adversaries, and stands at the head of a polemical body of eminent divines, such as Gastrell, Wells, Nelson, Mayo, Knight, and others, who appeared in this controversy. If, however, Dr. Clarke was accused of verging towards Arianism, by maintaining the derived and caused existence of the Son and the Holy Ghost, it seemed no less evident that Doctor Waterland verged towards Tritheism, by maintaining the self-existence and independence of these divine persons, and by asserting that the subordination of the Son to the Father is a subordination of office only, and not of nature. The history of this controversy during the last century, may be found in a pamphlet entitled, 'An Account of all the considerable Books and Pamphlets that have been wrote on either side, in the controversy concerning the Trinity, since the year 1712, in which is also contained, An Account of the Pamphlets written this last year on each side by the Dissenters, to the end of the year 1719.' This pamphlet was published in London, in the year 1720. The learned Dr. Stillingfleet well observes, 'Since both sides yield, that the matter they dispute about is above their reach, the wisest course they can take is, to assert and defend what is revealed, and not to be peremptory and quarrelsome about that, which is acknowledged to be above our comprehension; I mean as to the manner how the three persons partake of the divine nature.'

Arius owned Christ to be God in a subordinate sense, and considered his death to be a propitiation for sin; and his followers acknowledge that the Son was the Word; but they deny that Word to have been eternal, contending, that it had only been created prior to all other beings. Christ, say they, had nothing of man in him, except the flesh, with which the Λόγος, Word, spoken of by St. John, was united, which supplied the rest, and was the same in us as the soul. Though they deny that Christ is the eternal God, yet they contend against the Socinians for his pre-existence, which they found on our Lord's prayer,—'Glorify me with the glory, which I had with thee before the world was;' and on this expression, which he uses on another occasion,—'Before Abraham was, I am.' These, and many other texts of a similar kind, are, in their opinion, undeniable proofs that Christ did actually exist in another state, before he was born of the Virgin Mary.

But, 'whilst they all concur in maintaining the pre-existence of Christ as a superangelic Spirit, which supplied the place of a soul to him upon his conception and birth, and also his derivation from, and subordination to, the Father, some of them ascribe to him a higher degree, rank, and dignity, than others. Accordingly they have been sometimes distinguished into High and Low Arians. The former, approaching in opinion to those that have been called Semi-Arians, or rather to the ancient Arians, whilst they believe the Father to be the one supreme God over all, absolutely eternal, underived, unchangeable, and independent, conceive the Son to be the first derived Being from the Father, and under him employed in creating, and also in preserving and upholding, the world, and in exercising a moral, as well as natural, administration over mankind; so that, under this distinguishing character, he is invested with the office of final Judge.

'Of these High Arians, some suppose, that Jesus Christ sustaining relations, and exercising offices so honourable in themselves, and so interesting to mankind, is a proper object of subordinate worship; whilst others imagine, that worship, in the proper and discriminating sense of the term, belongs only to the Father, the self-existent, infinite, and supreme Deity.

'Some Arians of this class have maintained, that the Son of God, before his incarnation, had only, or chiefly, the care and government of the Jewish people allotted to him; whilst other angels were appointed presidents, or princes, of other nations and countries.

'Others have also maintained, that the conduct of all the dispensations of Providence, in every period of time, as they related to the patriarchs, to the Jewish nation, to the prophets, to Christians, and to the world in general, has been entrusted to Christ; and that he was distinguished by various appropriate titles, as Jehovah, the Angel of the Covenant, the Angel Jehovah, the Angel of the Presence and the Logos, &c. To this purpose they allege, among other arguments, the declaration of the apostle, (Heb. i. 2; ii. 3.) that it was by Christ God made the worlds, αἰῶνας, the ages, or dispensations, that is, by whom God formerly disposed those eminent and remarkable periods of time,—the antediluvian, the patriarchal, the Mosaic, and the present—being put under his government, according to the will of the Father. It is also alleged, as a further presumption in favour of this hypothesis, that the sacred writings contain a revelation and history of the administration of Providence, with regard merely to the inhabitants and concerns of our world, or of the terrestrial globe; and, of course, that the subordinate direction and superintendence of this part of the government of the supreme and infinite Sovereign of this, and innumerable other worlds, is entrusted with Jesus Christ: a superior Being, adapted by his pre-existent dignity, and extraordinary perfections and powers, to the office of Ruler and Judge.

'The Low Arians, on the other hand, are distinguished from the Socinians in no other respect, besides their maintaining the pre-existence, prior dignity, and transcendent native perfections, of that super-angelic spirit, which was united to the body of Christ, in his miraculous incarnation; but they hold that he is entitled to no kind of religious worship, in the peculiar and appropriate meaning of this term.'

Hence, while the High Arians believe that Christ is the Maker, Preserver, and Governor of the world, these modern Arians (a name by which the advocates of the hypothesis of the simple pre-existence of Christ, are willing to be distinguished, as well as by that of Unitarians) do not admit that he has any concern in its formation or government, or that he was in former ages, the medium of Divine dispensation to mankind.

The Arians believe that the Holy Ghost is not God, but the creature of the Son, begotten and created by him, and inferior in dignity to the Father and the Son. In their doxologies they ascribe 'Glory to the Father, through the Son.' It is also worthy of notice, that the friends of Arianism drew up seventeen different confessions of faith, within forty years, after they had rejected the Nicene Creed; that, after all, they would abide by none of these confessions; and it does not appear that they have had, to this day, any stated creed. That by Mr. B. Carpenter, in his Liturgy, 'to be said by the minister and people,' wants three articles, and is as follows: 'I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth; and in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, who taught us the way of God in truth, and set us an example, that we should follow his steps: who died for our sins, according to the Scriptures, and the third day rose again from the dead. He ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty; from thence he shall come to judge both the living and the dead. I believe in the Holy Spirit,—in the forgiveness of sins upon repentance,—in the necessity of a holy and religious life,—in the resurrection of the dead,—and in a future state of rewards and punishments; and I believe that, in every nation, he that feareth God and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him.'

The first Arians were accused of idolatry, for worshipping him whom they accounted a creature; and the more modern Arians, in order to evade this accusation, have framed a distinction between supreme and inferior worship; but this, like the Roman Catholic distinction of Latreia, and Dulia, does not appear to others to have any foundation in Scripture. Whiston, Clarke, Emlyn, Chandler, Benson, Pierce, and Grove, and, in short, all the most eminent Arians, whether churchmen or dissenters, have been worshippers of Christ; but we have been told, that 'since the publications of the late Dr. Price,' who was a great advocate of Arianism, the Arians 'seem to have abandoned the worship of Jesus Christ,' notwithstanding they still continue to believe that he is the Maker, Supporter, and Governor of the world, and the immediate Dispenser of all things pertaining both to life and godliness.

But though Dr. Clarke continued to join in the worship of the church of England, and even to take an active part in it, yet he thought he saw the necessity of reforming her liturgy; and accordingly, a short time before his death, he himself made and proposed some striking alterations, chiefly in the devotional parts, and with respect to the object of worship. All those passages, in which the Son and the Holy Ghost are called God, or divine worship is ascribed to either of them, he took the liberty of erasing, or of changing, so as to direct the worship to God the Father. This work, which, it is believed, was never published, was lodged by his son, Mr. Clarke, in the British Museum, and was intitled 'Amendments, humbly proposed to the consideration of those in authority, of the Book of Common Prayer,' &c. It does not appear that the Common Prayer, with these alterations, has been used in any congregation of Arians; but it, or something on the same plan, seems to be required by Arians and Unitarians; and it forms the ground-work of the liturgy used since 1774, in the Unitarian chapel, Essex-street, Strand.

According to Trinitarians, it is difficult to say which of the two is more unreasonable and unscriptural: Socinianism, which considers Christ as only a mere man, or Arianism, which regards him only as a supposititious God, 'a deified creature, a visible and inferior Jehovah.' Between these two, in their opinion, lies the true Christian faith, which, as it allows him to be 'perfect God and perfect man,' is never offended, or obliged to use any shifts, by what the Scripture says of him in either capacity.

'Nothing, indeed, is more repugnant to reason, than that a finite being should have made the universe; should uphold it; should possess it; should govern it; should judge and reward its intelligent inhabitants; should forgive their sins; should be the source of life; should communicate endless life; and should be the ultimate end for which they and all things else were created. Every one of these matters is not only utterly different from the dictates of reason on this subject (a mystery quite inexplicable), but is directly repugnant to common sense. Nothing is more strongly realized by reason, than that 'he who built all things is' very 'God;' that he who made the universe can alone uphold, possess, or govern it; or be the ultimate end, for which it was created; or do all or any of the things just now recited. If this Being be not God, in the absolute sense, reason has no knowledge and no evidence that there is a God.' Dwight's Theology, vol. ii. pp. 133, 134; *Rees's Cyclopæd. art. ARIMATHÆA, Ἀριμαθῖα, signifies a lion dead to the Lord, or light of the death to the Lord. It was the city of Joseph, the counsellor, who asked of Pilate the body of Jesus; and having taken it down from the cross, he wrapped it in linen, and laid it in a sepulchre, hewn in stone, in which never man before was laid. (Luke xxiii. 50, &c.) This city is supposed to be the same as Ramatha, (1 Sam. i. 1.) and to have been situated in the tribe of Ephraim. St. Jerome places Arimathæa between Lydda and Joppa.

ARISTARCHUS, Ἀριστάρχος, signifies a good prince. Aristarchus, mentioned by St. Paul, (Coloss. iv. 10. Philem. ver. 24.) and in the Acts of the Apostles, was a Macedonian, and a native of Thessalonica. He accompanied St. Paul to Ephesus, and continued with him during the two years of his abode in that city, partaking in all his labours and dangers. He had nearly been killed in a tumult raised by the Ephesian silversmiths. He left Ephesus with the apostle, and accompanied him into Greece and Asia, and thence to Rome. (Acts xix.; xx. 4.; xxvii. 2.) Ado, and the Roman martyrology, call him bishop of Thessalonica; but the Greeks say, that he was bishop of Apamea, in Syria, and beheaded with St. Paul at Rome under Nero.

ARISTOTELIANS, the followers of Aristotle. They believed in the eternity of the world, and represented the Deity as something similar to a principle of power that gives motion to a machine, and as happy in the contemplation of himself, but entirely regardless of human affairs. With respect to the human soul, they were uncertain as to its immortality. This sect derived their tenets as well as their name from Aristotle, and contributed to excite a proud and presumptuous spirit of infidelity. Encyclop. Britan. in verb.

ARK, or NOAH'S ARK, תיבה, Thebat, Κιβωτός, a chest, or Λάβναξ, a coffer. It was a floating vessel built by Noah, for the preservation of his family, and the several species of animals, during the deluge. (Gen.

vi. 14.) The term Thebat used by Moses is different from the common name by which he describes a coffer. He employs the same Hebrew word, when speaking of the little basket, in which he was exposed on the Nile; and hence some have thought, that the ark was of wicker-work. It was a sort of bark, in shape and appearance much like a chest, or trunk. The ancients inform us, that the Egyptians used on the Nile barks, which were made of bulrushes, and which were so light as to be carried upon their shoulders, when they met with falls of water that prevented their passage.

In all probability, Noah's ark was like these Egyptian boats, but infinitely larger. It has been observed, that the proportions of this vessel pretty nearly agree with those of the human figure, so that it resembled a dead body laid out for burial: 300 cubits in length is six times its breadth, 50 cubits; and ten times its height, 30 cubits. The body of a man lying on the water, flat on his back, will float without any exertion, so as to keep the mouth above water, and the nose free for the purpose of breathing. It would seem, therefore, that similar proportions would suit a vessel, whose purpose was floating only; and hence it has been thought by some not impossible that it might remain stationary all the time of the deluge.

If we reckon the Hebrew cubit at twenty-one inches, Noah's ark was 512 feet long, 87 wide, and 52 feet high; and its internal capacity was 357,600 cubical cubits. If we suppose the cubit to be only eighteen inches, its length was 450 feet, its width 75 feet, and its height 45 feet. Its figure was an oblong square, but the covering might have a declivity to carry off water. Its length exceeded that of most churches in Europe. Snellius computes the ark to have been above half an acre in area. Father Lamy shows, that it was 110 feet longer than the church of St. Mary, at Paris, and 64 feet narrower; and if so, it must have been longer than St. Paul's church in London from west to east, broader than that church is high in the inside, and 54 feet of our measure in height. Dr. Arbuthnot computes it to have been 81,062 tons.

The creatures contained in the ark were, besides eight persons of Noah's family, one pair of every species of unclean animals, and seven pairs of every species of clean animals, with provisions for them all during a whole year. At first view, the former appears almost infinite, but if we calculate, we shall find the number of species of animals less than is generally imagined, and that they do not amount to a hundred species of quadrupeds, nor to two hundred of birds. From this number are to be excepted in this case such animals as can live in the water. Zoologists usually reckon only one hundred and seventy species in all; and Bishop Wilkins shows, that only seventy-two of the quadruped kind needed a place in the ark.

By the description which Moses gives of the Ark, it appears to have been divided into three stories, each ten cubits or fifteen feet high. It is supposed to be most probable, that the lowest story was intended for the beasts; the middle for the food; and the highest for the birds, with Noah and his family; each story being subdivided into different apartments, stalls, &c. Josephus, Philo, and other commentators, add a kind of fourth story under the rest, and think that this was the hold of the vessel to contain the ballast, and receive the filth and faeces of so many animals. Father Calmet, however, is of opinion, that what is here called a story was no more than what is termed the keel in ships, and served only as a conservatory of fresh water. Drexelius reckons three hundred apartments; F. Fournier, three hundred and thirty-three; the anonymous author of the questions on Genesis, four hundred; Buteo, Temporalis, Arius Montanus, Hostus, Wilkins, Lamy, and others, suppose that there were as many partitions as different sorts of animals. Pelletier reckons only 72; 36 for the birds, and as many for the beasts. His reason is, that if we suppose a greater number as 333 or 400, each of the eight persons in the ark must have had 37, 41, or 50 stalls, to attend and cleanse daily, which he thinks could not be done. But it is observed that this argument is of little force. To diminish the number of stalls without the diminution of animals is in vain; and it is perhaps more difficult to take care of 300 animals in 72 stalls, than in 300. With respect to the number of animals contained in the ark, Buteo computes, that it could not be equal to 500 horses; and he even reduces the whole to the dimensions of 56 pairs of oxen. F. Lamy enlarges it to 64 pairs, or 128 oxen; and therefore, supposing one ox equal to two horses, if the ark could contain 256 horses, it would be sufficiently capacious for holding all the animals. The same author, however, demonstrates, that allowing nine square feet to a horse, one floor of the ark would be sufficient for 500 horses.

With respect to the food in the second story, it is observed by Buteo from Columella, that thirty or forty pounds of hay commonly suffice an ox during a day, and that a solid cubit of hay, as usually pressed down in our hay ricks, weighs about forty pounds. Hence a square cubit of hay is more than enough for one ox during a day. Now it appears, that the second story contained 150,000 solid cubits, which being divided among 206 oxen, will afford to each more hay by two-thirds, than he can eat in a year. Bishop Wilkins computes all the carnivorous animals equal, with respect to the bulk of their bodies and their food, to twenty-seven wolves; and all the rest to two hundred and eighty bees. For the former he allows 1825 sheep; and for the latter, 109,500 cubits of hay; all of which would be easily contained in the first two stories. With respect to the third story, no person doubts that it was sufficient for the fowls, with Noah, his sons, and daughters. On the whole, the learned Bishop remarks, that of the two, it appears much more difficult to assign a number and bulk of necessary things to correspond with the capacity of the ark, than to find sufficient room for the several species of animals, which it is known to have contained. This he attributes to the imperfection of our list of animals, especially those of the unknown parts of the earth. He adds, that the most learned and accurate calculators, and those most conversant in the building of ships, conclude, that if the ablest mathematicians had been consulted about proportioning the several apartments in the ark, they could not have done it with greater correctness than Moses has done; and this narration in the sacred history is so far from furnishing Deists with arguments, by which to weaken the authority of the Holy Scriptures, that, on the contrary, it supplies good arguments to confirm that authority; since it seems in a manner impossible for a man in Noah's time, when navigation was so imperfect, to discover by his own wit and invention, such accuracy and regularity of proportion, as is remarkable in the dimensions of the ark. It follows, therefore, that the correctness must be attributed to divine inspiration, and to a supernatural direction.

It is observable, that, besides the places requisite for the beasts and birds, and their provisions, space would be required for Noah to preserve household utensils, the instruments of husbandry, grains, and seeds, with which to sow the earth after the deluge. For this purpose it is thought Noah might spare room in the third story for thirty-six cabins, besides a kitchen, a hall, four chambers, and a space about forty-eight cubits in length, in which he and his family might walk. It has been asked how long was Noah in building the ark? Interpreters generally believe that he was an hundred and twenty years; and this opinion is founded on the following words: 'My spirit shall not always strive with man for that he also is flesh; yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years.' (Gen. vi. 3.) They suppose that God by this predicted an interval of only 120 years to the deluge; and that this time was necessary for Noah to make preparations to build the ark, to preach repentance, and to collect provisions, animals, &c. But how shall we reconcile this with what is afterwards said, that Noah was five hundred years old when he begat Shem, Ham, and Japheth? (Gen. v. 32.)

And when God commands him to build the ark, he says, 'Thou shalt come into the ark, thou and thy sons, and thy wife, and thy sons' wives with thee.' (Gen. vi. 18.) At that time his three sons, who were not born till after the five hundredth year of his age, were all married, though the deluge happened in the six hundredth year of Noah. It is therefore impossible, that he should have received orders to build the ark one hundred and twenty years before the deluge, unless, in fact, Noah had other sons, though only these three attended to his order. Or, it may be said, that when Noah is declared to have begotten Shem, Ham, and Japheth, at five hundred years of age, it should be translated had begotten, instead of begat.

The wood, of which the ark was built, is called in the Hebrew, גפר עצי Gopher-woods, and in the Septuagint, ξύλα τετραγώνια, square pieces of wood. Some translate it cedar; some, pine; others, box, &c. Pelletier prefers cedar, on account of its incorruptibility; and this wood was so plentiful in Asia, that as Herodotus and Theophrastus relate, the kings of Egypt and Syria built whole fleets of it instead of deal. The common tradition also throughout the east is, that the ark is still preserved entire upon mount Ararat. Our learned countryman, Mr. Fuller, has observed in his Miscellanies, that the wood, of which the ark was built, was that which the Greeks call κυπάρισσος, or cypress; for if we take away the termination, cupar and gopher will differ very little in sound. Bochart has also shown, that no country abounds so much with this wood, as that part of Assyria, which is contiguous to Babylon. Yet the accuracy of Mr. Fuller's observation may be reasonably doubted. Dr. Geddes says, that the ark was made of wicker work! and Abraham Dawson renders the passage, 'Make thee an ark of bulrushes; of reeds shalt thou make it!!' These are certainly strange ideas. Some writers have thought that for the building of this ark Noah was to take two kinds of woods (otzi, plural), gopher, and kanan, mentioned in the margin. The gopher, i. e. the inflammable, resinous kind (the pine) was used for the uprights, the main beams, the ribs, and other places requiring strength; and this kind of tree abounded upon the mountains, where Noah is supposed to have dwelt. Kanan, or long canes, which grew in the neighbouring marshes, were nailed along the upright ribs, both on the outside and on the inside.

In what place Noah built and finished the ark, is also a matter of dispute. Some suppose that he built it in Palestine, and planted in the plains of Sodom the cedars of which it was made. Some think that it was built upon mount Caucasus, on the confines of India; some in China, where they imagine Noah dwelt before the flood; in Chaldaea, where, in the time of Alexander, was so great a quantity of cypress in the groves and gardens, that that prince, for want of other timber, built of it a whole fleet. There is also a Chaldaean tradition, which says, that Xithurus (another name for Noah) set sail from that country.

The Mahometans say, that while Noah was employed in this building, the wicked rallied him. Some said, to what purpose is a vessel built in the open plain at such a distance from the waters? Some exclaimed in a way of ridicule, which has become proverbial, 'You have made a ship, now bring it to the waters.' Others said, that after having long practised the business of a husbandman, he was at last reduced to that of a carpenter. But his answer to them was, 'I shall have my turn; and you will learn, at your expense, who he is that punishes the wicked in this world, and reserves chastisement for them in the next.'

The number of men and animals which were included in the ark has plentifully supplied matter of dispute. However, about the number of men, if we observe the texts of Moses, and Peter, we shall have no contest: Moses expressly says, that Noah went into the ark, himself, his wife, his three sons, and their wives; and St. Peter tells us, that there were only eight persons saved from the deluge. In fixing the number of animals, Moses perplexes us in these words: 'Of every clean beast thou shalt take to thee by sevens, the male and his female; and of beasts that are not clean by two, the male and his female.' In the Hebrew, Samaritan, &c. the reading is seven, seven, two, two, went in. The text will, therefore, bear to be construed seven and seven, in like manner as it is said in the Gospel, that our Saviour sent away his disciples two and two, and they departed two and two, not four and four together. This opinion is followed by almost all commentators. Nevertheless, the contrary opinion is not without defenders, and the original text may signify fourteen clean beasts or seven pairs; and of unclean, two pairs or only one pair.

It may be asked, what are we to understand by clean and unclean beasts? Was this distinction, which is declared by Moses in the law, known and practised before the deluge? Or did Moses mention it as known and understood by the people, for whom he wrote? It seems probable that this distinction was known to Noah, and that the same animals were esteemed pure or impure both by him and the Jews. It is manifest, that by pure animals in general are meant those only, which might be offered in sacrifice, as bulls, sheep, goats, and their several species; and of birds, as pigeons, doves, hens, and sparrows. For the common uses of life, as food, &c. Moses allows a greater number of animals; but it would seem that in this place we are not to extend the pure animals beyond those admitted in sacrifice. The pair of unclean beasts could be only one male and one female; but the seven clean beasts might be two males and five females; one male for sacrifice, and the rest for multiplying the species. Taylor's Scripture Illustrated, Exposit. Index, p. 18; Univ. Hist. Book i. Chap. i.

ARK of the COVENANT, אָרֹן, arun, denotes the coffer or chest, in which the tables containing the commandments were deposited. This coffer was three feet nine inches in length, two feet three inches in breadth, and two feet three inches in height; and besides the tables of the covenant, it contained the golden pot that held manna, and Aaron's rod, (Exod. xvi. 33. Numb. xvii. 10. Heb. ix. 4.) It was made of shittim-wood, and covered with a lid of solid gold. This lid or covering was called the propitiatory or mercy-seat; at the two ends of which were two cherubim, that looked towards each other with expanded wings, and embracing the whole circumference of the mercy-seat, met on each side in the middle, (Exod. xxv. 17-22, &c.) Here the Shechinah or divine presence rested both in the tabernacle and the temple, and appeared in a cloud. (Levit. xvi. 2.) Hence issued the divine oracles by an audible voice, as often as God was consulted in the behalf of his people. Hence also God is said in Scripture to dwell between the cherubim on the mercy-seat, because there was the seat or throne of the appearance of his glory, (2 Kings xix. 15. 1 Chron. xiii. 6. Psalm lxxx. 1.) For this reason the high-priest appeared before the mercy-seat once every year on the great day of expiation, when he approached nearest to the divine presence to mediate and make an atonement for the whole people of Israel. On the two sides of the ark were four rings of gold, two on each side; and through these rings were put staves overlaid with gold, by means of which it was carried upon the shoulders of the Levites, when they marched through the wilderness, &c. (Exod. xxv. 13, 14; xxvii. 5. Numb. iv.)

After the passage of Jordan, the ark continued for some time at Gilgal, whence it was removed to Shiloh. From this place the Israelites carried it to their camp; and, in an engagement with the Philistines, the ark of the Lord was taken by the enemy. The Philistines, oppressed by the hand of God, returned the ark, and it was lodged at Kirjath-jearim. It was afterwards in the reign of Saul at Nob. David conveyed it to Obed-edom, and thence to his palace at Sion; and lastly, Solomon brought it into the temple at Jerusalem. It remained in the temple with all suitable respect till the times of the latter kings of Judah, who gave themselves up to idolatry, and were so daring as to establish their idols in the very holy place itself. The priests, unable to endure this profanation, removed the ark, and carried it from place to place, to preserve it from the impiety of these princes. Josiah commanded them to bring it back to the sanctuary, and forbade them to carry it into the country, as they had hitherto done. (2 Chron. xxxv. 3.)

It is doubted, with good reason, whether the ark was replaced in the temple after the return of the Jews from Babylon. Dr. Prideaux, however, is of opinion, that as the Jews found it necessary for the celebration of their worship in the second temple to have a new altar of incense, a new table of shew bread, and a new candlestick, they had also a new ark. Since the holy of holies, and the veil drawn before it, were entirely for the sake of the ark, there would have been no need of these in the second temple, if the ark, to which they referred, had been wanting.

Some think that Nebuchadnezzar conveyed the ark to Babylon, among the spoil of rich vessels carried off by him from the temple. Others are of opinion, that Manasseh having set up idols in the temple, took away the ark, which was not returned during his reign. The author of Esdras represents the Jews as lamenting that the ark of the covenant was taken by the Chaldeans among the plunder of the temple. (2 Esdras x. 22.)

The Gemara of Jerusalem and that of Babylon, acknowledged that the ark of the covenant was one of the things wanting in the second temple. The Jews flatter themselves that it will be restored by their Messiah; but Jeremiah, speaking of the time of the Messiah, says, they shall neither talk nor think of the ark, nor remember it any more. (Jer. iii. 16.) Ezra, Nehemiah, the Maccabees, and Josephus, never mention the ark in the second temple; and Josephus says expressly, that when Jerusalem was taken by Titus, nothing was found in the sanctuary.

Lastly, the Rabbins agree in saying, that after the captivity of Babylon, the ark was not extant at Jerusalem; and that the foundation stone, which they believe to be the centre of the holy mountain, was placed in the sanctuary in its room. The fathers and Christian commentators agree generally with the Jews in this matter.

The ark of the covenant was the centre of worship to all those of the Hebrew nation who served God according to the Levitical law. Not only in their worship in the temple, but in whatever country they were dispersed, when they prayed, they turned their faces towards the place where the ark stood. (Dan. vi. 10.) Hence the author of the book of Cosiri says, that the ark, with the mercy-seat and cherubim, was the foundation of the temple, and of the whole Levitical worship.

The Heathens also had their religious chests or cistæ, in which they deposited their most sacred things. In certain processions in Egypt was a chest-bearer, who carried a box containing the richest things for their religious uses. We likewise read of a box, in which the Trojans locked up their mysteries, and which, at the siege of Troy, fell to the share of Euripulus. The same custom prevailed among the Greeks and Romans. It has been doubted, whether the sacred chests of the Heathen did not refer originally to the ark of Noah, rather than to the ark of Moses. As instances of commemoration, it seems more probable that they represented the former, of which the tradition was constant and general, than the latter, of which the knowledge and the interest were very feeble, if at all sensible in distant, and especially in Heathen countries. It is, however, observable, that a chest or coffer very nearly resembling the Jewish ark, and called the house of God, was found in Huaheine, one of the islands in the South Sea. Hawkesworth's Collection of Voyages, vol. ii.; Prideaux's Connect. Part I. B. iii. p. 204, &c.

ARMAGED'DON, Ἀρμαγεδδών, signifies the mountain of Megiddo, the mountain of the Gospel. Armageddon is a place spoken of in the book of Revelation, (xvi. 16.) According to Mr. Pool, it does not signify any particular place, but, as some think, alludes in this passage to the city of Megiddo in the great plain at the foot of Mount Carmel. Here Barak overcame Sisera and his great army, (Judg. v. 19;) and here good king Josiah received his mortal wound in the battle against Necho, king of Egypt. ARME'NIA, אררט, Ararat, a province of Asia, consisting of the modern Turcomania and part of Persia. It is bounded on the north by Georgia, on the south by Curdistan, the ancient Assyria, and on the west by Nattolia, or the Lesser Asia. In this province are the sources of the Tigris and Euphrates, and those of the Araxes and Phasis; and in it many suppose Eden and also Paradise to have been situated. The name Armenia is derived either from Aram, the father of the Syrians, or from Harmini, the mountain of the Mineans. Moses says, that the ark rested upon the mountains of Armenia, according to the Vulgate; but in the Septuagint and Hebrew, the reading is Ararat, (Gen. viii. 4.) In the Second Book of Kings, it is said, that the two sons of Sennacherib, after having killed their father, escaped into Armenia, or, according to the Hebrews, the land of Ararat, (xix. 37.)

It seems highly probable, that both the Greater and the Lesser Armenia were enlightened with the knowledge of the truth in the first, or early in the second, century; but the Armenian church was not completely formed till the beginning of the fourth century, when Gregory, the son of Anax, commonly called the Enlightener, converted to Christianity Tiridates, king of Armenia, and all the nobles of his court. Gregory was consecrated bishop of the Armenians by Leontius, Bishop of Cappadocia; and his ministry was crowned with such success, that the whole province was soon converted to the Christian faith. From that period Armenia has undergone so many revolutions, that it must appear more remarkable, that the Armenians should still persevere in the Christian faith, than that they should deviate in many particulars from the original doctrines of their church. They no longer exist collectively as a nation, once famous for the wealth and luxury of its monarchs; but successively subjected to the Turks, Tartars, and Persians, they have preserved only their native language, and the remembrance of their ancient kingdom.

Early in the seventeenth century, the state of the Armenian church underwent a considerable change, in consequence of the incursions of Abbas the Great, king of Persia, into Armenia. This prince, to prevent the Turks from approaching his frontier, laid waste all that part of Armenia, which was contiguous to his dominions, and ordered the inhabitants to retire into Persia. In the general emigration that ensued, the more opulent of the Armenians removed to Ispahan, the capital of Persia, where they were allowed a beautiful suburb for their residence, and the free exercise of their religion. After the death of this generous monarch, the storm of persecution that arose upon them shook their constancy. Many of them apostatized to the Mahometan religion, and it was justly to be feared that this branch of the Armenian church would gradually perish. On the other hand, the state of religion in that church derived considerable advantage from the settlement of a great number of Armenians in different parts of Europe, for the purpose of commerce. These merchants, who had fixed their residence during this century in London, Amsterdam, Marseilles, and Venice, were not unmindful of the interests of religion in their native country. They supplied their Asiatic brethren with Armenian translations of the Holy Scriptures, and with theological books from the European presses, especially from those of England and Holland. These works were dispersed among the Armenians, who lived under the Turkish and Persian governments, and without doubt contributed to preserve that people from falling into the most deplorable ignorance.

The Armenian was formerly considered as a branch of the Greek church. It professed the same faith, and acknowledged the same subjection to the see of Constantinople, till nearly the middle of the sixth century, when the heresy of the Monophysites spread through Africa and Asia, and comprehended the Armenians among its votaries. But, though the members of this church still agree with the other Monophysites in the principal doctrine of that sect, respecting the unity of the divine and human nature in Christ, they differ from them in so many points of faith, worship, and discipline, that they hold no communion with that branch of the Monophysites who are Jacobites in the more limited sense of that term, nor with either the Copts or the Abyssinians.

The Armenians allow and accept the articles of faith according to the council of Nice; and use the Apostles' Creed. With respect to the Trinity, they agree with the Greeks in acknowledging three persons in one divine nature, and that the Holy Ghost proceeds only from the Father. They believe that Christ descended into hell, and liberated thence all the souls of the damned, by the grace and favour of his glorious presence; that this liberation was not for ever, nor by a plenary pardon or remission, but only till the end of the world, when the souls of the damned shall again be returned into eternal flames.

Du Pin insinuates, that the Armenians were reconciled to the church of Rome at the council of Florence, in the middle of the fifteenth century; but if we attend to the learned and judicious Dr. Mosheim, we shall find that the scheme of comprehension projected in that council was completely frustrated, not only in regard to the Greek church, but to all the Oriental churches. At the same time it ought to be acknowledged, that the subsequent attempts of the Roman missionaries on the faith of the Armenians have not been altogether unsuccessful.

The Armenians believe, that neither the souls, nor the bodies, of any saints or prophets, departed this life, are in heaven, except the blessed Virgin, and the prophet Elias. Yet, notwithstanding their opinion that the saints shall not be admitted into heaven till the day of judgment, by a certain imitation of the Greek and Latin churches, they invoke those saints with prayers, reverence and adore their pictures and images, and burn to them lamps and candles. The saints commonly invoked by them, are all the prophets and apostles; and also St. Silvester, St. Savorich, &c.

They worship after the Eastern manner, by prostrating their bodies, and kissing the ground three times. When they first enter the church, they uncover their heads, and cross themselves three times; but afterwards, they cover their heads, and sit cross-legged on carpets. The greatest part of their public divine service is performed in the morning before it is light. They are very devout on vigils to feasts, and on Saturday evenings, when they all go to church, and, after their return home, perfume their houses with incense, and adorn their little pictures with lamps. In their monasteries, the whole Psalter of David is read over every twenty-four hours; but in the cities and parochial churches, the Psalter is divided into eight portions, and each portion into eight parts, at the end of each of which is said the Gloria Patri, &c.

The rites and ceremonies of the Armenian church greatly resemble those of the Greek. Their liturgies also are essentially the same, or at least are ascribed to the same authors. The fasts, which they observe annually, are not only more numerous, but kept with greater rigour and mortification than is usual in any other Christian community. They mingle the whole course of the year with fasting: and there is not a single day, which is not appointed either for a fast or a festival. They commemorate our Lord's nativity on the 6th of January, and thus celebrate in one festival his birth, epiphany, and baptism.

The Armenians practise the trine immersion, which they consider as essential to baptism. After baptism, they apply the myron or chrism, and anoint the forehead, eyes, ears, breast, palms of the hands, and soles of the feet, with consecrated oil, in the form of a cross. Then they administer to the child the eucharist, with which they only rub its lips. The eucharist is celebrated only on Sundays and festivals. They do not mix the wine with water, nor put leaven into their bread, as do the Greeks. They steep the bread in the wine, and thus the communicant receives both kinds together, — a form different from that of the Latin, Greek, and reformed churches. They differ from the Greeks in administering bread unleavened, made like a wafer; and, from the Romans, in giving both kinds to the laity.

When the Armenians withdrew from the communion of the Greek church, they did not change their ancient episcopal form of church government, but claimed only the privilege of choosing their own spiritual rulers. The name and office of patriarch was continued; but three or four prelates shared that dignity. The chief of these exercises his jurisdiction over Turcomania, or Armenia Major, and is said to number among his suffragans forty-two archbishops, each of whom can claim the obedience of four or five suffragans. Though this prelate is elevated to the highest rank of ecclesiastical power and preferment, yet he rejects all the splendid insignia of authority, and fares no better than the poorest monastic. The Armenians place much of their religion in fasting and abstinences; and, among the clergy, the higher the degree, the lower they must live, inasmuch that the archbishops are said to live on pulse only.

The second patriarch of the Armenians rules over the churches established in Capadocia, Cilicia, Cyprus, and Syria, and has under his jurisdiction twelve archbishops.

The third, and last in rank of the Armenian patriarchs, has no more than eight or nine bishops under his jurisdiction.

In the Armenian, as in the Greek church, a monastery is considered as the only proper seminary for dignified ecclesiastics; and it seems to be a tenet of their church, that abstinence in diet, and austerity of manners, should increase with preferment. Hence, though their priests are permitted to marry once, their patriarchs and mastabets (or martabets), that is, bishops, must remain in a state of strict celibacy. It is also necessary that their dignified clergy should assume the sanctimonious manners of an ascetic.

Their monastic discipline is extremely severe. Their monks neither eat flesh nor drink wine; and they sometimes continue in prayer from midnight till three o'clock in the afternoon, during which time they are required to read the whole Psalter, besides performing many other spiritual exercises.

The extreme ignorance of the Armenian clergy, even with respect to their own doctrine, is palliated, if possible, by their wretched and abject state. The chief part of their income arises from what we call surplice fees, in the exaction of which they are said to be very encroaching and importunate. Adams's Religious World Displayed, vol. i. p. 408, &c.; Buchanan's Christian Researches, p. 255, &c.

ARMIES. The Lord, in Scripture, assumes the name of the God of Hosts, or of armies. The Hebrew word עֲבָאֹת, zabaoth, which signifies armies, is often understood of flocks of sheep; and in several places armies are compared to flocks. (1 Kings xx. 27. Jer. iii. 19. Psalm lxxvii. 20, &c.) The Hebrew nation, in many places, is called the army of the Lord, because their head and general was God, who named the captains of their armies, who ordained war and peace, and whose priests sounded the trumpets, &c.

The armies of Israel were not composed of troops kept constantly in pay; but the whole nation were fighting men, ready to march, as occasion required. The army expected no reward besides honour, and the captured spoils, which were divided by the chiefs. Each soldier furnished himself with arms and provisions, and their wars were generally of a short duration. They fought on foot, and had no horse in their army till the reign of Solomon. David was the first who had regular troops; and his successors, for the most part, had only militia, except their body guards, which were not very numerous. When they were ready to give battle, proclamation was made at the head of every battalion. (Deut. xx. 5.)

The ark of God was generally borne in the army, and was not out of the camp during the whole time of Israel's abode in the wilderness. Joshua ordered it to be carried almost constantly with him in his wars against the Canaanites. The Israelites being vanquished by the Philistines, in the time of Eli, the high-priest, they sent for the ark; and, on its coming, they were filled with joy, whilst terror spread through the camp of the Philistines. (1 Sam. iv. 4, 5.) David commanded it to be carried to the siege of Rabbah; and being compelled to flee before his son Absalom, the high-priest, Zadok, brought out to him the ark, but David ordered it back to Jerusalem. (2 Sam. xv. 24.) In imitation of Judah, the Israelites of the ten tribes carried their golden calves with them in their camp, as the Philistines did their idols. (1 Chron. xiv. 12. 2 Chron. xiii. 8.)

ARMINIANS, those who maintain the doctrines respecting Predestination and Grace, which were embraced and defended by James Harmensen, or Arminius, an eminent Protestant divine, and a native of Holland, who flourished at the beginning of the seventeenth century. The same religionists have also obtained the name of Remonstrants, particularly on the continent, because, in 1610, they presented to the States of Holland a petition, intitled their Remonstrance, in which they state their grievances, and pray for relief.

Arminius, from whom are derived the origin and the name, but not the doctrines of the sect, was born in 1560, and died in 1609. He first studied at Leyden, and then at Geneva. Whilst at the university of Geneva, he studied under Beza, by whom he was instructed in the doctrines of Calvin; and having been judged by Martin Lydius, professor of divinity at Franeker, a proper person to refute a work, in which the Calvinistic doctrine of Predestination had been attacked by some ministers of Delft, he undertook the task. On a strict examination of the reasons on both sides, he became a convert to the opinions, which he was employed to refute, and afterwards went still farther than the ministers of Delft. The result of his inquiries on this, and other subjects connected with it, was, that thinking the doctrine of Calvin, with respect to free-will, predestination, and grace, too severe, he expressed his doubts respecting them in the year 1591, and at length adopted the religious system of those, who extend the love of God, and the merits of his Son, to all mankind.

After his appointment to the theological chair of Leyden, in 1603, he avowed and vindicated the principles which he had embraced; and the freedom with which he published and defended them, exposed him to the resentment of those, who adhered to the theological system of Calvin, and in particular to the opposition of Gomar, his colleague.

After the death of Arminius, the controversy thus begun, became more general, and threatened to involve the United Provinces in civil discord. However, the Arminian tenets gained ground, and were adopted by several persons of merit and distinction.

The Calvinists, or Gomarists, as they were now called, appealed to a national Synod. Accordingly, a Synod was convened at Dordrecht, or Dort, and was composed of ecclesiastical and lay deputies from the United Provinces, and also of ecclesiastical deputies from the reformed churches of England, Switzerland, Bremen, Hesse, and the Palatinate. This Synod sat from the first of November, 1618, to the twenty-sixth of April, 1619. The principal advocate in favour of the Arminians was Episcopius, who was at that time professor of divinity at Leyden.

The Arminians insisted on beginning with a refutation of the Calvinistic doctrines, especially that of reprobation; whilst the other party determined, that, as the Remonstrants were accused of departing from the reformed faith, they ought first to justify themselves by Scriptural proof that their own opinions were well founded. As the Arminians would not submit to this latter mode of proceeding, they were banished the Synod for their refusal. Their cause was tried in their absence; and they were pronounced guilty of pestilential errors, and condemned as corrupters of the true religion. In consequence of this decision, which some think was premeditated and determined even before the meeting of the Synod, they were considered as enemies to their country, and its established religion, and were exposed to much persecution. They were treated with great severity, and deprived of all their posts and employments. Their ministers were silenced, and their congregations suppressed. The great Barneveldt lost his life on a public scaffold; and the learned Grotius, being condemned to perpetual imprisonment, made his escape, and took refuge in France. However, after the death of prince Maurice, in 1625, the Arminians, who had been driven into exile, were restored to their former reputation and tranquillity; and under the toleration of the States, which was granted them in 1630, they erected churches, and founded a college at Amsterdam, in which Episcopius was appointed the first theological professor.

The religious principles of the Arminians have insinuated themselves more or less into the established church in Holland, and infected the theological system of many of those pastors, who are appointed to maintain the doctrine and authority of the Synod of Dort. The principles of Arminius were early introduced into various other countries, as Britain, France, Geneva, and many parts of Switzerland; but their progress is said to have been rather retarded of late, especially in Germany and several parts of Switzerland, by the prevalence of the Leibnitzian and Wolfian philosophy, which is more favourable to Calvinism.

The distinguishing tenets of the Arminians may be said to consist chiefly in the different light, in which they view the subjects of the five points, or in the different explanation, which they gave to them, as comprised in the five following articles; Predestination, Universal Redemption, the Corruption of Human Nature, Conversion, and Perseverance. See CALVINISM.

1. With respect to the first, they maintained,—‘That God, from all eternity, determined to bestow salvation on those, who he foresaw would persevere unto the end in their faith in Jesus Christ, and to inflict everlasting punishments on those, who should continue in their unbelief, and resist to the end his divine assistance;—so that election was conditional, and reprobation, in like manner, the result of foreseen infidelity and persevering wickedness.’

2. On the second point they taught,—‘That Jesus Christ, by his sufferings and death, made an atonement for the sins of all mankind in general, and of every individual in particular; that, however, none but those, who believe in him, can be partakers of their divine benefit.’

3. On the third article they held,—‘That true faith cannot proceed from the exercise of our natural faculties and powers, nor from the force and operation of free will; since man, in consequence of his natural corruption, is incapable either of thinking or doing any good thing: and that therefore it is necessary to his conversion and salvation, that he be regenerated, and renewed by the operation of the Holy Ghost, which is the gift of God through Jesus Christ.’

4. On the fourth, they believed,—‘That divine grace, or the energy of the Holy Ghost, begins and perfects every thing, that can be called good in man, and consequently all good works are to be attributed to God alone;—that, nevertheless, this grace is offered to all, and does not force men to act against their inclinations, but may be resisted and rendered ineffectual by the perverse will of the impenitent sinner.’

5. On the fifth, they held,—‘That God gives to the truly faithful, who are regenerated by his grace, the means of preserving themselves in this state; and though the first Arminians entertained some doubts respecting the closing part of this article, their followers uniformly maintain, ‘that the regenerate may lose true justifying faith, fall from a state of grace, and die in their sins.’

It appears, therefore, that the followers of Arminius believe that God, having an equal regard for all his creatures, sent his Son to die for the sins, not of the elect only, but of the whole world; that no mortal is rendered finally unhappy by an eternal and invincible decree, but that the misery of those, who perish, arises from themselves; and that, in this present imperfect state, believers, if not peculiarly vigilant, may, through the force of temptation, and the influence of Satan, fall from grace, and sink into final perdition.

They found these sentiments on the expressions of our Saviour, respecting his willingness to save all that come unto him; especially on his prayer over Jerusalem; on his sermon on the mount; and above all, on his delineation of the process of the last day, in which the salvation of men is not said to have been obtained by any decree, but because 'they had done the will of their Father, who is in heaven.' This last argument they deem decisive. They also say, that the terms respecting election in the Epistle to the Romans, are applicable only to the state of the Jews as a body, and relate not to the religious consideration of individuals, either in this world, or the next. Mosheim's Ecclesiastical Hist.; vol. v. p. 464, &c. Evans's Sketch; Adams's Religious World, vol. ii. p. 245, &c.

ARMS of the Hebrews. The Hebrews used in war the offensive arms employed by other people of their time, and of the East; swords, darts, lances, javelins, bows, arrows, and slings. For defensive arms they made use of helmets, cuirasses, bucklers, and armour for their thighs. At particular periods, especially when under a state of servitude, whole armies of Israelites were without any good weapons. In the war of Deborah and Barak against Jabin, neither shields nor lances were among forty thousand men. (Judg. v. 8.) In the time of Saul, none in Israel, besides Saul and Jonathan, were armed with swords and spears, (1 Sam. xiii. 22.) because the Philistines, who were masters of the country, forbade the Hebrews to use the trades of armourers and sword-cutlers, and even obliged them to employ Philistines to sharpen their tools of husbandry. But as the Philistines were their masters, they would make for them no arms.

Arms were anciently made either of brass or of iron. In Scripture, we meet with brazen shields, helmets, and bows. The helmet, greaves, and target of Goliath, were of brass. The Hebrews were expert archers and slingers, as the exploit of David against Goliath sufficiently proves; (1 Sam. xvii. 5, 6, 7.) and the Benjamites could throw stones to a hair's breadth, without missing. The Scripture adds, that they commonly used both hands alike. (Judg. xx. 16.)

In the original Hebrew, we meet with four terms to signify bucklers, of which there were different kinds; but it is difficult to fix their particular forms and uses. They were made of wood or osier, and covered with brass, iron, or leather; sometimes bordered with metal, and, at other times, with several foldings of leather. The shoulders of Goliath were covered with a large shield of brass.

Cuirasses were made sometimes of linen, woollen, or cotton, beaten like felt; sometimes of brass, or copper, like coats of mail; or even composed of scales, or thin plates, laid one over another; and at other times, they were thin plates of copper, iron, or steel. Goliath had a coat of mail. (1 Sam. xvii. 5.) Saul had one of very solid and almost impenetrable linen. (2 Sam. i. 9.) The Hebrew shebetz, signifies an embroidered coat. (Exod. xxviii. 4. Psalm xlv. 14.) The following passage has divided interpreters: 'Slay, me,' says Saul, 'for anguish is come upon me.' (2 Sam. i. 9.) Some think that it should be rendered a close coat, made of rings in the nature of coats of mail. If so, Saul's sword might hitch in the eyelets of his armour; and his pains still continuing to agonize him, he desired to be speedily slain.

It was customary to hang arms and shields upon the towers of strong places. It is said in the Canticles, that bucklers were hung upon David's tower. Ezekiel speaks of the bucklers and helmets, which the Tyrians, Persians, Libyans, and Lydians, hung upon the walls of Tyre, (xxvii. 10.) The Maccabees, having purified and dedicated the temple, adorned the portal with gold crowns and bucklers. (1 Macc. iv. 57.) Simon Maccabæus embellished the mausoleum, erected for his brethren, with arms and ships carved on the stone. (1 Macc. xiii. 29.) Among the most perplexing passages of Scripture is the following: 'And Moses built an altar, and called its name Jehovah Nissi.' (Exod. xvii. 15, 16.) It is probable, that this was some kind of military trophy, which Moses erected as a memorial of the victory gained over Amalek, and also of future wars of the Lord against Amalek.

St. Paul has frequent allusions to arms, war, military exercises, and public games. He exhorts Christians to use their members as the armour of righteousness on the behalf of God, not as the armour of iniquity on the part of sin. He bids them put on the armour of light, as being to engage not with enemies of flesh and blood, but with the rulers of darkness. 'Take,' says he, 'the armour of God, put on the breast-plate of righteousness, and have your feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace; take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God,' &c. (Ephes. vi. 13.) He observes again, 'Let us put on the breast-plate of faith and love, and for an helmet, the hope of salvation.' (1 Thess. v. 8.) Fragments annexed to Calnet's Dictionary, No. ccxviii. p. 91; No. ccxix. p. 92.

ARNOLDISTS, the followers of Arnold of Brescia, in Italy, who, in the twelfth century, distinguished himself by being the founder of a sect, which opposed the wealth and power of the Romish clergy. He is also charged with having preached against baptism and the eucharist. Arnold, like some other reformers, went too far; and passion vitiated undertakings, which were perhaps begun with motives the most laudable. He was burnt at Rome in 1155, and his ashes were cast into the Tiber, lest the people should collect his remains, and venerate them as the relics of a martyr. Mosheim, vol. ii. p. 449.

AR'ÖER, or AUROOR, ארער, signifies heath, tamarisk; or, nakedness of the skin; or, exultation; or, nakedness of the watch, or of the enemy. Aroer was a city in the tribe of Gad, on the north bank of the river Arnon, and at the extremity of the country which the Hebrews possessed beyond Jordan. (Numb. xxxii. 34.) Eusebius says, that, in his time, Aroer was seated upon a mountain. In conjunction with this city Aroer, mention is made of the city that is by the river, (Deut. ii. 36.); and of the city that is in the midst of the river. (Josh. xiii. 9. 16.) Some commentators think, that this was a distinct city from Aroer; others, and by far the more numerous, are of opinion, that it was the same.

AR'PAD, or AR'PHAD, ארפר, signifies the light of redemption, or covering; or, that lies down, that makes his bed. Arpad is thought to have been a city of Syria, and is always placed in connection with Hamath. (2 Kings xviii. 34.; xix. 13. Isaiah x. 9.; xxxvii. 19.; xxxviii. 13. Jer. xlix. 23.) Sennacherib boasts of having reduced Arpad and Hamath, or of having destroyed the gods of these two places. Hamath is known to be the same as Emesa; and it is supposed, that Arpad is the same as Arad or Arvad, as it is sometimes called in the Hebrew. Opposite to the land of Hamath is the small island denominatd Aradus, which contains apparent marks of the Hebrew name Arpad or Arphad. Wells's Geography.

ARPHAX'AD, ארפכשד, signifies one that heals; or, one that releases. Arphaxad, the son of Shem, and father of Salah, was born in the year of the world 1658, one year after the deluge, and died in the year of the world 2096, aged 438. (Gen. xi. 12.)

ARPHAXAD, a king of the Medes, mentioned in Judith, (i. 1.) Calmet supposes this prince to be the same with Phraortes, the son and successor of Dejoces, king of Media. In this he differs in opinion from Prideaux and Usher, who think Arphaxad to be Dejoces, and not Phraortes, his successor: for it is observed, that Arphaxad is said to be that king of Media, who was the founder of Ecbatane; and all other writers agree that this was Dejoces; and the beginning of the twelfth year of Saosduchius exactly corresponds with the last year of Dejoces, when the battle of Ragau is said to have been fought. Herodotus informs us, that Phraortes first subdued the Persians, and afterwards almost all Asia; but at last, coming to attack Nineveh, and the Assyrian empire, he was killed, in the twenty-second year of his reign. The book of Judith says, that he built Ecbatane, and was defeated in the great plains of Ragau, which were, probably, about the city of Rages, in Media. (Tobit i. 14.; iii. 7.; iv. 1.) Prid. Connect. part i. b. 1.

ARROW, a missive weapon of offence, made to be shot with a bow. It would seem that the Israelites first learned the use of the bow from the Philistines, in whose armies or battles we find no mention of this kind of weapon, before that engagement, in which Saul was killed. (1 Sam. xxxi. 3.) Some think, that when David came to the throne, he taught the Israelites the use of the bow, (2 Sam. i. 18.) that they might not be inferior to the Philistines, nor suffer a similar disaster. Certain it is, that when he had concluded a peace with the Philistines, he took some of their archers, of whom he formed his body-guard, and who are frequently mentioned under the name of Cere-thites.

Divination by arrows was an ancient method of presaging future events. Ezekiel informs us that Nebuchadnezzar marching against Zedekiah and the king of the Ammonites, and coming to the head of two ways, mingled his arrows in a quiver, that he might thence divine in what direction he should pursue his march; and that he consulted teraphim, and inspected the livers of beasts, in order to determine his resolution. (Ezek. xxi. 21.) Jerom, Theodore, and modern commentators, think that this prince took several arrows, upon each of which he wrote the name of a king, town, or province, that he designed to attack; as, on one, Jerusalem; on another, Rabbah; on a third, Egypt, &c. These being put into a quiver, were hustled together, and drawn out; and the arrow, which came first, was considered as declarative of the will of the gods, to attack first that city, province, or kingdom, the name of which was written on the arrow.

'I saw,' says Della Valle, 'at Aleppo, a Mahometan, who caused two persons to sit on the ground, one opposite to the other; and he gave them four arrows into their hands, which both of them held with their points downwards, and, as it were in two right lines united to each other. Then, a question being put to him respecting any business, he began to murmur his enchantments, by which he caused the said four arrows, of their own accord, to unite their points in the midst, though he that held them moved not his hand. According to the future event of the matter, those of the right side were placed over those of the left, or vice versâ.' It cannot be affirmed, that this was the mode of divination practised by the king of Babylon. In our translation, it is said, He made his arrows bright, or, as the original imports, to move very lightly, to be exceedingly light. Now, how the placing of a number of arrows together in a quiver, (the mode referred to in explanation of the passage), may render them exceedingly light, seems difficult to ascertain. But if the word may signify, made very light, for the purpose of obtaining an accurate equilibrium when held in the hand; or, if it may signify vibrating very lightly, and by a very small impulse, when so held, it may be accommodated to this extract. For, those arrows, whose points, from being held downwards, united their points to the others, must have been very light, very easily moved. Perhaps, the observation of Della Valle explains why the divination for Jerusalem was at or in his right hand. 'The arrows of the right side, or of the right hand, in which they were held, were placed over those of the left.' This, I suppose, was an affirmative answer to the inquiry, when foretelling a favourable issue; but if the answer had been unfavourable, the arrows in the left would have predominated over those in the right hand. Fragments attached to Calmet's Dict. No. clxxix. p. 178; Patrick's Comment.; History of the Life of King David.

ARSACES, Ἀρσάκης, signifies who lifts up the buckler. Arsaces, otherwise Mithridates, king of the Parthians, is mentioned in the First Book of Maccabees. (1 Macc. xiv. 2.) By his valour and good conduct he considerably enlarged the kingdom of Parthia. Demetrius Nicanor, or Nicator, king of Syria, invaded his country, and at first obtained several advantages. Media declared for the king of Syria, and the Elymæans, Persians, and Bactrians, joined him; but Arsaces, having sent one of his officers to him, under pretence of treating for peace, Demetrius fell into an ambuscade, his army was cut off by the Persians, and himself was taken prisoner by Arsaces.

ARSENAL, a public magazine, or place appointed for the keeping of arms, either for defence or assault. The ancient Hebrews had each his own arms, because all went to the wars; but they had no arsenals, or magazines of arms, because they had no regular troops or soldiers in constant pay. There were no arsenals in Israel, till the reigns of David and Solomon. David collected a large quantity of arms, and consecrated them to the Lord in his tabernacle. The high-priest Jehoiada took them out of the treasury of the temple, to arm the people and Levites, on the day the young king Joash ascended the throne. (2 Chron. xxiii. 9.) Solomon collected a great quantity of arms, in his palace of the forest of Lebanon, and established well-provided arsenals in all the cities of Judah, which he fortified. (2 Chron. xi. 12.) He sometime obliged the conquered and tributary nations to forge for him arms. (1 Kings x. 25.) King Uzziah furnished his arsenals not only with spears, helmets, shields, cuirasses, swords, bows, and slings, but also with such machines as were proper for sieges. (2 Chron. xxvi. 14.) Hezekiah used the same precaution, and collected stores of arms of all sorts, (Ib. xxxii. 27.) Jonathan and Simon Maccabæus had arsenals stored with good arms, not only such as had been taken from the enemy, but also with others, which they had purchased, or commissioned to be made.

ARTAXERXES, ארתخشטא, Artachshasta, signifies the silence of light, or, light that imposes silence; or, joy that is in haste. Artaxerxes is the title of several Persian kings. Professor Gesenius derives it from the ancient Persian word Artahshetr, which is found in the inscriptions of Nachsehi Roustam. The latter part of this word is the Zendish Khshethro, (also sherao), a king; but the syllable art, which is found in several Persian names, as Artabanus, Artaphernes, Artabazus, appears to have signified to be great or mighty. At least the Greeks gave it this interpretation. This signification is now lost in the Persian. From the original Artahshetr, the modern Persians formed Ardeshir (a name borne by three kings of the dynasty of the Sassanides;) the Armenians, Artashir; the Greeks, Artaxerxes; and the Hebrews, Artachshashtha.

ARTAXERXES LONGIMANUS is supposed by Dr. Prideaux to be the Ahasuerus or Artaxerxes of Esther; and this opinion is considered as the most probable. See AHASUERUS. In the beginning of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, the Jews commenced the rebuilding of Jerusalem, and erecting the walls; but they were hindered by an order from him, in consequence of a letter of complaint from the principal Samaritan officers, Rehun the chancellor, Shimshai the scribe, &c. against 'the rebellious and the bad city.' They stated that if it was allowed to be rebuilt and walled again, the inhabitants would foment sedition, as they had formerly done, and endanger the king's revenue, by refusing to pay toll, tribute, or custom; and they appealed to the records of the empire to prove that Jerusalem had formerly been destroyed, and its walls dismantled, because it had been a rebellious and seditious city. Upon this, search was made, and the statement found to be correct; and the king, by letter, authorized the Samaritan chiefs to stop the work till further orders. This they executed immediately 'by force and power.' (Ezra iv 6—23.) The opposition of the Samaritans, on this occasion, was very unfortunate. Egypt had revolted from the Persian yoke, immediately on the death of Xerxes; and the Samaritans seized the opportunity of exciting the king's fears, lest the Jews should not only follow the example of the Egyptians, in refusing to pay tribute, but also obstruct the Persian army, in its passage through Palestine, for the reduction of Egypt.

After Artaxerxes had subdued all his domestic foes and competitors for the crown, he instituted in the third year of his reign a general rejoicing at Shushan, for half a year; and at a public banquet, when the queen Vashti refused to obey his summons, and show herself and her beauty to the princes and the people, he deposed her from being queen, by the advice of his council, and appointed Esther, a Jewess, in her place, in preference to all the other virgins, her competitors, in the fourth year of his reign. (Esther i.)

When Artaxerxes was firmly established on the throne, he turned his arms against the Egyptians, whom he subdued in the sixth year of his reign. (Diodorus Siculus, lib. ii.) Hence, we may presume, that in the seventh year of his reign, 'Ezra, the priest, and a scribe of the law of the God of heaven,' was sent by the king and his council to Jerusalem, to beautify or adorn the house of the Lord, out of respect to the former edicts of Cyrus and Darius Hystaspes, and to collect donations from the Jews of Babylon, for the service of the temple, and also liberal offerings from the royal treasures; and he was likewise vested with ample powers, civil and ecclesiastical, to appoint magistrates and judges throughout Judea and Samaria, and all the countries beyond the river, or westward of the Euphrates, all such as knew the laws of his God, and to teach those that knew them not. (Ezra vii.) See EZRA.

In the twelfth year of Artaxerxes, a dreadful plot for the massacre of all the Jews throughout his dominions, and the spoliation of their goods, contrived by Haman the Amalekite, and an inveterate foe of that nation, was defeated by the piety and address of Esther the queen, and turned against the contriver himself, who was destroyed with all his family. (Esther iii. iv. v. vi. vii.) The king gave Haman's employment to Mordecai, and his forfeited estate to Esther. On this occasion, appeared the mischievous effect of the law of the Medes and Persians, that the king's decree, when signed by him, and sealed with his seal, could not be changed or repealed. Artaxerxes was obliged to issue a counter-decree, empowering the Jews to take up arms in self-defence, and to repel the assailants by force. In consequence of this, they slew in the palace of Shushan, on the appointed day of massacre, five hundred men, and the next day three hundred more, and in the provinces seventy-five thousand men! Such was the bloody result of a rash and unjust decree, ratified at a banquet; 'when the king and Haman sat down to drink; but the city of Shushan was perplexed.'

In the twentieth year of his reign, Artaxerxes granted the permission, which he had long refused, of rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, at the instances of Nehemiah, a Jew, and his cup-bearer. (Nehem. ii.) See NEHEMIAH.

Prideaux says, that Artaxerxes was king of Persia from the year of the world 3531 to 3579; but Dr. Hales, whose Chronology seems chiefly to be depended on, states that he reigned forty-one years. Hales's Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. pp. 490. 524—527; Prideaux's Connect. part i. book v.

A'SA, אֲסָא, signifies physician; according to the Syriac, cure. Asa the son and successor of Abijam, king of Judah, began to reign in the year of the world 3049, and before Jesus Christ 955. He reigned forty-one years at Jerusalem. Asa did right in the sight of the Lord: he expelled those who, from religious superstition, prostituted themselves in honour of their false gods; he purged Jerusalem from the infamous practices attending the worship of idols; and he deprived his mother of her office and dignity of queen, because she erected an idol to Astarte, which he burnt in the valley of Hinnom. (1 Kings xv. 8, &c.) It has been observed, that by the words 'His mother's name was Maachah,' in the tenth verse, is not denoted Asa's natural mother, but his grandmother. We must, therefore, consider the expression of the king's mother, as only a title of dignity, which was enjoyed by one lady solely of the royal family, and denoted that she was the first in rank, chief sultana, or queen dowager, whether she was the king's natural mother, or not.

The Scripture reproaches Asa with not destroying the high-places, which, perhaps, he thought it necessary to tolerate, to avoid the greater evil of idolatry. He carried into the house of the Lord the gold and silver vessels, which his father Abijam had vowed he would consecrate. Asa fortified several cities, and repaired others, encouraging his people to this labour, while the kingdom was at peace, and the Lord favoured them with his protection. After this he levied three hundred thousand men in Judah, armed with shields and pikes; and two hundred and eighty thousand men in Benjamin, armed with shields and bows, all men of courage and valour.

About this time, Zerah, king of Ethiopia, or rather of Cush, which is part of Arabia, marched against Asa with a million of foot, and three hundred chariots of war, and advanced as far as Mareshah. This probably happened in the fifteenth year of Asa's reign, and in the year of the world 3063. (2 Chron. xiv. 9.) Asa advanced to meet Zerah, and encamped in the plain of Zephathah, or rather Zephatah, near Mareshah. Asa prayed to the Lord, and God struck the forces of Zerah with such a panic fear, that they began to flee. Asa and his army pursued them to Geran, and slew of them a great number.

After this, Asa's army returned to Jerusalem, laden with booty. The prophet Azariah met them, and said, 'Hear ye me, Asa, and all Judah, and Benjamin, the Lord is with you while ye be with him, and if ye seek him, he will be found of you; but if ye forsake him, he will forsake you. Be ye strong therefore, and let not your hands be weak: for your work shall be rewarded.' (2 Chron. xv. 2. 7.) After this exhortation, Asa being animated with new courage, destroyed the idols of Judah, Benjamin, and mount Ephraim; repaired the altar of burnt-offerings; and assembled Judah and Benjamin, with many from the tribes of Simeon, Ephraim, and Manasseh, and on the third day, in the fifteenth year of his reign, celebrated a solemn festival. Of the cattle taken from Zerah, they sacrificed seven hundred oxen, and seven thousand sheep; they renewed the covenant with the Lord; and, the cymbals and trumpets sounding, they swore to the covenant, and declared, that whoever should forsake the true worship of God, should be put to death. The Lord gave them peace; and, according to the Chronicles, the kingdom of Judah had rest till the thirty-fifth year of Asa. Concerning this year, however, there are difficulties; and some think, that we should read the twenty-fifth, instead of the thirty-fifth, since Baasha, who made war on Asa, lived no longer than the twenty-sixth year of Asa. (1 Kings xvi. 8.)

In the thirty-sixth, or, as chronologers say, in the twenty-sixth year of Asa, Baasha, king of Israel, began to fortify Ramah, on the frontiers of the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel, that he might prevent the Israelites from resorting to the kingdom of Judah, and the temple of the Lord at Jerusalem. When Asa was informed of this, he sent to Benhadad, king of Damascus, all the gold and silver of his palace, and of the temple, to induce him to break his alliance with Baasha, and to assist him against the king of Israel. Benhadad accepted Asa's presents, and invaded Baasha's country, where he took several cities belonging to the tribe of Naphtali. This obliged Baasha to retire from Ramah, that he might defend his dominions nearer home. Asa immediately ordered his people to Ramah, carried off all the materials prepared by Baasha, and employed them in building Geba and Mizpah.

This application to Benhadad for assistance was inexcusable. It implied, that Asa distrusted God's power and goodness, which he had so lately experienced. Therefore, the prophet Hanani was sent to reprove him for his conduct. Asa, however, was so exasperated at his reproaches, that he put the prophet in chains, and, at the same time, ordered the execution of several persons in Judah. Towards the latter part of his life, he was incommoded with the gout in his feet, or, as Scheuzer thinks, that kind of swelling of the feet and legs called oedematous, which, gradually rising higher, degenerates into the dropsy. This disorder rising upwards, killed him. The Scripture reproaches him with having recourse to physicians rather than to the Lord. He was buried in the sepulchre, which he had provided for himself in the city of David; and after his death, they placed him 'in the bed, which was filled with sweet odours and divers kinds of spices prepared by the apothecaries' art: and they made a very great burning for him.' (2 Chron. xvi. 14.) He died in the year of the world 3090, and before Jesus Christ 914, and was succeeded by his son Jehoshaphat. Scripture Illustrated; Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dict. No. xvi. p. 31.

A'SAPH, אֲסָפָה, signifies, one that assembles together; or, one that finishes and completes. Asaph, the son of Barachias, of the tribe of Levi, and the father of Zaccur, Joseph, Nethaniah, and Asarelah, was a celebrated musician in David's time. (1 Chron. vi. 39.; xxv. 2.) In the distribution of the Levites, which that prince directed for the service of the temple, he appointed Kohath's family to be placed in the middle, about the altar of burnt-sacrifices. Merari's family was to the left, and Gershon's family to the right. Asaph, who was of Gershon's family, presided over this band; and his descendants held the same rank and place.

We find several psalms with Asaph's name in the title, as the fiftieth, the seventy-third, and the ten following psalms. It is not known whether Asaph composed the words, together with the music, or David the words, and Asaph the music; or whether some of Asaph's descendants wrote them, and prefixed to them the name of that eminent master of the temple-music, or of that division of singers, of which Asaph's family was the head. Some think this last the most probable. It is observable, that all these psalms do not suit the time of Asaph; some of them were written during the captivity, others in the time of Jehoshaphat, &c. By 'a psalm of Asaph,' might be meant a psalm of Asaph's family.

ASCENSION of our Lord, a festival celebrated forty days after the resurrection, in memory of Jesus Christ's ascending into heaven, in the presence of his disciples. Our Saviour having conversed with his disciples for forty days after his resurrection, led them from Jerusalem to Bethany, and the mount of Olives, about one or two miles from Jerusalem. He then lifted up his hands, and blessing them, was raised up to heaven in their sight. (Luke xxiv. 50. Acts i. 4, &c.)

Tradition relates, that when he ascended, he left the impression of his foot on the stones, which still remains. Some have added to this miracle, and tell us, that the empress Helena, having built a magnificent church over this place, in the midst of which the impression of our Saviour's foot was visible, this spot could never be paved though often attempted; whatever was laid on the place immediately leaving it. Others say, that no one could close the roof over this place, and that all the space, through which Christ ascended to heaven was left open. This seems to be merely an allegory, intended to denote his spiritual opening of the way to glory. The origin of this festival is so ancient, that it has been thought to be derived traditionally from the apostles.

The ascension of the Messiah was figured under the Jewish dispensation. According to the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the high-priest's entrance into the holy of holies, the innermost and most sacred part of the temple, performed once a year, prefigured that Christ, the Messiah, should once suffer death, as a propitiation for the sins of mankind, and after that ascend into the heaven of heavens. The Jews believed, that the tabernacle was meant to represent this world, and the holy of holies the highest heaven. As the high-priest once in the year offered a sacrifice for the sins of the people, and with its blood entered into the holy place; so the Messiah, by the oblation of himself once offered, was to enter into the holy place, not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, and there to present the sacrifice he offered, and his blood that was shed for the sins of the world.

In noticing the evidence, which we have of the truth of our Lord's ascension, we may observe, that the Apostles must have had a clear conviction of the certainty of this fact. Their constant attendance on him rendered it altogether impossible that they should be deceived. His ascension was slow and gradual, and not quick and sudden, so as possibly to carry the appearance of illusion. When he had spoken, while they beheld, or had a fixed and steady view of his ascension, and while they were following him with eager eyes, he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight. And while they looked stedfastly towards heaven as he went up, behold two men, inhabitants probably of the heavenly region, whither he had ascended, stood by them in white apparel, and said, 'Ye men of Gallilee, why stand ye gazing towards heaven? This same Jesus which is taken from you, shall so come, in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.' (Acts i.) The apostles, therefore, could not be deceived by any artifice or illusion.

As a corroborative proof, that when he was taken from them, and a cloud received him out of their sight, there was no deception or imposition on the senses, they were convinced in a few days by the most sensible effects, when they found themselves vested, as he had promised, with miraculous powers, and were enabled to execute his command of teaching all nations, by the gift conferred on them of speaking in all languages. They could then no longer doubt that his prediction was verified; that he was gone to the Father, and that all power was committed to him both in heaven and on earth.

As the apostles were sufficiently assured of the truth of our Saviour's ascension, so they transmitted a faithful account of it to succeeding ages. Besides the incredibility of supposing that a few illiterate persons were capable of planning and conducting an imposition of that nature and consequence, which they might be certain would not be implicitly received, their narration discovers all the internal marks and evidences of veracity, all the characters of artless undisguised probity, and impartial regard for truth, which any writing can be supposed to contain. But should we suppose them capable of propagating an imposture in the world, the discerning jealousy of the Jews would have rendered it impracticable. Besides, what prospects could invite, what conceivable motives tempt them to project or carry on the fraud? Though they saw not only opposition and persecution, not only bonds and imprisonment, but even death, in all its various forms of terror, awaiting the declaration of so unwelcome a truth, yet they persisted in their testimony with an unshaken constancy, and, with the most persevering and determined assiduity, continued to publish, that Christ was ascended into heaven, far above all principalities and powers.

Since, therefore, we have the unanimous testimony of persons, who by the evidence of their own sight, confirmed by the voice of angels, were assured of our Saviour's ascension; since they were persons incapable of forming or conducting any artful design; since it was a doctrine, which, if false, could be productive of no advantage to the propagators of it; and since they persevered in asserting it, in despite of all the tortures, that cruelty could devise or power inflict; we have the fullest evidence of our Saviour's ascension that the nature of the fact can admit, or we in reason require.

Sermons by George Carr, vol. ii. p. 128, &c.
ASCETICS, those who retire from the world for the purpose of devotion and mortification. When the monks came in fashion, this title was given them, especially to such of them as lived in solitude. They professed very great sanctity and virtue, and declared their resolution of obeying all the counsels of Christ, that they might enjoy communion with God here, and in the next world approach the supreme centre of happiness and perfection. They considered themselves as prohibited from the use of wine, flesh, matrimony, and commerce; and they thought it their duty to attenuate the body by watchings, abstinence, labour, and hunger. They expected felicity in solitary retreats and desert places, where, by meditation, they raised the soul above all external objects, and all sensual pleasures. Both men and women imposed on themselves the most severe tasks, and the most austere discipline. In the second century, when they first appeared, they submitted to all these mortifications in private, and did not withdraw from the concourse of men; but in process of time, they retired into deserts, and, after the manner of the Essenes and Therapeutæ, formed themselves into companies. Mosheim, vol. i. p. 157.

ASCETICS was also the title of several books of spiritual exercises.

ASCODROGITES, a denomination which arose about the year 181. They brought into their churches bags or skins filled with new wine, to represent the new bottles filled with new wine mentioned by Christ. They danced round these bags or skins, and, it is said, intoxicated themselves with the wine. Broughton's Hist. Lib. vol. i. p. 88.

ASCOODRUTES, a sect, in the second century. They rejected the use of all symbols and sacraments, on the principle, that incorporeal things cannot be communicated by things corporeal, nor divine mysteries by any thing visible. Broughton, vol. i. p. 89.

AS'ENATH, אַסְנַת, signifies peril, or misfortune, and was the name of the daughter of Potipherah, and wife of Joseph. (Gen. xli. 45.) She was the mother of Ephraim and Manasseh. It is questioned, whether Asenath be the daughter of the same Potiphar, who bought Joseph, and afterwards, being imposed on by his wife, threw him into a dungeon? The Hebrews, cited in Origen, relate, that Asenath discovered to her father Potiphar what had passed between Joseph and her mother, and convinced him that his suspicions were entirely groundless. St. Jerom, Rupert, Fostatus, and some others, are also persuaded, that Asenath is the daughter of Potiphar, Joseph's first master. But the generality of the fathers and expositors are of a contrary opinion, for the reasons following; First, the name of Potiphar, (Poti-pherah) Joseph's father-in-law, is somewhat different from the name of that Potiphar who bought him. Secondly, the Scripture not having noticed this as the same Potiphar, there is reason to believe it may be another. Thirdly, the character of priest of On, ascribed to Potipherah, Joseph's father-in-law, does not seem consistent with the quality of captain of Pharaoh's guards, which is given to Potiphar, Joseph's master. Fourthly, the city of On is too remote from Tanais, where the king of Egypt kept his court, to suffer the same Potiphar who attended the king in this employment, to reside at On above fifteen leagues distant. These reasons determine in favour of the opinion that Asenath was not the daughter of that Potiphar, to whom Joseph was sold. These arguments, however, are not without reply. See POTIPHAR.

ASH/DOD, אַשְׁדּוֹד, signifies pillage, theft; or, expulsion, exile; or, perhaps, the fire of affection. In the Vulgate, this city is called Azoth; and in the Greek, Azotus. It was assigned by Joshua to Judah, (Josh. xv. 47.); but it was long possessed by the Philistines, and was rendered famous for the temple of their god Dagon. (1 Sam. v. 2, &c.) In the New Testament it is called Azotus, and was the place where Philip was found after baptizing the eunuch. (Acts viii. 39, 40.) It was situated near the shore of the Mediterranean Sea, between Gaza and Joppa; and in the times that Christianity flourished in these parts, it was made an episcopal see, and continued a fair village till the days of St. Jerom. Wells's Geography, vol. ii. pp. 6. 237.

ASH'ER, אֲשֵׁר, signifies happiness. Asher was the son of Jacob, and Zilpah, his wife, who had been Leah's servant. (Gen. xxx. 13.) We know no particulars of his life or death. Asher had four sons and one daughter. The inheritance of his tribe lay in a very fruitful country, (Gen. xlix. 20. Deut. xxxiii. 24.) and had Phenicia on the west, Mount Libanus on the north, Mount Carmel and the tribe of Issachar on the south, and the tribe of Zebulon and Naphtali on the east. The tribe of Asher never possessed the whole range of district which was assigned to it, and which extended to Libanus, Syria, and Phenicia.

ASHES, the terrene or earthy part of wood, and other combustible bodies, remaining after they are burnt, or consumed with fire. To repent in sackcloth and ashes is a frequent expression in Scripture for mourning and self-affliction for sin. Indicating his deep sense of his own meanness in comparison with God, Abraham said to the Lord, I am but dust and ashes, (Gen. xviii. 27.); and Job says, that man, who is only dust and ashes, shall again turn to dust. (Job xxxiv. 15.) God threatens to shower dust and ashes (powder) on the lands instead of rain, (Deut. xxviii. 24.) and thereby to render them barren instead of blessing them, to dry them up, instead of watering them. Travellers tell us, that in the eastern countries, the wind blows very high in hot and dry seasons, and raises to a great height in the air thick clouds of dust and sand. These grievously annoy all those, among whom they fall, filling their eyes, ears, nostrils, entering even into their mouths, and searching every place, as well within, as without the tents and houses. This may afford us some idea of the penetrating power of the dust of the land of Egypt, which was converted into lice, (Exod. viii. 16.); and of the effect of the ashes of the furnace, which Moses took and sprinkled up towards heaven, and which, being driven by the wind to all parts, and entering every where, became a boil breaking forth with blains upon man and upon beast. (Id. ix. 8.)

Tamar, after the injury she had received from Amnon, covered her head with ashes. (2 Sam. xiii. 19.) The Psalmist, in great sorrow, poetically says, that he had eaten ashes as it were bread. (Psalm cii. 9.) He sat on ashes, he threw ashes on his head; his food, his bread was sprinkled with the ashes, with which he was himself covered. In like manner, Jeremiah introduces Jerusalem, saying, that the Lord had covered her with ashes. (Lament. iii. 16.)

A sort of ley and lustral water was made with the ashes of the heifer sacrificed on the great day of expiation: the ashes of the heifer were distributed to the people; and this water was used in purifications to such as had touched a dead body, or had been present at funerals. (Numb. xix. 17.)

The ancient Persians had a punishment, which consisted in executing certain criminals by stifling them in ashes. Thus was dispatched the wicked Menelaus, who caused the troubles which had disquieted Judæa. (2 Maccab. xiii. 5, 6.) He was thrown headlong into a tower fifty cubits deep, which was filled with ashes to a certain height. The action of the criminal to disengage himself, plunged him still deeper in the ashes; and this agitation was increased by a wheel, which stirred the ashes continually about him, till he was entirely stifled. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dict. No. clxxii. p. 172.

ASH'IMA, אַשִּׁימָא, signifies crime; otherwise, position; otherwise, fire of the sea. It was the name of a deity, worshipped by the people of Hamath, who settled in Samaria. (2 Kings xvii. 30.) Some of the Rabbins say, that it had the shape of an ape; others, that of a lamb, a goat, or a satyr. Selden imagined the word Ashima to signify fire, which was adored by the Persians and Samaritans. It is observable, that these people came from Hamath, or Emesa, a city of Syria, where the sun was adored under the name of Elah-Gabal, whence the emperor Heliogabalus took his name. This god Elagabal was represented by a large stone, which was round at the bottom, and which, rising insensibly to a point, terminated in a cone or pyramidal figure. His worship became celebrated at Rome, from the time of Heliogabalus, who caused a magnificent temple to be erected to him. The name of Ashima may very well be understood of fire from heaven, or the sun; or it may be derived from the Persian Asuman, which is the name of an angel, or genius, who, say the ancient Magi of Persia, presides over the twenty-seventh day of every solar month.

ASH'KENAZ, אַשְׁכְּנַז, signifies a fire that spreads, and was the name of the eldest son of Gomer. (Gen. x. 3.) Calmet thinks, that Ashkenaz was the father of the Ascantes, a people who dwelt about Tanais and the Palus Mæotis. It is scarcely to be doubted, however, says Dr. Wells, that Ashkenaz settled in the north-west part of Lesser Asia. Geography of the Old and New Testament, vol. i. p. 59.

ASH'TAROTH, or ASTAR'TE, a goddess of the Zidonians. The word Ashtaroth properly signifies flocks of sheep, or goats; and sometimes the grove, or woods, because she was goddess of woods, and groves were her temples. In groves consecrated to her, such lasciviousness was committed, as rendered her worship infamous. She was also called 'the queen of heaven;' and sometimes her worship is described by that of 'the host of heaven.' She was certainly represented in the same manner as Isis, with cow's horns on her head, to denote the increase and decrease of the moon. Cicero calls her the fourth Venus of the Syrians. She is almost always joined with Baal, and is called gods, the Scriptures having no particular word to express a goddess.

It is believed that the moon was thus adored. Her temples generally accompanied those of the sun; and while bloody sacrifices or human victims were offered to Baal, bread, liquors, and perfumes were presented to Astarte. For her tables were prepared upon the flat terrace roofs of houses, near gates, in porches, and at cross-ways, on the first day of every month: and this was called by the Greeks Hecate's Supper.

Solomon, seduced by his foreign wives, introduced the worship of Ashtaroth in Israel; but Jezebel, daughter of the king of Tyre, and wife to Ahab, principally established her worship. She caused altars to be erected to this idol in every part of Israel; and at one time four hundred priests attended the worship of Ashtaroth. (1 Kings xviii.)

The manner of representing Ashtaroth on medals is not always the same. Sometimes she is in a long habit; and at other times in a short habit. Sometimes she holds a long stick, with a cross upon its top. Sometimes she has a crown of rays; and sometimes she is crowned with battlements, or by a victory.

Some have believed that by Ashtaroth, which signifies sheep, was meant Rachel, the beloved wife of Jacob, both words denoting the same in the Hebrew language. Ashtaroth is said to have consecrated the city of Tyre, by depositing in it a fallen star. Hence, perhaps, according to Bochart, originated the report that a star or globe of light at certain times descended from the top of Mount Libanus, near her temple at Aphek, and plunged into the river Adonis, and was thought to be Venus. Her temple, at Aphek, upon Mount Libanus, was a sink of lewdness, a school of the most beastly lusts, which were here permitted, because Venus was said to have had her first intercourse in this place with her beloved Adonis. Ash-taroth, or Astarte, is still worshipped by the Druses of Mount Libanus. Dr. Clarke's Travels, vol. v. pp. 32. 453—459; Broughton's Dict. of Religions; Hurd on Religions; Univ. History.

ASH'UR, אַשּׁוּר, Ἀσσυρία, signifies brown, black; otherwise, fire of whiteness, or, fire of the hole or cave; or, fire of liberty. Ashur, אַשּׁוּר, signifies, one that is happy, that walks, that looks.

ASHUR, the son of Shem, who gave name to Assyria. It is believed that he originally dwelt in the land of Shinar, and about Babylonia, but that he was compelled by Nimrod to remove thence, and settle higher towards the springs of Tigris, in the province of Assyria, which was so called from him, and where he built Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah, and Resen. This is the sense generally received from those words of Moses: 'Out of that land (Shinar) went forth Ashur, and builded Nineveh,' &c. (Gen. x. 11, 12.) Borchart, however, explains the text differently. He understands it to speak of Nimrod, who left his own country, and attacked Assyria, of which he made himself master, and where he built Nineveh, &c. Here he established the seat of his empire, and became the most powerful, and, probably, the first monarch of the East. Some think, that the prophet Micah calls Assyria the land of Nimrod. (Mic. v. 6.) Others, however, are of opinion, that in this passage the land of Ashur and the land of Nimrod are mentioned as two distinct countries. If Nimrod had built Nineveh, and planted Assyria, Babylon and Assyria would have been only one empire. In that case, the one could not be said to conquer the other; whereas, Diodorus expressly tells us, that the Assyrians conquered the Babylonians. Hence we may infer, that before Ninus united them, Babylonia and Assyria were two distinct kingdoms, founded by one and the same person.

Suidas, John Malala, and Cedrenus, relate, that Thuras reigned at Nineveh, after Ninus. He warred against Caucasus, who was of the race of Japhet, and whom he conquered and killed. After the death of Thuras, the Assyrians called the planet Mars by his name, and adored him under that of Baal, which signifies the god of war. This we learn from Suidas. Daniel speaks of this god as worshipped at Babylon. It is generally believed, that Thuras and Ashur were the same persons, and perhaps the name is also the same, only transposed; so that the Baal of the Assyrians and Babylonians was the founder of their monarchy. But instead of making Thuras the son and successor of Ninus, Calmet observes, that, on the contrary, Ninus should be called the son and successor of Thuras or Ashur, otherwise denominated Baal or Belus. For all historians agree, that Ninus was the son of Belus, though some confound Ninus with Ashur. Care, however, should be taken to distinguish the old Belus, who is probably the same with Evechois, king of Chaldea, from Belus the Assyrian, father of Ninus. Evechois reigned at Babylon 440 years before Belus the Assyrian.

The empire of the Assyrians is thought to have been the most ancient in the East. Herodotus, who is generally followed in this matter, says, that Ninus, the son of Belus, founded the Assyrian empire, which subsisted 520 years. Usher fixes the beginning of this empire to the year of the world 2737, and before the Christian æra 1267. The Scripture speaks of the foundation of the Assyrian empire, by Nimrod, long before Ninus, that is, about the time that the tower of Babel was building, in the year of the world 1757, and before the taking of Babylon, by Alexander the Great, 1903 years, (Gen. x. 8, 9, 10, 11.) From this time the Babylonians made observations on the heavens; and of those sent by Callisthenes to Aristotle, the earliest dated from that period of years. Dionysius Halicarnasseus observes very well, that the Assyrian empire in the beginning was of small extent. This is sufficiently confirmed, since we see kings of Shinar, Elam, Chaldæa, and Ellasar, attacking the kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, and the neighbouring cities, (Gen. xiv.) at a time when the Assyrian empire, founded by Nimrod, must have subsisted, and before Ninus, the son of Belus, had founded, or rather aggrandized, the only empire of Assyria, which was known to profane authors; for they had no notice of that established by Nimrod. See ASSYRIA. Shuckford's Connect. vol. i. pp. 160. 182.

A'SIA, Ἀσία, signifies muddy, boggy; or, perhaps more properly, continuity, extent, according to the Chaldee. Asia, the largest continent of the old world, is bounded on the north by the Frozen Ocean, on the west by Europe and Africa, on the east by the Pacific Ocean, and on the south by the Indian Ocean. It is situated between 25 and 180 degrees of east longitude, and between the equator and 80 degrees of north latitude; extending 7580 British miles from east to west, and 5250 from north to south.

Asia, in its largest acceptation, denotes the whole Asiatic continent. In this sense it is distinguished into two parts: Asia the Lesser denotes so much as lies between the Euxine or Black Sea northward, and the Mediterranean southward; and Asia the Greater denotes all the rest of the Asiatic continent. Asia the Lesser contained the provinces of Bithynia, Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Lycania, Phrygia, Mysia, Troas, all of which are mentioned in the New Testament; Lydia, Ionia and Æolis, which are sometimes included under Lydia, Caria, Doris, sometimes included under Caria and Lycia. Of these, Lydia and Caria taken in their larger acceptations, Mysia and Phrygia including Troas, or Phrygia Minor, formed the Roman proconsular Asia, which has been thought by some to be the same as the Scripture Asia. But it is evident that Mysia, Phrygia, and Troas, are reckoned by the sacred writer as distinct provinces from the Asia so called in Scripture. It is therefore supposed, that by Asia in the New Testament is to be understood Lydia in its largest acceptance, so as to include Ionia and Æolis; for in it were comprehended the seven cities the churches of which are styled by the sacred penman the churches of Asia.

The ancient Hebrews were strangers to the division of the earth into parts or quarters; and we never find the name Asia in any Hebrew book. They seem to have thought that the continent consisted only of Asia and Africa; and the rest of the world, and even, occasionally, Asia Minor, was comprised under the name of the Isles of the Gentiles. (Gen. x. 5.) We are not acquainted with the true etymology of the word Asia. This name occurs only in the books of the Maccabees, and in the New Testament. Asia is considered as that part of the world which has been most favoured. Here the first man was created; here the patriarchs lived; here the law was given; here the greatest and most celebrated monarchies were formed; and hence the first founders of cities and nations, in other parts of the world conducted their colonies. In Asia, Jesus Christ appeared; here he wrought salvation for mankind; here he died, and rose again; and hence the light of the Gospel has been diffused over the world. Laws, arts, sciences, and religions, almost all had their origin in Asia. Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 261.

AS'KELON, אַשְׁקֶלֶן, signifies weight or balance; otherwise, fire of infamy; otherwise, the residence, or station of fire, in activity, or heating. Askelon, or, as it was called by the Greeks and Latins, Ascalon, was a city in the land of the Philistines, situated between Azoth and Gaza, on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, about 520 furlongs from Jerusalem. After the death of Joshua, the tribe of Judah took Askelon, which afterwards became one of the five governments belonging to the Philistines. (Judges i. 18.) It is said to have been of great note for a temple dedicated to Derceto, the mother of Semiramis, who was worshipped here in the form of a mermaid; and for another of Apollo, in which Herod, the father of Antipater and grandfather of Herod the Great, served as priest. In the primitive ages of Christianity, it was an episcopal see; and during the holy wars, it was beautified with a new wall, and many fair buildings by our king Richard the First.

At present, it is a very inconsiderable place. The wine of Askelon is mentioned; and the cypress-tree, a shrub much esteemed, was there very common. Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 5.

ASMONÆ'ANS, a name given to the Maccabees, the descendants of Mattathias. In the latter times of the Hebrew commonwealth, the family of the Asmonæans became very illustrious; was the support of the religion and liberty of the Jews; and possessed the supreme authority from Mattathias to Herod the Great. See MACCABEES.

It is no where said, whether the Asmonæans were of the race of Josedech, in whose family the office of high-priest continued in a lineal descent, till Alcimus was promoted to that dignity. Certain, however, it is, that the Asmonæans were of the course of Joarib, which was the first class of the sons of Aaron; and, therefore, on failure of the former pontifical family, which had then happened by the flight of Onias, the son of Onias, into Egypt, they had the best right to succeed to that station. Under this right, Jonathan took the office, to which he was nominated by the then reigning king of Syria, and also elected by the general suffrage of the people. Prideaux's Connect. part ii. b. iv.

ASNAP'PER, or ASENAPHER, אַסְנַפֶּר, signifies unhappiness, misfortune of the bull; otherwise, fruitfulness, or increase of danger. Asnapper, the king of Assyria, who sent the Cushæans into Egypt. (Ezra iv. 10.) Many think that this was Salmaneser; others, with more probability, that it was Esar-haddon.

ASP, a kind of serpent, the poison of which is so rapid in its operation, that it kills almost instantly as it operates, without possibility of cure. The Scripture often mentions the asp or adder. The most remarkable place is that where it is said, 'to stop its ears, that it may not hear the voice of the charmer.' (Psalm lviii. 58.) It is affirmed, that this creature stops its ears with its tail, to prevent its hearing. Some are of opinion that there is a sort of asp which is really deaf, which is the most dangerous of its kind, and to which the Psalmist here alludes. Some think that the asp, when it grows old, becomes deaf. Others are of opinion, that the asp, as well as other serpents, hears exquisitely well; but that, when any one attempts to charm it, it stops its ears, by applying one very close to the earth, and stopping the other with the end of its tail. It is probable that this expression of the Psalmist is taken from an actual observation of nature. It is a known fact, that serpents are overcome, as if charmed, so that whilst they will bite some persons with great venom, they are harmless to others; but the mode of producing this effect has not yet been communicated to European travellers. A Hottentot affirmed, that, in his country, the naja, or hooded snake, was charmed by a peculiar whistle; but it appeared, that the attention of the creature was excited by the whistled tune, and that opportunity was seized on to kill it. If, however, there be a kind of asp, over which such a whistle, &c. has no power to excite his attention, but he steadily keeps himself safe within his hole of concealment, this may coincide with the Psalmist's idea, and justify his expression. Such a serpent, hid in the cleft of a rock, may look at his enemy, and preserve himself motionless, notwithstanding every art to entice him from his hiding place. Additions to Calmet's Dictionary.

AS'PHAR, a lake mentioned in the first book of Maccabees, (ix. 33.) Calmet thinks it probable, that this is the same as the Lacus Asphaltites, or lake of Sodom, which Maundrell says, is called by the present inhabitants of the adjacent country, the lake of Lot. It was denominated Lacus Asphaltites, from the great quantities of asphaltus, or bitumen, with which it abounds. Sometimes large pieces of bitumen float on the waters, at other times small pieces, which being collected are employed in the preparation of medicines, and particularly in embalming dead bodies. The asphaltus of the Dead Sea is thought to be the best. At particular seasons, it rises from the bottom of the lake; and the Arabians fish for it diligently, or gather it on the shore whither it is driven by the wind. It is shining, dark, and heavy, and has a strong smell when burnt.

The lake Asphaltites receives all the water of the Jordan, of the brooks Arnon and Jabbock, and other rivulets from the neighbouring mountains. It has no visible outlet, and yet does not overflow, because the evaporation from its surface compensates all these influxes; and, perhaps, it increases in saltiness, as the vapours exhaled consist of fresh water only. Some, however, think, that this lake discharges its waters by subterraneous passages into the Mediterranean or Red Sea. The author of the book of Wisdom says, 'The waste land (of Sodom) that smoketh, is a testimony, and plants bearing fruit that never come to ripeness; and a standing pillar of salt, is a monument of an unbelieving soul.' (Wisd. x. 7.)

As the Hebrews call nitre and bitumen by the name of Salt, the Dead Sea is denominated by them the Salt Sea. Galen says, that its water is not only salt but bitter; and that it is so strongly impregnated with salt, that if salt be thrown into it, it will scarcely melt. It is said to be called the Dead Sea, because no animal lives in it; and if by chance any fish come into it, they die, and swim upon the surface. The truth of this, however, is doubted by Maundrell, who observed, among the pebbles on the shore, two or three shells of fish resembling oyster shells. Chateaubriand, in his late travels, observes, that the marvellous properties ascribed to the Dead Sea, have vanished upon more rigid examination.

It appears, however, that the acrid saltiness of its waters is much greater than that of the sea; and that the land which surrounds this lake, being equally impregnated with that saltiness, refuses to produce plants. To this Moses alludes: 'the whole land thereof is brimstone and salt.' (Deut. xxix. 23.) The air itself, which is by evaporation loaded with it, is fatal to vegetation; and hence arises the deadly aspect which reigns around the lake. The water of this sea looks remarkably clear and pure; but on being tasted, it is nauseous and bitter in the extreme. Pliny states the total length to be one hundred miles, and its greatest breadth twenty-five. Josephus says, that it is 580 furlongs in length, and 150 in breadth; and Dr. Shaw, and other modern travellers, have stated its length to be about seventy-two English miles, and its greatest breadth to be nearly nineteen; but Mr. Carne, who visited the Dead Sea in 1825, estimates its length to be about sixty miles, and its general breadth eight. 'Whoever,' says Mr. Carne, 'has seen the Dead Sea, will ever after have its aspect impressed upon his memory; it is, in truth, a gloomy and fearful spectacle. The precipices, in general, descend abruptly into the lake; and on account of their height, it is seldom agitated by the winds. Its shores are not visited by any footstep, save that of the wild Arab, and he holds it in superstitious dread. No unpleasant effluvia are perceptible round it, and birds are seen occasionally flying across. The water has an abominable taste, in which that of salt predominates; and we observed incrustations of salt on the surface of some of the rocks.' Carne's Letters from the East, pp. 316, 317; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 42; Chateaubriand's Travels in Palestine, &c. vol. ii. Jolliffe's Letters from Palestine.

ASS, an animal well known for domestic uses, and frequently mentioned in Scripture. Le Clerc observes, that the Israelites having only few chariots, were not allowed to keep many horses. People, therefore, of the best quality in Palestine rode upon asses, which in the eastern countries are much larger and more beautiful than with us. Deborah, in her song, describes the greatest men in Israel by those who ride upon asses. (Judg. v. 10.) Jair, of Gilead, had thirty sons, who rode upon as many asses, and commanded in thirty cities. (Judg. x. 4.) Abdon, one of the Judges of Israel, had forty sons, and thirty nephews, who rode upon seventy asses. (Judg. xii. 14.)

We read that, in order to accomplish an ancient prophecy, our Saviour rode upon an ass into Jerusalem, in a triumphant manner. (Matt. xxi. 4. Zechariah ix. 9.) By some this has been made a subject of ridicule. It ought, however, to be considered, not only that the greatest men in Israel rode anciently upon asses, but that God had absolutely prohibited the use of horses and of chariots for war, (Deut. xvii. 16. Josh. xi. 6. and Judg. v. 22.); that David rode upon a mule, and ordered Solomon to use it at his coronation (1 Kings i. 33, 34.); that afterwards when Solomon and succeeding princes multiplied horses, they were rebuked for it, (Isaiah ii. 6, 7.; xxxi. 1. Hosea xiv. 3.); and that the removal of horses is promised in the days of the Messiah. (Hosea i. 7. Micah v. 10, 11. Zechar. ix. 10.) On the whole, therefore, we find that this action of our Lord ought to be viewed in the light of a recurrence to ancient principles; not merely as an accomplishment of a prophecy, but as a revival of an ancient and venerable Hebrew custom.

The ass was unclean by the law, because it did not chew the cud. To draw with an ox and an ass together was prohibited. (Levit. xi. 26.)

In the Gospel is mentioned the mola asinaria, (Matt. xviii. 6. Mark ix. 42.) to express a large millstone, which was turned by asses, and which was heavier than that turned by women and slaves.

The Pagans accused the Jews of worshipping the head of an ass. It is probable that Appion the grammarian was the author of this slander. He affirmed, that the Jews kept the head of an ass in the sanctuary, where it was discovered, when Antiochus Epiphanes took the temple, and entered into the most holy place. He added, that one Zabidus having secretly got into the temple, carried off the ass's head, and conveyed it to Dora. Suidas says, that Damocritus, or Democritus, the historian, asserted that the Jews adored the head of an ass, made of gold, and sacrificed to it a man, every three, or every seven years, after having cut him in pieces. Plutarch and Tacitus were imposed on by this calumny; they believed, that the Hebrews adored an ass, out of gratitude for the discovery of a fountain, by one of these creatures in the wilderness, at a time when the army of this nation was parched with thirst, and extremely fatigued. The Heathen imputed the same worship to Christians. Tertullian adds, that certain enemies of the Christians exposed to public view a picture, in which was represented a person holding a book in his hand, dressed in a long robe, with the ears and foot of an ass, and on which was inscribed, 'The God of the Christians has an ass's hoof.' There is no doubt but the Jews, as well as the Christians, were accused without foundation of worshipping an ass. Learned men, who have endeavoured to search into the origin of this slander, are much divided in opinion. Their explications, though ingenious, are not solid; and it is probable, that no one will ever be able to give a good reason for this accusation, which, perhaps, might arise from a joke, or from chance. Calmet thinks, that Le Moine has best succeeded. He says, that in all probability, the golden urn containing the manna, which was preserved in the sanctuary, was taken for the head of an ass; and that the omer of manna might have been confounded with the Hebrew hamor, which signifies an ass. For, according to the Rabbins, upon the prongs of the golden urn was the head of an animal, which would seem to be that of a young bull, but which might be the origin of the calumny, that the Jews worshipped an ass's head.

In the article BALAAM, the reader will find some account of his ass. It may not, however, be improper to inquire here, whether it was a reality, or an allegory; an imagination, or a vision of Balaam? Several of the Jewish doctors, who on other occasions are sufficiently credulous, seem doubtful in this matter. Philo, in his Life of Moses, suppresses it entirely; and Maimonides pretends that it happened to Balaam in a vision only. St. Austin, with the greater number of commentators, supposes that it was a certain fact, and understands it literally. He discovers nothing in the whole relation more surprising than the stupidity of Balaam, who heard his ass speak, and replied to it as to a reasonable person. He is of opinion that this diviner was accustomed to similar prodigies; or that he was strangely blinded by avarice, not to be stopped by so extraordinary an event. He adds, as his opinion, that God did not give the ass a reasonable soul, but permitted it to repeat certain words to prove the covetousness of the prophet. St. Peter also speaks of this fact as literal and certain. (2 Pet. ii. 16.) Gregory of Nyssa seems to think, that the ass did not utter words, but that having brayed as usual, or more than usual, the diviner, practised in drawing presages from the voices of beasts and birds, easily understood the meaning of the ass by its noise; and that Moses, designing to ridicule this superstitious art of augury, relates the matter as if the ass really spoke articulately. Le Clerc solves the difficulty, by saying, that Balaam believed the transmigration of souls, passing from one body into another, from a man into a beast reciprocally, and, therefore was not surprised at the ass's complaint, but conversed with it, as if it were rational. Bishop Patrick thinks, that Balaam was so enraged at the supposed perverseness of his beast, in crushing his foot, that he could not attend to any thing besides; though the account of Moses, he says, is so concise, as to omit many circumstances, which, if rightly known, would dispel the difficulties in this translation. It is yet to be considered whether the ass uttered sounds, which by the power of the angel then present, were conveyed to Balaam as combined into distinct words, though not such when they quitted the mouth of the ass; in this case the miracle was in the words, or in the combination of sounds in the air: or, whether the miracle was in the ears of Balaam, who heard, as combined into articulate words, sounds which the ass uttered without consciousness of her speaking, or any verbal sense intended, beyond her ordinary braying, or those utterances, by which she had formerly been accustomed to express her complaints. The fact is as consonant to reason as any other extraordinary operation; for all miracles are alike, and equally demand our assent, if properly attested, and the giving of articulation to a brute is no more to the Deity than the making of the blind to see, or the deaf to hear. We may assume as facts, that Balaam was accustomed to augury and presages; that on this occasion he would notice every event capable of such an interpretation, as presages were supposed to indicate; that he was deeply intent on the issue of the event; that the whole of his conduct towards Balak was calculated to represent himself as an extraordinary personage; and that the behaviour of the ass actually pre-figured the conduct of Balaam in the three particulars of it, which are recorded. First, the ass turned aside, and went into the field, for which she was smitten, punished, re-proved; and Balaam, on the first of his perverse attempts to curse Israel, was, as it were, smitten, re-proved, punished by God, and also by Balak. Secondly, the ass was more harshly treated for hurting Balaam's foot against the wall; and Balaam, for his second attempt, was doubtless still further mortified. Thirdly, the ass, seeing danger inevitable, fell down, and was smitten severely; and Balaam was over-ruled by God, to speak truth to his own disgrace, and escaped with the hazard of his life from the anger of Balak. Balaam had no sword in his hand, though he wished for one, with which to slay his ass; and Balak, notwithstanding his fury, and his seeming inclination, had no power to destroy Balaam. In short, the ass was opposed by the angel, but driven forward by Balaam; and Balaam was opposed by God, but driven forward by Balak, against his better knowledge. If Balaam wrote this story, and Moses copied it, as the Rabbins affirm, this view of the subject would remove all difficulties. See BALAAM.

In 2 Kings vi. 25. it is said, 'There was a great famine in Samaria, until an ass's head was sold for eighty pieces of silver.' The ass here mentioned was perhaps a measure, or a kind of pack, or other quantity, well known. Jesse sent to Saul an ass of bread, (1 Sam. xvi. 20.) and three asses of bread were eaten by one person in one day. It may also be doubted, whether Abigail (1 Sam. xxv. 18.) really loaded asses, quadrupeds, with her presents to David; for in the original, the literal meaning is, that she took 200 of bread, &c. and placed them on the asses, which seems to hint at something distinct from asses, animals. In Exod. viii. 14. what our translators have rendered heaps, in the original is asses asses; 'they gathered the frogs together asses asses,' that is, many of that quantity called an ass. Samson says of his defeated enemies, a heap, heaps, or ass, asses. Though we mean not to determine accurately, even if it were possible, the quantity of an ass, yet if we take the English word pile to denote this quantity, it will lead us to the idea that Jesse sent to Saul a pile of bread; that a person ate three piles of bread in one day; that Abigail placed her bread, wine, corn, raisins, and figs in piles; that the Egyptians gathered the stinking frogs into piles; and that Samson's enemies lay in piles. This may vindicate those Jews, who translate not the head of an ass, chamor, but the head of a measure, chomer; for the letters are precisely the same in the original. The word rash, translated head, signifies the total, the whole; see Psalm cxxxix. 17. Exod. xxx. 12. Numb. i. 2, &c. These ideas combined will render the passage in Kings to this effect; 'the famine was so severe that the whole of a pile, that is, of bread, or a complete pile of bread, sold for eighty pieces of silver. But as there is no mention of bread in the original, the ass or pile, as we have supposed, may refer to the dove's dung, as follows: 'The whole of the quantity called an ass (of dove's dung, or chick-peas) was sold for 80 pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung (chick-peas) for 5 pieces of silver.' See DOVE. Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, p. 116; Additions to Calmet's Dictionary; Horne's Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures, vol. iii. p. 593.

ASSIDÆ'ANS, חסידים, Chasidim, Ἀσιδαῖοι, signifies, merciful, pious, religious. They were a religious society among the Jews, and their chief and distinguishing character consisted in maintaining the honour of the temple. For this purpose they paid more than the usual tribute for the reparation of the temple; and on every day, except that of the great expiation, besides their daily oblations, they sacrificed a lamb, which was called the sin-offering of the Assidæans. They used greater mortifications than the rest of the Jews: and they commonly swore by the temple, an oath, for which our Saviour reproves the Pharisees. (Matt. xxiii. 16.) From this sect sprang the Pharisees, who produced the Essenians. Both these sects were strenuous in maintaining the importance of unwritten traditions, which they held to be superior in authority even to the written word of God. Their opponents, the Tsadikim, would, on the contrary, allow to tradition no force or authority whatsoever. The Assidæans were very numerous, and distinguished for their valour, as well as their zeal for the law. (1 Maccab. ii. 42.) Prid. Connect. part ii. b. iii. &c.; Jennings's Jewish Antiq. b. i. c. ix.

ASSURANCE of reconciliation to God, a doctrine held by the Methodists, by whom it is frequently termed the new birth. Without doubt a good man may be filled with hope, even a well-founded hope, which will comfort and refresh his soul. But what shall we say, when we are told that a condemned criminal could rise from his knees, and eagerly exclaim, 'I am now ready to die; I know Christ has taken away my sins, and there is no more condemnation for me?' Such persons, we are told, were originally either very wicked sinners, or merely formal Christians, but that at some period, on a sudden, and generally on accidentally hearing some Methodist preacher, they were, in the language of the Methodists, 'convinced of sin,' or 'for sin.' Then, and not till then, they became sensible that Christ died for them.

Upon this follow such influxes of Divine Grace, called by them 'experiences,' that the man continues from thenceforth fully assured of his salvation. Occasionally, indeed, certain doubtings and backslidings occur; but, upon the whole, there is a perseverance to the end in this blessed state.

Now it is plain that this is only our doctrine of repentance and faith dressed up in new colours, with the addition of a few extravagances. Repentance is called being 'convinced of sin;' because a new term may be made better to accord with their theory of sudden conversions. And to faith is superadded the notion of experiences, admirably calculated by the promise, which it holds out, of distinguished favour, to strike the imagination, and to allure the vain and conceited, the weak and the unwary, to flatter the pride and presumption of man.

In the apostolical writings we are particularly cautioned to 'be sober, to be vigilant,' (1 Pet. v. 8.): 'not to be high-minded, but to fear,' (Rom. xi. 20.): and this with a particular reference to our spiritual privileges: to 'work out our salvation with fear and trembling,' (Phil. ii. 12.): 'not to deceive ourselves,' (1 Corinth. iii. 18.) All these expressions, and many others which might be adduced, are inconsistent with every idea of this personal and sensibly continued communion with the Spirit, and assurance of salvation. Thus too, when the apostles speak of their feelings, the terms which they use are only such as might become any man, who was conscious of having tried to do his duty, and entertained a firm hope that he had not failed. 'We trust,' says St. Paul, 'we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly,' (Heb. xiii. 18.): also 'our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience,' (2 Cor. i. 12.) 'Herein,' he says elsewhere, 'do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God and toward men.' (Acts xxiv. 16.) St. Peter, too, speaks of 'the answer of a good conscience toward God.' (1 Pet. iii. 21.) St. John's expression is somewhat different, but to the same effect; 'Beloved,' he says, 'if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God.' (1 John iii. 21.) All these passages clearly point out that satisfaction, and that only, which results from reflecting upon a life well spent, and agreeing with what St. James teaches, that our faith must be shown by our works. (James ii. 18.)

It is with caution that St. Paul himself admits the doctrine of assurance, and therefore he styles it 'the assurance of hope.' (Heb. vii. 11.) Nor is the meaning of the expression altered when, in the same epistle, he calls it the assurance of faith, as he considers this assurance as arising from a true, pure, and assured profession of Christianity; which he emphatically denominates a new and living way. 'Let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water.' (Heb. x. 20. 22.)

We should be cautious in encouraging an indiscriminate assurance, independent of religious experience. 'My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth. And hereby we know we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him.' (1 John iii. 18, 19.) This indeed is the test of assurance, and it is with fear and trembling that the best of Christians approaches it. But as he is directed to have 'boldness to enter into the Holiest by the blood of Jesus,' let him in all humility of mind ascend into the hill of Sion, and laying aside all human righteousness, he shall then, and then only, 'have confidence towards God.' Mesurier's Sermon on Predestination and Assurance, pp. 33—35; Brewster's Secular Essay, pp. 161—163.

ASSYRIA, a country of Asia, the boundaries of which it is difficult to designate. It appears to have been situated between the Tigris and the Euphrates, inclosed between those two rivers, from the part where they begin to approach each other, on leaving Mesopotamia, to that where they join, not far from their mouth, in the Gulf of Persia. From Ashur, the son of Shem, Assyria derived its name. See ASHUR.

We have already noticed the opinions of authors with respect to the peopling of this country, and the antiquity, duration, and extent of the Assyrian empire. After the time of Nimrod, we find nothing in the sacred records respecting the Assyrian empire, till about the year 3234, when Pul, king of Assyria, invaded the territories of Israel, under the reign of Menahem. (2 Kings xv. 19. 1 Chron. v. 26.) It is generally believed, that Pul so greatly extended the empire of Assyria, as to be its real founder. Thus Jonah, who prophesied about sixty years before the reign of Pul, mentions indeed the king of Nineveh, but not that of Assyria. (Jonah iii. 6, 7.)

Tiglath-pileser, who is supposed to be the son of Pul, succeeded him in the throne, and also invaded Israel, carrying away the inhabitants captive into Assyria. (2 Kings, xv. 29.) He was succeeded by his son Shalmaneser, who compelled Hoshea, king of Israel, to pay him tribute. (2 Kings xvii. 3.) Sennacherib, the successor of Shalmaneser, is famous in sacred and profane writings. He was killed by two of his sons, and succeeded by another son, Esar-haddon, before Christ 710. Esar-haddon united the dismembered empires of Chaldæa and Assyria, and revived the glory of the Assyrian name, which had been eclipsed in the reign of his predecessor. He left the throne to Saosduchinus, or Saosducheus, who is the Nabuchodonosor of sacred history, and who reigned twenty years. Saosduchinus was succeeded by Sarac, or Chynaladan, who reigned twenty-two years.

Nabopolassar, otherwise Nebuchadnezzar, governor of Babylon, and Astyages, otherwise Ahasuerus, son to the king of Media, besieging Nineveh, took the city, and divided the monarchy of the Assyrians. Nabopolassar possessed Nineveh and Babylon; and Astyages, Media, and the neighbouring provinces. Nabopolassar was the father of Nebuchadnezzar, who took Jerusalem. He was succeeded by Evilmerodach; Evilmerodach, by Belshazzar; and Belshazzar by Darius the Mede. We have the authority of Scripture in respect to Nebuchadnezzar, Evilmerodach, Belshazzar, and Darius the Mede.

However, profane authors relate the series of Evilmerodach's successors in a different manner. Megasthenes says, that Evilmerodach was slain by Neriglissor, his brother-in-law, who reigned four years. Neriglissor was succeeded by Lebassorachus, who was killed by conspirators, that gave the crown to one of their number, named Nabonidas, or Nabannidoch, or Labinith. From this last, Cyrus conquered Babylon; and having rendered himself master of the Chaldæan empire, he reunited the empires of Assyria, Chaldæa, and Persia. Usher's Annals; Calmet's Dictionary.

ASTY'AGES, Ἀστυάγης, signifies the chief, or captain of the city. Astyages, otherwise Cyaxares, king of the Medes, and successor to Phraortes, reigned forty years, and died in the year of the world 3409. He was father of Astyages, otherwise called Darius the Mede. He had two daughters, Mandane and Amytis: Mandane married Cambyzes the Persian, and was the mother of Cyrus: Amytis married Nebuchadnezzar, the son of Nabopolassar, and was the mother of Evilmerodach.

ASTYAGES, otherwise Ahasuerus, (Tobit ult. v. ult. in the Greek; Dan. ix. 1.) Artaxerxes, (Dan. vi. 1, in the Greek,) or Darius the Mede, (Dan. v. 31.) or Cyaxares his father's name (Xenophon), or Apandas in Ctesias. He was appointed by his father, Cyaxares, governor of Media, and sent with Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, against Sarac, or Chynaladan, king of Assyria. These two princes besieged Sarac in Nineveh, took that city, and dismembered the Assyrian empire. Astyages was with Cyrus at the conquest of Babylon, and succeeded Belshazzar, king of Babylon, in the year of the world 3447. (Dan. v. 30, 31.) He was succeeded by Cyrus, in the year of the world 3456. (Dan. xiii. 65. in the Vulgate.)

ASYLUM, signifies a sanctuary whither unfortunate persons might retire for security from their enemies, and whence they could not be forced. The ancient Hebrews, as well as the Heathens, had their asylums. The most remarkable of those belonging to the Jews, were their cities of refuge, which were intended for the security of those, who by accident, and without design, killed a man. They were six in number, three on each side Jordan, (Exod. xxi. 13. Numb. xxxv. 11.) The Jews were also commanded to add three more, when they should enlarge their borders; but as they did not comply with this command, the Rabbins say, that the Messiah, when he comes, will accomplish it.

Besides the cities of refuge, the temple, and especially the altar of burnt-offerings, enjoyed the privilege of an asylum. This privilege began to be enjoyed by the Christian churches, about the time of Constantine; but whatever intention it was to answer, or whatever might be the laws concerning it, the modern asylums of the Christian church, in protecting criminals of almost all descriptions, and thus disappointing the ends of the civil laws, proved a great abuse of the ancient institution, and were therefore abolished, particularly in England.

A'TAD, אֶתָד, signifies a thorn, a bramble-bush. At Atad's threshing-floor, the sons of Jacob, and the Egyptians who accompanied them, mourned for Jacob; and hence it was afterwards called Abel-mizraim, the mourning of the Egyptians. (Gen. l. 11.) St. Jerom fixes this place between the Jordan and Jericho, two miles from the river, and three from Jericho: and Dr. Wells thinks, that it was situated on the west of Jordan, and not far from Hebron. Geography of the Old and New Testament, vol. i. p. 186.

ATHALIAH, אֶתְלִיָּה, Ἰθθαλιᾶ, signifies the time of the Lord. Athaliah was the daughter of Omri, king of Samaria, and wife to Jehoram, king of Judah. Being informed that Jehu had slain her son, Ahaziah, and forty-two princes of his family, she resolved to massacre all the princes of the blood royal of Judah, that she might ascend the throne without a rival. (2 Kings xi. 1, 2, &c.) However, Jehosheba, the daughter of king Jehoram, and sister to king Ahaziah, took Joash, son of Ahaziah, with his nurse, and privately preserved him from the slaughter of the king's children. He was secretly supported six years, with his nurse, in the temple, and in the seventh, the high-priest, Jehoiada, determined to place him on the throne of his ancestors. This he accomplished amid the acclamations of the multitude. Athaliah hearing the noise, entered the temple; and seeing the young king seated on his throne, she tore her clothes, and cried, treason, treason! Jehoiada commanded the Levites, who were armed, to carry her without the inclosure of the temple, and to put to death those who followed her. They dragged her by the way of the horse-gate, near the palace, where she was slain, in the year of the world 3126, and before the Christian era 878. She had reigned six years.

ATHANASIAN CREED, a formulary or confession of faith, long supposed to have been drawn up by Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, in the fourth century, to justify himself against the calumnies of his Arian enemies. However, it is now generally allowed not to have been his. Dr. Waterland ascribes it to Hilary, bishop of Arles, for several reasons. He thinks that Hilary composed it, about the year 430, for the use of the Gallican clergy, and particularly for those of his own diocese; that about the year 570, it became sufficiently famous to be commented on, but was yet simply styled The Catholic Faith; and that before 670, it obtained the name of the Athanasian Creed, being in itself an excellent system of the Athanasian principles of the Trinity and incarnation, in opposition chiefly to the Arians, Macedonians, and Apollinarians.

This creed obtained in France about 850, and was received in Spain and Germany about 180 years later. As to our own country, we have clear proofs, that it was sung alternately in our churches in the tenth century. It was in common use in some parts of Italy about the year 960, and was received at Rome about 1014. It has been questioned whether it was ever received by the Greek and Oriental churches, though some writers are of opinion that it was. It has been rejected by the episcopal churches of America. Still it appears, however, that the reception of this creed has been both general and ancient.

As to the matter of this creed, it is given as a summary of the true orthodox faith. Unhappily, however, it has proved a fruitful source of unprofitable controversy.

Though the account of the doctrine of the Trinity contained in this creed appears just and satisfactory, yet its damnatory clauses have by some been thought exceptionable. That they are exceptionable, however, is denied by bishop Cleaver, who, in a sermon preached before the university of Oxford, has highly censured the objections made by the Bishop of Lincoln to these clauses. 'Great objection,' says the bishop of Lincoln, 'has been made to the clauses of this creed, which denounce damnation against those, who do not believe the Catholic faith, as here stated; and it certainly is to be lamented, that assertions of so peremptory a nature, unexplained and unqualified, should have been used in any human composition. We know that different persons have deduced different and even opposite doctrines from the words of Scripture, and, consequently, there must be many errors among Christians; but since the Gospel no where informs us, what degree of error will exclude from eternal happiness, I am ready to acknowledge, that in my judgment, notwithstanding the authority of former times, our church would have acted more wisely, and more consistently with the general principles of mildness and toleration, if it had not adopted the damnatory clauses of the Athanasian creed. Though I firmly believe that the doctrines of this creed are all founded in Scripture, I cannot but conceive it to be both unnecessary and presumptuous to say, that 'except every one do keep them whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly.' Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. p. 219.

ATHEIST, in the strict and proper sense of the word, is characteristic of a person, who does not believe in the existence of a God, or who owns no Being superior to nature. It is compounded of the two terms, a negative, and Θεός, God, signifying without God. Atheists have been also known by the name Infidels; but the word Infidel is now commonly used to distinguish a more numerous sect, and is become almost synonymous with Deist. He who disbelieves the existence of a God, as an infinite, intelligent, and a moral agent, is a direct or speculative Atheist; he who confesses a Deity and providence in words, but denies them in his life and actions, is a practical Atheist.

That Atheism existed, in some sense, before the flood, may be suspected from what we read in Scripture, as well as from heathen tradition; and it is not very unreasonable to suppose, that the deluge was partly intended to evince to the world a heavenly power as Lord of the Universe, and superior to the visible system of nature. This was at least a happy consequence of that fatal catastrophe; for, as it is observed by Dean Sherlock, 'The universal deluge, and the confusion of languages, had so abundantly convinced mankind of a Divine Power and Providence, that there was no such creature as an Atheist, till their ridiculous idolatries had tempted some men of wit and thought, rather to own no God, than such as the heathens worshipped.'

Atheistical principles were long nourished and cherished in Greece, and especially among the atomical, peripatetic, and sceptical philosophers; and hence some have ascribed the origin of Atheism to the philosophy of Greece. This is true, if they mean that species of refined Atheism, which contrives any impious scheme of principles to account for the origin of the world, without a Divine Being. For though there may have been in former ages, and in other countries, some persons irreligious in principle as well as in practice, yet we know of none who, forming a philosophical scheme of impiety, became a sect, and erected colleges of atheistical learning, till the arrogant and enterprising genius of Greece undertook that detestable work. Carrying their presumptuous and ungoverned speculations into the very essence of the Divinity, at first they doubted, and at length denied, the existence of a First Cause independent of nature, and of a Providence that superintends its laws, and governs the concerns of mankind.

These principles, with the other improvements of Greece, were transferred to Rome; and, excepting in Italy, we hear little of Atheism, for many ages after the Christian era. 'For some ages before the reformation,' says Archbishop Tillotson, 'Atheism was confined to Italy, and had its chief residence at Rome.'—'But, in this last age, Atheism has travelled over the Alps and infected France, and now of late it hath crossed the seas, and invaded our nation, and hath prevailed to amazement.' However, to Tillotson, and other able writers, we owe its suppression in this country; for they pressed it down with a weight of sound argument, from which we trust it will never be able to raise itself.

Atheism, in its primary sense, comprehends, or indeed goes beyond, every heresy in the world, for it professes to acknowledge no religion, true or false. The two leading false hypotheses, which have prevailed, respecting this world and its origin, are, that of Ocellus Lucanus, adopted and improved by Aristotle, that it was eternal, and that of Epicurus, that it was formed by a fortuitous concourse of atoms. 'That the soul is material and mortal, Christianity an imposture, the Scripture a forgery, the worship of God superstition, hell a fable, and heaven a dream, our life without providence, and our death without hope, like that of asses and dogs, are part of the glorious Gospel of Atheists.'

The being of a God may be proved from the marks of design, and from the order and beauty visible in the world; from universal consent; from the relation of cause and effect; from eternal consciousness; and from the necessity of a final as well as efficient cause.

'Of all the false doctrines and foolish opinions, which ever infested the mind of man, nothing can possibly equal that of Atheism, which is such a monstrous contradiction of all evidence, of all the powers of understanding, and the dictates of common sense, that it may be well questioned, whether any man can really fall into it by a deliberate use of his judgment.

'All nature so clearly points out, and so loudly proclaims, a Creator of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, that whoever hears not its voice, and sees not its proofs, may well be thought wilfully deaf, and obstinately blind.

'If it be evident, self-evident to every man of thought, that there can be no effect without a cause, what shall we say of that manifold combination of effects, that series of operations, that system of wonders, which fill the universe, which present themselves to all our perceptions, and strike our mind and our senses on every side! Every faculty, every object of every faculty, demonstrates a Deity. The meanest insect we can see, the minutest and most contemptible weed we can tread upon, is really sufficient to confound Atheism, and baffle all its pretensions.—How much more that astonishing variety and multiplicity of God's works, with which we are continually surrounded! Let any man survey the face of the earth, or lift up his eyes to the firmament: let him consider the nature and instincts of brute animals, and afterwards look into the operations of his own mind, will he presume to say or suppose that all the objects he meets with are nothing more than the result of unaccountable accidents and blind chance? Can he possibly conceive that such wonderful order should spring out of confusion; or that such perfect beauty should be ever formed by the fortuitous operations of unconscious, inactive particles of matter? As well, nay better, and more easily, might he suppose that an earthquake might happen to build towns and cities; or the materials carried down by a flood fit themselves up without hands into a regular fleet. For what are towns, cities, or fleets, in comparison of the vast and amazing fabric of the universe!

'In short, Atheism offers such violence to all our faculties, that it seems scarce credible it should ever really find any footing in the human understanding.'

tend. For he must suppose either that the world is eternal, or that it was formed by chance and a fortuitous concurrence of the parts of matter. That the world had a beginning is evident from universal tradition, and the most ancient history that exists; from there being no memorials of any actions performed previously to the time assigned in that history as the era of the creation; from the origin of learning and arts; and the liability of the parts of matter to decay. That the world was not produced by chance is also evident. Nothing can be more unreasonable than to ascribe to chance an effect, which appears with all the characters of a wise design and contrivance. Will chance fit means to ends, even in ten thousand instances, and not fail in a single one? How often might a man, after shaking a set of letters in a bag, throw them on the ground, before they would become an exact poem, or form a good discourse in prose? In short, the arguments in proof of Deity are so numerous, and at the same time so obvious to a thinking mind, that to waste time in disputing with an Atheist, is approaching too much towards that irrationality, which may be considered as one of the most striking characteristics of the sect.

When Hobbes and his followers say, that the notion of a God is not from nature, nor revelation, but from policy and state craft, they own it to be for the good of society. When it is supposed that the world came into existence by chance, and is every moment liable to be destroyed by it, then it is dangerous to live in such a world. When it is alleged that the world is eternal, and that all things are by fatal necessity, then liberty and choice were infinitely better. When it is argued from supposed defects in the frame of nature, and in the government of the world, then it is better that the world had been made, and were governed by a perfectly wise and gracious being.

It may be affirmed, that the abettors of Atheism and irreligion were never more numerous than they have been of late. But we have reason to believe, that, as has always been the case, they are more numerous in Europe, and particularly in France, Germany, and Italy, than in any other part.

The more noted Atheists, since the reformation, are Machiavel, Spinoza, Hobbes, Blount, and Vanini. To these may be added Hume, and Voltaire the Coryphaeus of the sect, and the great nursing father of that swarm of them, which has appeared in these last days. Adams's Religious World, vol. iii. p. 484, &c. Tillotson's Sermons, vol. i. 70, &c.

ATH'ENS, Ἀθήναι, a celebrated city of Greece, and some time a very powerful commonwealth, distinguished by the military talents, but still more by the learning, eloquence, and politeness of its inhabitants. St. Paul coming hither, in the year of Christ

52, found it plunged in idolatry, occupied in inquiring and reporting news, curious to know every thing, and divided in opinion concerning religion and happiness, (Acts xvii.) The apostle, therefore, took an opportunity of preaching Jesus Christ in this city, and was carried before the judges of the Areopagus; where he gave an illustrious testimony to truth, and a remarkable instance of powerful reasoning. See AREOPAGUS.

ATONEMENT, the satisfying of Divine Justice by the meritorious death and passion of Jesus Christ, the Son of God. The first Gospel declaration on this subject is the exclamation of John the Baptist, when he saw Jesus coming unto him: 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.' It seems plain, that when John called our Lord the Lamb of God, he spoke with a reference to his being sacrificed, and to the effect of that sacrifice, as an atonement for the sins of mankind. This was said of our Lord, even before he entered on his office. If any doubt should exist respecting the meaning of the Baptist's expression, it is removed by other passages, in which a similar allusion to a lamb is adopted, and in which the allusion is specifically applied to the death of Christ, as an atonement for sin. In the Acts of the Apostles, the following words of Isaiah (liii.) are, by Philip the evangelist, distinctly applied to our Lord, and to his death. 'He was led as a sheep to the slaughter; and like a lamb dumb before his shearer, so opened he not his mouth: in his humiliation his judgment was taken away: and who shall declare his generation? for his life is taken from the earth.' By the concluding words it is evident that to his death this description relates; and Philip taught the eunuch that this passage was spoken of Christ. This particular part and expression of the prophecy being applied to Christ's death, the whole must relate to the same subject; for it is undoubtedly one entire prophecy, and the other expressions, which are still stronger, are equally applicable. 'He was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed: the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.' In the first Epistle of Peter, is a strong and very apposite text, in which the application of the term 'lamb' to our Lord, and the sense in which it is applied, can admit of no doubt: 'Forasmuch as ye know, that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot.' (1 Pet. i. 18, 19.) It is therefore evident that the prophet Isaiah, seven hundred years before the birth of Jesus; that John the Baptist, on the commencement of his ministry; and that St. Peter, his friend, companion, and apostle, subsequent to the transaction; speak of Christ's death as an atonement for sin, under the figure of a lamb sacrificed.

The passages that follow, plainly and distinctly declare the efficacy of Christ's death: 'Now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many: and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation.' (Heb. ix. 26. 28.) 'This man after he had offered one sacrifice for sin, for ever sat down on the right hand of God, for by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified,' (Id. x. 12. 14.) It is observable, that nothing similar is said of the death of any other person, and that no such efficacy is imputed to any other martyrdom. 'While we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. Much more then, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him. For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more being reconciled we shall be saved by his life.' (Rom. v.) The words 'reconciled to God by the death of his Son,' show that his death had an efficacy in our reconciliation: but reconciliation is only preparatory to salvation. He has 'reconciled us' to his Father 'through the blood of his cross,' and in the body of his flesh through death.' (Coloss. i. 20. 22.) What is said of reconciliation in these texts, is in some others spoken of sanctification, which is also preparatory to salvation: 'We are sanctified,' how? 'by the offering of the body of Christ once for all.' (Heb. x. 10.) In the same Epistle, the blood of Jesus is called the blood of the covenant by which we are sanctified.

Daniel, in his ninth chapter, recites from the mouth of Gabriel, the following words: 'Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people;—to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to anoint the Most Holy.' In the following verse, he farther informs us, that at the end of the 'seventy weeks,' the 'Messiah should be cut off, but not for himself.' Accordingly, at the end of seventy weeks, or four hundred and ninety years, 'from the commandment to rebuild Jerusalem, published by Artaxerxes Longimanus, (before Christ 457.) the Messiah was cut off, but not for himself;' that is, within four years after he had been anointed by the Holy Ghost, according to the same prediction. The effect of his being cut off was to make an end of sin, and to make reconciliation of iniquity. 'Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures.' (1 Cor. xv. 3.) Here it is asserted, not only that 'Christ died for our sins,' but that this fact took place 'according to the Scriptures.' The same doctrine is taught by Christ himself, (Luke xxiv. 25, 26. 45, 46.) who asserts that his death was due or necessary, because it had been before declared by the prophets, and in the Scriptures.

'Who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us from this present evil world.' (Gal. i. 4.) 'When he had by himself purged our sins.' (Heb. i. 3.) 'Who his ownself bare our sins in his own body on the tree; that we, being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness: by whose stripes ye were healed.' (1 Pet. ii. 24.) 'He was manifested to take away our sins.' (1 John iii. 5.) 'Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God.' (Rev. i. 5.)

From every one of these passages, as well as from many others, it is evident beyond all doubt, that Christ stood in the place of mankind—bore their sins, and healed them by the stripes which he suffered—that our iniquities were laid on him—that he washed our sins away—became a curse for us—was wounded for our transgressions—made reconciliation for iniquity—and was cut off, not for himself, but for mankind.

The death of Christ was an atonement for the sins of mankind, and the accomplishment of our eternal redemption. It was that great sacrifice, the efficacy of which reaches back to the first transgression of man, and forward to the end of time. But the nature and extent of that efficacy we are unable, as yet, fully to trace. Part we are capable of beholding; and the wisdom of what we behold we have reason to adore. We discern in this plan of redemption, the evil of sin strongly exhibited; and the justice of the Divine government awfully exemplified, in Christ suffering for sinners. But let us not imagine, that our present discoveries unfold the whole influence of the death of Christ. It is connected with causes, into which we cannot penetrate. It produces consequences too extensive for us to explore. 'God's thoughts are not as our thoughts.' In all things, we 'see only in part;' and here, if any where, we see also 'as through a glass darkly.' Paley's Sermons, Sermon xviii; Blair's Sermons, vol. i. p. 122, 123; Dwight's Theology, vol. ii. pp. 333, 334.

ATTRIBUTES of GOD, the several qualities or perfections of the Divine nature. Some distinguish them into negative, and positive, or affirmative. The negative are such as remove from him whatever is imperfect in creatures; as, infinity, immutability, immortality, &c. The positive are such as assert some perfection in God, which is in and of himself, and which in the creatures, in any measure, is derived from God. This distinction is now mostly discarded. Some distinguish them into absolute and relative. Absolute are such as agree with the essence of God; as Jehovah, Jah, &c. Relative are such as agree with him in time, with some respect to his creatures, as Creator, Governor, Preserver, Redeemer, &c. But the attributes of God are more commonly distinguished into communicable and incommunicable. The communicable are those, of which there is some resemblance in men; as, goodness, holiness, wisdom, &c. The incommunicable are those, of which there is no appearance in men; as, independence, immutability, immensity, and eternity. Buck's Theolog. Dict.

ATTRITION. By the casuists of the Romish church, a distinction is made between a perfect and an imperfect contrition. The latter is called by them attrition; which is the lowest degree of repentance, or a sorrow for sin arising from a sense of shame, or any temporal inconvenience attending the commission of it, or merely from fear of punishment, without any resolution not to sin again. In consequence of this doctrine, they teach that, after a wicked and flagitious course of life, a man may be reconciled to God, and his sins forgiven on his death-bed, by confessing them to the priest with this imperfect degree of sorrow and repentance. This distinction was settled by the council of Trent. It might, however, be easily shown, that the mere sorrow for sin because of its consequences, and not on account of its evil nature, cannot be more acceptable to God than hypocrisy. No man, who has seriously considered the nature of God and religion, can ever be persuaded to build his hopes of happiness on such a foundation. The abolition of all the priests in the world will not procure the forgiveness of God to any man not disposed for his mercy by such a repentance as the Gospel requires.

In the catechism published in France by order of Buonaparte, and sanctioned by the Pope's legate, it is said, that attrition, or, as it is called, imperfect contrition, does not reconcile a sinner to God, but disposes him to receive the grace of justification in the sacrament of penance; and that, for this purpose, it ought to include three things, a sincere resolution to sin no more, a hope of pardon, and a beginning of love to God as the source of all righteousness. Catechism published by the French Government; Tillotson's Sermons, vol. iv. p. 95.

AUGSBURGH, or AUGUSTAN CONFESSION, a celebrated confession of faith drawn up by Luther and Melancthon, on behalf of themselves and other ancient reformers, and presented, in 1530, to the emperor Charles V. at the diet of Augusta, or Augsburg, in the name of the evangelic body. This confession contains twenty-eight chapters; of which the greatest part is employed in representing with perspicuity and truth, the religious opinions of the Protestants, and the rest in pointing out the errors and abuses that occasioned their separation from the church of Rome. The leading doctrines of this confession are the true and essential divinity of the Son of God; his substitution, and vicarious sacrifice; and the necessity, freedom, and efficacy of Divine grace. This diet was followed by a civil war, which lasted upwards of twenty years, but which, instead of extirpating, tended only to spread the new opinions. Mosheim, vol. iii. p. 354, &c.

AUGUSTINS, a religious order, who observed the rule of St. Augustin, prescribed to them by Pope Alexander IV. in 1256. By this rule, they were to have all things in common; the rich, who entered among them, to sell their possessions, and give them to the poor; to employ the first part of the morning in labouring with their hands, and the rest in reading; when they went abroad, to go always two in company; never to eat except in their monastery, &c.

Soon after their institution, this order was brought into England, where they had about thirty-two houses at the time of their suppression. Hurd's Hist. of Religious Rites, &c. p. 191.

AUGUSTUS, from augur, like robur, robustus, (Valpy's Etym. Dict.) Augustus was emperor of Rome, and successor to Julius Caesar. The battle of Actium fought with Antony, gave him the empire, in the year of the world 3973, and before Jesus Christ 31. He died in the year of our Lord 14. Augustus was the emperor who appointed the enrolment which obliged Joseph and Mary to go to Bethlehem, where the Messiah was to be born. (Luke ii. 1.)

Augustus procured from the Roman senate the crown of Judæa for Herod. After the defeat of Marc Antony, Herod adhered to Augustus, to whom he was constantly faithful. Augustus loaded him with honours and riches; and when the emperor undertook to subject Arabia to the Roman empire, Herod gave Ælius Gallus, who commanded the expedition, five hundred of his guards. Augustus took upon him the education of Alexander and Aristobulus, Herod's sons; and he examined into the quarrels between Herod and his sons, and reconciled them. Afterwards, he greatly disapproved the rigour exercised by Herod towards his sons, in executing Alexander and Aristobulus; and, lastly, Antipater. On this occasion, the emperor is said to have observed, that it was much better to be Herod's hog, than his child.

After the death of Lepidus, Augustus assumed the office of high-priest among the Romans; and this dignity gave him the inspection of ceremonies and religious concerns. One of his first proceedings was an examination of the Sybils' books, which were then in many hands, and occasioned great disorders among the people, every one interpreting them as suited his fancy and inclination. It is said, that he burnt nearly two thousand copies, and preserved only those, which bore the name of some particular Sybil, and which, after close examination, were esteemed genuine. These were put into two little gold boxes, under the pedestal of the statue of Apollo, whose temple was within the inclosure of the palace. This is worthy of notice, as there is every reason to suppose these prophecies had excited a general expectation, that some great person would be born about that time. It should also be remembered, that Augustus had the honour of shutting the temple of Janus, in token of universal peace, at the time when the Prince of peace was born. This is the more remarkable, because that temple was shut only a very few times. Addenda to Calmet's Dict.

AVIM, אִימ, signifies the wicked, and was the name of a people descended from Hevæus, son of Canaan. They originally dwelt in the country afterwards possessed by the Capthorim, or Philistines. (Gen. x. 17. Josh. xiii. 3.) At Shechem or Gibeon were also Avim or Hivites, (Josh. xi. 19.); for the inhabitants of Shechem and the Gibeonites were Hivites. (Gen. xxxiv. 2.) There were likewise some of them beyond Jordan, at the foot of Mount Hermon. Bochart thinks that Cadmus, who conducted a colony of Phœnicians into Greece, was a Hivite. His name, Cadmus, is derived from the Hebrew word Kedem, the East; because he came from the eastern parts of the land of Canaan; and Hermione, the name of his wife, from Mount Hermon, at the foot of which the Hivites dwelt. In this case, the metamorphosis of Cadmus's companions into serpents is founded on the signification of the name Hivites, which, in the Phœnician language, signifies serpents. If, however, Cadmus was of Æthiopia, his name might also signify serpent; as here was a powerful race of kings, whose family name was Serpent.

AXE, a well known instrument of iron for cutting down trees, &c. This word is used figuratively in Scripture for a person or power, who, as a cutting instrument in the hand of God, is employed to lop off branches and boughs, and sometimes to cut down the tree itself. If, therefore, sinners be compared to trees in a forest, he who smiteth them is compared to an axe. (Isaiah x. 15, &c.) This especially appears in the proverbial phraseology of John the Baptist: 'The axe is laid to the root of the trees,' (Matt. iii. 10. Luke iii. 9.) that is, approaching punishment, destruction, is near. We may refer this ultimately to the Roman power and armies, which, as an axe, most vehemently cut away the very existence of the Jewish state and polity.

This simile may be taken as addressed, 1. to each individual tree, i. e. sinner; 2. to the nation and people of the Jews, to whom the plural form of the word 'trees' inclines.

(Judg. ix. 8, &c. Psalm lxxiv. 5. Isaiah xiv. 6, 7, 8. Ezek. xvii. 22, 23, 24.; xxxi. 3, &c.) Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dict.

AZAR'AH, אֲזַרְיָה, signifies assistance, or court of the Lord; otherwise, he that hears the Lord, or, whom the Lord hears.

AZARIAH or Uziah, king of Judah, began to reign at sixteen years of age, and reigned fifty-two years at Jerusalem. (2 Kings xv.) His mother's name was Jecholiah. He did right in the sight of the Lord, but did not destroy the high places. This prince, who is called Uziah, (2 Chron. xxvi. 1, 3, &c.) presuming to offer incense in the temple, an office peculiar to the priests, was struck with a leprosy, and continued without the city, separated, to his death. Josephus says, that on this occasion a great earthquake was felt; that the temple opened at the top, and a ray of light darted on the forehead of the king, who was instantly struck with a leprosy. He adds, that the earthquake was so violent, as to divide the mountain west of Jerusalem, and the earth moving along a space of four furlongs, (500 paces) till it met the mountain east of the city, closed up the high-way, and covered the king's gardens. We know, indeed, that there was a very great earthquake in the reign of Uziah; it is expressly mentioned in Amos, (i. 1.) Zechariah, (xiv. 5.) Kings, and Chronicles. But that it happened at the very time when Uziah presumed to offer incense, is very uncertain.

The beginning of Uziah's reign was very happy; and he obtained great advantage over the Philistines, Ammonites, and Arabians. He added to the fortifications of Jerusalem, and had an army of 307,500 men with great magazines of arms for attack or defence. He was a great lover of agriculture, and employed numerous husbandmen in the plains, vine-dressers in the mountains, and shepherds in the valleys. He died in the year of the world 3246, and before the Christian era 758. As he was a leper, he was not buried in the royal sepulchres, but in an adjacent field.

AZA'ZEL, אֲזַזְזֵל, or HAZAZEL, commonly called the scape-goat. Some, however, consider this word as relating only to the ceremony of the scape-goat, under the Jewish religion. Some think azazel to be the name of a mountain. Bochart says, that it signifies departure, or removal. Spencer affirms, that it denotes some demon; and that the goat sent to azazel was given to the devil. Le Clerc translates azazel præcipitium, and believes it to be that steep and inaccessible place, to which the scape-goat was sent, and where it perished. Calmet, however, prefers the version of the Greek interpreters, who derived azazel from the Hebrew haz, or hoz, 'a goat,' and azal, 'he went away.' See SCAPE-GOAT.

B.

BA'AL, or BOL, בעל, signifies he that rules and subdues; master, lord, or husband. Baal, Bel, or Belus, was an idol of the Chaldæans, Phœnicians, and Canaanites. Baal and Ashtaroth are commonly mentioned together; and, as it is believed that Ashtaroth denotes the moon, it is concluded, with apparent reason, that Baal represents the sun. The name Baal is used in a generic sense for the superior god of the Phœnicians, Chaldæans, Moabites, &c. It is often compounded with the name of some other god; as Baal-peor, Baal-zebub, Baal-gad, Baal-zephon, Baal-berith. The Hebrews too often imitated the idolatry of the Canaanites, and worshipped Baal. They offered to him human sacrifices, and erected altars to him in groves, upon high places, and upon the terraces of houses. Baal had priests and prophets consecrated to his service; and many infamous and immodest actions were committed in the festivals of Baal and Astarte, or Ashtaroth. Some learned men think, that the Baal of the Phœnicians was the Saturn of the Greeks and Romans; and, indeed, there was a great conformity between the services and sacrifices performed to Saturn, and what the Scripture relates of the sacrifices offered to Baal. Others are of opinion, that Baal was the Phœnician or Tyrian Hercules, a god of great antiquity in Phœnicia; perhaps, in reality, this opinion is not inconsistent with the other. However, it is generally concluded, that Baal was the sun; and the Hebrews sometimes call the sun Baal-shemesh, Baal the sun. Manasseh adored Baal, planted groves, and worshipped all the host of heaven. Josiah, desirous of repairing the evil introduced by Manasseh, put to death the idolatrous priests that burned incense unto Baal, to the sun, and to the moon, and to the planets, and to all the host of heaven. He also took away the 'horses that the kings of Judah had given to the sun, and burnt the chariots of the sun with fire.' (2 Kings xxiii. 5. 11.) Here the worship of the sun is particularly described; and the sun itself is often called by the name of Baal. This great luminary was adored over all the East, and is the most ancient deity, whose worship is acknowledged among the Heathens.

The Scripture calls temples consecrated to this god chamanim, (Exod. xxxiv. 13. Isaiah xvii. 8.; xxvii. 9. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4.); they were places enclosed with walls, in which was kept a perpetual fire. They were frequent in the East, particularly among the Persians. Maundrell, in his Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, observed some remains of these inclosures in Syria. In most of them were no statues; in others were some, but of no uniform figure.

This false deity is frequently mentioned in Scripture in the plural number, (Baalim); and this may intimate, either that the name Baal was given to several different gods, or that there were many statues bearing different appellations consecrated to this idol. Arnobius tells us, that Baal was of an uncertain sex, and that his votaries, when they invoked him, said, 'Hear us, whether thou art a god or a goddess.'

Several critics have thought, that the god Belus of the Chaldæans and Babylonians was Nimrod, their first king; some, that he was Belus the Assyrian, father of Ninus; and others, a son of Semiramis. Many have supposed Belus to be the same with Jupiter. It is, however, generally believed, that Baal was worshipped as the sun among the Phœnicians and Canaanites; and that he was often taken for the great god of the eastern people.

BAAL. There were many cities in Palestine, into whose name the word Baal entered by composition; either because the god Baal was adored in them, or because these places were considered as the capital cities, lords, superiors, of their respective provinces.

BA'AL-BERITH, בעל-ברית, signifies idol of the covenant; otherwise, he that possesses, or subdues, the covenant. Baal-berith was the god of the Shechemites, to whom the idolatrous Israelites, after the death of Gideon, prostituted themselves, and whom they made their god. (Judg. viii. 33.; ix. 4.) At Shechem was a temple of Baal-berith, in whose treasury they accumulated that money, which they afterwards gave to Abimelech, the son of Gideon. Bochart conjectures, that Berith is the same as Beroe, the daughter of Venus and Adonis, whom Bacchus married, and who gave her name to the city of Berith, in Phœnicia, of which she afterwards became the goddess. The most simple explanation of the name Baal-berith is to take it for the god who presides over alliances and oaths. In the same manner, the Greeks had their Ζεὺς ὁρκίος; and the Romans, their Deus Fidius, or Jupiter Pistius.

BA'AL-PE'OR, or BE'EL-PHE'GOR, or BA'AL-PHE'GOR, בעל-פעור, signifies master of the opening, and was the name of the god Peor, an idol of the Moabites and Midianites. The Scripture tells us, that the Israelites being encamped in the plains of Shittim, were seduced to worship Baal-peor, to partake of his sacrifices, and to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab, (Num. xxv. 1, &c.); and that Solomon erected an altar to this idol upon the Mount of Olives. (1 Kings xi. 7.)

It has been very much questioned what this Baal-peor was. Some have thought him to be Priapus, or the idol of turpitude, and that the worship of him consisted in the most obscene practices. Maimonides says, that they adored this idol by uncovering before him what modesty conceals. There is no doubt, that Baal-peor was god of impurity. We know with what impudence the daughters of Moab engaged the Israelites to sin, (Numb. xxv.); and the prophet Hosea, speaking of this crime, says, 'They went to Baal-peor, and separated themselves unto that shame.' (ix. 10.)

Some think, that Baal-peor was Saturn, a deity worshipped in Arabia. The castration of this deity by his own son, might contribute to introduce the obscenities practised in the worship of Baal-peor.

Selden suggests, that Baal-peor is Pluto, the god of the dead, and founds his conjecture on the following passage: 'They joined themselves also unto Baal-peor, and ate the offerings of the dead.' (Psalm cvi. 28.) Vossius, however, observes, that by the offerings of the dead in this passage may be meant no more than offerings to idols or false gods, who are properly called the dead, in contradistinction to the true God, styled in Scripture the living God.

An ingenious author is of opinion, that Baal-peor was the sun, the same as Moloch of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of the Moabites; and that he was denominated Baal-peor from the particular place of his worship, as Jupiter Capitolinus, Jupiter Casius, &c. Dr. Wells says, that Peor is thought to be a part of the mountains Abarim; and that upon this mount seems to have been the temple of an idol, thence called Peor or Baal-peor.

However, Calmet maintains, that Peor was the same as Adonis, whose feasts were celebrated in the manner of funerals; and, he observes, that the persons, who celebrated these feasts, committed many dissolute actions, particularly when they were told that Adonis, whom they had mourned as dead, was restored to life.

BA'AL-ZE'BUB, BEEL'ZEBUB, or BEL'ZEBUB, בעל-זבוב, בעל-זבוב, signifies the god of flies, and was an idol of the Ekronites. It is not easy to discover how this false deity obtained its name. Some commentators think, that this god was called Baal-semin, or the lord of heaven, but that the Jews, from contempt, gave him the name of Baal-zebub.

Others with greater reason believe, that he was denominated the god of flies by his votaries, because he defended them from flies, which are extremely troublesome in hot countries; in the same manner as the Eleans worshipped Hercules under the appellation of Ἀπόμυιος, the fly-chaser. Pliny is of opinion, that the name of Achor, the god invoked at Cyrene against flies, is derived from Accaron or Ekron, where Baal-zebub was worshipped, and where he had a famous temple and oracle. In Scripture, this false deity is called the prince of devils, (Matt. xii. 24. Luke xi. 15.;) and for this reason, Patrick and Le Clerc think, that he is the same deity with Pluto, whom the heathens call the god of hell. Ahaziah, king of Israel, having received a dangerous hurt by a fall, sent to consult this deity whether he should recover.

The worship of this false deity must have prevailed in the time of our Saviour, since the Jews accused him of driving out the devils in the name of Beelzebub, their prince. Under what form this deity was represented, is uncertain. Some place him on a throne, in the attire of a king; and Procopius Gazeus paints him under the figure of a fly.

Winkelman (Monum. Ined. p. 13.) has given the figures of two heads, 'both of them images of Jupiter, called by the Greeks, Ἀπόμυιος, and by the Romans, Muscarius, that is to say, fly-driver; for to this Jupiter was attributed the function of driving away flies.' It appears, that Bellori considered the god of flies as the god of bees. Might not this be one reason why honey was forbidden to be offered on the altar of the Lord, as we find it prohibited? (Levit. ii. 11.)

It is evident that Beelzebub was considered as the patron deity of medicine, for this is plainly implied in the conduct of Ahaziah. (2 Kings i.) Besides, the same deity had power over evil spirits, and was capable of expelling them, as appears from the opinions of the Pharisees, (Matt. xii. 24. Mark iii. 22. Luke xi. 15.); who accuse our Lord of a combination with Beelzebub. The Greek mythology considered Apollo as the god of medicine, and attributed also to him those possessions by a pythonic spirit, which occasionally perplexed spectators, and of which we have an instance in Acts xvi. 16. Apollo, too, was the sun. On these principles, we probably see the reason why Ahaziah sent to Beelzebub to inquire the issue of his accident; since Beelzebub was Apollo, and Apollo was the god of physic. We see also the reason of that apparently strange expression of the Scribes, (Mark iii. 22.) 'He hath Beelzebub,' that is, he is possessed by a pythonic spirit; as we read in verse 30, 'Because they said, He hath an unclean spirit,' that is, of a heathen deity. With this agrees the contrast in the preceding verses, between an impure spirit and the Holy Ghost. It illustrates also the propriety of our Lord's assertion, (Matt. xii. 28.) that he cast out devils, not by a pythonic spirit,—not by the god of physis, but by 'the Spirit of God.'

The Jews, who changed Beelzebub into Beelzebub, 'god of a dunghill,' perhaps, had a reference to the Greek of pytho, which signifies putrefied. Scripture Illustrated.

BA'AL-ZEPHON, בעל-צפון, signifies the idol, or the possession of the north; otherwise, hidden, or secret. Baal-zephon is supposed by the Jewish Rabbins, and after them by Grotius and others, to have been an idol erected to guard the confines of Egypt. It was probably a temple to Baal, at the northern point of the Red Sea, and was also an establishment or town, like the present Suez, in which, or adjacent to which, stood this temple. We read, that the Hebrews having left Egypt, after three days, came to Baal-zephon, where they passed the sea. (Exod. xiv. 2, 9.) Sacred Geography.

BA'ASHA, or BOSHA, בעשא, signifies in the work; otherwise, in the moth; otherwise, in the compression; otherwise, he that seeks and demands. Baasha was the son of Ahijah, commander of the armies of Nadab, son of Jeroboam, king of Israel. He killed his master treacherously at the siege of Gibbethon, a city of the Philistines, and usurped the kingdom, which he possessed twenty-four years. He exterminated the whole race of Jeroboam, as God had commanded; but by his bad conduct and his idolatry, he incurred God's indignation, in the year of the world 3051, and before Jesus Christ, 953. However, instead of properly using admonition, Baasha was transported with rage against the prophet, who denounced against him and his house the judgments of God, and whom he killed. (1 Kings xv. 27, xvi. 1, 7.) When it is said, in the second verse, that God exalted Baasha to the kingdom of Israel, we are to understand, that though his accession to the kingdom was from the divine decree, yet the form and manner of his accession were occasioned by his own ambition and covetousness. Poole's Annot.

BA'BEL, or BABYLON, בבל, signifies confusion, or mixture. This name was given to the city and province of Babylon, because, when the tower of Babel was building, God confounded the languages of those, who were employed in that undertaking; about the year of the world 1757, and about one hundred years after the deluge. (Gen. xi. 9.) Some, however, think it more probable, that the city was called Babel, either from having been itself, or from having its principal temple, dedicated to the god Bel, or El, the deified personification of the sun; and it is observed, that Babel seems to be derived, not from the Hebrew and Chaldee, which were not the original languages of Babylon, but from the Arabic word bāb, a gate; as if the gate or city of Bel.

It is thought that Nimrod, the son of Cush, was the principal instigator in building the tower of Babel. It is evident, however, that all mankind were not employed on this tower; for we are told, that those, who attempted it, were travellers from the East, and consequently those left in the East did not participate in the undertaking. It would appear, that it was their design to erect a chapel or temple upon the summit of the tower, and that the building of this tower, which was intended to be sacred to the heavenly powers, was occasioned by their idolatrous wishes; for it is reasonable to suppose, that idolatry, intended or perpetrated, was the immediate cause of the divine anger. It may be inferred, that Shem had no share in this undertaking.

Many have thought, that the tower of Belus, mentioned by Herodotus, and extant in his time at Babylon, was the tower of Babel, or, at least, a continuation of it built on the old foundations. The learned Bochart has adopted this opinion, which appears the more probable, because this tower was completed and raised to its full height. Herodotus says, that it was composed of eight towers placed one upon another, decreasing gradually in their size from the lower to the upper; and that over the eighth or last, was the temple of Belus. This author does not mention the complete height of the whole edifice, nor of its respective towers. He merely says, that the lowest of the eight towers was a furlong, or a hundred twenty-five paces, high and wide, or square; for his text, which is not very clear, is σταδίον καὶ τὸ μῆκος, καὶ τὸ εὖρος. (Her. I. 181.) Some think, that this was the height of the whole edifice; others, that each of the eight towers was a furlong in height, and the whole fabric eight furlongs, or a thousand paces high, which seems impossible. However, St. Jerom says, by report, that it was four thousand paces high; and others affirm, that it was still higher. If instead of height, that is, perpendicular height, we understand these measurements as denoting ascent, the ascending height, they may all be true, though at first they appear contradictory. Besides a direct way adapted for the processions of priests and sacred services, there was, doubtless, a more circuitous way, by which, perhaps, loaded animals, and even carriages, might advance to the top of this tower. If by ascending on one side, we proceed one mile to the top, which is the direct way, by going round all the four sides, we must proceed four miles to the top; and thus Jerom's account is reconciled with the former, and contributes even to establish it. On this estimate, 'one furlong in height,' may mean lateral height; so that a cord, stretched from the top to the furthest extent of the building, would be a furlong in length.

It is said in Gen. xi. 3. that the builders proposed to make bricks and burn them thoroughly; that these bricks were employed by them as stones, of which it would appear their country was destitute; and that instead of clay-mortar, which is the kind used in countries east of Shinar, they employed the bitumen mortar, to resist moisture and wet. The tower was first begun, and the building of it advanced ages before it was finished. During this suspension, it was nick-named 'Confusion,' by those, who opposed the object of its worship. Afterwards, it was resumed and completed; a prodigious city was built around it; and in this latter state it was, when the accounts, which we have of it, were composed, and which unite descriptions of the tower or temple, and of the city, partly from observation, and partly from recollection.

Herodotus says, that the square of the temple was two stadia, or 1250 feet; and the tower itself one stadium; in which Strabo agrees. The former adds, 'In the midst, a tower rises, solid, of the height (or length, μῆκος) and breadth of one stadium; upon which resting seven other towers are built in regular succession. The ascent is on the outside, which, winding from the ground, is continued to the highest tower; and in the middle of the whole structure there is a convenient resting place. In the last tower is a large chapel, in which is a couch magnificently adorned; and near it a table of solid gold, but there is no statue in the place.' He afterwards describes another chapel, lower down in the structure, with golden statues, tables, and altars; all of which appear to have been forcibly taken away by Xerxes, who also put the priest to death.

Strabo says, that the sepulchre of Belus was a pyramid of one stadium in height, the base of which was a square of similar dimensions; and that it was destroyed by Xerxes. Arrian agrees in this particular; and both of them say, that Alexander wished to restore it, that is, we may suppose, both the tower and temple, but that he found it too great a labour. Arrian calls it a stupendous and magnificent fabric, and says, that it was situated in the heart of the city. Diodorus says, that it was entirely gone to ruin in his time, and that nothing certain could be made out concerning its design; but he adds, that it was of a very great height, built of brick, and cemented with bitumen, and in this the others generally agree. Diodorus says, that upon the top was a statue of Belus, 40 feet in height, in an upright posture.

That this tower was very lofty, must be conceived by the mode of expression, employed by those, who describe it. If it be admitted, that the whole fabric was a stadium in height, as Strabo says, and as appears probable, even this measure, which is about 625 feet, must be allowed to be a vast height, for so bulky a structure raised by the hands of men, and would exceed the loftiest pile in this island, (Salisbury steeple) by 200 feet, and the great pyramid of Memphis in Egypt, by about 80 feet. Dr. Greaves says, that the old steeple of St. Paul's, previously to the fire of 1666, was 520 feet in height, and of course 105 feet lower than the tower of Belus.

Authors differ also, in respect of the manner, in which the tower was completed at the top. Herodotus says, that it terminated in a spacious dome, in the nature of a chapel or temple; but others say, an observatory. Diodorus says, that the statue Belus was at the top; Herodotus, lower down the building. Xerxes is said to have removed the statues; and, therefore, Herodotus could not have seen them.

It may be concluded, that the uppermost stories consisted more of masonry than of earth; but the lower chiefly of earth, which was retained in its place, by a vast wall of sun-dried bricks, the outer part, or facing of which was composed of such as had undergone the operation of fire. Strabo says, that the sides of the tower were of burnt bricks.

It would appear, that though the great design of these builders was defeated, yet the tower was raised to a certain height at this time; probably it was afterwards ornamented, and various enrichments and finishings were bestowed on it by Nebuchadnezzar; but whether it was raised in height may be doubted.

Belus, king of Babylon, by whose directions the building of the tower, which Herodotus mentions, is said to have been undertaken, lived long after Moses; whether by Belus be meant the father of Ninus, or Belus the son of Semiramis. Archbishop Usher places Belus, the father of Ninus, about the year of the world 2682.

Modern travellers vary in their descriptions of the remains of the tower of Babel. Fabricius and Guion say, that it might have been about a mile in circumference. Benjamin, who is much more ancient, informs us, that the foundations were two thousand paces in length. It is, however, highly probable, that the remains of towers usually shown in Babylonia, are only ruins of old Babylon, built by Nebuchadnezzar, and formed no part of the original tower of Babel.

Mr. Rich, in his 'Memoirs of Babylon,' has observed, that 'all travellers, since the time of Benjamin of Tudela, who first revived the remembrance of these ruins, whenever they fancied themselves near the site of Babylon, universally fixed upon the most conspicuous eminences to represent the tower of Belus.' The Birs Nimrod, which is a corruption of Birs for Beros or Belus, and is designated Nimrod merely because the inhabitants of the country are fond of attributing every thing to that 'mighty hunter,' is now generally considered as the remains of the tower of Babel. The Birs Nimrod, or Nimrod's tower, is situated on the west side of the Euphrates, about six miles south-west of Hillah. 'To all the features, by which the tower of Babel has been described in ancient authors, the remains of the monument called the Birs Nimrod exactly correspond. The form of its ascent is that of a pyramid; and four of the eight stages of which its whole height was composed, may be distinctly traced, on the north and east sides. Its dimensions at the base, as accurately measured by Mr. Rich, are in circumference seven hundred and sixty-two yards, or two thousand two hundred and eighty-six feet, exceeding the square of a stadium, or two thousand feet, by no more than might be expected from the accumulation of the rubbish around it on all sides. The height of the four existing stages is equal to about one half of that of the original building, or two hundred and fifty feet; which, as the eight stages are said to have risen above each other in regular succession, may be fairly supposed to represent the four lowermost of them. The square inclosure to be traced around the whole, appears, from the summit of the building, to occupy a line of three hundred yards for each of its sides, which may be thought to correspond accurately enough with the inclosure of two stadia, or one thousand feet, assigned by the historian.'

On the Birs Nimrod Mr. Rich also observes, that the masonry is infinitely superior to any thing of the kind he had ever seen; that the impression made by a sight of it is, that it was a solid pile, composed in the interior of unburnt bricks, and perhaps earth or rubbish; that it was constructed in receding stages, and faced with fine burnt bricks, having inscriptions on them, laid in a very thin layer of lime cement; and that it was reduced by violence to its present ruinous condition. Buckingham's Travels in Mesopotamia, vol. ii. p. 380, 381; Scripture Illustrated; Geographical Excursions, p. 54, 55; Fragments annexed to Calmel's Dictionary, No. clxv. p. 170.

BABYLON, the capital of Chaldæa, was built by Nimrod, (Gen. x. 10.) adjacent to the tower of Babel. It was the capital of Nimrod's empire; and its antiquity is unquestionable. Profane authors say, that its founder was the son of Belus, who lived two thousand years before Semiramis; some, that it was Belus the Assyrian, father of Ninus; and others, Semiramis. However, the opinion most generally followed is, that it was founded by Nimrod, enlarged by Belus, and increased with so many and so very considerable works by Semiramis, that she might be called, not improperly, its foundress; but it was finally augmented, both in size and beauty, by Nebuchadnezzar, who rendered it one of the wonders of the world, and therefore arrogated to himself the whole glory of it, saying in the pride of his heart, 'Is not this great Babylon, that I have built?' (Dan. iv. 30.)

The Scripture often speaks of Babylon, particularly after the reign of Hezekiah, who, on his recovery, was visited by ambassadors from Berodach-baladan, king of Babylon. (2 Kings xx. 12.) Isaiah, who lived at the same time, especially foretells the calamities which the Babylonians should bring on Palestine; the captivity of the Hebrews; their return from Babylon; the fall of that great city, and its capture by the Persians and Medes. The prophets who lived after Isaiah, as Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, and who saw the desolation of Jerusalem and Judah, enlarge still more on the grandeur of Babylon, its cruelty, and the evils with which God would overwhelm it.

The sacred authors describe this metropolis as the greatest and most powerful city in the world. Berosus and Abydenus ascribe to Nebuchadnezzar the building of the walls of Babylon, and those prodigious gardens raised on arches, which some attribute to Semiramis. Herodotus, however, says, that the bridge, the river-banks, and the lakes, were the work of Nitocris, the daughter-in-law of Nebuchadnezzar. Concerning the height and extent of the walls of Babylon, authors are not agreed. Clitarchus, cited by Diodorus Siculus, says the circuit of the walls was 368 furlongs; Quintus Curtius says, 60,000 paces; Herodotus 480 furlongs; Ctesias, in Diodorus Siculus, 360 furlongs, which makes 44,600 paces, or nearly fifteen leagues; and Strabo 385 furlongs. Quintus Curtius and Strabo describe the walls as 65 feet high, and 32 wide; and Pliny and Selenus, as 200 feet high, and 50 wide. Quintus Curtius relates, that these walls were built in a year, and that the workmen finished a furlong, or 125 paces in a day; but Berosus and Abydenus inform us, that this wonderful work was completed in fifteen days.

Julius Africanus says, that Evechoüs, who is probably the same with Jupiter Belus, began to reign over the Chaldæans, in the time of the patriarch Isaac, in the year of the world 2242, and before Jesus Christ 1762.

The Arabians deprived Chinitzitus, king of Babylon, of his crown, and Mardocentius reigned there in his stead, in the year of the world 2466, before Jesus Christ 1538, and about the fortieth year of Moses.

Belus the Assyrian began to reign in Babylon, in the year of the world 2682, before Jesus Christ 1322, and in the time of Shamgar, judge of Israel. Belus was succeeded by Ninus, Semiramis, Ninyas, and others, whose names are not mentioned in Scripture, at least, under the title of kings of Babylon. According to Herodotus, the Assyrian empire was founded by Ninus, and subsisted 520 years. During this interval, the city and province of Babylon were under a governor appointed by the king of Assyria. Of all the Assyrian monarchs, who reigned at Babylon, the Scripture mentions only Pul, who was probably the father of Sardanapalus, the last of the Assyrian kings, the successors of Ninus. Under the reign of Sardanapalus, and in the year of the world 3257, Arbaces, governor of the Medes, and Belesus, or Baladan, (Isai. xxxix. compared with 2 Kings xx. 12.) or Nabonassar, governor of Babylon, revolted, and besieged Sardanapalus in Nineveh, where they obliged him to burn himself, with all that was dear to him. The insurgents then divided the monarchy; Arbaces reigned in Media, and Belesus at Babylon. Tiglath-pileser reigned at Nineveh, and continued the succession of the Assyrian kings; but the kingdom was much diminished in extent. He was succeeded by Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon.

Belesus, or Baladan, was father or grandfather to Berodach-baladan, who sent to congratulate Hezekiah after the miracle of the sun's retrogradation. (2 Kings xx. 12.) Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, conquered Babylon, and he and his successors, Saosduchinus, called in Scripture Nebuchadnezzar, or Nebuchodonosor, and Chynaladan, otherwise denominated Sarac, possessed it, till Nabopolassar, governor of Babylon, and Astyages, the son of Cyaxares, took up arms against Chynaladan, killed him, divided his dominions, and destroyed the Assyrian empire, in the year of the world 3378, and before Jesus Christ 626.

Nabopolassar was the father of Nebuchadnezzar the Great, who destroyed Jerusalem, and was the most magnificent king of Babylon. Evilmerodach succeeded Nebuchadnezzar; Belshazzar, Evilmerodach; Darius the Mede, Belshazzar; and Cyrus, Darius the Mede, otherwise called Astyages. The death of Belshazzar is fixed in the year of the world 3448; and the first year of Cyrus's reign at Babylon, to 3457.

The following were the successors of Cyrus, in their order; Cambyses, the seven Magi, Darius, son of Hystaspes, Xerxes, Artaxerxes Longimanus, Xerxes II. Secundianus or Sogdianus, Ochus or Darius Nothus, Artaxerxes Mnemon, Ochus, Arsēs, Darius Codomannus overcome by Alexander the Great, in the year of the world 3673, and before Jesus Christ 331.

The following account of Babylon, in its greatest splendour, is borrowed principally from Herodotus, who had been on the spot, and is the oldest author that has treated of the subject. The city was square, being 120 furlongs, that is fifteen miles, or five leagues, every way; and the whole circuit of it was 480 furlongs, or twenty leagues. The walls were built with large bricks, cemented with bitumen, a thick glutinous fluid, which rises out of the earth in the neighbouring country, and which binds stronger than mortar, and becomes harder than brick itself. These walls were eighty-seven feet thick, and three hundred and fifty feet high. Those who mention them as only fifty cubits high, refer to their condition, after Darius, son of Hystaspes, had commanded them to be demolished to that height, to punish a rebellion of the Babylonians.

The city was encompassed with a vast ditch, which was filled with water, and the sides of which were built up with brickwork. The earth which was dug out was used in making bricks for the walls of the city; so that the depth and width of the ditch may be estimated by the extreme height and thickness of the walls. There were a hundred gates to the city, twenty-five on each of the four sides. These gates, with their posts, &c. were all of brass. Between every two gates were three towers, raised ten feet above the walls, where necessary; for the city being encompassed in several places with marshes which defended the approach to it, those parts stood in no need of towers.

A street corresponded with each gate; so that there were fifty streets, which cut one another at right angles, and each of which was fifteen miles in length, and 151 feet in width. Four other streets, which had houses on one side, and the ramparts on the other, encompassed the whole city, and were each of them 200 feet wide. By the streets crossing each other, the whole city was divided into 676 squares, each of which was four furlongs and a half on every side, and two miles and a quarter in circuit. The houses of these squares were three or four stories high, and their fronts were embellished; and the inner space was filled with courts and gardens.

The city was divided into two parts by the Euphrates, which ran from north to south. A bridge of admirable structure, about a furlong in length, and sixty feet in width, formed the communication across the river; and at the two extremities of this bridge were two palaces, the old palace on the east, and the new palace on the west side of the river. The temple of Belus, which stood near the old palace, occupied one entire square. The city was situated in a vast plain, the soil of which was extremely fat and fruitful. To people this immense city, Nebuchadnezzar transplanted hither an infinite number of captives from the many nations that he subdued. It would appear, however, that the whole of it was never inhabited.

The famous hanging gardens, which adorned the palace in Babylon, were ranked among the wonders of the world. They contained four hundred feet square, and were composed of several large terraces: and the platform of the highest terrace equalled the walls of Babylon in height, or 350 feet. The ascent from terrace to terrace was by steps ten feet wide. The whole mass was supported by large vaults, built upon each other, and strengthened by a wall twenty-two feet thick. The tops of these arches were covered with stones, rushes, and bitumen, and plates of lead to prevent leakage. The depth of earth was so great, that in it the largest trees might take root. Here was every thing that could please the sight; large trees, flowers, plants, and shrubs. Upon the highest terrace was a reservoir, supplied by a certain engine with water from the river.

The predictions of the prophets against Babylon gradually received their accomplishment. Berosus relates, that Cyrus having taken this city, demolished its walls, lest the inhabitants should revolt. Darius, son of Hystaspes, destroyed the gates, &c. Alexander the Great intended to rebuild it, but was prevented by death from accomplishing his design. Seleucus Nicator built Seleucia on the Tigris; and this city insensibly deprived Babylon of its inhabitants. Strabo assures us, that under Augustus, Babylon was almost forsaken; and that it was no longer any thing more than a great desert. St. Jerom relates, on the testimony of a monk, who dwelt at Jerusalem, that in his time, Babylon and its ancient precincts were converted into a great park, in which the kings of Persia were accustomed to hunt.

The remains of ancient Babylon, as described by recent travellers, are so vast, that the whole could never be suspected of having been the work of human hands, if it were not for the layers of bricks, which are found there. The bricks of Babylon are of two kinds, sun-dried, and fire-burnt. The former is generally largest, as it is of a coarser fabric than the latter; but its solidity seems, by proof, to be equal to the hardest stone. It is composed of clay mixed with chopped straw, or broken reeds, to compact it, and then dried in the sun. These unburnt bricks commonly form the interior or mass of any strong foundation among the ruins of Babylon. The fire-burnt bricks are cemented with zepht or bitumen; and between each layer are oziars. In the ruins of Babylon are found those large and thick bricks imprinted with those unknown characters resembling arrow-heads, specimens of which are preserved in the British Museum, in the Museum of the East India Company, and in other depositories of antiquities. 'It is evident,' says the Honourable Captain Keppel, 'that, with some exceptions, the great buildings of Babylon were composed of sun-burnt bricks, and coated with bricks burnt in the furnace.' Hence it appears, that the composition of these bricks corresponds exactly with the account given by the sacred historian of the builders of Babel. 'Let us make brick,' said they, 'and burn them throughly

And they had brick for stone, and slime had they for mortar.' (Gen. xi. 3.)

The literal fulfilment of the predictions uttered against Babylon by the Hebrew prophets, has been shown by various modern travellers, who have described the present state of the ruins. 'The mound (Mujillebe),' says captain Keppel, 'was full of large holes: we entered some of them, and found them strewn with the carcases and skeletons of animals recently killed. The odour of wild beasts was so strong, that prudence got the better of curiosity, for we had no doubt as to the savage nature of the inhabitants. Our guides, indeed, told us, that all the ruins abounded in lions, and other wild beasts; so literally has the divine prediction been fulfilled, that "wild beasts of the desert should lie there; that their houses should be full of doleful creatures; that wild beasts of the islands should cry in their desolate houses."' (Isai. xiii. 21, 22.) Keppel's Narrative of Travels from India, vol. i. p. 171—188; Buckingham's Travels in Mesopotamia, vol. ii. p. 258—394; Sir R. K. Porter's Travels in Georgia, &c. vol. ii. p. 308—332, 337—400.

BABYLONIA, a province of Chaldæa or Assyria, of which Babylon was the capital, and which is now called Irac.

BACCHI'DES, Βακχιδης, signifies son of Bacchus, or like to Bacchus. Bacchides was governor of Mesopotamia, and general of the troops belonging to Demetrius Soter, king of Syria. (1 Macc. ix. 1.) He and the high-priest Alcimus were sent, by Demetrius, to examine into the depredations alleged against Judas Maccabæus in the country. From several instances mentioned of him, he appears to have been a cruel and perfidious character.

BA'LAAM, or BELOM, בלעם, signifies old age, or absorption; otherwise, without the people; otherwise, their destruction. Balaam was a prophet or diviner of the city of Pethor, on the Euphrates. (Numb. xxii. 4, 5.) Balak, king of Moab, having seen the multitude of Israel, feared that they would attack his country; and to avert this dreaded misfortune, he sent for Balaam, as a man famous for prediction, to come and curse that nation. His messengers having declared their errand, Balaam, during the night, consulted God, who forbade him to go. Afterwards, Balak sent other messengers of superior quality. Balaam still declined to go, but kept them in his house that night: during this time, the Lord said to him, 'If the men come to call thee, rise up and go with them; but yet the word which I shall say unto thee, that shalt thou do.' It has been thought that, on this occasion, Balaam lodged the messengers in some apartments of his house, whilst he himself slept upon the top or terrace, in expectation of some communication from Heaven. If so, this will render clear the nature of the sign, upon which depended his going with them. 'If to call thee (call to thee—at thee, as Samuel went to call Saul), the men come up to thee, rise, and go with them.' But we do not read that he waited for this sign. 'He rose up early in the morning,' perhaps before his visitors were awake, 'saddled his ass, and went.' His forwardness was greater than their's, and was punished. If he slept upon the top of the house, where he might gather auguries, &c. from the aspects of heaven, the stars, the sun-rising, the flight of birds, &c. he certainly slept single, and the messengers might have called him without intrusion.

Balaam, therefore, without staying for the signal appointed to him, of being called by the messengers, rose up in the morning, and went with the envoys of Balak. God, perceiving this forward evil disposition of his heart, was angry; and an angel stood in the way to stop him. Balaam's ass, seeing the angel, while the diviner himself was probably lost in thought, turned out of the road into the fields. Balaam forced her into the way again; but the ass left the road a second and a third time.

At length Balaam became sensible of the divine interposition, and offered to return home; but receiving permission to continue his journey, he went to Balak, who complained of his reluctance in coming. 'Now I am come,' said Balaam, 'I can say nothing: the word that God putteth into my mouth, that must I speak.' Balak conducted him to a feast in his capital of Kirjath-huzoth and the next morning carried him to the high places of Baal, where he showed him the extremity of the camp of the Israelites.

Whilst they were here, Balaam ordered seven altars to be erected, and seven oxen and seven rams to be prepared; and having offered an ox and a ram on each altar, he left Balak to stand by the sacrifices, while he himself withdrew to consult the Lord. (Numb. xxiii.) When Balaam was withdrawn, God gave him his commission, and bade him return. He then uttered an oracular blessing upon Israel, and not a curse; and this he did a second and a third time, to the extreme mortification of Balak. Balak was enraged against Balaam, and said, I called thee to curse mine enemies, and behold thou hast altogether blessed them these three times. Therefore now flee unto thy place. I thought to promote thee to great honour, but now the Lord hath kept thee back from honour. Balaam answered, Spake I not also to thy messengers, saying, if Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the commandment of the Lord to do either good or bad of my own mind. Then Balaam also foretold what Israel, in future times, should do to the surrounding nations.

After these predictions, Balaam returned into his own country, or at least, quitted Balak for a time; but before he departed, as if vexed at his disappointment in missing the reward he expected, he advised Balak to engage Israel in idolatry and whoredom, that they might offend God, and lose his assistance. (Numb. xxv. 1, 2, 3; xxxi. 16. Mic. vi. 5. 2 Pet. ii. 15. Jude 11. Rev. ii. 14.) This evil counsel was followed. The young women of Moab invited the Hebrews to the feasts of Baal-peor, persuaded them to idolatry, and seduced them to impurity. God commanded Moses to avenge this insidious action. Moses therefore declared war against the Midianites, slew five of their princes, and a great number of other persons; and among those who fell, on this occasion, was Balaam himself. (Numb. xxv. 17, 18; xxxi. 1, 2, 7, 8.)

The Rabbins say, that Balaam was the author of that passage in Numbers, in which his history is related, and that Moses inserted it, in the same manner as he inserted other writings. It has been questioned whether Balaam was a true prophet of the Lord, or a mere diviner, magician, or fortune-teller, as he is called. Origen says, that all his power consisted in magic and cursing; because the devil, by whose influence he acted, can only curse and injure, and not bless. It cannot, however, be denied, that the Scripture calls him a prophet. (2 Pet. ii. 16.) St. Jerom has adopted the opinion of the Hebrews, that Balaam knew the true God, that he erected altars to him, and was a true prophet, though corrupted by avarice.

Moses says, that Balaam consulted the Lord, and calls the Lord his God: 'I cannot go beyond the commandment of the Lord my God.' (Numb. xxii. 18.) The reason why Balaam calls Jehovah my God, may be, because he was of the posterity of Shem, who maintained the worship of Jehovah, not only in his own person, but among his descendants; so that while the posterity of Ham fell into idolatry, and the posterity of Japhet were settled at a distance in Europe, the Shemites retained the worship of God, and knew the holiness of his nature. This appears, from the profligate advice, which Balak received from Balaam, to seduce Israel to transgress against Jehovah, with the holiness of whose nature the perverted prophet seems to have been well acquainted. On the whole there appears to be little doubt, that Balaam was a true prophet, though a very bad man; and this is the opinion of most of the commentators. Additions to Calmet's Dictionary. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. cciv. p. 23.

BAL'ADAN, בלאדן, signifies the Lord God; ripeness of judgment; or, without judgment; or, without command. Baladan is the Scripture name of a king of Babylon, who is called, in profane authors, Belesis, or Belesus, Nabonassar, or Nanybrus. Baladan was at first only governor of Babylon; and confederating with Arbaces, governor of Media, he rebelled against Sardanapalus, king of Assyria. These two generals marched against Sardanapalus with an army of four hundred thousand men. The conspirators lost three battles; but the Bactrians deserting to them, they rendered themselves masters of the king's camp. Sardanapalus retreated to Nineveh, which was besieged by the conspirators three years; but in the third year the Tigris overflowed, and beat down twenty furlongs of the walls. On this the conspirators entered the city; Sardanapalus burnt himself, with his valuables, upon a funeral pile, in his palace. Arbaces was acknowledged king of Media; and Baladan, king of Babylon. Berodach-baladan, who sent ambassadors to Hezekiah, was, probably, the son of Baladan. (2 Kings xx. 12.)

BA'LAK, בלק, signifies who lays waste and desert; otherwise, who licks, or laps. Balak, the son of Zippor, king of the Moabites, terrified at the multitude of Israelites, encamped on the confines of his country, and fearing they would attack him, sent deputies to Balaam the diviner, and requested him to come and curse, or devote (execrate) this people. (Numb. xxii.; xxiii.; xxiv.; xxv.) See BALAAM.

Balaam advised him to engage the Israelites in sin; and Balak, politically as he thought, followed his advice. This proved equally pernicious to him, who gave the counsel, to those who adopted it, and to those, against whom it was intended. The Israelites who were betrayed by it, were slain by their brethren, who continued unperturbed; Balaam, the author of it, was involved in the slaughter of the Midianites; and Balak, who had executed it by means of the Midianite women, saw his allies attacked, their country plundered, and himself accused as the cause of their calamity.

BALANCE, an instrument for weighing commodities. It is supposed that the Hebrew balance pretty much resembled the Roman steel-yard, on which the weight was hung at one end, and the article to be weighed at the other end of the beam. Balances, in the plural, generally mean scales—a pair of scales. Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

BALDNESS, a natural effect of old age, when the hair of the head wanting nourishment, falls off, and leaves the head naked. Artificial baldness was adopted as a token of mourning; and it is threatened to the voluptuous daughters of Israel. (Isaiah iii. 17. Mic. i. 16. Isaiah xv. 2. Jerem. xlvii. 5. Ezek. vii. 18. Amos viii. 10.) Supplement. Addenda to Calmet.

BA'MOTH-BA'AL, במות-בעל, signifies altars or heights of the idol, or in the death of the idol, or rather heights sacred to Baal. Bamoth-baal was a city beyond Jordan given to Reuben. (Josh. xiii. 17.) Eusebius says, that it was situated in the plain, through which the Arnon runs.

BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY, a controversy that arose with the bishop of Bangor. Dr. Hoadley, bishop of Bangor, in a sermon preached before George I. asserted, that Christ was supreme in his own kingdom; that he had not delegated his power, like temporal lawgivers, during their absence, to any persons, as his vicegerents or deputies; and that the church of England, as all other national churches, was merely a civil or human institution, established for the purpose of diffusing and perpetuating the knowledge and belief of Christianity. On the meeting of the convocation, a committee was appointed to examine this publication. A heavy censure was passed against it, as tending to subvert all government and discipline in the church of Christ, to reduce his kingdom to a state of anarchy and confusion, and to impugn and impeach the royal supremacy in matters ecclesiastical, and the authority of the legislation to enforce obedience in matters of religion, by their sanction. To these proceedings a sudden stop was put by proroguing the convocation. However, the controversy, which had been commenced, was continued for several years, by the bishop and his adherents on the one side, and by men of equal learning and talents on the other.

"The whole stream of ecclesiastical history, from the days of the apostles to the present hour, presents to our view a visible, as well as an invisible church. An eminent divine, Dr. Rogers, considered the subject, during this contest, in this light; and indeed if we take away this argument we must remove at the first onset that venerable council, which assembled at Jerusalem, on the great question of circumcision, as well as that body of Christians to whom the decree was directed. The nature of Christ's kingdom, no doubt, is spiritual, but as he has commanded a communion of saints, an union of men, whose sole object is, or ought to be, the promotion of their own and others' salvation, according to the doctrines of the Gospel, we must acknowledge that under Him a directing power must reside some where. He has given us no reasons to suppose that power infallible. Where then can we look for it, but in an assembly of good men, united under his authority, according to the measure of grace which he has given them, that church which he has planted upon earth? I speak not here of any particular church, but of the catholic or universal church of Christ, of the 'general assembly and church of first-born, whose names are written in heaven.' " Brewster's Secular Essay, p. 64, 65.

BAPTISM, from βαπτίζω, signifying to wash, dip, or plunge, and was reckoned among the rites of the Jewish religion. We read that Aaron and his sons were initiated into the priesthood by baptism (Exod. xxix. 4.); and Spencer proves that long before our Saviour's time, the Jews received proselytes into their church by baptism. Some, indeed, reckon this ceremony of initiation into the Jewish religion among the inventions of the Talmudists. When, however, we consider, that the Jews always held the practices of the Christians in abhorrence, it will appear highly probable, that this rite was derived to them from the usage of their ancestors, before the coming of Christ. It is farther probable, that, as the sacrament of the Lord's Supper is plainly derived from the Jewish passover, the twin sacrament of baptism had its origin also in the rites of the Jewish religion.

Grotius is of opinion, that the rite of baptism dated its origin from the time of the deluge; immediately after which, he thinks, it was instituted, as a memorial that the world was purged by water. Some learned men are of opinion, that it was added to circumcision, soon after the Samaritan schism, as a mark of distinction to the orthodox Jews. Spencer, who is fond of deriving the rites of the Jewish religion from the ceremonies of the heathens, supposes it probable, that the Jews received the baptism of proselytes from the neighbouring nations, who prepared candidates for the more sacred functions of their religion, by a solemn ablution; that by this affinity of sacred rites, the Jews wished to induce the Gentiles to embrace their religion, and that the proselytes, in gaining whom they were extremely diligent, (Matt. xxiii. 15.) might more easily comply with the transition from Gentilism to Judaism. In confirmation of this opinion, he observes, first, that there is no Divine precept for the baptism of proselytes, God having enjoined only the rite of circumcision for the admission of strangers into the Jewish religion; secondly, that among foreign nations, as the Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, and others, it was customary for those, who were initiated into their mysteries or sacred rites, to be first purified by dipping their whole body in water. As a farther confirmation of his opinion, that learned writer adds, that the cup of blessing, annexed to the Paschal Supper, seems plainly to have been derived from a Pagan origin; for the Greeks, at their feasts, had one cup, called ποτήριον ἀγαθοῦ δαίμονος, the cup of the good demon or god, which they drank at the conclusion of the entertainment, when the table was removed. Since, then, a rite of Gentile origin was added to one of the Jewish sacraments, viz. the passover, there can be no absurdity in supposing that baptism, which was annexed to the other sacrament, namely, circumcision, might be derived from the same source. Lastly, he observes, that Christ, in the institution of his sacraments, paid a peculiar regard to those rites, which were borrowed from the Gentiles; for, rejecting circumcision and the Paschal Supper, our Saviour adopted into his religion baptism and the sacred cup, and thus prepared the way for the conversion of the Gentiles, and their reception into his church. Selden observes, that the proselyte was not baptized till the wound of circumcision was perfectly healed, when the ceremony was performed by plunging him into some natural receptacle of water; and that baptism was never repeated in the same person, or in any of his posterity, who derived their legal purity from the baptism of their ancestors.

When John the Baptist began to preach repentance, he practised a baptism in the waters of Jordan. To this service he did not attribute the virtue of forgiving sins, but used it only as a preparation for the baptism of Jesus Christ, and remission of sins through him. (Matt. iii. 2. Mark i. 4.) He exacted not only sorrow for sin, but a change of life, manifested by such practices as were worthy of repentance. The baptism of John was more perfect than that of the Jews, but less perfect than that of Jesus Christ. It was, says Chrysostom, as it were a bridge, which, from the baptism of the Jews, made a way to that of our Saviour; it was superior to the first, but inferior to the second. That of John promised what that of Jesus executed. Though John the Baptist did not enjoin his disciples to continue his baptism after his death, because it was superseded by the manifestation of the Messiah, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost, yet it was administered by many of his followers, and, several years after the death of Jesus Christ, some were ignorant that there was any other baptism. Among this number was Apollos, a learned and zealous man of Alexandria, who came to Ephesus twenty years after the resurrection of our Saviour. (Acts xviii. 25.) When St. Paul came afterwards to the same city, he found many, either constant residents in Ephesus, or only occasional visitors, who had received no other baptism than that of John, and knew not that there were any influences of the Holy Ghost, communicated by baptism into Jesus Christ. (Acts xix. 1.) Perhaps, however, these were only occasional visitors at Ephesus. Our Saviour, when sending his disciples to preach the Gospel, said, 'Go teach all nations; baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Whosoever believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned.' (Matt. xxviii. 19. Mark xvi. 16. John iii. 5.) Baptism, therefore, is the first mark, by which the disciples of Jesus Christ are distinguished.

The word baptism is frequently used in Scripture for sufferings. 'Can ye drink of the cup that I drink of, and be baptized with the baptism, which I am baptized with?' (Mark x. 38.) 'I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished?' (Luke xii. 50.) Traces of similar phraseology are found in the Old Testament, (Psalm lxix. 2, 3,) where waters often denote tribulations; and where, to be swallowed up by the waters, to pass through great waters, &c. signify to be overwhelmed by misfortunes.

Many difficulties have been raised on the following words of St. Peter: 'Repent and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins.' (Acts ii. 38.) It has been questioned, whether such baptism was ever administered in the name of Jesus only, without express mention of the Father and the Spirit? and whether such baptism could be valid or lawful? Many fathers and some councils believed, that the apostles had occasionally baptized in the name of Jesus only; and Ambrose asserts, that though only one person of the Trinity were named, the baptism is perfect. For he adds, whoever names one person of the Trinity, means the whole. But, as this opinion is founded on only a dubious fact, and an obscure text, it is not impossible that these fathers and councils might be mistaken. By baptizing in the name of Jesus may be signified, first, either to baptize with invocation of the name of Jesus alone without mentioning the Father and the Spirit; or, secondly, to baptize in his name, by his authority, with his baptism, and into his religion, mentioning expressly the three persons of the Trinity, as he has clearly and plainly commanded in Matthew. Since, therefore, we have a positive and explicit text for this service, what obliges us to quit it and to follow another capable of different senses? Who will believe, that the apostles, forsaking the form of baptism prescribed to them by Jesus Christ, had instituted another form entirely new, and without necessity? In fact, the opinion that baptism ought to be administered in the name of the whole Trinity, and with express invocation of the three persons, has in its favour a clear text of Scripture, in which the rite is, as it were, instituted, and expressly discussed. The passage, 'to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ,' may be explained 'solemnly to profess to be a follower of Jesus, and to bind oneself to embrace his doctrine.'

St. Paul, proving the resurrection of the dead, says, 'If the dead rise not at all, what shall they do who are baptized for the dead?' (1 Cor. xv. 29.) The question is, what is meant by baptism for the dead? No one can pretend, that the apostle approves the practice, or authorizes the opinion. It is sufficient, that there were persons, who thus thought and acted at the time. It is also observable, that he does not say, the Corinthians caused themselves to be baptized for the dead, but what shall they do who are baptized for the dead? How will they support this practice, upon what will they justify it, if the dead rise not again, and if souls departed do not exist after death? It would appear, that some at this time, who called themselves Christians, were baptized for the dead,—for the advantage of the dead. When this epistle to the Corinthians was written, twenty-three years after the resurrection of our Saviour, several heretics, as the Simonians, Gnostics, and Nicolaitans, denied the real resurrection of the dead, and acknowledged only a metaphorical resurrection received in baptism. The Marcionites, who appeared some time afterwards, embraced the same principles; they denied the resurrection, and, what is more particular, received baptism for the dead. This we learn from Tertullian, who tells the Marcionites, that they ought not to use St. Paul's authority in favour of their practice of receiving baptism for the dead; and that if the apostle notices this custom, it is only to prove the resurrection of the dead against themselves. In another place he confesses, that in St. Paul's time some were baptized a second time for the dead,—on behalf of the dead, hoping it would be serviceable to others, at their resurrection. Chrysostom says, that among the Marcionites, when any of their catechumens died, they placed a living person under the bed of the deceased; and then advancing to the dead body, they asked whether he was willing to receive baptism? The person under the bed answered for him, that he earnestly desired to be baptized; and then accordingly, he was baptized, instead of the dead person. Epiphanius asserts, that the Marcionites received baptism not only once, but as often as they thought proper; that they procured themselves to be baptized in the name of those among them, who died without baptism, as substituted representatives of such persons; and that St. Paul had these heretics in view. However, the late bishop Warburton was of opinion, that the apostle alluded to vice as death, and to a return to virtue as life; and Dr. Doddridge, and some others think, that at the time when St. Paul wrote this epistle, it was too early to notice the practice of the Marcionites.

Mr. Bloomfield observes, "The phrase seems to be idiotical, and there is (populari more) an ellipsis of ἀναστάσις. Thus the sense will be, 'baptized in the confidence and expectation of a resurrection from the dead.' Of course, by dead are meant the dead that die in the Lord; and by the resurrection, the resurrection to happiness. This interpretation is established beyond all doubt by Chrysostom, who has examined the passage at considerable length, and with his usual ability. He and the other Greek commentators notice, but with the strongest censure, the interpretation which makes this an allusion to the vicarious baptism of the dead. They all agree that there is an allusion to the form in Baptism, 'I believe in the resurrection of the dead,' to which is added, 'Wilt thou be baptized in this faith?' 'It is my desire.' "

Many different ideas have been entertained respecting the effects of baptism. The Remonstrants and Socinians reduce it to a mere sign of divine grace. On the contrary, the Romanists exalt its power; they maintain, that by it all sin is taken away; and that it absolutely confers the grace of justification, and consequently grace ex opere operato. Some also speak of an indelible character impressed by it on the soul, called character dominicus, and character regius; but this is not admitted by others, since the spiritual character, conferred in regeneration, may easily be effaced by mortal sins. Dodwell maintained, that by baptism the soul is rendered immortal, and that those who die without it will not rise again. Bloomfield's Recensio Synoptica, vols. iv. p. 89; vi. p. 688; Doddridge's Family Expositor, vol. iv. p. 99; Warburton's Divin. Legat. vol. i. p. 435.

BAPTISM OF THE DEAD was a custom, which anciently prevailed among some people in Africa, of baptizing the dead. The third council of Carthage speaks of it as a matter of which ignorant Christians were fond. Gregory Nazianzen also observes, that the same superstitious opinion prevailed among some, who delayed to be baptized. In addressing these men, he asks, whether they delayed to be baptized till after death? It is also mentioned by Philastrius as the general error of the Montanists or Cataphrygians, that they baptized men after death. The practice seems to be founded on a vain opinion, that when men had neglected to receive baptism during their life, some compensation might be made for this default by conferring it after death.

BAPTISTS, a denomination of Christians, who consider immersion in water as essential to Christian baptism, and who disapprove of the admission of infants to that ordinance. Many of the Hussites in the fifteenth, of the Wickliffites or Lollards in the fourteenth, of the Petrobrussians in the twelfth century, and of the Waldenses, were Baptists in sentiment. However, much of the present felicity of this denomination on the continent may be traced to the laborious efforts of Menno Simon, a native of Friesland, from whom they received the name of Menonites, and who in 1536 publicly embraced the communion of the Anabaptists. As it happens that many of those, whom this denomination baptize, have undergone what the Baptists term the ceremony of sprinkling in their infancy, the Baptists have been called Anabaptists, as if they re-baptized. This, however, they deny, and allege that those who have undergone this ceremony in their infancy, did not thereby receive Christian baptism.

In England, fourteen Anabaptists were put to death in 1535, and thirty were banished in 1539, for their opinions, in the reign of Henry the Eighth. Yet bishop Burnet remarks, that in 1547 many Anabaptists were in England, and that they were generally Germans, whom the revolutions in their own country had banished from home. It is added, that in the reign of Queen Elizabeth they greatly increased, and were subjected to imprisonment. A few, indeed, recanted their opinions, but two were burnt in Smithfield, in 1575. In the reign of James I., among the persecuted exiles that fled to Holland were several Anabaptists; and in the same reign, Edward Wightman, a Baptist of Burton-upon-Trent, was burnt at Lichfield. He was the last that suffered this cruel kind of death in England.

The Baptists having been thus exposed to many severities, were a long time in establishing themselves in England. Neale places their first congregation in this country in 1640, when they separated from the independents, under a Mr. Jesse. From that time they have prevailed more or less, and at present subsist under two separate and distinct societies. Those who have followed the doctrines of Calvin, are called Particular Baptists, from particular election, the principal tenet of that system; and those, who profess the Arminian or Remonstrant doctrines, are denominated General Baptists, from the chief of those tenets, general or universal redemption.

About 1620, and the same time that the Independents settled in New England, several Anabaptists emigrated to that country. However, their congregational brethren, though they had themselves fled from persecution, afforded no great latitude to their tender consciences. Yet they have maintained their establishment in America ever since, and have gradually increased in number. At present, the communicants, and other members of the Baptist congregations in the United States alone, are computed at 255,670.

It has been already observed, that the members of this denomination are distinguished from all other professing Christians, by their opinions respecting the ordinance of Christian Baptism. Conceiving, that positive institutions cannot be established by analogical reasoning, but depend on the will of the Saviour, revealed in express precepts, and that apostolical example illustrative of this is the rule of duty, they differ from their Christian brethren with regard both to the subjects and the mode of baptism.

With respect to the subjects, from the command, which Christ gave after his resurrection, and in which baptism is mentioned as consequent to faith in the Gospel, they conceive them to be those, and those only, who believe what the apostles were then enjoined to preach. So, when the Æthiopian eunuch asked the evangelist Philip, 'What doth hinder me to be baptized?' he answered, 'If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest.'—'They that gladly received the Spirit were baptized;' and it is said, 'Many of the Corinthians hearing, believed, and were baptized.'

With respect to the mode, they affirm, that, instead of sprinkling or pouring, the person ought to be immersed in the water. They maintain that immersion or plunging is the primary and common signification of the word βάπτισμα, both in sacred and profane authors. They again refer to the primitive practice, and observe, that the baptizer as well as the baptized having gone down into the water, the latter is baptized in it, and both come up out of it. They say, that John baptized in the Jordan, and that Jesus, after being baptized, came up out of it. Believers are said also to be 'buried with Christ by baptism into death, wherein also they are risen with him;' and the Baptists insist, that this is a doctrinal allusion incompatible with any other mode.

But they say, that their views of this institution are much more confirmed, and may be better understood, by studying its nature and import. They consider it as an impressive emblem of that, by which their sins are remitted or washed away, and of that, on account of which the Holy Spirit is given to those who obey the Messiah. In other words, they view Christian baptism as a figurative representation of that which the Gospel of Jesus is in testimony. To this the mind of the baptized is therefore naturally led, while spectators are to consider him as professing his faith in the Gospel, and his subjection to the Redeemer. The Baptists, therefore, would say, that none ought to be baptized, except those who seem to believe this Gospel, and that immersion is not properly a mode of baptism, but baptism itself.

With respect to infants, Jesus said, 'Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.' Though the Baptists see no reason for baptizing them, in this or any other passage, yet this express assurance of the divine favour towards their children affords them much consolation.

Thus the English and most foreign Baptists consider a personal profession of faith, and an immersion in water, as essential to baptism. The profession of faith is generally made before the congregation, at a church meeting. On these occasions some have a creed, to which they expect the candidate to assent, and to give a circumstantial account of his conversion; but others require only a profession of his faith as a Christian. The former generally consider baptism as an ordinance, which initiates persons into a particular church; and they say that, without breach of Christian liberty, they have a right to expect an agreement in articles of faith in their own societies. The latter think, that baptism initiates merely into a profession of the Christian religion, and therefore say, that they have no right to require an assent to their creed from such as do not intend to join their communion; and in support of their opinion, they quote the baptism of the eunuch, in the eighth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles.

Some, both of the General and the Particular Baptists, object to free or mixed communion, and do not allow persons, who have been baptized in their infancy, to join with them in the celebration of the Lord's Supper; because they consider such as not having been baptized, and consequently inadmissible to the other ordinance. Others, however, of both classes of Baptists, suppose that this ought to be no objection; that such as think themselves really baptized, though in infancy, and such as are partakers of grace, belong to the true Church of Christ, and are truly devoted to God, ought not to be rejected on account of a different opinion respecting this particular ordinance. Some of these also, without referring to a man's persuasion that he has been baptized, think that he ought to be received into the fellowship of the churches. If therefore he, with many Unitarians, should doubt the perpetuity of baptism, or that it is a perpetual ordinance, as it respects the descendants of Christians, though it may be properly administered to proselytes from other religions, he might be admitted as a communicant at the Lord's Supper.

Some of both classes of Baptists are, at the same time, Sabbatarians, and, with the Jews, observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath. This has been adopted by them, from a persuasion that all the ten commandments are in their nature strictly moral, and that the observance of the seventh day was never abrogated or repealed by our Saviour or his apostles.

In church government the Baptists differ little from the Independents, except that, in some of their churches, the Baptists have three distinct orders of ministers, who are separately ordained, and to the highest of whom they give the name of messengers, to the second that of elders, and to the third that of deacons. With respect to excommunication, they seem closely to follow our Saviour's directions, in the eighteenth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, which they apply to differences between individuals; and if any man be guilty of scandalous immorality they exclude him from the brotherhood, or fellowship of the church. Like the other Protestant dissenters, and the Presbyterians in Scotland, &c. the Baptists receive the Lord's Supper sitting at a common table, and giving the elements one to another. This is a practice unknown in the primitive church, in which 'the sacrament was received by the communicants sometimes standing and sometimes kneeling; but there is no trace in any ancient writer of its having ever been received sitting.'

The Baptists in Great Britain, Ireland, Holland, Germany, the United States of America, Upper Canada, &c. are divided, as has been already observed, into two distinct classes, or societies, the Particular or Calvinistic, and the General or Arminian Baptists. The former are said to be much more numerous than the latter, and to have nearly 400 meeting-houses in England, of which 15 are within the bills of mortality in London. In December 1798, the Particular Baptist congregations in England amounted to three hundred and sixty-one; and in Wales, to eighty-four. At the same time, the numbers of most congregations were greatly increasing; and their Itinerant Society in London were making great exertions in Cornwall, Salop, Devon, and the north part of Somersetshire, &c. This class of Baptists ordain in almost the same manner as the Independents. The most distinguished of their society are, perhaps, Dr. Gill, Mr. John Bunyan, and Dr. Samuel Stennett.

The father of the General Baptists was a Mr. Smith, who was at first a clergyman of the church of England; but resigning his living, he went over to Holland, where his baptismal principles were warmly opposed by Messrs. Ainsworth and Robinson, of whom the former was pastor of the Brownists or Independents at Amsterdam, and the latter of those at Leyden. As Mr. Smith did not think that any one at the time was duly qualified to administer the ordinance of baptism, he baptized himself, and hence was denominated a se-baptist. He afterwards adopted the Arminian doctrines; and in 1611, the General Baptists published a Confession of Faith, which diverges much farther from Calvinism, than those who are now called Arminians would approve. However, the General Baptists are said to be on the decline at present, and a considerable number of them have embraced Socinianism or Arianism. On this account, several of their ministers and churches, who disapprove of those principles, have within the last forty years, formed themselves into a distinct connection, called The New Association. The churches in this union keep up a friendly acquaintance, in some outward things, with those from whom they have separated: but in things more essential, and particularly as to the changing of ministers, and the admission of members, they disclaim any connection. Among the eminent General Baptists may be ranked the names of Gale, Foster, Burroughs, Foot, Noble, Bulkley, Wiche, Robinson, and, perhaps, Whiston.

Much praise is due to the Baptists for their zeal and exertions in converting the heathens. In 1793, the Particular Baptists formed a missionary society; and Messrs. John Thomas and William Carey were sent out to India as missionaries. These have been followed by others; and the knowledge of Christianity, as understood and professed by the Baptists, has been zealously and assiduously propagated. The Baptists, therefore, seem likely to rival the Moravians in their endeavours to spread the knowledge of the Gospel in heathen countries; and should they be equally gifted with patient endurance and perseverance, they may probably become much more successful, by the exertions they are now making, in translating the Scriptures into the languages of the East.

It is a distinguishing tenet of the Baptists, as well as of the Independents, to admit of no opinions or rites, which are not countenanced by apostolic precept or example; and as the former conceive, that the Scriptures contain neither the one nor the other for the baptism of infants, they disclaim it, notwithstanding the arguments from tradition, &c. alleged in its defence. Though it would seem, that all those, who oppose infant baptism, must deny original sin, yet no sect or party of Christians are more strenuous supporters of the doctrine of original sin than the Particular Baptists.

The Baptists in England separate from the established church for the same reasons as the other dissenters, and also on account of their particular tenets respecting baptism. "Before the act of toleration, they were liable to pains and penalties as non-conformists, and often for their peculiar sentiments as Baptists; but, by that act, they, in common with other dissenters, are protected in the exercise of their religious worship.

With respect to the mode of baptism by immersion, they are by no means singular. It is administered in this manner in the Greek and Russian churches; and in the church of England it is enjoined to be thus administered to those who are thought capable, though it is never practised. However, according to some, the question with the Baptists does not so properly regard either the subjects or the mode of baptism, as whether it should be administered on the candidates' own profession of faith only, or on that of another. If the Baptists require a personal profession of faith from all their members, the church of England does the same. The latter, however, requires this profession not previously, but subsequently to baptism, when she calls upon her members to renew, ratify, and confirm the vows of their baptism by confirmation, after which they may be admitted to every Christian privilege. Evans's Sketch of the Denominations of the Christian World, p. 142, &c. Adam's Religious World, vol. iii. p. 57, 58, &c.

BAPTISTS, SCOTTISH. Till the year 1765 there were no Baptist churches in Scotland, except one, which existed from about the year 1653 to the restoration, and which, in all probability, was composed of English Baptists, who had left their native country during the civil wars. In 1765, Mr. Robert Carmichael, who had been a dissenting minister, and Mr. Archibald M'Lean, a printer in Glasgow, openly professed the doctrine of Believer-Baptism. From that time the Baptist principles in Scotland gradually and imperceptibly gained ground till the year 1777, when a great number of persons joined the Baptist churches in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and other places.

The Scottish Baptists have some distinguishing tenets, which it may be necessary to mention. With them it signifies nothing, though a man should have been baptized in his riper years, if he does not appear to have been converted by the Word and Spirit of God, so as to know and believe the precious truth of the Gospel, which 'flesh and blood cannot reveal,' to experience its saving power, and to 'bring forth fruits meet for repentance.' They have not proceeded chiefly on the distinguishing principle of adult baptism, but on the important grounds that Christ's kingdom is not of this world, and the obligation imposed on his disciples to observe his ordinances in a state of separation from the world, and in all things to hear his voice. They consider the baptism of infants not only as opposite to all the precepts and examples in the New Testament, but as completely subversive of the doctrine of Christ's kingdom, which is frequently denominated the Kingdom of Heaven, and which admits not the fleshly seed of believers, as such, to be accounted its subjects, or to partake of its blessings and privileges; for 'except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' Yet they admit, that the heavenly and eternal kingdom of God consists of infants as well as adults; that some of the children of believers that grow up to maturity are of the elect of God, though such, while infants, cannot be distinguished by man; and that the whole word of God is favourable to the salvation of all that die in infancy.

The Scottish Baptists are particularly jealous with regard to salvation through the blood of Christ alone. They are persuaded, that the vilest sinner needs nothing more to relieve his guilty conscience, than to believe that Jesus, the Son of God, a divine person, 'was delivered up for the offences of sinners, and raised again for their justification,' and that 'he who believeth shall be saved.' They affirm, that the grace, which saves the most virtuous of men, is as free and sovereign as that which saved the dying thief upon Mount Calvary. They maintain, that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law; and that faith does not signify working, but merely believing, or giving credence to the divine record. At the same time, they plead with equal zeal, in another point of view, for the necessity of good works. Though in their opinion faith and works are opposed to each other, so far as justification is concerned, yet these, with respect to sanctification, perfectly harmonize. Deliverance from the power of sin is, in their view, an essential part of that salvation which Christ came to bestow, and which is promised to those who believe in his name. They are fully convinced, that he, who professes to believe the Gospel, and on whom the effects of righteousness are not produced, is still 'in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity.'

They consider the peculiar and distinguishing love, which the disciples of Christ owe to each other, as one of the most striking evidences of true Christianity; and they perceive, that among the fruits of that love, works of charity, or ministering to the temporal wants of poor brethren, are most frequently inculcated in the New Testament, and that showing no mercy in this respect puts a negative on a man's pretensions to the love of God.

The Scottish Baptists refrain from eating blood, observe the kiss and feasts of charity, and endeavour to exemplify a complete equality among the brethren.

They acknowledge no standard of faith and practice among Christians, except that of divine revelation; but they are not satisfied with a general acknowledgment that the Bible is an infallible standard. They maintain, that the sense, in which a man understands the Scripture, constitutes his faith; and, therefore, they have no communion with those, who do not agree with them in the sense of Scripture, respecting every thing essential to their faith and order. According to them, the religion of Christ is at present the same, in all respects, as in the apostolic age. They affirm that, during that period, there were no presbyteries, except the elderships of distinct and independent churches; no bishops, except presbyters, who were all in an equal degree bishops, or overseers, as the word literally signifies; no decisions respecting ecclesiastical matters, without the suffrage of the brethren; and no attempts to establish Christ's religion by human laws, or to render it palatable to the world, who love darkness rather than light.

The public ordinances, in which the Scottish Baptists continue stedfastly, are the apostle's doctrine, or hearing the word of God read and preached; fellowship, or contribution for the poor, and for other necessary purposes; the breaking of bread, or the Lord's Supper; the prayers, which accompany all these ordinances; and singing the praises of God. They observe the Lord's Supper, as well as all the other Divine ordinances, every first day of the week, being of opinion, that obedience to their Lord's commandment, 'Do this in remembrance of me,' was a principal thing the first churches had in view, when they assembled together on that day. (Acts xx. 7.) The prayers and exhortations of the brethren form a part of their church order, under the direction and control of the elders, pastors, or overseers of the flock, to whom it exclusively belongs to preside in conducting the worship, to rule in cases of discipline, and to preach the Gospel. These are, therefore, distinguished from the brethren exhorting each other, except only when persons qualified for preaching the word are approved by the church, of which they are members, and regularly called to exercise that function. Such persons may preach the Gospel and baptize, but have no official charge in any particular church.

The elders of the churches here described are all laymen. They are chosen from among the brethren, by the rules laid down in the epistles to Timothy and Titus. They are not distinguished by any religious titles, or peculiar garb; and they are generally persons engaged in worldly business, which they continue after their appointment to the office of elder. However, they who are taught consider it as their indispensable duty to support those who labour in the word and doctrine, if the latter cannot earn a comfortable livelihood, or be devoted entirely to the work of the ministry. The teachers claim no dominion over the consciences of their brethren, among whom they are ranked, without forming themselves into a separate class. The official character of the teachers gives them no pre-eminence; and no exception exists in favour of those, who have been formerly clergymen.

The Scottish Baptists admit the usefulness of some branches of human learning, when these are not abused to serve the purposes of pride and vain jangling. At the same time, they affirm that no improvement of a man's intellectual powers can enable him to understand 'the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven,' which God hath hidden from the wise and prudent, and revealed to babes; and that those theological and philosophical studies, which are generally thought necessary, tend to increase the natural enmity of man's heart against the preaching of the cross, which was a stumbling-block to the Jews, who required a sign, and foolishness to the Greeks, who sought after wisdom. They say, that they cannot add to the qualifications of a Christian teacher laid down in the word of God. They deny that a liberal education is essential to his character and office; but they consider it absolutely necessary that he should diligently study the Holy Scriptures, which are able 'to make the man of God perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.'

The discipline and government of the Scottish Baptist churches are strictly congregational. After publicly professing their faith, members are received with the consent of the whole church, which, when the congregation is numerous, is expressed by a show of hands; and every case of discipline is determined in the same manner. A conscientious regard to the law of discipline, instituted by the great head of the church, (Matt. xviii.) is thought absolutely necessary for the safety of the whole body, and for maintaining purity of communion, and the due exercise of brotherly love. The Scottish Baptists consider all existing powers as ordained of God, and are therefore cheerfully subject to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake.

In Scotland are fifteen Baptist churches, with some small societies, &c. that amount to about one thousand members; and the number of the Scottish Baptists has of late years considerably increased. In England and Wales are a few churches of the same faith and order. In Scotland, two congregations at least are in communion with the Particular Baptists in England, and must therefore be considered as wholly distinct from the society that has formed the subject of this article.

The most considerable works by members of this denomination are M'Lean's Illustration of the Commission given by Jesus Christ to his Apostles, and the Answer to Glas's Dissertation on Infant Baptism; Inglis's Two Letters to the Public on the Grace of God; and the Publications of Mr. William Braidwood. Adam's Religious World, vol. iii. p. 233—248.

BARAB'BAS, Βαραββᾶς, signifies son of the father, or, of the master; otherwise, son of confusion and shame. Barabbas was a remarkable thief, guilty also of sedition and murder. Yet, he was preferred before Jesus Christ by the Jews, when Pilate asked them at the feast of the Passover, which of the two they would have released, Jesus or Barabbas? (John xviii. 40.) Origen says, that in many copies Barabbas was also called Jesus. The Armenian has the same reading: 'whom will ye that I deliver unto you, Jesus Barabbas, or Jesus who is called Christ?' This, as it gives additional spirit to the history, is well worthy of notice.

BARACHIAS, בִּרְיָה, signifies who blesses the Lord, who bends the knee before the Lord. Barachias was the father of Zacharias, who was slain between the temple and the altar. (Matt. xxiii. 35.) A diversity of opinion prevails concerning this Zacharias, son of Barachias. Some think (and this is the opinion most generally adopted), that he was Zacharias son of Jehoiada, who was killed by the order of Joash, between the temple and the altar. (2 Chron. xxiv. 21.) They are of opinion, that Jehoiada had two names, Barachias and Jehoiada; and in the Gospel of the Nazarenes, cited by St. Jerom, instead of Zacharias, the son of Barachias, was inserted Zacharias, the son of Jehoiada. Others think, that this Barachias was father of Zechariah, the last of the twelve lesser prophets, (Zech. i. 1.); but we have no proof, that this Zechariah was killed in the temple. Several of the ancients were of opinion, that Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, was the son of Barachias; and in some apocryphal books it was said, that Zacharias was killed in the temple, because he contrived to secure his son from the fury of Herod, when he ordered the massacre of the children of Bethlehem. But nothing can be more uncertain than this story. There is a Zachariah, the son of Barachias (or Jeberechiah), to whom the prophet Isaiah addressed himself, to witness his prophecy concerning the birth of the Messiah. Lastly, several moderns conjecture, that this Barachias is Baruk, father of Zacharias, mentioned by Josephus, in his books of the Jewish War. This Zacharias was killed between the porch and the altar, by the zealots, a little before the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans.

BARAK, בָּרַק, signifies thunder; otherwise, in vain. Barak, the son of Abinoam, was chosen by God to deliver the Hebrews from that bondage under which they were held by Jabin, king of the Canaanites. (Judges iv. 4, 5, &c.) At first he refused to obey the Lord's orders, signified to him by Deborah the prophetess, and answered, 'If you will go with me, I will go; if not, I will not go. I will surely go, said Deborah, but the honour of the victory will not be your's; for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a woman. By this she meant either Jael, who killed Sisera; or herself, who had the greater share in the success of this expedition. However, Deborah marched with Barak towards Kadesh, the capital of Naphtali; and having assembled ten thousand men, they advanced to Mount Tabor.

Sisera being informed of this movement, marched with nine hundred chariots of war, and encamped near the river Kishon. Barak rapidly descended from Mount Tabor; and the Lord having spread terror through Sisera's army, Barak easily defeated it, and obtained a complete victory. Sisera was killed by Jael. Barak and Deborah composed a hymn of thanksgiving; and the land had rest forty years, from the year of the world 2719 to 2759.

Some have supposed, that Barak was the son of Deborah; some, that he was her father; and others, that he was her husband; and that Barak and Lapidoth are the same person. It is certain from the text, that Deborah was married to Lapidoth, and that Barak was not related to her. It is observable, that some have understood the Hebrew word Lapidoth in the sense of splendour, 'a woman of splendour,' a woman, whose mode of living was in great splendour; and others, as a town, a woman who lived at Lapidoth.

BARBARIAN, לֵז, loez, in the Hebrew sense of the word, signifies a stranger, one who knows neither the holy language, nor the law. Some, however, derive it from berbir, a shepherd, whence Barbary, the country of wandering shepherds, Bedouins, Sceni, Scythæ, as if wanderers in tents, and, therefore, barbarians. According to the notions of the Greeks, all nations who were not Greeks, or governed by laws similar to those of the Greeks, were Barbarians. In their phraseology, the Persians, Egyptians, Hebrews, Arabians, Gauls, Germans, and even the Romans, were barbarians, however learned or polite they might be in themselves and in their manners. St. Paul comprehends all mankind under the names of Greeks and Barbarians: 'I am debtor both to the Greeks and to the Barbarians; to the wise and to the unwise.' (Rom. i. 14.) St. Luke calls the inhabitants of the island of Malta, Barbarians. (Acts xxviii. 2. 4.) St. Paul, in the Colossians, uses the terms barbarian and Scythian in almost the same signification. In another place, he says, that if he, who speaks a foreign language in an assembly, be not understood by those, to whom he discourses, with respect to them he is a Barbarian; and, in like manner, if he understand not those, who speak to him, they are to him Barbarians. It appears, therefore, that the word barbarian is used for every stranger, or foreigner, who does not speak our native language, and that it has no implication whatever of savage nature or manners in those, respecting whom it is employed.

BAR-CHOCHEBAS, COCHEBAS, or CHOCIBUS, a famous impostor. It is said, that he assumed the name of Bar-Chochebas, that is son of the star, from the words of Balaam, which he applied to himself, as the Messiah: 'There shall come a star (cocab) out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel.' Others think, that he derived his name from the town of Cochaba, beyond Jordan, in the neighbourhood of Ashtaroth-Carnaim. Bar-Chochebas engaged the Jews to revolt under the reign of Adrian. Akiba, the famous Jew, supported him, and maintained that he was the Messiah. It is said, that an order, forbidding the Jews to practise circumcision, induced them to rebel at this time, Bar-Chochebas, that he might impose on the Jews, put kindled straw into his mouth, and appeared to vomit fire. He fortified many places, and massacred an infinite number of men, raging with fury principally against the Christians.

Adrian sent against him Julius Severus, who, at length, shut him up in Bether. The siege was long and very obstinate; but, at last, the town was taken, and the war was soon after terminated. In it Bar-Chochebas perished. The Jews say, that he fell into the hands of the Romans, who tore off his skin with iron pincers. The multitude of Jews put to death, or sold during this war, and in consequence of it, was almost innumerable. Great numbers were sold at the fair of the turpentine-tree; those, who remained unsold, were exposed to sale at Gaza; and such as were unsold at Gaza, were carried into Egypt, and perished by shipwreck, or famine, or slaughter. After this, Adrian published an edict, forbidding the Jews, on pain of death, to visit Jerusalem; and guards were placed at the gates, to prevent their entrance. The rebellion of Bar-Chochebas happened A. D. 178, 179, in the seventeenth and eighteenth years of Adrian.

BARDESANITES, a sect of heretics in the second century. They obtained their name from their leader Bardesanes, a native of Edessa, who was a man of a very acute genius, and who acquired a considerable reputation by his writings. Seduced by the fantastic charms of the oriental philosophy, he adopted it with zeal, but, at the same time, with such modifications, as rendered his system less extravagant than that of the Marcionites. The sum of his doctrine was as follows: There is a supreme God, pure and benevolent, absolutely free from all evil and imperfection; and there is also a prince of darkness, the fountain of all evil, disorder, and misery. The supreme God created the world without any mixture of evil in its composition; he gave existence also to its inhabitants, who came out of his forming hand, pure and incorrupt, endued with subtle ethereal bodies, and spirits of celestial nature. But when, in process of time, the prince of darkness had enticed men to sin, then the supreme God permitted them to fall into sluggish and gross bodies, formed of corrupt matter by the evil principle; he permitted also the depravation and disorder which this malignant being introduced both into the natural and the moral world, designing, by this permission, to punish the degeneracy and rebellion of an apostate race; and hence proceeds the perpetual conflict between reason and passion in the mind of man. It was on this account, that Jesus descended from the upper regions, clothed not with a real, but with a celestial and an aerial body, and taught mankind to subdue that body of corruption, which they carry about with them in this mortal life; and by abstinence, fasting, and contemplation, to disengage themselves from the servitude and dominion of that malignant matter, which chained down the soul to low and ignoble pursuits. Those, who hear the voice of this divine instructor, and submit themselves to his discipline, shall, after the dissolution of this terrestrial body, mount up to the mansions of felicity, clothed with ethereal vehicles, or celestial bodies.

This sect, which was a branch of the Gnostics, subsisted a long time in Syria, though Bardesanes afterwards abandoned the chimerical part of his system. Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. p. 179, 180.

BARJESUS, or according to some copies Barjeu, Βαρῖσου, signifies son of Jesus. He was a Jewish magician, in the isle of Crete, and is called by Luke Elymas, which in Arabic signifies sorcerer. (Acts xiii. 8.) He was with the proconsul, Sergius Paulus, who sent for Paul and Barnabas, and desired to hear the word of God. Bar-jesus resisted them, and endeavoured to hinder the proconsul from embracing Christianity. Paul, therefore, filled with the Holy Ghost, and looking stedfastly at him, said, 'O full of all subtilty and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord? And now behold the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season. Immediately he was struck blind, and went about seeking some to lead him by the hand.' The proconsul saw this miracle, and was converted. Origen and Chrysostom think, that Elymas or Bar-jesus was also converted, and that St. Paul speedily restored his sight.

BARLAAMITES, the followers of Barlaam, in the fourteenth century. Barlaam was by birth a Neapolitan, and of the order of St. Basil. He adopted the sentiments and precepts of the Stoics with respect to the obligations of morality and the duties of life, and digested them in a work, which is known by the title of Ethica ex Stoicis. The Barlaamites, in opposition to the opinion of Gregory Palamas, archbishop of Thessalonica, maintained, that the light which surrounded Christ upon Mount Tabor, was neither the divine essence, nor flowed from it; and that there is no real difference between the attributes and essence of God considered in themselves, but only in our conceptions respecting them. Mosheim, vol. iii. p. 143, 199, &c.

BARLEY. In Palestine, barley was sown in autumn, and reaped in spring, that is, at the passover. The Rabbins sometimes called barley the food of beasts, because with it they fed their cattle. (1 Kings iv. 28.) In Homer, we find barley always given to horses. Herodotus tells us, that the Egyptians ate neither wheat nor barley, instead of which they used a particular sort of corn. However, the Hebrews frequently used barley-bread; for instance, David's friends brought him in his flight, wheat, barley, &c. (2 Sam. xvii. 28.) Solomon sent wheat, barley, wine, and oil to the servants whom king Hiram had furnished him, for the works at Libanus. (2 Chron. ii. 15.) In the Gospel, Jesus Christ and his apostles had for their provision five barley-loaves. (John vi. 9.) Elijah received a present of twenty barley-loaves, and corn in husk, as first fruits. (2 Kings iv. 42.)

Moses remarks, that when the hail fell in Egypt, the flax and the barley were bruised and destroyed, because the flax was full grown, and the barley forming its green ears; but that the wheat and other grain were not injured, because they were only in the blade. (Exod. ix. 31.) This happened some days before the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt, or before the passover. In Egypt, barley-harvest does not begin till toward the end of April.

BAR'NABAS, בְּרִינָבָא, Βαρνάβας, signifies son of the prophet, otherwise, son of consolation. Barnabas, a disciple of Jesus Christ, and a companion of St. Paul in his labours, was a Levite, and a native of the isle of Cyprus. He was also called Joseph or Joses; and in some Greek copies, instead of Barnabas, he is denominated Barsabas, who drew lots with Matthias, to fill the place of Judas. (Acts i. 23.) He sold all his temporal fortune, and laid the price at the apostles' feet. (Acts iv. 36, 37.) He is said by Calmet, but without any apparent authority, to have been brought up with Paul at the feet of Gamaliel. When that apostle came to Jerusalem, three years after his conversion, he was introduced by Barnabas to the other apostles. (Acts ix. 26, 27.)

Five years after this, the church of Jerusalem being informed of the progress of the Gospel at Antioch, sent thither Barnabas, who beheld with great joy the wonders of the grace of God. (Acts xi. 22, 24.) He exhorted the faithful to perseverance. Some time after, he went to Tarsus to seek Paul, and bring him to Antioch, where they dwelt together two years, and converted great numbers, and where the disciples were first called Christians. In the year of our Lord 44, they left Antioch, to convey alms from this church to that of Jerusalem. At their return, they brought with them John Mark, cousin of Barnabas. Whilst they were at Antioch, the Holy Ghost ordered, that they should be separated for those offices, to which he had appointed them. After prayer and fasting, and imposition of hands, they departed into Cyprus; and at Paphos, a city remarkable for the worship of Venus, they converted Sergius Paulus the proconsul.

At Perga in Pamphylia, they preached without much success, by reason of the obstinacy and malice of the Jews. At Iconium they converted many; but the Jews stirred up a sedition, and obliged them to retire to Derbe and Lystra, in Lycaonia. At Lystra, St. Paul curing one Æneas, who had been lame from his birth, the people considered them as gods, and calling Barnabas Jupiter, and Paul Mercury, would have offered to them sacrifices. This the two apostles, with great difficulty, prevented; but, soon afterwards, they were persecuted in this very city. Having revisited the cities, through which they had passed, and in which they had preached the Gospel, they returned to Antioch in Syria.

In the year of our Lord 51, Barnabas, with Paul, was sent from Antioch to Jerusalem, on account of some disputes concerning the observance of legal rites, to which the Jews wished to subject the Gentiles. Paul and Barnabas were present in the council at Jerusalem, and immediately returned to Antioch. Peter arrived there soon after, and as seduced to countenance, in some degree, by his example, the observance of the Mosaic ceremonies. Barnabas also used the same dissimulation; but Paul reproved Peter and Barnabas with great freedom.

Afterwards, Paul determining to visit the churches in the isle of Cyprus and in Asia Minor, Barnabas desired they might be accompanied by John Mark; but Paul objected, because Mark had left them on the first journey. The two apostles, therefore, separated: Paul went towards Asia; and Barnabas, with Mark, to Cyprus. This is all we know with certainty concerning Barnabas.

There is extant an epistle under the name of Barnabas, which has by many been thought authentic. The design of it is to prove, that the Law is abolished by the Gospel; that the legal ceremonies are useless; and that the incarnation and death of Christ were necessary. It abounds in figurative explications of various passages in Scripture; in allegory, and allusion. Perhaps, it may be esteemed a specimen of the manner of Judaizing teachers of Christianity; and if, as we have reason to believe, such kind of comments were in request among the Jews at that time, it fully justifies the allegories used by Paul, as a means of gaining the attention of those to whom he wrote, and of showing to them his learning in that mode, which they most esteemed. If this be fact, that apostle has been very sparing in a kind of writing, of which, as he was educated at the feet of Gamaliel, he was doubtless fully master. The epistle ascribed to Barnabas is quoted by Clement of Alexandria, A.D. 194, and by Origen, A.D. 230; and it is mentioned by Eusebius, A.D. 315, and by Jerom, A.D. 392, as an ancient work in their time, bearing the name of Barnabas, and as well known and read among Christians, though not accounted a part of Scripture. It purports to have been written soon after the destruction of Jerusalem, during the calamities, which followed; and it bears the character of the age, to which it professes to belong, and has many allusions and expressions to be found in St. Matthew's Gospel. Paley's Evidences of Christianity, vol. i. p. 74.

BARNABITES, a religious order founded in the sixteenth century by three noblemen of Milan, who had been advised by a celebrated preacher to read carefully the epistles of St. Paul. Those of this order were called Regular Clerks of St. Paul, from having chosen that apostle as their patron; though they are more commonly known by the denomination of Barnabites from the church of St. Barnabas, at Milan, which was given to them in 1545. At first, they were obliged to renounce all worldly goods and possessions, and to depend for their subsistence on the spontaneous donations of the liberal. But they soon tired of this precarious method of living, and therefore secured to their community certain possessions and revenues. Their principal office consists in going from one place to another, like the apostles, to convert sinners. Mosheim, vol. iii. p. 445.

BAR/SABAS, בֶּרֶשֶׁב, Βαρσαβᾱς, signifies son of returns, or of conversion; otherwise, son of rest; otherwise, son of swearing; otherwise, son of plenty. Barsabas, or Joseph Barsabas, surnamed the Just, was an early disciple of Jesus Christ, and probably one of the seventy. After the ascension of our Saviour, while the apostles kept together, expecting the descent of the Holy Ghost, Peter proposed to fill the place of Judas the traitor, by one of those disciples, who had been constant eye-witnesses of our Saviour's actions. Two persons were selected, Barsabas, surnamed Justus, and Matthias; and lots being drawn, it was determined for Matthias. (Acts i. 21, &c.) Nothing more is known with certainty concerning him.

BARSABAS was also the surname of Judas, one of the principal disciples, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, (xv. 22, et seq.) He and others were sent from Jerusalem, with Paul and Barnabas, to Antioch, whither they carried a letter containing the council's decree. Judas, that is Barsabas, and Silas, stayed there some time, instructing and confirming the brethren, and afterwards returned to Jerusalem.

BARTHOLOMEW, Βαρθολομαῖος, signifies a son that suspends the waters; or rather, perhaps, son of Thalmi. Bartholomew, one of the twelve apostles, (Matt. x. 3.) was of Galilee, (Acts i. 11.; ii. 7.) but where born is uncertain. It is thought, that he is the same with Nathanael, one of the first disciples that came to Christ. The reason for this opinion is, because as St. John never mentions Bartholomew in the number of the apostles, so the other evangelists take no notice of Nathanael; and as in St. John, (i. 45.) Philip and Nathanael are joined together in their coming to Christ, so in the other evangelists Philip and Bartholomew are constantly mentioned at the same time. What renders this more probable is, that Nathanael is particularly mentioned among the apostles, to whom the Lord, after his resurrection, appeared at the sea of Tiberias, where were present Simon Peter, Thomas, and Nathanael of Cana, in Galilee, the two sons of Zebedee, and two other disciples, who were probably Andrew and Philip. (John xxi. 2.) As St. Peter was called Bar-jona, that is, the son of Jona, so Nathanael might be denominated Bartholomew, or Bar-tholmai, that is, the son of Tholmai; whence some, on no better foundation than a similitude of names, have derived his pedigree from the Ptolomies of Egypt. Our Saviour has drawn his character in that fine eulogium; 'Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile.' (John i. 47.)

It is generally believed that this apostle travelled as far as India, to propagate the Gospel; and we are also told, that he preached in Arabia Felix and Persia. Nothing is known with certainty respecting the time, place, or manner of his death. It is, however, generally said, that he died in the city of Albana, which, perhaps, is Albana, in Albania, on the Caspian Sea, and on the confines of Armenia. This country has been sometimes included under the name of the Indies. It is believed, that Bartholomew was flayed alive by Astyages, brother of Polemon, king of Armenia, from hatred to the Christian religion, which the apostle had prevailed on Polemon to embrace. A spurious Gospel of Bartholomew is mentioned by Pope Gelasius.

St. Bartholomew's day is distinguished in history, on account of that horrid and atrocious carnage, called the Parisian massacre. This shocking scene of religious frenzy was marked with such barbarity as would exceed all belief, if it were not attested by authentic evidence. In 1572, in the reign of Charles IX. numbers of the principal Protestants were invited to Paris, under a solemn oath of safety, to celebrate the marriage of the king of Navarre with the sister of the French king. The queen-dowager of Navarre, a zealous Protestant, was poisoned by a pair of gloves, before the marriage was solemnized. On the 24th of August, being Bartholomew's day, 1572, about morning twilight, the massacre commenced on the tolling of a bell of the church of St. Germain. The admiral Coligni was basely murdered in his own house, and then thrown out of a window, to gratify the malice of the duke of Guise. His head was afterwards cut off, and sent to the king and queen's mother; and his body, after a thousand indignities offered to it, was hung up by the feet upon a gibbet. The murderers then ravaged the whole city of Paris, and put to death more than ten thousand persons of all ranks. This, says Thuanus, was a horrible scene. The very streets and passages resounded with the groans of the dying, and of those, who were about to be murdered. The bodies of the slain were thrown out of the windows, and with them the courts and chambers of the houses were filled. The dead bodies of others were dragged through the streets; and the blood flowed down the channels in such torrents, that it seemed to empty itself into the neighbouring river. In short, an innumerable multitude of men, women with child, maidens, and children, were involved in one common destruction; and all the gates and entrances of the king's palace were besmeared with blood. From Paris, the massacre spread throughout the kingdom. In the city of Meaux, the Papists threw into a gaol more than two hundred persons; and after they had ravished and killed a great number of women, and plundered the houses of the Protestants, they executed their fury on those, whom they had imprisoned, whom they killed in cold blood, and whose bodies were thrown into ditches, and into the river Maine. At Orleans, they murdered more than five hundred men, women, and children, and enriched themselves with the plunder. Similar cruelties were exercised at Angers, Troyes, Bouzages, La Charité, and especially at Lyons, where they inhumanly destroyed more than eight hundred Protestants, whose bodies were dragged through the streets, and thrown half-dead into the river. It would be endless to mention the butcheries committed at Valence, Romaine, Rouen, &c. It is asserted, that, on this dreadful occasion more than thirty thousand persons were put to death. Gregory's Christ. Church, vol. ii. p. 422, 423; Mavor's Univ. Hist. vol. xxiii. p. 174, 175.

BARTIMÆ'US, Βαρτιμαῖος, signifies son of Timæus, and was the name of a blind man of Jericho, who sat by the side of the public road, and begged, when our Saviour passed that way to Jerusalem. Mark says, that Jesus coming out of Jericho, with his disciples, and a great crowd, Bartimæus, when he heard that Jesus of Nazareth was passing, began to cry out, Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy on me. At his request, Jesus restored his sight. (Mark x. 46. 52.) But Matthew, relating the same story, says, that two blind men, sitting by the way-side, and understanding that Jesus was passing, began to cry out, &c. and both received sight. (Matth. xx. 30.) Mark mentioned Bartimæus only, because he was more known, and not improbably, as his name is preserved, was born in a superior rank of life, and to better hopes, and was therefore no common beggar. If his blindness had been the cause of reducing him to poverty, his neighbours would doubtless mention his name, and be interested in his cure. Probably his father Timæus was of note in that place, as was generally the case, when the father's name was assumed by the son; and perhaps some of the neighbours, who had known Bartimæus in better hopes, and who had often pitied, but could not relieve him, were the persons that encouraged the blind man: Be of good comfort! Rise: he calleth thee. This does not contradict the supposition, that on this occasion, he principally expressed his faith and zeal; that he spake to Jesus Christ, and distinguished himself by his alacrity, faith, and obedience.

It is observable, that the cure of another blind man, mentioned in Luke (xviii. 35. 43.) is different from this: that was performed when Jesus was entering into Jericho; and this, the next day, when he was coming out.

Euthymius, on the authority of Chrysostom, conjectures that the blind man in Mark was different from the two mentioned by Matthew; and that the one spoken of by Luke is different from the one mentioned by Mark. For, says he, the one of Mark threw down his garment, out of excessive haste, and received the cure without touch; but he in Luke, rather as Christ was coming to Jericho, and not departing from it, received his cure.

On these variations, Rosenmuller and Kuinoel remark, that they arose from the diversity of oral narration, and that such trifling discrepancies, which are perpetually found in the best historians, are of no moment; and that as the credibility of historians is not diminished, but rather increased by such diversities, so will not that of the Evangelists be at all affected. Bloomfield's Recensio Synoptica Annotationis Sacre, vol. i. p. 282, 283.

BA'RU'CH, ברוך, signifies who is blessed, who bends the knee. Baruch, son of Neriah, and grandson of Maaseiah, was of illustrious birth, of the tribe of Judah. Baruch was the faithful disciple of Jeremiah the prophet. (Jerem. xxxii. 12.) He served him as his secretary, and did not quit him till his death. In the reign of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, Jeremiah, who was in prison, received orders from the Lord, to write all his prophecies to that time. (Jerem. xxxvi. 1, 2, 3, &c.) He sent for Baruch and dictated them to him by heart. Some time after, he directed Baruch to read them to the people, then assembled in the temple. This happened in the year of the world 3399, and before Jesus Christ 605. The reading of the prophecies alarmed the king's officers, and they reported the matter to the king, who, having heard part of the book, cut it with a knife, and threw it into the fire.

Afterwards, God commanded Jeremiah again to commit his prophecies to writing. Baruch wrote them, as he repeated them; and the prophet added several others, which were not inserted in the former book. Baruch's constant adherence to Jeremiah drew on him persecution. One day, being greatly disheartened, and complaining bitterly, God encouraged him by the mouth of Jeremiah, (Jerem. xlv. 2, 3.) and from that time he became more tranquil. In the fourth year of king Zedekiah, Baruch went to Babylon, with his brother Seraiah, and carried from Jeremiah a letter, in which the prophet foretold the misfortunes that should befall Babylon, and promised the captives that they should one day be set at liberty. Baruch read the prophet's letter to king Jehoiakim, and other captives; and after this, he threw it into the Euphrates, as the prophet had commanded. The captives having heard Jeremiah's letter, were touched with compunction, and gave Baruch money, with which to offer sacrifices to the Lord, in the temple at Jerusalem. They also wrote a letter to their brethren of Jerusalem, perhaps by Baruch's hand, and it is pretended that this letter is contained in the first five chapters of the apocryphal book called Baruch.

After his return to Jerusalem, Baruch continued his attendance on Jeremiah; and when Jerusalem was besieged by Nebuchadnezzar, and Jeremiah was thrown into prison, Baruch was also confined. However, after the surrender of the city, Nebuzaradan showed him great favour, and setting him at liberty, permitted him to go with Jeremiah wherever he pleased.

The remains of the people left under Gedaliah having resolved to go into Egypt, and finding that Jeremiah opposed this journey, blamed Baruch, and pretended that he engaged the prophet to this opposition. At length Jeremiah and Baruch were obliged to accompany the people into Egypt, where Jeremiah died; after his death Baruch retired to Babylon, where the Rabbins say he died, in the twelfth year of the captivity.

BARUCH, book of, in the Apocrypha, is not extant in Hebrew, and only in Greek and Syriac; but in what language it was first written, or whether one of these be the original, is impossible to know. It is also uncertain, by whom this book was composed, and whether it contains any matters historically true, or the whole be a fiction. Grotius thinks that it is an entire fiction, and that it was composed by some Hellenistic Jew, under the name of Baruch. Jerom speaks of it in a manner, which shows that he did not esteem it canonical. He says, that he did not think proper to comment on Baruch (which in the Septuagint is joined with Jeremiah), because it was not read among the Hebrews, and contains an epistle, which falsely bears the name of Jeremiah. This epistle is annexed to the book, and, in the common division, forms the last chapter. The principal subject of the book, indeed, is also an epistle, sent, or pretended to be sent, by king Jehoiakim and the Jews in captivity in Babylon, to their brethren the Jews in Judah and Jerusalem. Prideaux's Connection, Anno 595.

BARZIL'LAI, ברוי, signifies, made of iron; or, otherwise, son of contempt. Barzillai, a native of Rogelim in Gilead, and an old friend to David, whom he assisted, when expelled from Jerusalem by Absalom. (2 Sam. xvii. 27.) He came to meet the king at Mahanaim beyond Jordan, and supplied him with provisions whilst David continued at that place. After the defeat of Absalom, when David returned to Jerusalem, Barzillai attended him to the river Jordan. The king, in gratitude for his kindness, invited him to court; but Barzillai objected his age and infirmities, and sent, in his stead, Chimham his son. This happened in the year of the world 2981, and before Jesus Christ 1023.

BA'SHAN, בשן, signifies in the tooth, or in the ivory, or in the change, or in sleep, or in slumbering, or confusion, or ignominy. Bashan, one of the most fertile cantons of Canaan, was bounded on the east by the river Jordan, on the west by the mountains of Gilead, on the south by the brook Jabbok, and on the north by the land of Geshur. The whole kingdom, which has since been called Batanæa, took its name from the hill of Bashan, situated in its centre. It contained no less than sixty walled towns, besides villages. It was exceedingly commended for its rich pastures, stately oaks, and fine cattle, and was esteemed one of the most fruitful countries in the world. (Psalm lxviii. 15. Isa. ii. 13. Deut. xxxii. 14, &c.) Its capital cities were Ashtaroth and Edrei. When Moses conquered Bashan, it was possessed by Og, king of the Amorites. Great Universal History, lib. i. cap. 7; Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 284; vol. ii. p. 138.

BASILIAN MONKS, were monks of the order of St. Basil, who lived in the fourth century. St. Basil, having retired into a desert in the province of Pontus, founded a monastery for the convenience of himself and his numerous followers; and for the better regulation of this new society, it is said that he drew up in writing certain rules, which he wished them to observe, though some think, that he did not compose these rules. This new order soon spread over all the East, and after some time passed into the West.

Some authors pretend, that St. Basil saw himself the spiritual father of more than 90,000 monks in the East only; but this order, which flourished during more than three centuries, was considerably diminished by heresy, schism, and a change of empire. They also say, that it has produced 14 popes, 1805 bishops, 3010 abbots, and 11,085 martyrs, besides an infinite number of confessors and virgins. This order also boasts of several emperors, kings, and princes, who have embraced its rule.

BASILIDIANS, a denomination, in the second century, from Basilides, chief of the Egyptian Gnostics. He acknowledged the existence of one Supreme God, perfect in goodness and wisdom, who produced from his own substance seven beings, or æons, of a most excellent nature. Two of these æons, called Dynamis and Sophia, that is power and wisdom, engendered the angels of the highest order. These angels formed a heaven for their habitation, and produced other angelic beings of a nature in some respects inferior to their own. Many other generations of angels followed these; new heavens were also created; till the number of angelic orders, and of their respective heavens, amounted to three hundred and sixty-five, and thus equalled the days of the year. All these are under the empire of an omnipotent Lord, whom Basilides called Abraxas, which was an Egyptian word containing numerical letters to the amount of three hundred and sixty-five. The inhabitants of the lowest heavens, which touched on the borders of the eternal, malignant, and self-animated matter, conceived the design of forming a world from that confused mass, and of creating an order of beings to people it. This design was carried into execution, and was approved by the Supreme God, who to the animal life, with which only the inhabitants of this new world were at first endowed, added a reasonable soul, and, at the same time, gave to the angels the empire over them.

These angelic beings, advanced to the government of the world, which they had created, gradually fell from their original purity, and soon manifested the fatal marks of their depravity and corruption. They not only endeavoured to efface in the minds of men the knowledge of the Supreme Being, that they might be worshipped in his stead, but also began to war against each other, with an ambitious view to enlarge every one the bounds of his respective dominion. The most arrogant and turbulent of all these angelic spirits, was that which presided over the Jewish nation. Hence the Supreme God, beholding with compassion the miserable state of rational beings, who groaned under the contests of these jarring powers, sent from heaven his son Nus, or Christ, the chief of the æons, that, joined in a substantial union with the man Jesus, he might restore the knowledge of the Supreme God, destroy the empire of those angelic natures, which presided over the world, and particularly that of the arrogant leader of the Jewish people. The God of the Jews, alarmed at this, sent forth his ministers to seize the man Jesus, and put him to death. They executed his commands, but their cruelty could not extend to Christ, against whom their efforts were vain. Those souls, who obey the precepts of the Son of God, shall, after the dissolution of their mortal frame, ascend to the Father, while their bodies return to the corrupt mass of matter, from which they were formed. Disobedient spirits, on the contrary, shall pass into other bodies.

Such were the tenets of Basilides. His doctrine in point of morals, if we may credit the accounts of most ancient writers, was favourable to the lusts and passions of mankind, and permitted the practice of all sorts of wickedness. However, those, whose testimonies are most worthy of regard, represent this teacher as recommending the practice of virtue and piety in the strongest manner, and as condemning not only the actual iniquity, but even every inward propensity of the mind to a vicious conduct. It is true that in his precepts relating to the conduct of life, were some things, which offended all true Christians. For he affirmed, that it was lawful for them to conceal their religion, to deny Christ when their lives were in danger, and to partake of the feasts of the Gentiles, instituted in consequence of the sacrifice offered to idols. He had adopted an absurd notion, that all the calamities of this life were of a penal nature, and that men never suffered except in consequence of their iniquities. This rendered his principles greatly suspected; and the irregular lives of some of his disciples seemed to justify the unfavourable opinion entertained concerning their master. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 181—184; Lardner's Works, vol. ix. p. 271.

BASTINADO, a punishment used among the Greeks and Romans, some instances of which we also find among the Hebrews. It consisted in beating the criminal with a stick, and was likewise denominated tympnum, because the sufferer was beaten like a drum. The Romans called it fustigatio, fustium admonitio, or fustibus cædi. It differed from the flagellatio, which was performed with a rod, or scourge, whilst a stick was used in fustigation. Flagellation was a severe punishment, and reserved for slaves; fustigation, more light, and inflicted on free-men. This punishment still prevails among the Turks and other nations of the East. The criminal is laid on his belly; and his feet are raised, and tied to a stake, which is held fast by officers for that purpose. In this posture, he is beaten with a cudgel on the soles of his feet, back, chin, &c. and sometimes receives one or two hundred blows.

Mr. Harmer thus describes the bastinado in an extract from Irwin's Travels: 'The prisoner is placed upright on the ground, with his hands and feet bound together, while the executioner stands before him, and, with a short stick, strikes him with a smart motion on the outside of his knees. The pain, which arises from these strokes, is exquisitely severe, and which no constitution can support for any continuance.'

It is related, that old Eleazar was led to the torture, and that he was beaten with blows till he nearly expired. (2 Macc. vi. 19.) St. Paul says, that some of the saints were tortured (ἐτυμπαίνοντο), that is, suffered the torture of the tympanum, hoping for a better resurrection. (Heb. xi. 35.)

The τύμπανον was probably in the form of a T; and the criminal had his arms fastened to the two horns of the post, with his head above its top, and his feet bound to the lower part, but without reaching the ground; and hence he might be truly said κρεμάσθαι. It is obvious how effectually this posture would promote the purposes of punishment, by rendering it impossible for the culprit to shrink from the blows. Bloomfield's Recensio Synoptica Annotationis Sacre, vol. viii. p. 541, 542; Harmer's Observations on various passages of Scripture, vol. iii. p. 370, edit. Dr. Ad. Clarke.

BAT, vespertilio, a genus of quadrupeds of the order of the feræ. In its upper jaw are six fore-teeth, acute, and distant from each other; in the lower, six acute, but contiguous. The canine teeth are two above and two below, on each side. Every foot has five toes, and those of the fore-feet are connected by a membrane, and expand into a sort of wings. This animal has often been ranked with birds: but it has the mouth of a quadruped, not the beak of a bird; it is covered with hair, not with feathers; it produces its young alive, not from eggs; and it greatly resembles a mouse in shape and colour. The female has two paps, and brings forth two young ones at a birth; while these are incapable of providing for themselves, she flies about with them clinging to her paps, and sometimes hangs them against a wall. During winter, bats cover themselves with their wings, and hang asleep in dry caves or old buildings. In summer they hide themselves in the day, and fly about in the evening, catching moths and other insects. Some bats have tails, and others have none. It is said, that in China are bats as large as pullets, and as delicate eating. Those of Brazil, Madagascar, and the Maldives, are very large, and suck the blood of men, while they sleep in the night, fastening on some uncovered part, which, at the same time, they refresh by the fluttering of their wings. The bat, which the law of Moses classes among birds, is declared an unclean animal. (Levit. xi. 19. Deut. xiv. 18.) But according to the Rabbins, the Hebrew word hatalaph, which is commonly interpreted a bat, signifies a swallow.

BATH, בַּת, χοῖνίξ, signifies a daughter, or a house, and was the name of an Hebrew measure, containing seven gallons and four pints, liquid measure; or, three pecks and three pints, dry measure. It was the same as the ephah. Some have imagined, that there was a sacred bath, different from the common, and containing a bath and a half of the other. This they endeavour to prove by what is said in the First Book of Kings, (vii. 26.) that Solomon's molten sea contained 2000 baths, compared with the Second Book of Chronicles, (iv. 5.) which says, that it held 3000 baths. This difference, however, is easily reconciled, by saying, that the brazen sea itself contained 2000, and the brim or rim 1000 baths. The bath was the tenth part of the homer, in liquid measure; as the ephah was in dry measure. (Ezek. xlv. 11.) Arbuthnot's Tables, &c. p. 99.

BATH-KOL, or BATH-COL, בַּת-קוֹל, signifies daughter of the voice. It is a name, by which the Jewish writers distinguish what they call a revelation from God, after verbal prophecy had ceased in Israel, that is, after the prophets Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. The generality of their traditions and customs are founded on this Bath-kol. They pretend, that God revealed them to their elders, not by prophecy, but by secret inspiration, or tradition; and this they call the daughter of the voice. The Bath-kol, as Dr. Prideaux shows, was a fantastical way of divination, invented by the Jews, like the Sortes Virgilianæ among the Heathens. With them, the words dipt at in opening the works of Virgil, was the oracle, by which they prognosticated those future events, of which they desired to be informed. In like manner also when the Jews appealed to Bath-kol, the next words which they heard were considered as the desired oracle. The Christians, when Christianity began to be corrupted, used the Scriptures in the same manner as the Heathens employed the works of Virgil. Prideaux's Connect. Partii. Book 5; Monthly Mag. No. 193.

BATH'SHEBA, בַּת-שֶׁבַע, signifies daughter of swearing, of satiety; or, the seventh daughter. Bathsheba, the daughter of Eliam, or Ammiel, was the wife of Uriah, the Hittite, and dwelt at Jerusalem, not far from

David's palace. One day, after sleeping at noon, as is customary in warm countries, David went up to the terrace roof of his palace, whence, in a garden at no great distance, he saw Bathsheba bathing. As she was a very beautiful woman, David became enamoured of her, and sent to inquire who she was; and being informed that she was the wife of Uriah, an officer in his own army, who was then with Joab at the siege of Rabbah, he caused her to be brought to him, and with her he committed adultery. In a short time, she found herself with child, and informed David, requesting him at the same time to consult her honour and safety, by devising some means of concealment. David sent for Uriah, who, he supposed, would naturally accompany his wife, when at home; but Uriah spending his nights with the king's guards, counteracted the king's design. David then sent orders by this brave man himself, for his exposure to danger, by which he was killed before Rabbah. (2 Sam. xi.)

Bathsheba, hearing of her husband's death, mourned in the usual manner; and when this ceremony was ended, David brought her to his house, and married her. Soon after this, she was delivered of a son. The Lord sent the prophet Nathan to David, to reproach him with his sin, by the parable of the ewe-lamb, taken by a rich man from a poor man, and to threaten his punishment by the death of this child. David earnestly interceded for his son; but on the seventh day the child died. (2 Sam. xii.)

After this, David comforted Bathsheba, and she conceived a son, who was named Solomon, in the year of the world 2971, and before Jesus Christ 1033. God afterwards appointed that this son should succeed David on the throne; build a temple to the Lord; and be blessed with wisdom, riches, and understanding. Towards the end of David's life, Adonijah, his eldest son, formed a party, and presumed that he ought to reign rather than Solomon. Bathsheba, therefore, went to David, whom she found in his chamber, and bowing very respectfully before him, informed him of the conduct of Adonijah. Nathan the prophet confirming her account, David gave immediate orders for the inauguration of Solomon. After the settlement of Solomon, Adonijah prevailed on Bathsheba to request him to give him Abishag, the Shunamite, who had been the wife of David. Solomon treated his mother with the greatest respect, but saw in this request a deep policy, which he punished by the death of Adonijah. (1 Kings ii. 12.) This is the last time Bathsheba is mentioned.

The First Book of Chronicles, (iii. 5.) and the Second Book of Samuel, (v. 14.) besides Solomon, notice other sons of Bathsheba by David; namely, Shammuah, Shobab, and Nathan. Some interpreters are of opinion, that these three were the sons of Uriah; but the generality maintain, that they were the sons of David. The text in Samuel is clear for this opinion; and St. Luke gives us the genealogy of Nathan, the son of David, as one of the Messiah's ancestors. The passage in Proverbs, (iv. 3.) in which Solomon says, that he was his father's son, tender and only beloved in the sight of his mother, 'proves no more than the tender affection of David and Bathsheba for him.

The thirty-first chapter of Proverbs has been considered as Bathsheba's instruction to her son Solomon, which this prince placed in the collection of his Proverbs, or maxims of morality. But this chapter might really be written by Solomon, if designing to do honour to his mother, he reduced the instructions, which he received from her, into this form, and published them as if she had been their author. Besides, king Lemuel, like Agur, may be another person, whose writings are appended to those of Solomon.

The original inclines some to think, that Bathsheba was a famous beauty, whose renown, previously to her being seen by David from the terrace, had already reached the king's ears. In our version, the translators have inserted the word one, but the rendering might be more literal, if understood as follows: And David sent, and inquired after the woman; and he said to himself, while his inquirers were gone, to obtain the intelligence he wanted, Is not this Bathsheba, the daughter of Eliam, the wife of Uriah, the Hittite? And David sent agents, and took her. For it does not appear, that the information who Bathsheba was, would have had any influence in abating David's illicit passion. On the contrary, nothing is more natural, than that David should say to himself, 'This beauty, whom I see, is certainly that Bathsheba, so famous for her charms, and I will possess her;' thus flattering his vanity, while enhancing the gratification of his criminal desires. In David's promise (perhaps stipulation) to Bathsheba, that her son should succeed him, (1 Kings i. 13. 17. 30.); in Bathsheba's promptitude to give notice of her pregnancy; in the forwardness of Adonijah to assert his natural expectation of succeeding to the crown; in the dignity of Bathsheba as the king's mother; and in the influence, which Bathsheba hoped to maintain over Solomon, and the respect with which Solomon treated her, we may discover strong indications, that she had ruled over David, who thus experienced other punishments of this passionate connexion. Fragments attached to Calmet's Dict. No. cxxiv. p. 38.

BAXTERIANS, those who adopt the sentiments of the famous non-conformist, Richard Baxter, who was born in the year 1615, and who was equally celebrated for the acuteness of his controversial talents, and the utility of his practical writings. His design was to reconcile Arminianism and Calvinism; and for this purpose he formed a middle scheme between those systems. With Calvin, he taught that God had selected some, whom he is determined to save, without any fore-sight of their good works; and that others, to whom the Gospel is preached, have common grace, which if they improve, they shall obtain saving grace, according to the doctrines of Arminius. This denomination allow, with Calvin, that the merits of Christ's death are to be applied to believers only; but they also assert, that all men are in a state capable of salvation. Mr. Baxter maintains, that there may be a certainty of perseverance here; and yet, he doubts whether a man may not possess so weak a degree of saving grace, as again to lose it.

To prove that the death of Christ has put all in a state capable of salvation, the following arguments are alleged by this learned author: 1. It was the nature of all mankind, which Christ assumed at his incarnation; and the sins of all mankind were the occasion of his suffering. 2. It was to Adam, as the common father of lapsed mankind, that God made the promise. (Gen. iii. 15.) The conditional new covenant equally gives Christ, pardon, and life, to all mankind, on condition of acceptance. The conditional grant is universal: Whosoever believeth shall be saved. 3. It is not to the elect only, but to all mankind, that Christ has commanded his ministers to proclaim his Gospel, and offer the benefits, which he has procured.

Mr. Baxter allows, that there are certain fruits of Christ's death, which are proper to the elect only: 1. Grace eventually worketh in them true faith, repentance, conversion, and union with Christ, as his living members. 2. The actual forgiveness of sin, with respect to the spiritual and eternal punishment. 3. Our reconciliation with God, and adoption and right to the heavenly inheritance. 4. The Spirit of Christ to dwell in us, and sanctify us by a habit of Divine love. (Rom. viii. 9—13. Gal. v. 6.) 5. Employment in holy acceptable service, and access in prayer, with a promise of being heard through Christ. (Heb. ii. 5, 6. John xiv. 13.) 6. Well-grounded hopes of salvation, peace of conscience, and spiritual communion with the church mystical in heaven and on earth. (Rom. v. 12. Heb. xii. 22.) 7. A special interest in Christ, and intercession with the Father. (Rom. viii. 32, 33.) 8. Resurrection unto life, and justification in judgment; glorification of the soul at death, and of the body at the resurrection. (Phil. iii. 20, 21. 2 Cor. v. 1, 2, 3.)

Christ, says Mr. Baxter, has made a conditional deed of gift of these benefits to all mankind; but they are accepted and possessed by the elect only. Hence he infers, that though Christ never absolutely intended or decreed, that his death should eventually put all men in possession of those benefits, yet he did intend and decree, that all men should have a conditional gift of them by his death.

Among the Baxterians are generally ranked both Watts and Doddridge. In the scale of religious sentiment, Baxterianism seems to be with respect to the subject of the Divine favour, what Arianism is with respect to the person of Christ. It appears to have been considered by some as a safe middle way between two extremes.

Mr. Baxter was an extraordinary character in the religious world. It is said, that he wrote about one hundred and twenty books, and had more than sixty written against him. Of his Call to the Unconverted, twenty thousand were sold in one year. Though he possessed a very metaphysical genius, and sometimes made a distinction without a difference, yet the great object of most of his writings was peace and amity. Accordingly, his religious system was formed not to inflame the passions, but to conciliate the minds of men, and to heal those wounds of the Christian church, under which she had long suffered. Baxter's Catholic Theology, p. 51. 53; Evans's Sketch, p. 78, 79; Adams's View of Religions, p. 89, 90.

BDELLIUM, (ברלה), a pearl, jasper, or some other stone. This precious substance, which is naturally hard, white, smooth, and glossy, is found in many parts of the world, and produced in the shell of the pearl oyster, with which the Persian Gulf in particular abounds. Perhaps the Hebrew name is from בל, singular, and בה, smooth, as being the only gem naturally smooth and polished. It occurs in Gen. ii. 12, and Numb. xi. 7. Compare also Exod. xvi. 31.

This is a different interpretation from that usually affixed to the word, viz. the gum of a tree in Arabia, and more probable when applied to the passages in which it occurs. Parkhurst's and Bates's Lexicons.

BEAN, בען, signifies affliction. It is said, that the children of Bean, were a shame and offence to the people of Israel, for whom they placed ambushes. (1 Macc. v. 4. 5.) Some think, that Bean is the name of a city beyond Jordan (Numb. xxxii. 3.); some, that Bean is put for Batanæa; and others, that it is the name of a man.

BEAR, ursus, a genus of quadrupeds of the order of the feræ, or beasts of prey.

Aristotle and Pliny say, that when bears are littered, they are scarcely bigger than mice, and are without eyes and hair. Their dams go with them about thirty days, and generally bring forth five at a time. During the winter they hide themselves and sleep. The male continues in this state forty days; and the female four months; and they sleep so soundly for the first fourteen days, that blows will not awake them. During the time they sleep, they eat nothing, and yet, when the period is expired, the males are very fat. Though the bear seems rough and stupid, yet he is capable of discipline, and will leap, dance, and play a thousand tricks at command.

This animal was very common in Palestine. David says, that he had often fought with bears and lions, (1 Sam. xvii. 34. 36.) Elisha having prophetically cursed some boys of Bethel, for insulting him, two she bears issued from a neighbouring forest, and wounded forty-two of them. (2 Kings ii. 23, 24.) To express the sensations of a man transported with passion, the sacred writers say, He is chafed, in his mind, as a bear robbed of her whelps, (2 Sam. xvii. 8. Prov. xvii. 12. Hos. xiii. 8.) The prophet Isaiah, describing the happiness of the Messiah's reign, says, that the cow and the bear shall feed together, (Isaiah xi. 7.); by the bear some think that he denoted the Gentiles, and by the cow the Jews. Daniel, (vii. 5.) in his description of the four great monarchies, represents that of the Persians under the figure of a bear with three rows of teeth; by this he principally intended Cyrus. In the book of Revelation, (xiii. 2.) Antichrist is said to have the feet of a bear.

It is observable, that the bear is generally masculine in the Hebrew. The passage in which we read, that two she-bears tare forty-two children, though it leads to the idea of their being females, more strongly than any other passage, yet is in the masculine. Might not this be an anomaly of language among the Hebrews as among ourselves, who frequently call a cat she, though it be a male, and an animal of the canine kind a dog, though it be really a bitch? The current idiom of all languages has something of this imperfection: and we may still continue to reckon the bears of these passages as females, if the construction require it, though the words be really masculine. Scripture Illustrated.

BEARD, the hair growing on the chin and adjacent parts of the face, chiefly of adults and males. The Hebrews wore their beards on their chin, but had, doubtless, in common with other Asiatic nations, several fashions in this, as in all other parts of dress. Moses forbids them to cut off entirely the angle or extremity of the beard, (Levit. xix. 27.) that is, to avoid the manner of the Egyptians, who left only a little tuft of beard at the extremity of their chins. In some places, the Jews, at this day, suffer a little fillet of hair to grow from below the ears to the chin; where, as well as upon their lower lips, their beards are pretty long. When they mourned, they shaved entirely the hair of their heads and beards, and neglected to trim their beards, to regulate them into neat order, or to remove what grew on their upper lips and cheeks. (Jer. xli. 5.; xlviii. 37.) Hence we perceive the import of Mephibosheth's neglect of his beard, in not trimming it. (2 Sam. xix. 24.) In times of grief and affliction, they plucked off the hair from their heads and beards, a mode of expressing sorrow common to other nations under great calamities. The dishonour done by David to his beard, of permitting his spittle to fall on it, seems at once to have convinced Achish that he was disordered in mind. It was as if he had said, no man, in good health of body and mind, would thus defile what we esteem so honourable, as his beard. (1 Sam. xxi. 13.)

The king of the Ammonites, designing to insult David, in the person of his ambassadors, cut away half of their beards, and half of their clothes; that is, he cut off all their beard on one side of their faces. (2 Sam. x. 4, 5. 1 Chron. xix. 5.) To avoid ridicule, David did not permit them to appear at court, till their beards were again grown.

We are told by travellers, that in the East men kiss each other's beards, when they salute in the streets, or when one of them has lately come from a journey. This may lead us to discover traces of deeper dissimulation in the behaviour of Joab to Amasa, than we have hitherto noticed. It is said, that 'Joab took Amasa by the beard with the right hand to kiss him.' (2 Sam. xx. 9.) It was, therefore, no wonder, that whilst this act of friendship, of gratulation after a long absence, occupied Amasa's attention, he did not perceive the sword in Joab's left hand. The action of Joab was, indeed, a high compliment, but neither suspicious nor unusual, and to this compliment Amasa paying attention, and doubtless returning it with equal politeness, he could not expect the fatal event produced by the perfidy of Joab.

It is not improbable, that the behaviour of Judas to Jesus was rather like that of Joab to Amasa. Matthew says, 'And forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, Hail, master, and kissed him.' (Matt. xxvi. 49.) Mark says the same, (xiv. 45.) But Luke seems to imply, that Judas observed a more respectful manner, in his salutation. According to Matthew, Jesus, before he received the kiss from Judas, had time to say, 'Friend, (in what manner) to what purpose art thou come?' And whilst Judas was kissing him—suppose his beard—Jesus might easily, and very aptly express himself as Luke relates; 'Judas, betrayest thou the son of man with a kiss?'

Niebuhr relates, that 'when the younger Turks, after having been shaven, permit their beards to grow, they recite a fatha or prayer, which is considered as a vow never to cut it off; and when any one cuts off his beard, he may be very severely punished, and also becomes the laughing-stock of those of his faith. It is not, perhaps, improbable, that this fatha or prayer is in some degree analogous to the rites of the Nazarite, (Numb. vi. 18. Acts xxi. 24.) Fragments attached to Calmet's Dictionary, No. xciii. p. 151. 153.

BEAST, an appellation commonly given to all four-footed animals fit either for food, labour, or sport; and in this sense it is distinguished from birds, fishes, insects, and man. However, Calmet, and some others, define beast an animal destitute of reason; and in this sense it comprehends the whole animal creation, man alone excepted.

In the beginning, God created the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the air, on the fifth day of the world, (Gen. i. 21, 22, 23.); on the sixth day, he created the beasts of the earth and man, (Ibid. 24. 26. 31.); and, lastly, he brought the fowls and the animals to Adam, who gave them their names, and who thus commenced his exercise of that dominion, in which God had placed him over the creatures. (Ibid. ii. 19.) The Lord blessed man, the fowls, fishes, and beasts; he commanded them to multiply, and gave them the fruits and herbs of the earth for food. It was not till after the deluge, that God granted flesh as food to mankind; and even then he forbade the eating of blood, threatening to punish the violent shedding of it, and to chastise even beasts, which should spill human blood. (Ibid. ix. 3, 5.)

By the law of Moses, every beast, which should kill a man, or was abominably polluted, was punished with death. (Exod. xxi. 28, 29; Levit. xx. 15, 16.) Cities guilty of apostasy were devoted, with not only their inhabitants, but also their cattle. (Deut. xiii. 15.) When Noah, with his children, and the animals, quitted the ark, God says that he made a covenant with Noah, his family, his descendants, and the creatures, and promised, never to send such a deluge again over the earth. (Gen. ix. 9.) God, enjoining rest on the Sabbath, declares that cattle as well as servants, should enjoy the benefits of this repose, (Exod. xx. 10.) God smote in Egypt the first-born of men and beasts; and as a memorial of his having spared the Hebrews, he commands, that to him the first-born of men, and of beasts, should be consecrated. (Exod. xxii. xxiii.)

The Egyptians, among whom the Hebrews dwelt for so long a time, adored beasts. The Israelites, also, worshipped the golden calf in the wilderness, and, after the schism of Jeroboam, continued to adore the like figures of deities.

The doctrine of Transmigration was common throughout the East, and even among the Hebrews: and remains of it were visible among the Jews of our Saviour's time, and perhaps in the apostles before they had received the Holy Ghost. This opinion manifestly supposes, that beasts are reasonable; because it supposes, that the same souls, which animated the wisest and most understanding of men, pass successively into the bodies of beasts. The doctrine of Transmigration is observable, with some variety, in Philo, and in the Rabbins.

Philosophers, indeed, are greatly divided in opinion respecting the essential characters of beasts or brute animals. The Platonists allow them reason and understanding, though in a degree less pure and refined than those of men. Lactantius allows them every thing, which men possess, except a sense of religion; and some sceptics have ascribed to beasts even sense and religion. Several speak as if they considered beasts to be moral beings, and under obligation to the law of nature. Ulpian and other lawyers are supposed to have embraced this opinion, which is said to have been first borrowed from the school of the Stoics.

Different faculties and degrees of knowledge are perceptible in different animals. Some possess only the motive and sensitive faculties, as worms; some have also memory; and others, imagination and invention, as monkeys and elephants. In the same species, some exceed others in docility and ingenuity; and the climate, air, and food, have an influence on beasts, as well as on men. They who agree in ascribing reason to brutes, do not ascribe to them the same species or degrees of reason. Galen allows to beasts internal reason; Porphyry, enunciative; Lactantius, practical reason or prudence only; Pythagoras, reason on the second act, exclusive of the first; and the Stoics allow them speculative reason. Hobbes insists, that they are incapable of science from a want only of names and signs, by which to denote abstract ideas; that they have sensitive, but not intellectual knowledge; that they have apprehension, but not reflection; and that they are capable of prudence, but not of reason, which can be the fruit of evidence only.

Solomon, whether he proposes his own thoughts, or those of the philosophers and free-thinkers of his time, expresses himself in a manner, which might seem to insinuate, that beasts possess understanding and reasonable souls: 'I said in my heart, concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them; and that they might see that they themselves are beasts; for as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath, so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast.' (Eccles. iii. 18, 19, 20.) The Scripture, in other places, speaks of the death of beasts and men, in nearly the same manner: as, 'Thou takest away their breath, and they die, and return to their dust' (Psalm civ. 29.); and in Job, 'If he gather unto himself his spirit and his breath, all flesh shall perish together,' (xxxiv. 14.)

Calmet observes, that we should widely mistake the import of such passages, if we infer from them, that beasts are equal to man, in reason, or in a capacity of religion, of knowing God, of attaining celestial felicity, and of acting on spiritual principles. The knowledge, reasoning, desires, and designs of beasts, are limited to the discernment of what may contribute to their immediate and instant enjoyments, their temporal happiness, and the multiplication of their species. They may, indeed, determine between hot and cold, between enjoyment and danger, but not between moral good and evil, between just and unjust, lawful and unlawful. If any one insist, that they are immortal and eternal, we may grant it; but this privilege is common to them with bodies, and matter, the essence of which is indefectible, and cannot perish. Matter may be changed in its figure or situation; it may rest, or be put in motion; but it cannot be annihilated, unless God cease to preserve it. In this sense, also, the angels themselves, and the souls of men, have no greater privilege than matter.

It may be asked, what becomes of the animating principle of beasts, when separated from matter? To this we reply, that we have no principles, by which we can discover it; neither revelation, nor experience, nor reasoning, furnishes light in this particular. We know that God created all things for his glory; but can beasts be capable of an active knowledge and love of their Creator? If not, he must be glorified by them, some other way; as, doubtless, he is glorified passively by simple matter, but surely not in any other sense than as showing forth his glory, his power, &c.

Against the souls of beasts, a great objection is borrowed from Austin, that 'under a just God, no one can be unhappy that does not deserve it.' Now, if beasts have sense and reason, they are unhappy; and having deserved to be unhappy, this desert must arise from sin. Now, supposing that they have sinned, are they not then capable of virtue? of the love and knowledge of God? Let it be granted, that they are miserable; for men kill and eat them, subject them to the hardest labours, beat them, use them shamefully ill, and persecute them, without reason. If beasts were capable of sense and reason, would God have given to sinful man such entire dominion over them? We may reply, that God is sovereign over his creatures, and may dispose of them as he pleases. God created beasts, and has subjected them to the dominion of man; he has permitted man to eat, and consequently to kill them. Man uses this power; and if we suppose that beasts are reasonable, of what then can they complain? Of dying? Man dies; and in what differs death by slaughter, from death by disease? Will they tell God that they are innocent, and yet he subjects them to wicked, brutal, foolish men? And are not mankind, the best of mankind, also subject to calamities, diseases? &c. &c.

Such are the reasonings of Calmet on this subject. The preceding passage quoted from Ecclesiastes, is thus paraphrased by the late Bishop Patrick: 'I could not but think that the condition of mankind is very deplorable. For, as beasts are subject to many accidents of which they have no foreknowledge, so are also men. The latter can no more foresee several things, which happen to them, than the former. If, however, men differ from beasts, in defending themselves from some evils, which may befall them, yet one thing renders both equal, and that is death. For men and beasts equally grow old, and die alike; and whilst they live, they breathe the same common air. Therefore, when a man dies, he is as much an unprofitable piece of matter, as a beast; and in this, he cannot pretend to any pre-eminence above other inferior creatures.' It appears from the context, that the words of Solomon are not spoken in the person of a free-thinker. They seem intended to humble the vain opinion of those great men, who would tyrannize over their inferiors; by representing to them how little they differ from beasts, except only, in that, which they do not value or regard, namely, their immortal souls. Patrick's Paraphrase on Ecclesiastes.

On the subject of beasts, we should recur to the distinctions of life; body, soul, and spirit. Body we grant; soul, that is animal life, we also grant them; this they enjoy up to fixed degrees, each possessing that kind, degree, power, duration, &c. appropriate to its species, and transmitting the same to its posterity, without improvement, and without variation. In this is the animal life, or soul, distinct from reason, which is infinitely various, and capable of unlimited improvements, and of stronger desires after still farther acquisitions. Instinct, then, is a confined, contented, satisfied quality; reason is quite the reverse, and strongly characterizes the active nature of spirit, which is a higher principle of life, and bestowed on man for the highest purposes of existence.

We should also remember, that, however the beasts may appear to be subjected to human cruelty, yet, in fact, not one in ten millions of animals in general suffer in this way. In support of this opinion, we may instance those myriads of wild creatures around our dwellings, and those where man has no residence; we may instance birds that fly from our power, that swim, that dwell on rocks, &c. &c. We may instance the reptile tribe, the fishes, and, above all, insects in their innumerable species, together with microscopic insects! Surely not one living being in a hundred millions, ever comes under the power of man. These ideas are distinct from the consideration, that beasts, having no foreknowledge, are not unhappy; they have no anxious apprehensions, which never enter into their catalogue of miseries. On the contrary, anticipations of evil form the chief of human woes, and are the severest of human sufferings. This strongly characterizes the nature of reason, and manifests its capacity for extending its views into futurity, a futurity not limited by the narrow confines of time and of sense. Additions to Calmet's Dictionary; Patrick on Ecclesiastes.

BEATIFICATION, in the Romish church, the act by which the Pope declares a person happy after death. Beatification differs from canonization. In the former the Pope does not act as a judge in determining the state of the beatified, but only grants a privilege to certain persons to honour him by a particular religious worship, without incurring the penalty of superstitious worshippers. In canonization, the Pope speaks as a judge, and determines ex cathedra, on the state of the canonized.

It is remarkable, that particular orders of monks assume to themselves the power of beatification.

BEAUTY. The Hebrew word naveh, which signifies beauty, also denotes a dwell-ing. The Lord hath loved the beauty of Jacob, his temple, his selected abode in Jacob (Ps. xlvii. 4.). Sion his beauty, (Ps. l. 2.) may be expounded in the same manner. The temple of the Lord, and his tabernacle, the places of his abode among men, are called his habitation. God delivered the beauty of the Israelites, the ark of the Lord, into the hands of the Philistines. It is observable, that the idea of excellence suits all these passages.

Commentators think that the phrase, beauty of holiness, (1 Chron. xvi. 29. 2 Chron. xx. 21. Ps. xxix. 2.; xcvi. 9.; cx. 3.) is expressive of the dispositions of the mind requisite for all the true worshippers of God; but if the expression be carefully attended to, it will be found to allude to the Shechinah, the visible glory of Jehovah, in which he appeared to the Old Testament church, and in which he dwelt between the cherubim. The Hebrew word hedar, here rendered beauty, properly denotes some external splendour or glory, and such as belongs only to the object of worship. Leigh's Critica Sacra.

BEDAN, בִּדָן, signifies only, or lever; otherwise, in the judgment, or according to judgment. It is said in the First Book of Samuel, (xii. 11.) that the Lord sent several deliverers of Israel; as Jerubbaal, Bedan, Jephthah, Samuel. Jerubbaal, we know, is Gideon; but we do not where find Bedan among the judges of Israel. The Septuagint, instead of Bedan, reads Barak, and some think, that Bedan is Jair, of the tribe of Manasseh, who judged Israel twenty-two years. (Judg. x. 3.) There was a Bedan, great-grandson to Machir, and Jair was descended from a daughter of Machir. The Chaldee, the Rabbins, and after them the generality of commentators, conclude that Bedan was Samson of the tribe of Dan. Calmet, however, is of opinion that Bedan and Jair were the same person. The names of Samson and Barak were added in many Latin copies, before the corrections of them by the Roman censors were published. Bishop Patrick says, that the younger Jair, to distinguish him from his elder brother, seems to be called Bedan. Comment. on Judges.

BEE/ROTH, בְּאֵרוֹת, signifies the wells or illuminations; otherwise, in the lights. Beer-oth was a city of the Gibeonites, and afterwards belonged to Benjamin. (Josh. ix. 17. 2 Sam. iv. 2.) Eusebius places this city seven miles from Jerusalem, towards Nicopolis. Mr. Maundrell, who seems to think that it was the same with Beer, whither Jotham fled from Abimelech, says, that it enjoys a very pleasant situation, on a southern declivity. At the bottom of the hill is a plentiful fountain of excellent water, from which the city derives its name. Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 294.

BEEROTH of the children of Jaakan, a station whence the Israelites marched to Mosera. (Deut. x. 6.) Eusebius places it at the distance of ten miles from the city of Petra. In Numbers (xxxiii. 31, 32.) it is called Bene-jaakan, instead of Beeroth-bene-jaakan, or Beeroth of the children of Jaakan. The word Beeroth denotes the particular place among the children of Jaakan, where the Israelites encamped. It is, indeed, rendered in all the old versions, as well as in ours, as a proper name; but it may be taken appellatively to denote wells, and imports that the Israelites pitched at the wells belonging to the children of Jaakan. This is the more probable, when we consider the value, in which wells or water would be held in the desert. Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 264.

BEER'SHEBA, בְּאֵר־שֶׁבַע, signifies the well or fountain of an oath; otherwise, the seventh well, or the well of satiety. Beer-sheba, the well of an oath; or the well of seven, was so denominated, because at this place Abraham entered into an alliance with Abimelech, king of Gerar, and gave him seven ewe-lambs, in token of that covenant, to which they had sworn. (Gen. xxi. 22.)

Beersheba was at first given to the tribe of Judah, and was afterwards ceded to that of Simeon. (Josh. xv. 28.; xix. 2.) The limits of the Holy Land are often expressed in Scripture, by the terms, 'from Dan even to Beersheba.' (2 Sam. xvii. 11, &c.) Dan being the northern, and Beersheba the southern extremity of the country. Beersheba was situated twenty miles from Hebron, towards the south. Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 164, 165.

BEES, four-winged insects, which have wings entirely membranous, and tails furnished with a sting. The common or hive-bee, is of three sorts: 1. The queen-bee, which is rather longer and of a brighter red than the rest. Her business consists in conducting a new swarm, and depositing eggs for another brood; and her fertility is so great, that she frequently brings forth several thousands of young in a year. 2. The drones, which have no stings, are of a darker colour than the rest, and supposed to be males. 3. The honey-bees, or working bees, which are much more numerous than the other two kinds.

Bees were declared unclean by the law. (Levit. xi. 23.)

BEGGAR, one who asks alms. Moses, exhorting the Israelites to alms-giving, says, 'Save when there shall be no poor among you; for the Lord shall greatly bless you in the land, which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it.' (Deut. xv. 4.) Soon after he adds as follows: 'If there be among you a poor man of any of thy brethren, within any of thy gates, in thy land, which the Lord thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother.' (Ibid. xv. 7.) The text of this place does not speak of begging; but we know, that there were, at all times, poor persons and beggars among the Jews, as well as other nations. God himself says, the poor shall never cease out of the land. (Deut. xv. 11.) We see in the Gospels, that there were several beggars in Jerusalem, and in other places. (Mark x. 46. Luke xvi. 20.; xviii. 35, &c.) The true sense of the passage in Moses, is, that God will so plentifully bless the lands of the Hebrews in the sixth year, that, though there be no harvest in the sabbatical year, yet there will be no poor among them, if they observed his precepts; or, it was his design to recommend charity and alms-giving to them in such a manner, that there should be among them no poor; as if he had said, 'Be so charitable and liberal, that there may be no indigent person in Israel.' Some have thought that Jesus Christ and his Apostles were reduced to such a degree of poverty as to beg. This, they are of opinion, appears from what our Saviour said to Zaccheus at Jericho; 'Make haste and come down, for to-day I must abide at thy house.' (Luke xix. 5.) It is certain, however, that this passage does not prove, that Jesus Christ begged on this occasion. We know that our Saviour had some persons who followed him, and supplied his wants: 'they ministered unto him of their substance.' (Id. viii. 3.) He had a common purse, into which was put whatever was voluntarily offered: 'Judas had the bag, and bare what was put therein.' (John xii. 6.) Lastly, Jesus Christ, before his preaching, worked with his father Joseph at the trade of a carpenter; 'Is not this the carpenter?' (Mark vi. 3.) The apostles also exercised trades even during their ministry. (Acts xx. 34. 1 Cor. iv. 12. Eph. iv. 28. Acts xviii. 2, 3, &c.)

BEGHARDS, BEGUARDS, or BEGUINS, certain enthusiasts, who first appeared in Germany and the Low Countries, in the thirteenth century, and who derived their name from an old German word, signifying to seek any thing with importunity, zeal, or earnestness. The word Beghard soon after acquired a new and second signification, and was employed to denote a person, who prayed with uncommon fervency, and who distinguished himself from others by an extraordinary appearance of piety. Hence a Beghard signified a devout man. The origin and signification of this word will serve as a clue to deliver the reader from that labyrinth of difficulties, in which the history of the Beghards has been involved. They will also enable him to account for the prodigious multitudes of Beghards or Beguins, that arose in Europe in the thirteenth century; and they will show how it happened, that these denominations were given to above thirty sects or orders, which differed widely from each other in their opinions, discipline, and manner of living. The first and original signification of the word Beghard was that of importunate beggar. When, therefore, the people saw certain persons embracing not only with resignation, but also with the most voluntary choice, and under a pretext of devotion, the horrors of poverty, begging their bread from door to door, and renouncing all their worldly possessions and occupations, they called them Beghards, without considering the variety of opinions and maxims, by which each was distinguished. Afterwards, those who departed from the manner of living common among their fellow-citizens, and distinguished themselves by the gravity of their aspect, and the austerity of their conduct, were comprehended under the general denominations of Beghards in Germany, and of Beguins in France. At first, the use of these terms was so extensive, that they were applied even to the monks themselves; but in process of time, they were confined to those who formed a sort of intermediate order between the monks and the citizens, and who resembled the former in their manner of living, without assuming their name, or contracting their obligations.

The Beghards were divided into two classes, which derived their different denominations of perfect and imperfect, from the different degrees of austerity in their manner of living. The perfect lived on alms, abstained from wedlock, and had no fixed habitations. On the contrary, the imperfect had their houses, wives, and possessions, and were engaged in the various affairs of life.

The denomination of Beghards, which was at first honourable, gradually lost its primitive signification, and became a term of infamy and reproach. Among these religious beggars, and pretenders to extraordinary piety, were many, whose piety consisted only in the most senseless superstition, whose austere devotion was accompanied with opinions of a corrupt nature, or who, under the mask of religion, concealed the most abominable principles, and committed the most enormous crimes. These were the persons who brought the denomination of Beghards into disrepute, and rendered it both ridiculous and infamous; and in time, it was employed to signify only idiots, heretics, or hypocrites. MacLaine's Notes on Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iii. p. 80, &c.

BEGUINES, a congregation of nuns founded either by St. Begge, duchess of Brabant, in the seventh century; or by Lambert Le Begue, a priest and native of Liege, who lived in the twelfth century. They were established first at Liege, and afterwards at Neville in 1207, or, as some say, in 1226. From this last settlement sprang the great number of Beguinages, which are spread over all Flanders, and which have passed from Flanders into Germany. In the latter country, some of them fell into extravagant errors, and persuaded themselves that it was possible in the present life to attain to the highest perfection, even to impeccability, and a clear view of God, and, in short, to so eminent a degree of contemplation, that, after this, there was no necessity of submitting to the laws of mortal men, civil or ecclesiastical. The council of Vienna, in 1311, condemned these errors, but permitted those who continued in the true faith, to live in chastity, and penitence, either with or without vows. There still subsist, or at least subsisted till lately, many communities of Beguines in Flanders. Mosheim, vol. iii. p. 85, &c.; Broughton's Historical Dictionary, vol. i. p. 135.

BE'HEMOTH, בהמות, signifies animals, or perhaps the animal. In Job, (xl. 15.) is described an animal, called Behemoth, the particular properties of which are narrated at large. Bochart has taken much pains to prove that this is the hippopotamus, or river-horse; Sanctius thinks it was an ox; the fathers suppose it was the devil; but Calmet and the generality of interpreters are of opinion, that it is the elephant. That it is not the elephant appears from that animal being unknown in Egypt, though the elephant has been repeatedly and constantly adopted as a symbol of Africa. The most probable opinion is, that it is the hippopotamus, which, in thinking and speaking, was commonly, in ancient times, and in the countries of which they were natives, united with the crocodile, the leviathan of Job. Besides, the description of the behemoth agrees best with the hippopotamus.

Behemoth, in Hebrew, signifies beasts in general, particularly those of the larger kind. The Rabbins say, that behemoth is the largest four-footed creature which God created; that in the beginning he made two, male and female; that he killed and salted the female, and reserved it as an entertainment for the elect, whenever the Messiah shall come; and that the male is still living, but when his time comes, God will kill it, and give it to the Israelites, who shall then rise from the dead. They are so fully convinced of these extravagancies, that they often swear by the share which they are to have of the behemoth. Harmer's Observations, vol. iv. p. 36. 70 Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. lxx. p. 114, 115.

BEHMENISTS, a name given to those mystics, who adopt the explications of the mysteries of nature and grace, as given by Jacob Behmen. This man was born in the year 1575, at Old Seidenburg, near Gorlitz, in Upper Lusatia, and was by trade a shoemaker. He is said to have been thoughtful and religious from his youth, and to have taken peculiar pleasure in frequenting public worship. At length, seriously considering with himself that speech of our Saviour, 'My Father, which is in heaven, will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him,' he was by it thoroughly awakened in himself, and set forward to desire that promised Comforter. Continuing in that earnestness, he was at last, to use his own expression, 'surrounded with a divine light for seven days, and stood in the highest contemplation and kingdom of joys!' After this, about the year 1600, he was again surrounded by the divine light, and replenished with the heavenly knowledge; and going into the fields, and viewing the herbs and grass, by his inward light he saw into their essences, uses, and properties, which were discovered to him by their lineaments, figures, and signatures. In the year 1610, he had a third special illumination, in which were revealed to him still farther mysteries. Till the year 1612, Behmen did not commit these revelations to writing. His first treatise, which is entitled Aurora, was seized on, before it was finished, by the senate of Gorlitz, who persecuted him at the instigation of the primate of that place; and he never afterwards proceeded with it farther than by adding some explanatory notes. His next production was called The Three Principles; and in this he more fully illustrates the subjects treated of in the former work, and supplies what it wants. The contents of these two treatises may be divided as follows; 1. How all things came from a working will of the holy triune incomprehensible God, manifesting himself as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, through an outward perceptible working triune power of fire, light, and spirit, in the kingdom of heaven. 2. How and what angels and men were in their creation; that they are in and from God, his real offspring; that their life is begun in and from this divine fire, which is the Father of Light, generating a birth of light in their souls; and that from both these proceeds the Holy Spirit, or breath of divine love in the triune creature, as it does in the triune Creator. 3. How some angels, and all men, are fallen from God, and their first state of a divine triune life in him; and what they are in their fallen state, and the difference between the fall of angels and that of man. 4. How the earth, stars, and elements, were created in consequence of the fall of angels. 5. Whence exist good and evil in all this temporal world, in all its creatures, animate and inanimate; and what is meant by the curse, which in it every where dwells. 6. Of the kingdom of Christ, which opposes and contends with the kingdom of hell. 7. How man, through faith in Christ, is able to overcome the kingdom of hell, and triumph over it in the divine power, and by that means obtain eternal salvation; and how, by working in the hellish quality or principle, he falls into perdition. 8. How and why sin and misery, wrath and death, shall reign only for a time, till the love, the wisdom, and the power of God, in a supernatural manner, as the mystery of God made man, shall triumph over sin, misery, and death; and they shall raise fallen man to the glory of angels, and cause this material system to shake off its curse, and enter into an everlasting union with that heaven, from which it was separated. By Behmen's Three Principles are to be understood the dark world or hell, in which the devils live; the light world, or heaven, in which the angels live; and the external and visible world, in which man lives with respect to his bodily life.

The year after, he produced his Threefold Life of Man, according to the Three Principles. In this work he treats more largely of the state of man in this world: 1. That he possesses that immortal spark of life, which is common to angels and devils. 2. That divine life of the Light and Spirit of God, which constitutes the essential difference between an angel and a devil, the last having extinguished this divine life in himself; and that man can attain to this heavenly life of the second principle only through the new birth in Christ Jesus. 3. Of the life of the third principle, or of this external and visible world. Thus, the life of the first and third principles is common to all men; but the life of the third principle belongs only to a true Christian, or child of God.

Behmen mingled what was termed the Rosicrucian, or chemical philosophy, with the mysteries of religion. Amongst other abstruse doctrines, he taught that the divine grace operates by the same rules, and follows the same methods, that the divine providence observes in the natural world; and that the minds of men are purged from their vices and corruptions in the same manner as metals are purified from the dross.

He wrote several other treatises, besides the three already mentioned; but these three form the basis of all his other writings. His conceptions are often clothed under allegorical symbols; and in his latter works, he frequently adopted chemical and Latin terms to express his ideas. This phraseology he borrowed from his conversation with learned men, for his education was very confined and illiberal; but with respect to the matter contained in his writings, he denied that he borrowed it either from men or books. Some have bestowed high praises on this enthusiast, on account of his piety, integrity, and sincere love of truth and virtue; and we shall not offer to contradict these encomiums. He died in the year 1624; and his last words were, 'Now I go hence into Paradise.' Some of Behmen's principles were adopted by the late William Law, who has clothed them in a more modern dress, and in a less obscure style, and who, though gloomy and visionary, like his master, was certainly an honest and a well-meaning man. Behmen's Works, vol. i. p. 6—20; vol. ii. p. 1; Okeley's Memoirs of Behmen, p. 1—8; Mosheim, vol. iv. p. 266. 476; Adam's View of Religions, p. 90. 98.

BEL, בֵּל, Bäl, signifies ancient; otherwise, nothing. Bel, or Belus, first king of Babylon, who, after his death, received divine honours in that city, and throughout Chaldaea. It is uncertain, whether Nimrod, or Belus, the father of Ninus, or some other king, was the first worshipped under this name; or whether it was the Sun, Saturn, or Jupiter. See BAAL.

Jeremiah, speaking of the destruction of Babylon by the Medes and Persians, says, 'Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, Merodach is broken in pieces.' (Jer. l. 2.) In another place, he says, 'I will punish Bel in Babylon, and I will bring forth out of his mouth that which he hath swallowed up, and the nations shall not flow together any more unto him; yea, the wall of Babylon shall fall.' (Ibid. li. 44.) This prophecy was fulfilled under Cyrus, Darius the son of Hystaspes, and the princes, by whom they were succeeded.

The Babylonians worshipped Bel as a living god; they attributed to him the gift of healing diseases, and believed that he ate and drank like a living person. Baruch (vi. 41. Apoc.) says, that a dumb person was presented to him, that he might restore the use of speech, as though he were able to understand. And Daniel, in the apocryphal book of Bel and the Dragon, relates in what manner he discovered the cheat of Bel's priests, who came every night through private doors, to eat what was offered to their deity.

BEL and the DRAGON, the history of, an apocryphal book, separated from the end of Daniel. This history was always rejected by the Jewish church, and is not extant either in the Hebrew or the Chaldean language. St. Jerom gives it no better title than the fable of Bel and the Dragon. Selden thinks, that this little history should be considered as a sacred poem, or fiction, rather than as a true account. With respect to the dragon, he observes, that serpents (dracones) formed a part of the hidden mysteries of the pagan religion, as appears from Clemens Alexandrinus, Julius Firmicus, Justin Martyr, and others. Aristotle also relates, that in Mesopotamia were serpents, which would not injure the natives of the country, but strangers only. Hence it is thought not improbable, that both the Mesopotamians themselves, and the neighbouring people, might worship a serpent: the latter to avert the evil arising from these reptiles; and the former from a principle of gratitude. However, of this there is no certain proof; nor is it known, that the Babylonians worshipped a dragon or serpent. Broughton's Hist. Dict. vol. i. p. 137.

BELIAL, בִּלְיָל, παράνομος, or βέβηλος, signifies wicked, of no account. Belial is Hebrew, and plainly denotes a wicked, worthless man; one resolved to endure no subjection; a rebel; a disobedient and an uncontrollable fellow. The inhabitants of Gibeah, who abused the Levite's wife, have the name of Belial, unrestrainables, given them. (Judg. xix. 22.) Hophni and Phineas, the high-priest Eli's sons, are also called sons of Belial, of uncontrollableness, because of their crimes, and their unbecoming conduct in the temple of the Lord. (1 Sam. ii. 12.)

In later writings, Belial denotes the devil. Paul says, 'What concord hath Christ with Belial?' (2 Cor. vi. 15.) Hence we infer, that in his time, the Jews, under the name of Belial, commonly understood the devil, in the Old Testament.

BELIEF, in its general and natural acceptance, denotes a persuasion, or an assent of the mind to the truth of any proposition. In this sense, belief does not relate to any particular kind of means or arguments, but may be produced by any means whatever: thus we are said to believe our sense, to believe our reason, to believe a witness. Belief, in its more restrained sense, denotes that kind of assent which is grounded only on the authority or testimony of some person. In this sense belief stands opposed to knowledge and science. We do not say that we believe snow to be white, but that we know it is white. But when a matter is propounded to us, of which we ourselves have no knowledge, but which appears to us to be true from the testimony of another, this is what we call belief. See FAITH.

BELL. Moses ordered that the lower part of the blue robe which the high-priest wore in religious ceremonies, should be adorned with pomegranates and gold bells intermixed, at equal distances. With respect to the number of bells worn by the high-priest, the Scripture says nothing; and authors are not agreed on this subject. The sacred historian, however, has informed us of their use and intent, in the following words: 'And it shall be upon Aaron to minister; and his sound shall be heard when he goeth in unto the holy place before the Lord, and when he cometh out, that he die not.' (Exod. xxviii. 35.) Patrick is of opinion, that the sound of the bells, when the high-priest entered into the holy place, gave notice to the people to pray, whilst Aaron was offering incense, which represented their ascending to heaven; and that the sound of the bells, when he came out, taught them so to dispose themselves, that they might be dismissed with his blessing. Comment. on Exod.

The kings of Persia are said to have had the hem of their robes adorned like that of the Jewish high-priest, with pomegranates and gold bells. Calmet thinks it was with a design of giving notice that the high-priest was passing that he wore little bells at the hem of his robe; and that it was a kind of public notice, that he was about to enter the sanctuary. In the king of Persia's court, no one might enter the apartments without giving warning not by knocking, or speaking, but by the sound of something. Thus the high-priest, out of respect, did not knock by way of notice, when he entered the sanctuary; but by the sound of the little bells, he, in some manner desired permission to enter, that the sound of the bells might be heard, and he be not punished with death for entering improperly.

The figure of these bells is not known. The prophet Zechariah speaks of bells hung to war-horses. 'In that day,' says he, 'there shall be upon the bells of the horses, holiness unto the Lord.' (Zech. xiv. 20.)

Among the ceremonies introduced into the church in the tenth century, none was more ridiculous than the consecrating and baptizing of bells. The first fact of this kind on record occurred about the year 968, when pope John XIII. sprinkled a large bell, which was cast for the Lateran at Rome, with holy water, blessed it, and pronounced it sacred. It is said that a similar custom still exists in the Romish church, and that on the baptizing of bells, a prayer of consecration is used, which imports, that by its sound the people may be delivered from the assaults of their enemies, and the attacks of evil spirits. Godfathers and godmothers are also appointed to answer questions in the name of the bell. Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. ii. p. 27.

BELL, BOOK, and CANDLE-LIGHT. Between the seventh and the tenth century, great solemnities were paid to the sentence of excommunication. The most important was the extinction of lamps or candles, by throwing them on the ground, with a slight imprecation, that the person against whom the imprecation was pronounced, might be extinguished or destroyed by the vengeance of God. The people were summoned to attend this ceremony by the sound of a bell, and the curses accompanying the ceremony were pronounced out of a book by the minister, standing in a balcony. Hence originated the phrase of cursing by bell, book, and candle-light. Priestley's History of the Corruptions of Christianity, vol. ii. p. 179.

BELLY is a word often used in Scripture as synonymous with gluttony: 'The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies.' (Tit. i. 12.) 'There are many whose God is their belly.' (Phil. iii. 19.) 'They serve not the Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly.' (Rom. xvi. 18.)

Belly is also used for the heart, the bottom of the soul: 'The words of a tale-bearer are as wounds, and they go down into the innermost parts of the belly.' (Prov. xviii. 8.) 'The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord, searching all the inward parts of the belly.' (Ibid. xx. 27.) 'For it is a pleasant thing if thou keep them within thee, (in thy belly, marg. reading); they shall withal be fitted in thy lips' (Ib. xxii. 18.).

The belly of hell is the grave, or imminent danger of death. The author of Ecclesiasticus says, that he was delivered from the depth of the belly of hell, (li. 5.); and Jonah, that he cried to the Lord out of the belly of hell, (ii. 2.)

BELSHAZ'ZAR, בלשצר, Βαλτάσαρ, signifies master of the treasure, or who buys up treasure in secret. Belshazzar, the last king of Babylon, is generally supposed to have been the son of Evil-merodach, and grandson to Nebuchadnezzar. During the time that Babylon was besieged by Cyrus, he made for a thousand of his courtiers an entertainment, at which every one drank according to his age. Belshazzar ascended the throne of Chaldæa in the year of the world 3444; and he made this entertainment in 3449, and therefore reigned only four years. (Dan. v. 1, 2, &c.) It is computed from Ptolemy's Canon, &c. that Belshazzar ascended the throne of Chaldæa before Christ 558, and that he reigned five years.

The king, deluded by wine, commanded his servants to produce to him the gold and silver vessels, which his grandfather Nebuchadnezzar had brought from the temple at Jerusalem, that he might drink out of them, with his wives, his concubines, and his court. This was accordingly done; and to add to their profaneness, in the midst of their cups, they sang songs in praise of their idols. Presently there was an appearance, as it were, of a man's fingers writing on the wall over against the candlestick. Belshazzar observing this, was greatly astonished, and commanded to fetch all the diviners and sages of Babylon, that they might explain what was written on the wall. It would seem, that the writing was upon the plaster, over against the central pillar of the court, and in the most conspicuous situation which the wall afforded.

Belshazzar promised great honours, but the Magi could comprehend nothing of this writing, which increased the disorder and uneasiness of the king and his court. The queen-mother, wife to the late Nebuchadnezzar the Great, came in and told Belshazzar of Daniel, and his prophetic spirit. The king, therefore, sent for him, and promised him the same honours that he had offered to the Magi, if he would explain the writing. Daniel undertook to perform what was required of him, but first reproved the king for his ingratitude to God, who had raised him to the rank of a sovereign, and for the profanation of the vessels consecrated to his worship. He then proceeded to interpret the words, which were Mene, Tekel, Upharsin. Mene, says he, signifies number, and imports, that the days of both your life and reign are numbered, or that you have only a short time to live; Tekel signifies weight, and intimates, that you have been weighed in the balance of God's justice, and found too light; and Upharsin, or Peres, as it is in Daniel, signifies, a fragment, and imports that your kingdom shall be divided, and given to the Medes and Persians. This took place accordingly. That very night, in the midst of their feasting and revelling, the city was taken by surprise, Belshazzar slain, and the kingdom transferred to Cyaxares, whom the Scripture calls Darius the Mede.

The following observations on this subject occur in a very respectable work.

An Eastern palace contains many courts, in which a great number of persons might be accommodated at a festival. One of these courts forms a square area, with pillars around it, supporting a gallery, &c. In this area, suppose the king and a select party of his guests to be entertained; suppose the candlestick, giving a great light, to be situated in the centre of this area; the tables to be placed around it, and at the upper end the king to be seated.

We may now ask in what part of the court did this miracle occur? and in what did it consist?

I. In that same hour came forth fingers (יֶדֶי di) fitted for—adapted to—according to—like unto—as it were of—a human hand writing (that is, they wrote) over against—in the presence of—that is, near to (not, for instance, in the comparatively obscure angles of the court; but in the nearest part to) the candlestick, where the principal force of the light struck; in a bright situation; upon the plaster of the wall, skreen, inclosure, partition, which surrounded the court, (יֶדֶי di) according to—fit for—adapted to—the dignity and custom of a royal palace: then the king was terrified, &c. verse 24, and sent for Daniel. Then from before him was sent away the part (יֶדֶי di) according to a hand, that is, like unto a hand; and this writing appeared to be traced upon the wall. The writing, therefore, was upon the plaster, over a central pillar in the court, in the most conspicuous situation the wall could afford.

II. This miracle consisted in tracings, marks, or delineations, on this plaster. Such might be made by various means: as 1, by strong lines drawn with a black substance on a white ground; or 2, by faint lines, so drawn; or 3, by fissures, cracks, or crevices, wrought, as it were, in the plaster; or 4, as a finger, or, might write on soft plaster, by tracing its course along it, thereby forming hollows, little furrows, incuse marks on its surface, nearly similar to those made by the impression of a seal, for so the word (רֶשִׁים reshim) is used (chap. vi. 8.) Now, O king, establish the decree and sign (mark הַרְשָׁם tereshem), mark by stamping (a kind of writing) with thy seal, as the custom in the East is, for confirmation, the writing.

The Chaldæan wise men could not ascertain the meaning of this writing, because if it consisted in incuse tracings, as with a finger on soft plaster, there was no discoloration, by which to distinguish them as letters from the rest of the plaster, as well-drawn, well-formed, letters. At most, they saw merely a number of (to them confused) lines; or if the marks were delineated by means of cracks, fissures, formed in the plaster itself, the effect was much the same to the Chaldæans. They saw certain shapes, but could not combine them into true, or analogous, figures of letters; and if they could perceive a letter in some places, they were not able to associate these into words, or separate the mass of them into significant expressions.

Besides, after Daniel is introduced, and applies himself to the reading of these tracings, the part of the hand disappears—vanishes. Did the hand keep moving along the writing so as to hide part of it? Was it attended by any thin vapour-like cloud, which partly concealed the delineation till the right person came to read it? When Daniel inspected this inscription, (1) he perceived that it formed letters, and words; (2) he was enabled to combine, and arrange them; (3) to perceive their hidden meaning and application to persons and things; and (4) he possessed the fortitude to explain them to the king, and apply them to him personally.

If it be thought that the letters were clear to the eyes of the wise men, as they were to Daniel, a question still remains, in what character were they written? Not in the Chaldean character, we may suppose, but probably in the sacred language, the ancient Hebrew, which at present we call the Samaritan. This was a character not likely to be thought of by the Chaldæans; they would not readily think of uniting into letters and words, in this character of the ancient Hebrews, their subjects and slaves, a few irregular scrawling fissures or lines. That was to them no sacred character; and they were not in the habit of investigating it. To Daniel, on the contrary, this description of writing had been familiar from his youth, in the Holy Scriptures. Whilst, therefore, the lines appeared to the Chaldæan wise men no better than those random veins, which are occasionally observed in marble, they were immediately understood by the learned Daniel, who read and explained them without difficulty.

From the repeated use of the word יֶדֶי di, which seems to imply similarity, rather than the actual existence of the thing itself, to which it is referred, it has been suggested as a query, whether a real hand be meant by the writer, or a general resemblance to a hand? whether real fingers, or something like them? and whether real letters, or lines approaching to the forms of such? and those not strongly depicted, but only traced, as a finger might trace on plaster when soft, or as a seal marks the wax or the paper to which it is applied. It has been supposed that this inscription was combined into a cypher.

Let us consider what remains unexplained of the narration. In that same hour there came (whence? from the air, or from the plaster? or did they merely appear?) fingers, that is a projection longer than broad; a kind of styli, pencils (fingers is a secondary idea of the word) di—sufficient for, that is proportionate to a man's hand, in size, number, or shape—and these styli marked, traced, opposite to the candlestick, in the most conspicuous and open part, upon the plaster of the inclosure of,—which went round the court, di—like unto a king's, that is, the interior, or third, court of the palace, which was prohibited to persons not sent for. And the king saw the apparent part of the hand, which wrote, or traced, the lines. After calling in Daniel, Then from before him went away, was sent away, the part di—sufficient for, proportionate to a man's hand; and left these tracings marked. And these were the tracings which were di—sufficiently—proportionately marked, &c. Mene, &c.

It is difficult to reconcile profane history with the account of Belshazzar given in the sacred writings. It is generally thought, that Evil-merodach was succeeded by Neriglissor; Neriglissor by Laborasardoch; and that Belshazzar is the same with Nabonidas, or Labynitus. This will appear more plain, if we consider, first, that Nabonidas is generally believed to have been the last of the Babylonian kings, and therefore must be the same with him, who in Scripture is called Belshazzar; for immediately after the death of Belshazzar, the kingdom was given to the Medes and Persians. Secondly, it appears that he was of the race of Nebuchadnezzar; for Daniel frequently calls him his son, and it is said in the Chronicles, that Nebuchadnezzar and his children, or offspring, reigned at Babylon till the kingdom of Persia. Thirdly, it also appears that, according to the prophecy of Jeremiah, the nations of the East were to serve Nebuchadnezzar, and his son, and his son's son. Nebuchadnezzar, therefore, must have been succeeded by a son and a grandson in the throne of Babylon. Evil-merodach was the son of Nebuchadnezzar; and of all the kings that reigned after Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar alone could be his grandson. For Neriglissor was only his daughter's husband, and Laborasardoch, his daughter's son. Fourthly, Herodotus tells us, that the last king of Babylon was son to the celebrated queen Nitocris; and it is evident, that only by Evil-merodach she could have a son, who was grandson to Nebuchadnezzar. This opinion seems to be the least perplexed with difficulties, and the most consonant to what we read both in Scripture and profane history.

But whatever variations may be observed in historians, the result of their accounts is constant and uniform; they show, that the prophecies against Babylon were literally fulfilled. That city was besieged by an army of Medes, Elamites, and Armenians, according to the predictions of Isaiah, (ch. xiii. 17.; xxi. 2.; xiv. 23.), and Jeremiah (ch. l. 11. 27. 28. 29. 30. 38.; li. 36. 39. 57.) They foretold that the fords of the river should be seized; that confusion and disturbance should prevail throughout the city; that the bravest of the inhabitants should be disheartened; that the river Euphrates should be made dry; that the city should be taken in time of rejoicing; that its princes, sages, and captains, should be overwhelmed with drunkenness, and pass from a natural to a mortal sleep; and that the city, which was formerly so beautiful, so powerful, and flourishing, should become a dwelling for bitterns and unclean birds. These particulars deserve the reader's notice not only in themselves, but also in their being delivered in progression. They were not all foretold together, nor all by the same prophet, but at different times. The succeeding prophet added what a former had omitted; and yet all agree in the same general issue and description. Universal History, vol. iv.; Prideaux's Connection, part i. b. ii.; Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. ccv. p. 24—26; Hales's Analysis, vol. i. p. 281.

BENAI'AH, בניִיָּהוּ, Bav'eah, signifies son of the Lord; otherwise, the understanding of the Lord. Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada, captain of David's guard. He slew two sons of Ariel of Moab, as it is in the Septuagint; or the two lion-like men of Moab, as our translators have rendered the passage; or, as Calmet understands it, he took the two cities of Ar or Ariel, or the city Ar divided into two parts by the river Arnon. Bochart thinks that Ariel was the surname of two brave men of Moab, who were thus denominated from their great courage and strength; and that the additional word בֵּל, which signifies God, is expressive of their bravery, in the manner we read of the mountains of God, the cedars of God, &c. Bishop Patrick seems to agree in opinion with Bochart; and Le Clerc translates this passage the two Ariels. Benaiah also killed a lion in a pit, in time of snow. He killed a giant, who was five cubits high, and who was armed with sword and spear, though he himself had only a staff in his hand. (2 Sam. xxiii. 21.) He adhered to Solomon against Adonijah, (1 Kings i. 36.) and he was sent by Solomon to kill Joab, in whose room he was created generalissimo. (1 Kings ii. 29.)

BENEDICTINES, an order of monks, who professed to follow the rules of St. Benedict, and who were established into a society in the year 529. They were obliged to perform their devotions seven times in twenty-four hours, and always to walk two together. Every day in Lent they fasted till six in the evening, and abated of their usual time in sleeping, eating, &c. Every monk had two coats, two cowls, a table-book, a knife, a needle, and a handkerchief; and the furniture of his bed consisted of a mat, a blanket, a rug, and a pillow. This order is said to have been brought into England about the year 596. To them the English owe their conversion from idolatry. They founded the metropolitan church of Canterbury, and all the cathedrals afterwards erected. This order has produced a great number of eminent men. Their Alcuinus founded the university of Paris; their Dionysius Exiguus perfected the ecclesiastical computation; their Guido invented the scale of music ; and their Sylvester, the organ.

However, the followers of St. Benedict greatly degenerated from the piety of their founder, and lost sight of the duties of their station, and the end of their establishment. Having acquired immense riches from the liberality of the opulent, they became luxurious, intemperate and slothful, abandoned themselves to all kinds of vices, extended their zeal and attention to worldly affairs, insinuated themselves into the cabinets of princes, took part in political cabals and court factions, greatly augmented superstitious rites and ceremonies in their order, to blind the multitude, and supply the place of their expiring virtue, and among other meritorious enterprises, ardently laboured to swell the arrogance, by enlarging the power and authority of the Roman pontiff. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 447, 448.

BENEDICTION, in a general sense, the act of blessing or giving praise to God, or returning thanks for his favours. Hence, benediction is applied to the act of saying grace before or after meals. The ancient Jews, as well as Christians, never ate without a short prayer. The Jews are obliged to rehearse, every day, a hundred benedictions, of which eighty are to be said in the morning. Under the name benediction, the Hebrews also frequently understand presents made by one friend to another: in all probability, because such are generally attended with blessings or compliments, both from those who give, and those who receive.

Benediction is also used for an ecclesiastical ceremony, by which a thing is rendered sacred or venerable. The spirit of piety, or rather of superstition, has introduced into the Romish church benedictions for almost every thing. We read of forms of benediction for wax candles, boughs, ashes, church-vessels, and ornaments; for flags or ensigns, arms, first-fruits, houses, ships, paschal eggs, silicium or the hair-cloth of penitents, &c.

BENEFICENCE may be defined active goodness, or the practice of good. Every benevolent action is, in some measure, its own reward. It is always accompanied with a reasonable and a moral satisfaction. Every instance of victory over our more unsocial feelings and desires, is associated with a degree of delight, more heartfelt and more pure than any other victory. It diffuses over us the sweet complacency of a virtuous self-approbation, which is greatly superior to any of the gross enjoyments of selfishness. The more studiously we consider the frame of our nature, the constitution of the world, and even the present tendencies of actions, the more we shall find, that we have no greater interest in any thing, than in the pursuits of a disinterested beneficence. Do we desire pleasure? and what do we desire more? Then, let me ask, what can afford pleasure so pure, or so heavenly, as the practice of beneficence? Much do they mistake the nature of pleasure who place it in merely personal enjoyments.

It will be found, that those habits, passions, and propensities, which are most hurtful to the peace and happiness of society, are at the same time, most adverse to our own peace and happiness. The greatest part of human misery may be ascribed to the operations of pride, envy, malice, lust, intemperance, avarice, and injustice. Yet these are, at the same time, the most mischievous to the individual in whom they prevail. They harass his quiet, vex him with perpetual solicitude, waste his mind with care, and his heart with anguish. Thus those passions, affections, and pursuits, which have the strongest tendency to render us either unable or unwilling to promote the interest of others, most forcibly withdraw our attention from our own greatest interest.

The first step towards doing good is to abstain from doing evil. To this pitch we surely can attain. If we cannot practise a disinterested benevolence, we can at least, abstain from cruelty, injustice, and oppression. But from this negative state of charity, which consists in doing no ill to others, we shall, if we only cultivate those principles of good-will, and those sensations of sympathy, which are engrafted in our nature, gradually rise to the higher degrees of positive beneficence.

Can that wealth, that honour, those temporal distinctions, or those corporeal delights, which sensuality, avarice, and ambition, the abhorred progeny of an irrational self-love, are so anxious to obtain, in any degree equal the heartfelt satisfaction of beneficence? A disinterested beneficence diffuses over the whole sensitive frame of man sensations of a tranquil and unalloyed pleasure, not only in the act, but in the recollection. As far as happiness consists in an agreeable state of the sensations, beneficence will be experienced by all who practise it, to be the direct road to the attainment of the purest felicity. Since we know that this system of things, in which we are living, is subject to moral as well as to natural laws, and that even here some distinction is made between the cruel and the kind, the selfish and the beneficent; an imperfect resemblance of that more perfect distinction, which will be hereafter; and since we are every moment living under the providential government of God, we have no reason to dread lest our acts of beneficence should expose us to want and misery. 'He that hath pity upon the poor, lendeth unto the Lord; and that which he hath given, will he pay him again.' The beneficent man thus secures an invaluable treasure in the divine favour, and 'lays up in store for himself a good foundation against the time to come.' He may expect his recompence, not indeed as earned or deserved, but as plainly promised, and faithfully assured. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. p. 55, 56, 57, &c.; Bowden's Sermons, Serm. xi.

BENEVOLENCE is a natural feeling of good-will to others, and inculcates a rule of action tending to the happiness of our fellow-creatures. There seems to be ingenerate in our constitution, in which the sensitive and the rational natures are so intimately combined, a natural desire not only for our own good, but also for the good of others. The benevolent Creator has mingled in our frame a concern for the good of others, as an antagonist to our selfishness, or more immediate concern for our own good. Independently of all acquired sensations of ill-will, we are naturally so constituted as to delight in the good, and to condole with the sufferings of our fellow-creatures. This is that ingenerate or instinctive feeling of benevolence, which the Author of our being has most powerfully incited us to cultivate, by rendering its operations so conducive to our happiness, and so necessary to our well-being. The assiduous culture and strenuous exercise of this disposition are alone wanting to unite us all by ties of sympathetic tenderness, as members of one body, or children of the same family, notwithstanding the diversity of our talents, our tempers, our pursuits, and interests. To be affectionate, kind, and sympathizing, to study the good of others, to rejoice with the happy, and to weep with the unfortunate, is to follow the bent of nature, and to obey the will of our Creator.

A benevolent disposition produces a willingness to perform, and an alacrity in performing, all those kind offices, those free and unsolicited services, which endear others so much to us, which conciliate their esteem, their confidence, and affectionate attachment; and which make them desire our good, deprecate our evil, and sympathize with us in all the varieties of our fortune. Many, indeed, are the temporal advantages of a benevolent disposition. Great as may be the depravity among men, they are seldom so depraved as to be able to resist the attractions of goodness, or to remain unmoved by the operations of benevolence. For benevolence always finds something responsive to itself, something which excites a reciprocal love. Benevolence, while it disarms malignity, conciliates friendship. It is impossible that we can hate those, in whom we know there exists a sincere good-will towards us; an earnest desire to promote our happiness, and to alleviate our misery. The consciousness of benevolence in any person naturally and strongly attracts our love. Benevolence is as agreeable to our unvitiated affections and sentiments, as food, or any other grateful thing, to the palate. By passion or interest, or something congenial in their pursuits, the wicked may be leagued in friendship; but benevolence, which glows in the heart, and operates in the conduct, attracts the most pure, and cements the most lasting friendships.

The genuine heartfelt pleasure, which is produced by the operations of true benevolence, does not originate so much in the act, as in the benevolent disposition, in which the act originates. It is the benevolent disposition of the person, which chiefly causes the exquisite serenity of the joy. Though a man may not have a shilling to give in alms, he may possess a most benevolent disposition, which wants only opportunities for its exercise; and in the consciousness of its possession, he will experience as much delight as others in more prosperous circumstances can do in its active operations. For true benevolence takes pleasure not only in doing good, but in seeing good done; and this, perhaps, is one of the best proofs and strongest instances of a truly benevolent disposition of mind. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. p. 74, 194, 235, 238, &c.

BEN'HADAD, בְּנֵי־חָדָד, signifies, son of Hadad. Benhadad, king of Syria, waged war against Ahab, king of Israel, in the year of the world 3103, thirty-seven years after the war of Benhadad I. against Baasha. Benhadad was defeated, and lost all his baggage. His generals informed him, that the God of the Hebrews was a God of the mountains only, and that he must attack Israel in the plain, where the God of Israel had no power. The year following, Benhadad pursued this advice; but the Israelites killed one hundred thousand of his people. To avoid falling into the hands of Ahab, Benhadad concealed himself in an inner chamber, or, as it is supposed, in the chamber of women, or harem, (1 Kings xx. 30.) Benhadad's servants then advised to beg their lives of king Ahab. Therefore, they went to Ahab; and Ahab accepted Benhadad's conditions of peace, and suffered him to depart.

About twelve years after this, or about the year of the world 3115, the same Benhadad declared war against Jehoram, the son of Ahab; but the prophet Elisha discovered the plans of Benhadad to Jehoram, and by that means disconcerted them, (2 Kings vi. 8, et seq.) Benhadad suspected treachery in his officers; but being afterwards informed, that his projects were revealed by Elisha, he resolved to seize that prophet. Understanding, therefore, that Elisha was at Dothan, he sent thither a detachment of his best troops to invest the city; but the prophet struck them with obscurity of vision, and, before they perceived it, led them into Samaria. Some years after, Benhadad again besieged Samaria, and the famine was extreme in the place. However, in the night-time, a panic fear struck the Syrian host; and, imagining that Jehoram had procured an army of Hittites and Egyptians, they thought only of saving themselves by flight. The next year, Elisha being gone towards Damascus, Benhadad, who had fallen sick, sent Hazael with presents to the man of God, to learn from him whether there were hopes of his recovery? The prophet answered, Go, tell him, thou mayest certainly recover; however, the Lord hath showed me, that he shall surely die. At the same time Elisha foretold to Hazael, that he himself would reign at Damascus, and would injure Israel greatly. Hazael returned to Damascus, and told Benhadad that his health would be restored; but the next day, he took a thick cloth, which he dipped in water, and spread over the face of the king, who speedily died. Hazael succeeded him, according to the prophecy of Elisha. Some have doubted, whether Hazael, by spreading the wet cloth over the king's face, intended Benhadad's death, or applied it as a remedy for the king's disorder. Fragments attached to Calmet's Dictionary, No. vii. p. 16; xxv. p. 48.

BENHADAD, the son of Hazael, of whom we have been speaking. Jehoash, king of Israel, recovered from Benhadad all that Hazael had taken from Jehoahaz, king of Israel, his predecessor. (2 Kings xiii. 3, 24, 25.) Jehoash defeated him three times, and compelled him to surrender all the country beyond Jordan, that is, the lands belonging to Gad, Reuben, and Manasseh, which Hazael had taken in the foregoing reigns.

Josephus calls those princes Hadad, who, in Scripture, are denominated Benhadad, that is, son of Hadad. He adds, that the Syrians of Damascus paid divine honours to the last Hadad, and Hazael, in consideration of the benefits of their government, and particularly because they adorned the city of Damascus with magnificent temples.

BENJAMIN, בְּנִימִין, signifies son of the right hand, and was the name of the youngest son of Jacob and Rachel. Jacob journeying from Mesopotamia, southward, with Rachel in his company, she was surprised with the pains of child-bearing, about a quarter of a league from Bethlehem. She died after the delivery of a son, whom with her last breath she named Benoni, that is, the son of my sorrow, but whose name Jacob afterwards changed, and called him Benjamin, that is, the son of my right hand. (Gen. xxxv. 16, 17, &c.)

During the famine which afflicted Canaan, Jacob sent his other sons into Egypt to buy corn, and kept Benjamin at home, (Ibid. xlii. xliii.) Joseph, who well knew his brethren, though they did not discover him, perceiving that Benjamin was not among them, inquired very artfully whether he were living? He gave them corn only on condition they would bring him into Egypt; and for the better security of their promise, he detained Simeon till their return. Jacob, after great reluctance, at length permitted Benjamin to undertake this journey.

Joseph, seeing Benjamin with the rest of his brethren, carried them to his house, made them eat with him, but not at his own table. Joseph placed his brethren according to their age; and in the distribution of the meat, which he sent them, Benjamin's portion was five times larger than that of any other. After this, Joseph commanded his steward to fill their sacks with corn; and in the sack belonging to the youngest, he ordered him to put the silver cup which he used, and the money, which Benjamin had brought to pay for his corn, (Ibid. xliv.) When Joseph's brethren were gone out of the city, he sent after them his steward, who reproached them with their robbery, and, after searching all the sacks, found the cup in that of Benjamin. They returned to Joseph, who, after much solicitude on their part, and tears on his, revealed himself to them, fell on Benjamin's neck, and kissed him and all his brethren. He invited them to come, with their father, and live in Egypt. To each of them he gave two suits of raiment; but to Benjamin he gave five suits, with three hundred pieces of silver.

After this, the Scripture does not mention Benjamin. Of this tribe Jacob says, 'Benjamin shall ravin as a wolf: in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil.' (Gen. xlix. 27.) Of Benjamin Moses, in his last song, says, 'The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by him; and the Lord shall cover him all the day long, and he shall dwell between his shoulders.' (Deut. xxxiii. 12.) These words, 'Benjamin shall ravin as a wolf,' are allusively applied to St. Paul, who was of the tribe of Benjamin; but they are much more properly applied to the valour of this tribe. On these words of Genesis, (xlix. 27.) it has been observed, that the order of the words rather imports, that he shall chase and prey in the morning, and again at night, for the wolf does not prey during the day. At night, the wolf 'sallies forth over the country, keeps peering round the villages, carries off such animals as are not under protection, attacks the sheepfolds, scratches up, and undermines the threshold of the doors where they are housed, enters furious, and destroys all, before he fixes on, and carries off' his prey! When these sallies fail he returns to the forests, pursues the smaller animals, goes regularly to work, follows by the scent, opens to the view, still keeps following, hopeless himself of overtaking the prey, but expecting that some other wolf will come to his assistance, and is then content to share the spoil with his associate.' The present order of the words in the text has been suspected by others. Mr. Green wished to transpose

the two periods; and the Syriac translator was led to nearly the same order. It is probable, that besides those wolves, which singly seek for prey, some may hunt two or more together, and others in troops: Benjamin's partition of his prey leads to such kinds, if such be the character of Eastern wolves. The tribe of Benjamin was certainly warlike, and probably also cunning. Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, p. 34; Buffon's Nat. Hist.

BER'A, ברע, Βαλχά, signifies in evil; or, in the companion; otherwise, in crying. Bera, king of Sodom, in the time of Abraham, was tributary to Chedorlaomer, king of Elam. We know not how the king of Elam, who was situated so far from Palestine, subdued the kings of Pentapolis. Shuckford thinks, that, as the transaction we are about to relate, happened four years before the death of Ninias, who then lived in Persia, we may infer that this Ninias was the Chedorlaomer of Moses, at that time head of the Assyrian monarchy, and that the kings mentioned as his confederates were only his deputies. He is also of opinion, that it is not absurd in Moses to call them kings, since, from what Isaiah afterwards hinted, the Assyrian boasted that his deputy princes were equal to royal governors; 'Are not my princes altogether kings?' (Isa. x. 8.) Connect. vol. ii. l. 6. But, however this might be, certain it is, that Bera, and four other kings of neighbouring cities, supported probably by the people around them, rebelled against the Elamites. Chedorlaomer, confederating with three other kings, came and attacked Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zebaiim, and Zoar. He took and plundered these cities, and carried off the spoil to Hobah, a little beyond the springs of Jordan. Abraham pursued, overtook, and dispersed them; recovered the booty, and restored to Bera, and to the other kings of Pentapolis, what had been taken from them. (Gen. xiv.) This is the first war expressly mentioned in Scripture, and happened in the year of the world 2092, and before Jesus Christ 1912.

BERE'A, or BEROE, Βέροια, signifies heavy, and was the name of a city of Macedonia, in which St. Paul preached the Gospel with success. The sacred writer, therefore, has bestowed a peculiar eulogium on the Bereans, who, he tells us, were more noble or ingenuous, than the inhabitants of Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, and diligently searched the Scriptures, whether the things spoken by Paul concerning the Messiah, or Christ, were just or not. (Acts xvii. 10—13.) Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 257.

BEREANS, a sect of Protestant dissenters from the church of Scotland, who derive their name from, and profess to follow the example of the ancient Bereans, in founding their system of faith and practice on the Scriptures alone, without regard to any human authority.

The Bereans first assembled as a separate society of Christians, in the city of Edinburgh, in the autumn of 1773, and soon after in the parish of Fettercairn. The opponents of the Berean doctrines allege, that this new system of faith would never have been heard of, if Mr. Barclay, its founder had not been disappointed of a settlement in the church of Scotland. In answer to this charge, the Bereans appeal not only to Mr. Barclay's doctrine, uniformly preached in the church of Fettercairn, and many other places in that neighbourhood, for fourteen years before that benefice became vacant, but also to two different treatises, containing the same doctrines, and published by him about ten or twelve years preceding that period. They admit, indeed, that previously to May, 1773, when the general assembly, by sustaining the king's presentation in favour of Mr. Foote, excluded Mr. Barclay from succeeding to the church of Fettercairn, in opposition to the almost unanimous desire of the parishioners, the Bereans had not left the established church, nor attempted to erect themselves into a distinct society. They say, that this separation was by no means necessary on their part, till by the assembly's decision they were in danger of being not only deprived of Mr. Barclay's instructions, but of being scattered as sheep without a shepherd. They add, that it was Mr. Barclay's open and public avowal, from both the pulpit and the press, of those peculiar sentiments, which now distinguish the Bereans, that was the first and principal, if not the only cause of the opposition raised against his settlement in Fettercairn.

The Bereans agree with the great majority of Christians respecting the doctrine of the Trinity, which they hold as a fundamental article. They also agree, in a great measure, with the professed principles of both our established churches, respecting predestination and election, though they allege that these doctrines are not consistently taught in either church.—But they differ from the majority of all sects of Christians, in various other important particulars. 1. On the subject of our knowledge of the Deity, they say, that the majority of professing Christians stumble at the very threshold of revelation; and that, by admitting the doctrine of natural religion, natural conscience, natural notices, &c. the cause of Christianity is at once given up to the infidels; who may justly argue, as Mr. Paine in fact does in his Age of Reason, that no occasion exists for any revelation or word of God, if man from his works alone can discover his nature and perfections. But this the Bereans argue is beyond the natural powers of human reason; and, therefore, our knowledge of God is derived from revelation, without which man would never have entertained an idea of the existence of a Supreme Being. The same, however, is believed by most other Christians.—2. With respect to faith in Christ, and assurance of salvation through his merits, the Bereans differ from almost all other sects. These they reckon inseparable, or rather the same, because, say they, 'God hath expressly declared, he that believeth shall be saved; and therefore it is not only absurd but impious, and in a manner calling God a liar, for a man to say, I believe the Gospel, yet have doubts of my own salvation.' With respect to the various distinctions and definitions that have been given of different kinds of faith, they argue, that there is nothing incomprehensible or obscure in the meaning of this word, as used in Scripture. They say, that as faith, when applied to human testimony, signifies neither more nor less than the mere simple belief of that testimony as true, upon the authority of the testifier; so, when applied to the testimony of God, it signifies precisely 'the belief of his testimony, and resting on his veracity alone, without any kind of collateral support from, or concurrence of, any other evidence or testimony whatever.' They also insist, that as this faith is the gift of God alone, the person, to whom it is given, is as conscious of possessing it, as is the being, to whom God imparts life, that he is alive; and, therefore, he entertains no doubts either of his faith or his consequent salvation through the merits of Christ, who died and rose again for that purpose. In a word, they argue that the Gospel would not be, what it is said to be, glad tidings of great joy, if it did not afford full personal assurance of eternal salvation to the believer; and they insist, that this assurance is the present infallible privilege and portion of every individual believer of the Gospel.

3. Consistently with the preceding definition of faith, the Bereans say, that the sin against the Holy Ghost, which has alarmed and puzzled so many in all ages, is only unbelief; and that the expression, 'it shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, neither in the world to come,' means only that a person dying in infidelity would not be forgiven, neither under the former dispensation by Moses (at that time the present dispensation, kingdom, or government of God), nor under the Gospel dispensation, which, in respect to the Mosaic, was a kind of future world or kingdom to come.

4. The Bereans interpret a great part of the Old Testament prophecies, and in particular the whole of the Psalms, excepting such as are merely historical or laudatory, to be typical or prophetic of Jesus Christ, his sufferings, atonement, mediation, and kingdom; and they consider it as a gross perversion of these Psalms and prophecies, to apply them to the experience of private Christians. In proof of this, they not only urge the words of the apostle, that no prophecy is of any private interpretation, but insist, that the whole of the quotations from the ancient prophecies in the New Testament, and in particular those from the Psalms, are expressly applied to Christ. With them, in this opinion, many other classes of Protestants agree.

5. Of the absolute all-superintending sovereignty of the Almighty, the Bereans entertain the highest idea, as well as of the uninterrupted exertion of that sovereignty over all his works in heaven, earth, and hell, however unsearchable by his creatures. They argue, that God, without election or choice in all his works, is a God without existence, a mere idol, a non-entity; and that to deny God's election, purpose, and express will in all his works, is to render him inferior to ourselves.

With respect to their practice and discipline, the Bereans consider infant baptism as a Divine ordinance, instituted in the room of circumcision; and they think it absurd to suppose, that infants, which all agree are admissible to the kingdom of God in heaven, should, nevertheless, be incapable of admission into his visible church on earth. They commemorate the Lord's Supper commonly once a month; but as the words of the institution fix no particular time, they sometimes celebrate it oftener, and sometimes at more distant periods, as may best suit their convenience. In observing the Lord's Supper, they have no previous days of fasting or preparation, as they conceive that such human institutions tend only to convert the ordinance into an idol, and to occasion erroneous ideas respecting its superior solemnity and importance. They also consider as unscriptural, the popish, episcopal, and presbyterian practice of consecrating the elements, or setting them apart from a common to a holy use; as they, in like manner, object to the setting apart of the water in baptism. The words of that ordinance are, 'When he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat,' &c. They insist that the word, thanks is incompatible with any notion of consecration; that the Lord, acting the part of the Father's servant, did not address the bread or the cup, but his heavenly Father, with thankfulness; and that he has thus left an example to all his followers, commemorating the Lord's death, to give thanks to their God and Father, for his love shown in this ordinance till their Lord shall come. They also object to the word sacrament, as commonly applied to this ordinance and baptism. The term sacrament, as expressed by the Latins, applies to the taking of an oath, which, they think, is not intended in showing forth the Lord's death, more than in prayer and praise. They say, that all ordinances appointed by God are works of faith, and labours of love, while an oath is to put an end to strife. At all times, as well as at the Lord's table, they recommend holiness in all manner of conversation.

The washing of feet, and similar practices, which some other sects of Christians consider as duties, the Bereans think not to be obligatory. They argue, that the example of our Saviour in washing the feet of his disciples, was not the institution of an ordinance, but merely a familiar instance, taken from the custom of the country, and intended to teach his followers, that they ought to perform to each other even the meanest offices of kindness. The Bereans meet every Lord's day for the purpose of preaching, praying, and exhorting to love and good works.

With regard to admission, and exclusion of members, their method is very simple: when any person, after hearing the Berean doctrines, professes his belief and assurance of the truths of the Gospel, and desires to be admitted into their communion, he is cheerfully received on his profession, whatever may have been his former manner of life. If, however, such a one should afterwards forsake his good profession or practice, they first admonish him, and, if that has no effect, they leave him to himself. They do not think, that they possess any power to deliver a backsliding brother to Satan; that text, and other similar passages, as, 'Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven,' &c. are considered by the Bereans as restricted to the apostles and to the inspired testimony alone, and not to be extended to any church on earth, or to any number of churches or of Christians, whether decided by a majority of votes, or by unanimous consent. Nor do they think themselves authorized, as a Christian church, to inquire into each other's political opinions, or to examine into each other's notions of philosophy. They both recommend and practise, as Christian duties, submission to lawful authority; but they do not think that a man, by becoming a Christian, or joining their society, is under any obligation, by the rules of the Gospel, to renounce his right of private judgment on matters of public or private importance. On all such subjects, they allow each other to think and act, as each may see it his duty; and they require of the members nothing more than a uniform and steady profession of the apostolic faith, and a suitable walk and conversation. It is said, that the doctrine of the Bereans has found converts in various places of Scotland, England, and America; and that they have congregations in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Paisley, Stirling, Crieff, Dundee, Arbuthnot, Montrose, Fettercairn, Aberdeen, and other towns in Scotland, as well as in London, and various parts of England. Adam's Religious World, vol. iii. p. 249—259.

BERENGARIANS, a religious sect in the eleventh century. They adhered to the opinions of Berengarius, who asserted that the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper are not really and essentially, but only figuratively, changed into the body and blood of Christ. His followers were divided in opinion, with respect to the eucharist. They all agreed, that the bread and wine were not essentially changed. Some, however, allowed that the body and blood of Christ were contained in them; some denied any change; some allowed a change in part; and others, an entire change, with this restriction, that to those, who communicated unworthily, the change of the elements was reverted.

It is observable, that Berengarius, who thus strenuously opposed the doctrine of transubstantiation and of the real presence, lived in the latter part of the eleventh century, a very considerable time before Luther. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. p. 253, 254. 321, &c.

BEREN'ICE, Βερνίκη, signifies one that brings victory. Berenice, was daughter of Agrippa the Great, king of the Jews, and sister to Agrippa the Younger, who was also king of the Jews. She was first betrothed to Mark, son of Alexander Lysimachus, alabarch of Alexandria; and she afterwards married Herod, king of Chalcis, her own uncle by the father's side. After the death of Herod, she proposed to Polemon, king of Pontus and part of Cilicia, that she would marry him, if he would consent to be circumcised. Polemon accepted this offer, and the match was consummated. But with him Berenice did not long continue. She returned to her brother Agrippa, with whom she lived in such a manner as induced the world to speak ill of both. This incestuous commerce is noticed by Juvenal, (Sat. vi. 156.) Berenice was present with her brother Agrippa, and heard the discourse of Paul before Festus, at Cæsarea of Palestine. (Acts xxv. 13. 23.) Titus, the son of Vespasian, had a friendship for Berenice, and Vespasian himself made her large presents. Some have said, that Titus would have married her, had she not been a foreigner, and a queen; a connection which the Roman laws forbade.

BERESCHITH, בְּרֵאשִׁית, 'Εν ἀρχῇ, signifies in the beginning, and is the name given by the Jews to the Book of Genesis, because in Hebrew it begins with this word. Solomon Meir, a celebrated cabbalist, who became a convert to Christianity, undertook to explain the motives of his conversion to David, an eminent Jew. He took the word bereschith for his text, and in it pretended to discover all the mysteries of Christianity.

BERESCHITH is also a name given to the second part of the Cabbala, which includes the study and contemplation of this sublu-nary world; as the first part, called Mercava, relates to the knowledge of God's perceptions, and of heavenly intelligence. Maimon. More Nevoch.

BERO'DACH - BAL'ADAN, בִּרְאֲדָךְ, Βαρωδὰκ, signifies who creates contrition; otherwise, the son of death; or of thy vapour; otherwise, the wheat, or the purity of thy cloud, or of thy vapour. Berodach-Baladan was the son of Baladan, king of Babylon. On receiving information that Hezekiah, king of Judah, had been sick, and was recovered in a miraculous manner, he sent ambassadors to Hezekiah with letters and presents. The king of Judah, extremely pleased with the arrival of these ambassadors, showed them the riches and beauties of his palace. Afterwards, God sent Isaiah to inform Hezekiah that every thing in his palace, with the sight of which he had entertained these foreigners, would be carried to Babylon. (2 Kings xx. 1, 2, &c.)

BERYLLIANS, so called from Beryllus, an Arabian bishop of Bozrah, who was a man of eminent piety and learning, and lived in the third century. He taught that Christ did not exist before Mary; but that a spirit issuing from God himself, and therefore superior to all human souls, as being a portion of the divine nature, was united to him at the time of his birth. Beryllus was afterwards refuted by Origen, and returned into the church. Mosheim, vol. i. p. 248.

BE'SOR, בִּשְׁרָא, signifies evangelization, or incarnation; otherwise, in the ox, or the wall. Besor is a brook (1 Sam. xxx. 9.) which falls into the Mediterranean, between Gaza and Rhinocorura. This is the river of the wilderness (Amos vi. 14), that many have unadvisedly taken for the river of Egypt, which is mentioned in Scripture, and is the eastern branch of the Nile. (Josh. xv. 4, 47.; 2 Chr. vii. 8.)

BETHAB'ARA, Βηθαβάρᾱ, signifies the house of passage; otherwise, in anger; otherwise, in the wheat. Bethabara was a place beyond Jordan, where John baptized. (John i. 28.) It probably was the same as Beth-barah. (Judg. vii. 24.) It was doubtless a regular passage over the river Jordan; and, as such, it was resorted to by the Midianites when discomfited by Gideon. Whether it was also the passage adopted by the Israelites under Joshua is uncertain. Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 341.; ii. p. 154.

BETH'ANY, Βηθανία, signifies the house of obedience, or of afflictions; otherwise, the house of songs, or the house of the grace of the Lord. Bethany was a considerable place situated at the foot of the Mount of Olives, about fifteen furlongs, or two miles, east from Jerusalem, in the way to Jericho. Here Martha and Mary lived with their brother Lazarus, whom Jesus raised from the dead, (John xi. 18.;) and here Mary poured the perfume on our Saviour's head.

At present, Bethany is only a small village. At its entrance is an old ruin, which is called Lazarus's castle, and is supposed to have been the mansion-house in which he and his sisters resided. At the bottom of a descent, not far from the castle, is shown his sepulchre, which the Turks regard with great veneration, and is used for an oratory or place of prayer. Descending into the sepulchre by twenty-five steps you come first into a small square room, and thence creep into another, which is less, and about a yard and a half deep, and in which, it is said, the body of Lazarus was laid. Not far from hence is the place, which, it is pretended, was Mary Magdalen's habitation; and, after descending a steep hill you come to the fountain of the apostles, which is so denominated, because, as tradition reports, these holy persons were wont to refresh themselves here, in their journeys between Jerusalem and Jericho. This tradition seems extremely probable, as the fountain is close to the road, and very inviting to the thirsty traveller. Whitby's Tables; Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 191, &c.; Maundrell's Journey; Mariti's Travels.

BETHA'VEN, בֵּית־אֵוֶן, Βαιταβέν, signifies the house of vanity, or of grief; or, house of strength, or of iniquity. It is generally supposed, that Bethaven is the same as Bethel, and this belief is founded on the following circumstance: after Jeroboam son of Nebat, had set up his golden calves at Bethel, the Hebrews, who adhered to the house of David, in derision called this city Bethaven, that is, the house of nothing, or the house of iniquity, instead of Bethel, 'the house of God,' as it had been formerly named by Jacob. (Gen. xxviii. 19.) But as we read that Ai was beside Bethaven, on the east side of Bethel, (Josh. vii. 2.) it appears evident that Bethaven, though not far from Bethel, was yet a distinct place. It was situated in the north border of the tribe of Benjamin, (Josh. xviii. 12.) for in all probability, the wilderness of Bethaven was so called from this city. Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 293.

BETH'EL, בֵּית־אֵל, signifies the house of God. Bethel was a city west of Ai, on the confines of the tribes of Ephraim and Benjamin. (Gen. xii. 8.; xxviii. 10.) Here Jacob slept, and had a dream, to him of great import and consolation. See JACOB.

Eusebius says, that Bethel was twelve miles from Jerusalem, in the way to Sichem. Bethel was also called Bethaven, properly, perhaps, Bethaun; where Aun is the same deity as is otherwise called On, and probably is the Elioum of Sanchoniathon, in which appellation both names El and Aun appear to be united. As Bethel was situated within the lot of Ephraim, the son of Joseph, it belonged to the kingdom of Israel, after the revolt of the ten tribes. It was taken from the kingdom of Israel by Ahijah, and afterwards reckoned a part of the kingdom of Judah.

The Rabbins say, that the stone on which Jacob rested his head at Bethel, was put into the sanctuary of that temple, which was built after the return from the Babylonish captivity; that the ark of the covenant was placed on this stone, and that, long after the ruin of the temple, the Jews were accustomed to lament on it their calamities. The Mahometans also believe their temple of Mecca to be founded on this very stone, and profess for it a great veneration. Sacred Geography; Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 180.

BETHER, "ὄρη κοιλωμάτων, signifies division; or in the dove, or in examination, or contemplation. In the song of Solomon (ii. 17.; viii. 14.) the mountains of Bether are mentioned. The word Bether, which, in the second chapter of the Canticles, our translators of the Bible, and the author of the Vulgate, have retained, is by the Septuagint rendered κοιλώματα. Le Clerc does not think proper to follow the Septuagint; and some Latin copies read Bethel, instead of Bether. But in the eighth chapter of the Canticles, the mountains of Bether, as it is in the Hebrew, are rendered by our translators, as well as by the Septuagint, and the author of the Vulgate Bible, mountains of spices. Some suppose Bether to be Bethhoron, called Bethen in Eusebius, Bithara in Josephus, and Bethra in an old itinerary. Bether was taken by the emperor Adrian, in the rebellion of Barchochebas. Some think, that Bether is the same as Betharis, between Cæsarea and Diospolis, and noticed in the ancient itinerary, already mentioned; some that it is Bether, which is reckoned, by the Septuagint, among the cities of Judah, (Josh. xv. 60.); and Calmet is of opinion, that it is Upper Bethhoron, or Bethora, between Diospolis and Cæsarea. Eusebius speaks of Betharim, near Diospolis; and, when he mentions Bether, which was taken by Adrian, he says, it was in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem.

BETHES'DA, Βηθσεδὰ, signifies the house of effusion; or, house of mercy. Bethesda is called in the Greek κολυμβήθρα προσβατικῇ, and in the Vulgate Piscina Probatica, because, according to some, in it were washed the sheep intended for the sacrifices. Bethesda is the Hebrew name for a pool or public bath, which was surrounded by five porches, piazzas, or covered walks. This bath, on account of its singular usefulness, was called Bethesda, Bith Chezda, or the house of mercy, because, as Pool observes, the erecting of baths was an act of great kindness to the common people, whose indispositions in hot countries required frequent bathing; or rather, as the generality of expositors think, because it evinced God's great goodness to his people, in giving such healing virtues to the waters of this pool. Some, however, explain Bethesda, בית אשר, the sink-house, or drain, because the waters, which came from the temple, and where the victims were washed, flowed hither. As Josephus uses the Greek word κολυμβήθρα to denote the baths at Jericho, Mr. Macknight, in his Harmony of the Gospels, concludes, that the opinions of those are false, who affirm that this pool was used for washing the sheep designed for sacrifice, before they were driven into the temple, and the entrails of the beasts there sacrificed. He also thinks, that this washing was incompatible with the situation of Bethesda, which was near the sheep-gate or market (as our translators have rendered the passage,) in the south-east wall of the city, or, according to some, in that on the north-east, at a great distance from the temple.

The Gospel informs us, that in the porches of this bath, at the time of a certain feast, supposed to be the passover, were many sick persons waiting to descend into the water when it was moved; for an angel came down at certain times, and stirred the water. Whoever then first, after the troubling or stirring of the water, stepped into the pool, was cured, whatever was his disease. (John v. 2, 3, &c.) The majority of writers have regarded the cures wrought at this place as a standing miracle among the Jews; and yet they have been surprised, that Josephus should omit to mention a fact so honourable to his nation. Dr. Doddridge thinks, that this is 'the greatest of difficulties in the history of the Evangelists, and that in which of all others, the learned answerers of Mr. Woolston had given him the least satisfaction.' To obviate some difficulties in the story, Mr. Fleming supposed the latter part of the third verse, and the whole of the fourth to be spurious; it is wanting in Beza's MS. and is added in a later hand to a MS. which belonged to the late French king. However, it is in all other MSS., in the Syriac, and the other versions in the Polyglot.

Dr. Hammond supposed that the blood of the great number of sacrifices which were washed in this pool, communicated a salutary efficacy to the water, on its being stirred by a messenger from the high-priest. By this unphilosophical suggestion, Dr. Pococke was so far carried away, as to seek at Jerusalem for the Pool of Bethesda, on that side of the city where it is not; and where it is, he could not see it, for reasons which will be stated presently. The following is one of Dr. Doddridge's notes on this history: 'I imagine this pool might have been remarkable for some miraculous virtue attending the water; which is the more probable, as Jerom tells us, it was of a very high colour: this, together with its being so very near the temple, where a bath was so much needed for religious purposes, may account for the building such stately cloisters round it, three of which remain to this day. (See Maundrell's Travels, page 108.) Some time before this passover, an extraordinary commotion was probably observed in the water; and Providence so ordered it, that the next person who accidentally bathed here, being under some great disorder, found an immediate and unexpected cure: the like phenomenon, in some other desperate case, was probably observed on a second commotion; and these commotions and cures might happen periodically, perhaps every Sabbath (for that it was yearly none can prove), for some weeks or months. This the Jews would naturally ascribe to some angelic power, as they did afterwards the voice from Heaven (John xii. 29.), though no angel appeared: and they, and St. John, had reason to do it, as it was the Scripture scheme, that these benevolent spirits had been, and frequently are, the invisible instruments of good to the children of men. (Psalm xxxiv. 7.; xci. 11. Dan. iii. 28.; and vi. 22.) On their making so ungrateful a return to Christ for this miracle, and those wrought at the former Passover, and in the intermediate space, this celestial visitant, probably, from this time, returned no more; and, therefore, it may be observed, that though the Evangelist speaks of the pool as still at Jerusalem, when he wrote, yet he mentions the descent of the angel, as a thing which had been, but not as still continuing, (compare ver. 2 and 4) —This may account for the surprising silence of Josephus, in a story, which made so much for the honour of his nation. He was himself not born when it happened; and though he might have heard the report of it, he would, perhaps, (as is the modern way) oppose speculation and hypothesis to fact, and have recourse to some indigested and unmeaning harangues, on the unknown force of imagination: or, if he secretly suspected it to be true, his dread of the marvellous, and fear of disgusting his Pagan readers with it, might as well lead him to suppress this, as to disguise the passage through the Red Sea, and the Divine voice from Mount Sinai, in so cowardly and ridiculous a manner, as it is known he does. And the relation, in which this fact stood to the history of Jesus, would make him peculiarly cautious in touching upon it, as it would have been so difficult to handle it at once with decency and safety.'

We shall now analyze the words of the Evangelist's history, and endeavour to state their true import.

Now there is, in Jerusalem, over against the sheep (-market, or sheep-gate) a pool (or place for swimming in, κολυμβήθρα, i. e. sufficiently deep in some places for swimming in) named in Hebrew, Bethesda, having five porches (porticos, gateways, cloisters, walking-places.) In these lay a multitude (enow to fill them) of (ἀσθενούντων, strengthless, languishing) debilitated persons, blind, contracted, (i. e. having parts of their persons strained, χωλῶν, shut up) wasted (parched as by burning heat, dried up, shrunk, shrivelled) waiting for the moving of the water; for an angel according to the season (at the proper season occasionally, from time to time, after an interval, after a period of time; the word is not χρόνος, importing a fixed time, but κατὰ καιρὸν, a season, or opportunity) descended into the pool, and troubled the water; whoever then first went down (into the pool) after the moving of the water, was cured of whatever disease (i. e. of the nature of those above enumerated) had seized him.

I. The words, Now there is, do not determine that the evangelist wrote his Gospel before the destruction of Jerusalem, as has been inferred from them, for remains of this pool exist to this very day, and as it is sunk in the rock, it may still continue for ages. Dr. Doddridge says, that, though many have asserted it, he does not find satisfactory proof, that the sheep to be sacrificed were washed here; or that the blood of the sacrifices ran into this pool. Indeed, there are no traces, or channels, in the rock which forms the ground, if even such a thing were possible, that the blood from the altar ever ran toward, or into this pool. This obliged Pococke, who adopted that idea, to seek for the Pool of Bethesda in lower ground, on the other side of the temple. The error has consisted, in supposing that the sheep were washed here, after they were slain; whereas, they were washed in it, as soon as bought in the adjoining market, i. e. they were driven in, and swam about, &c. in the pool. In it was always a body of water sufficient for that purpose; and, after being washed, they were driven into the temple.

The place now shown for the pool of Bethesda, is square: yet it might have had five porches; one on each hand at entering, and three on the other sides. It was, probably, very simple, and, though near the temple, unfit for the purpose of religious purifications.

II. The diseases of these patients were of the nervous kind. Perhaps, τυφλῶν, blind, is used in the sense of dim-sighted, i. e. so weak in the nerves, &c. serving the eye, as to be nearly, yet not hopelessly, blind. The other diseases, mentioned by the Evangelist, are evidently such as cold bathing might be likely to cure. The angel might be any providential agent of God. See ANGEL.

III. But, perhaps, there were two distinct waters: first, the constant body of water, the pool, in which the sheep were washed, and which was the bath; secondly, an occasional and inconstant issue of water, whose source was on one side of the bath, falling from a crevice of the rock, into which this basin was sunk, from a height of several feet. Perhaps, this last was the medicinal water, which was troubled at the season. As it, probably, did not fall in a very large quantity, the person who could first get to it, received the full benefit of it, (1) because it was fresh, and pure, from the rock, which the water in the pool, if supplied from the same source, could not be; (2) because there was no superfluity of it, of which others might partake; (3) because such of it as fell into the pool, instantly became diluted, mingled with the body of water constantly there, and by that means was deprived of its efficacy, and its concentrated virtues; (4) this mixture was soon completed by the number of persons, who rushed into the pool, in hopes of being in it the first, or, at least, very early. If the water fell from above into the pool, it might easily be watched by the people, who would not fail to rush towards it, when they discovered it to be issuing. But if the pool itself had been the water that was moved, it is probable they would not have washed the sheep in it, partly from the idea of holiness connected with this pool, and partly from an apprehension that whilst they were washing, the water might be troubled at a moment when no person could enjoy its benefit; if, indeed, its being troubled could be distinguished from the commotion occasioned by the sheep in it, every day.

Sandys says, 'A little above, we entered the city at the gate of St. Stephen, formerly called the port, or gate, of the valley, and of the flock; because at this gate came in the cattle, which were to be sacrificed in the temple, and were sold in the market adjoining. On the left hand is a stone bridge, which passeth at the east end of the north wall, into the court of the temple of Solomon; the head of the bridge to the pool of Bethesda (underneath which the water of the pool had a conveyance) called also Probatium, as the sacrifices were washed in it, before they were delivered to the priests. Now, it is a great square profundity, green and uneven at the bottom: into which a barren spring doth drill between the stones of the northward wall; and stealeth away almost undiscovered. The place is for a good depth hewn out of the rock; confined above on the north side with a steep wall, on the west with high buildings (perhaps a part of the castle of Antonia; where are two doors to descend by, now all that are, half choked with rubbish), and on the south with the wall of the court of the temple.'

Such is the account of Sandys, who was there on Good Friday, 1611, and who found the spring running, but in small quantities. However, when Mr. Maundrell was there on Good Friday, 1697, it would seem that this stream did not then run; and, therefore, it is probable, that this spring is still intermitting, and to this day runs occasionally. We have every reason to suppose, that the spring was formerly more copious and abundant, as well as medicinal; as the rubbish, &c. which now chokes up the passages for its waters, may not only diminish their quantity, but also injure their quality. *Fragments attached to Calmet's Dict. BETH'LEHEM, בֵּית־לֶחֶם, signifies the house of bread; otherwise, the house of war. Bethlehem was a city of Judah, generally called Bethlehem of Judah, (Judg. xvii. 7.) to distinguish it from another of the same name in Zebulun. (Josh. xix. 15.) It is also called Ephrathah, (Mic. v. 2.) or Ephrath, (Gen. xlviii. 7.) and Bethlehem Ephrathah; and its inhabitants are denominated Ephrathites. This city was not considerable for its extent or riches, but was remarkable on account of the Messiah's birth. Micah extolling this pre-eminence of Bethlehem, says, 'Thou Bethlehem Ephrathah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting.' (Mic. v. 2.) The words 'ruler in Israel,' are translated 'the Messiah,' by the Chaldee paraphrast. The prophet had certainly no design of describing David, who had been born at Bethlehem many ages before he wrote; but he referred to Christ, who was born in this city many ages afterwards.

Several difficulties have been started relating to this prophecy of Micah, who foretells the birth of the Messiah at Bethlehem. First, Matthew reads, 'And thou Bethlehem of Judah, art not the least among the princes of Judah,' (Matt. ii. 6.); whereas the text of Micah runs, 'And thou Bethlehem, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah.' It is objected, therefore, that a contrariety exists between Matthew and Micah, one of whom says, that Bethlehem is small among the cities of Judah; and the other, that it is not the least among the princes of Judah. To this it is answered, that a city, though little, yet may not be the least. Matthew also might read the text of Micah in an interrogative manner: 'And thou Bethlehem, art thou too small to be ranked with the cities of Judah?' If so, he gives the true sense of the prophet, 'Thou art not the least.' Some critics maintain that the Hebrew word Zehir, generally translated small, signifies also the contrary, and they cite several passages, in which Zehir, as the Jews agree, denotes heads, principals of the people, (See Jer. xlviii. 4; xlix. 20.; Zech. xiii. 7.) But Jerom and others are of opinion, that Matthew produced the passage in Micah ironically, not as it was written in that prophet, but as it had been produced by the priests to Herod; so that he might reprove their ignorance and negligence. However, a city may be small in extent yet not the lowest, the meanest, the least, but on the contrary, of great dignity and consequence by reason of other circumstances, such as its being a royal seat, or of great antiquity, or illustrious for learning as an university, &c. or for other privileges. Perhaps, the following is the sense of the passage: 'Bethlehem, though of narrow extent as a city, yet is of great dignity as the appointed birth-place of the Messiah.' In other words, it is small but honourable.

Secondly, Micah, in the latter part of the passage, says, 'Out of thee (viz. Bethlehem) shall he come forth unto me, that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting.' The Jews generally acknowledge, that the Messiah should come out of Bethlehem; but they maintain, that this prophecy of Micah has no reference either to Jesus or the Messiah. He of whom Micah speaks, say they, shall be 'ruler in Israel;' and in the third verse, it is affirmed, 'The remnant of his brethren shall be converted, and reunited with the children of Israel.' Jesus as man never reigned over Israel, and if he be God, he can have no brethren over whom to reign. Besides, they think, that to confine the kingdom of the Messiah to Israel, would be to limit it too much. The answer is, that Christ as God certainly had no brethren; but as the son of Mary, and as born of the Jewish nation, Jesus had brethren. In this place, the prophet carefully distinguishes his temporal birth at Jerusalem, from 'his goings forth,' which, says he, have been from of old, from everlasting. Nor is it derogatory from the greatness of the Messiah, to say, that he will reign over Israel, any more than for God to call himself, as he frequently does, the God of Israel.

Bethlehem is situated on the declivity of a hill, about two leagues from Jerusalem. It is generally visited by pilgrims, and at present is furnished with convents not only of the Latins, but also of the Greeks, and Armenians. Here are shown the very place, in which our Saviour was born, the manger, in which he was laid, and the cave or grot, in which Mary hid herself and her divine babe, for some time before their departure into Egypt. The grot is hollowed in a chalky rock; but this whiteness is affirmed by the people not to be natural. It was occasioned, they say, by some miraculous drops of the blessed virgin's milk, which fell from her breast as she was suckling the holy infant. Indeed, so firmly do the inhabitants of Bethlehem believe this opinion, that they are also persuaded the chalk of this grotto possesses a miraculous virtue, and will increase the milk of women. Here are the chapel of St. Joseph, the supposed father of our Lord, the chapel of the Innocents, and also those of St. Jerom, St. Paula, and Eustochium. About half a mile east from the town is the field in which the shepherds were watching their flocks, when they received the glad tidings of the birth of Christ. Not far from the field, is the village, in which the shepherds dwelt. Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 144, 145; Chateaubriand's Travels in Greece, Palestine, &c. vol. i. p. 329, &c.

BETHLEHEMITES, a religious order of men, distinguished by a red star with five rays, which they wore on their breast, in memory of the star that appeared to the wise men, and conducted them to Bethlehem. Several authors have mentioned this order, but none have told us of their origin, or where their convents were situated; if we except Matthew Paris, who says that, in 1257, they obtained a settlement in England, and resided in Trumpington-street, Cambridge. There still subsists in the Spanish West Indies another order of Bethlehemites, who are habited like capuchins, except that they wear a leather girdle, instead of a cord, and on their right side an escutcheon representing the nativity of our Saviour. Buck's Theological Dictionary.

BETH'-PHAGE, בֵּית-פֶּזֶז, Βηθφαγῆ, signifies house of the mouth of the valley, or house of the swelling of the valley, or house of fire. Bethphage was a small village at the foot of the mount of Olives, between Bethany and Jerusalem. Jesus, having come from Bethany to Bethphage, commanded his disciples to procure an ass for his use, in his triumphant entrance into Jerusalem, (Matt. xxi. 1, &c.) The distance between Bethphage and Jerusalem is about fifteen furlongs. The Talmudists, indeed, tell us, that Bethphage was within the walls of Jerusalem, but at their very utmost circuit; and it is probable, that there was a street or district so called, because it led immediately, and adjoined, to the Bethphage which produced figs, and was out of the city. Sacred Geography.

BETHSA'IDA, Βηθσαιδᾶ, signifies the house of fruits, or grain, or hunters, or the crafty, or, perhaps, rather the temple of Saida, or Sidé. Bethsaida was a city, which is not mentioned in the Old, though it frequently occurs in the New Testament. The reason of this is, that it was only a village, as Josephus tells us, till Philip the tetrarch enlarged it into a magnificent city, and gave it the name of Julias, from respect to Julia, the daughter of Augustus Cæsar. As it belonged to the tribe of Naphtali, a country well stocked with deer, (Gen. xlix. 21.) it was extremely well situated for hunting; and as it stood on the north end of the lake Gennesareth, just at the influx of the river Jordan into the lake, it was so commodious for fishing, that we find Peter and Andrew, who were inhabitants of this city, following the occupation of fishermen. (John i. 44.) Hence the name Bethsaida, which imports a place of hunting, or fishing, has been thought to agree well with its situation. The woe denounced against it by our Saviour has long overtaken it in some measure. Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 172.

BETH'SHAN, בֵּית שָׁן, signifies the house of the tooth, or of ivory; or, otherwise, the house of change; or, the dwelling of sleep; or, otherwise BETH-SHEAN, which signifies the house of tumult. Beth-shan, or Beth-shean, was a city belonging to the half tribe of Manasseh on the west of Jordan, and not far from that river. In the time of Eusebius and St. Jerom, it was a considerable city, and was then, as it had long been before, called Scythopolis, or the city of the Scythians, as the Septuagint read it. (Judges i. 27.) It is supposed to have taken this name, from some remarkable occurrence here, when the Scythians invaded Syria. It is said to be six hundred furlongs from Jerusalem. (2 Macc. xii. 29.) After the battle upon mount Gilboa, the Philistines having taken the bodies of Saul and Jonathan, hanged them upon the walls of Bethshan: but the inhabitants of Jabesh Gilead, on the other side Jordan, came in the night, carried off the dead bodies, and interred them honourably under a grove of oaks, near that city, (1 Sam. xxxi. 10, &c.) — Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 20.

BETH-SHEMESH, בֵּית שֶׁמֶשׁ, signifies house of the sun, or house of servitude, or of attendance. Beth-shemesh, a city, belonging to the priests in the tribe of Judah. (1 Sam. vi. 12.) In Eusebius, it is placed ten miles from Eleutheropolis, east, in the way to Nicopolis, or Emmaus. This Beth-shemesh was situated in the north border of Judah, as appears from the book of Joshua, (xv. 10.) and not far west from Kirjath-jearim.—The Philistines returning the ark of the Lord into the land of Israel, it came to Beth-shemesh, where some of the people looking into it with too much curiosity, the Lord smote seventy principal men of the city, and fifty thousand of the common people. (1 Sam. vi. 19, &c.) As some have misunderstood this history, and thought that fifty thousand persons perished on this occasion, it may be proper to examine the expressions of the historian more particularly. His words are, the Lord smote,—as if with his hand—among the people, seventy men, and fifty thousand men; and the people lamented because the Lord had restrained, confined, the people with a great restraint. Here, then, was no destruction, no mortality, of the people, for, in that case, they could not have lamented. Probably, some disorder was epidemical among them, and by it many of them were laid up, confined to their chambers, &c. for a time. This narration is illustrated by the manner in which the small-pox sometimes pervades one of our towns: it restrains, confines the inhabitants, with a great restraint; yet, they recover, and, in due time, may appear abroad again. This explanation of the passage removes all difficulty with respect to the number of persons visited, since the disease might spread far beyond Beth-shemesh, or its territories. Indeed, this single town can scarcely be supposed to have contained so great a number of people as the history mentions. Nor does the history say, that the country at large was alarmed, or that it sympathized with this town, &c. or that any but the people of Beth-shemesh, lamented, as must have been the case, had so many persons been destroyed.

It may, however, be very much doubted, whether this is the proper interpretation of the passage. It appears that three of the MSS. of the twelfth century (collated by Dr. Kennicott), and Josephus, read simply seventy men, and omit 50,000. Seventy is, therefore, evidently the true number; for as Beth-shemesh was only a "small village," it is improbable that it could contain so many as 50,000 inhabitants. Kennicott's Diss. i. p. 532; ii. p. 208; Dr. A. Clarke and Dr. Boothroyd on 1 Sam. vi. 19; Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, vol. ii. p. 505, sixth edition; Additions to Calmet's Dictionary; Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 7.

BETHULIA, Βεθουλία, signifies the virgin of the Lord, and was a city celebrated for its siege by Holofernes, at which he was killed by Judith. (Judith vii. 1.)

Bethulia is a small city, not far from the mountain known by the name of the Mountain of the Beatitudes. It is generally supposed to be the "city set on a hill." (Matt. v. 14.) It stands upon a very eminent and conspicuous mountain, and is seen at a great distance. At present it is called Safet, and is a very strong position, and might well defy the power of Holofernes and his army. It answers exactly to the description given in the book of Judith.

Safet is said to be peopled by about four hundred Jewish families. The prospect from this place is very extensive. 'The view to the south, and on either side, comprehending about one-third of the circle, presents the most surprising assemblage of mountains which can be conceived. It is, if such an expression may be allowed, one vast plain of hills. To a distance of twenty or thirty miles toward Nazareth, and nearly the same toward Mount Tabor, and Mount Hermon, the far spreading country beneath is covered with ranges of mountains; which, having passed over them, we knew to be ascents and descents far from inconsiderable; but which, from the eminence of Safet, appear only as bold undulations of the surface of the earth. To the left are the inhospitable and unvisited mountains, eastward of the river Jordan. In the centre of the distant scene, appears the beautiful lake of Tiberias, fully seen from one extremity to the other; and in the back ground, stretching beyond the utmost power of vision, are the mountains of Gilead. On a clear day, the view in that direction must be more than forty miles.' Jowett's Researches in Syria, p. 184; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 568.

BETH'-ZUR, בֵּית-צִיּוֹר, signifies the house of the rock, or of strength, or of honour, or of reward, or of chains. Beth-zur, Beth-zura, or Bethsura, was a city of Judah. (Josh. xv. 58.) It was opposite to south Edom, and thence defended the passages into Judea. We read in the second Book of Maccabees, (xi. 5.) that Bethsura was only five furlongs from Jerusalem; but this is evidently a mistake. Eusebius places it twenty miles, or seven leagues, from Jerusalem, in the way towards Hebron. This was a place of great strength, particularly in the time of the Maccabees. It was fortified by Rehoboam, king of Judah. (2 Chron. xi. 7.) Lysias, regent of Syria, under young Antiochus, the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, besieged Beth-zur, with an army of sixty thousand foot, and five thousand horse. (1 Macc. iv. 28, &c.) Judas Maccabæus marched to succour the place, and obliged Lysias to raise the siege. (Id. vi. 7.) Judas put his army to flight, and afterwards, employing well the arms and booty found in the enemy's camp, the Jews became stronger, and more formidable than they had hitherto been.

BEYOND. The Hebrew word עֵבֶר, heber, which is generally translated beyond, signifies also on this side. At least we find it in many places, in which, by the context, it appears that we should read, on this side. It is said, 'And they came to the threshing-floor of Atad, which is beyond Jordan.' (Gen. l. 10.) The floor of Atad was to the west of Jordan. It seems, therefore, that with respect to Palestine, in which the Jews dwelt, it should be translated on this side the river. However, it may be said, that Moses, when he wrote this, was east of Jordan, and consequently with regard to him, Atad was beyond that river. In the Septuagint, (Numb. xxii. 1.), we read, Παρὰ τὴν Ἱερὸδάνην κατὰ Ἱερικῶν, On the other side Jordan, by Jericho; and the Vulgate has it still stronger, Trans Jordanem Jericho fixa est, Jericho is situated beyond Jordan, though we know that this city lay to the west of the river. This example has been produced by Calmet from the Vulgate, to prove that this preposition is capable of a different meaning, and ought to be translated on this side. Our translators of the Bible knew that the Hebrew word admitted of this sense, and accordingly have rendered the passage, on this side Jordan by Jericho. However, it seems impossible to conclude, whether the author by this preposition means this or the other side, unless the context explain the passage.

BE'ZEK, בֶּזֶק, signifies lightning; otherwise, in the chains or fetters. Bezek was a city in the tribe of Judah, whither the men of Judah, by the direction of God, marched against the Canaanites, and slew of them ten thousand men. Here they found Adoni-bezek, of whose kingdom this city is supposed to have been the capital, and on whom they retaliated for the cruelty with which he had treated others. (Judg. i. 4—7.) Saul, before he marched to Jabesh Gilead, reviewed his men at Bezek. (1 Sam. xi. 8.) Eusebius and St. Jerom say, that in their days were two cities of this name, pretty near each other, and about seventeen miles from Sichem, in the way to Scythopolis or Bethshan. Calmet is of opinion, that Bezek was situated somewhere near the passage of the river Jordan at Bethshan; and Dr. Wells thinks, that there was only one city of this name, in the tribe of Judah. Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 333.

BE'ZER, בֶּזֶר, Βασάρ, signifies fortification, or vintage; otherwise, to cut, to take away, to defend, to hinder; otherwise, in anguish, or distress. Bezer, or Bozra, or Bostra, a city beyond Jordan, given by Moses to the tribe of Reuben, (Deut. iv. 43.) and designed by Joshua as a city of refuge. (Josh. xx. 8.) It was bestowed on the Levites of Gershon's family. (Id. xxi. 27. 36.) When the Scripture mentions Bezer, it adds, in the wilderness, because it was situated in Arabia Deserta, and the eastern part of Edom, encompassed with deserts. Isaiah threatens Bozra with very great calamities, (Isa. xxxiv. 6.) and describes a conqueror coming from Bozra with his garments dyed in blood. (Id. lxiii. 1.) Many learned interpreters have supposed, that this conqueror was Judas Maccabæus, who took this city, which he ravaged, plundered, and afterwards set on fire. Bishop Lowth, however, is of opinion, that the metropolis of the Edomites, and of the country thence called Idumea, which Judas took, was not Bozra, but Hebron. (1 Macc. v. 65.) He thinks, therefore, that the prophecy has no relation to Judas Maccabæus; and he knows of no event, to which it can refer, unless, perhaps, to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the Jewish polity. Jeremiah also threatens Bozra in a terrible manner, (Jer. xlviii. 24, 25.; xlix. 13. 22, &c.); and it is believed by some, that this prophecy was fulfilled, when Nebuchadnezzar carried his arms into Edom, and the neighbouring provinces, five years after the taking of Jerusalem.

Eusebius places Bezer, or Bozra, twenty-four miles from Adraa or Edrai. This city is sometimes said to belong to Reuben, sometimes to Moab, and at other times to Edom; because as it was a frontier town to these three provinces, it occasionally belonged to each. It is probable there were other cities of this name.

BIBLE, Βίβλος, the Book, a name given by Christians to the collection of the sacred writings, or the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, by way of eminence and distinction. This collection is also known by various other appellations, as the Sacred Books, Holy Writ, Inspired Writings, Scriptures, &c. The Hebrews call the Bible (that is, the Old Testament), מִקְרָא mikra, lesson, lecture, or Scripture.

This sacred book is that, on which both the Jewish and Christian religions are founded. The Jews acknowledge only the Books of the Old Testament, the collecting and publishing of which are unanimously ascribed to Ezra, by both Jews and Christians. Some of the ancient fathers, on no other foundation than that fabulous and apocryphal Book, the Second of Esdras, pretend that the Scriptures were lost and destroyed during the Babylonish captivity, and that Ezra restored them by a Divine revelation. But the truth is, that, in the reign of Josiah, no other book of the law was extant, besides that found in the temple by Hilkiah. From this original, by order of that pious king, copies were transcribed, and search was made for the other parts of the Scriptures (2 Kings xxii.); and by this means copies were multiplied among the people, who carried them to Babylon. After the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, Ezra collected as many copies of the sacred writings as he could, and from them prepared a correct edition. He disposed the several books in their proper order, and settled the canon of Scripture for his time. These books he divided into three parts: 1. The Law; 2. The Prophets; 3. The Hagiographia, or Sacred Writings. This division is mentioned by Josephus, who says, 'We have only twenty-two books, which we believe to be of Divine authority, and of which five are the books of Moses.—From the death of Moses to the reign of Artaxerxes, the son of Xerxes, king of Persia, the prophets, who succeeded Moses, have written thirteen books. The remaining four contain hymns to God, and moral precepts for the conduct of life.' This division is as follows:—

I. The Law contains, 1. Genesis, 2. Exodus, 3. Leviticus, 4. Numbers, and 5. Deuteronomy.

II. The writings of the Prophets are,—1. Joshua, 2. Judges and Ruth, 3. Samuel, 4. Kings, 5. Isaiah, 6. Jeremiah and his Lamentations, 7. Ezekiel, 8. Daniel, 9. The twelve Minor Prophets, 10. Job, 11. Ezra, 12. Nehemiah, and 13. Esther.

III. The Hagiographia consist of, 1. The Psalms, 2. The Proverbs, 3. Ecclesiastes, and 4. The Song of Solomon.

The sacred books were thus divided, that they might be reduced to the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, which amount to twenty-two. At present, the Jews reckon twenty-four books in their canon of Scripture. In this division the Law stands as before, and the Prophets are distributed into the former and latter prophets. The former prophets are Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings; and the latter, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve Minor Prophets. The Hagiographia consist of the Psalms, the Proverbs, Job, the Song of Solomon, Ruth, the Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, and the Chronicles. Under the name of Ezra, they comprehend Nehemiah. This order has not been always observed, but the variations from it are unimportant.

The five books of the Law are divided into fifty-four sections. Many of the Jews suppose, that this division was appointed by Moses himself; but others, with greater probability, ascribe it to Ezra. By this division it was intended, that one of these sections should be read in their synagogues every Sabbath day; and the number was fifty-four, because a month being added to the Jewish intercalated years, the Sabbaths amounted to fifty-four. In other years, the number was reduced to fifty-two, by twice uniting two short sections. Till the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Jews read only the Law; but the reading of it being then prohibited, they substituted in its room fifty-four sections from the Prophets. When the reading of the Law was restored by the Maccabees, the section which had been read from the Law was used for the first, and that from the Prophets for the second lesson. These sections were divided into verses; and if Ezra was not the author of this division, it was introduced not long after his death, and seems to have been intended for the use of the Targumists, or Chaldee interpreters. After the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, when the Hebrew language had ceased to be spoken, and the Chaldee became the vernacular tongue, it was usual to read the law first in the original Hebrew, and afterwards to interpret it to the people in the Chaldee language. For this purpose, therefore, these shorter sections or periods were very convenient. Buxtorf, Tiberias, cap. 11.

The division of the Scriptures into chapters, as they are at present, is of much later date. Some attribute it to Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, in the reigns of John and Henry III. But the real author of this invention was Hugo de Santo Caro, commonly called Hugo Cardinalis, from his being the first Dominican raised to the degree of cardinal. This Hugo flourished about the year 1240. He wrote a comment on the Scriptures, and projected the first concordance, which is that of the Latin Vulgate Bible. As the intention of this work was to render the finding of any word or passage in the Scriptures more easy, it became necessary to divide the book into sections, and the sections into subdivisions. These sections are the chapters, into which the Bible has been divided since that time. But the subdivision of the chapters was not then into verses, as at present. Hugo subdivided them by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G, which were placed in the margin at an equal distance from each other, according to the length of the chapters. About the year 1445, Mordecai Nathan, a famous Jewish Rabbi, improved Hugo's invention, and subdivided the chapters into verses, in the manner they are at present.—*Id. Præfat. and Concor. Bib. The order and division of the books of the Bible, as well of the Old as the New Testament, according to the decree of the council of Trent, are as follows: those books, to which asterisks are prefixed, are rejected by Protestants, as apocryphal:

The Books of the Old Testament.

Genesis.
Exodus.
Leviticus.
Numbers.
Deuteronomy.
Joshua.

Judges and Ruth.

1 Samuel, or 1 Kings.

2 Samuel, or 2 Kings.

1 Kings, otherwise called 3 Kings.

2 Kings, otherwise called 4 Kings.

1 Esdras (as the Septuagint and Vulgate call it), or the book of Ezra.

2 Esdras, or, as we denominate it, the book of Nehemiah.

* Tobit.

* Judith.

Esther.

Job.

Psalms.

Proverbs.

Ecclesiastes.

Song of Solomon.

* The Book of Wisdom.

* Ecclesiasticus.

Isaiah.

Jeremiah and * Baruch.

Ezekiel.

Daniel.

Hosea.

Joel.

Amos.

Obadiah.

Nahum, which we place immediately after Micah, and before Habakkuk.

Jonah, which we place immediately after Obadiah.

Micah.

Habakkuk.

Zephaniah.

Haggai.

Zechariah.

Malachi.

* 1 Maccabees.

* 2 Maccabees.

The Revelation of St. John.

The books of the Old Testament were chiefly written in Hebrew; but some parts of Esdras and Daniel, are in Chaldee.

The books of the New Testament were all written in Greek, except, perhaps, Matthew, if that was first written in Hebrew, that is, in Syriac, the language then spoken in Judea. It is, however, disputed, whether Mark wrote in Greek or Latin, and whether the Epistle to the Hebrews was not first written in Hebrew.

Books cited in the Old Testament, and supposed to be lost, are the Book of the Righteous, or Jasher, (Josh. x. 13. 2 Sam. i. 18.); the Book of the Wars of the Lord, (Numb. xxi. 14.); and the Annals of the Kings of Judah and Israel. The authors of these annals were the prophets who lived at that time. We have also only a part of Solomon's three thousand Proverbs, and his one thousand and five songs, (1 Kings iv. 32.); and we have none of his writings on Natural History. It is questioned whether we have the Lamentations, which Jeremiah composed on the death of Josiah, king of Judah; because the taking of Jerusalem, and the destruction of that city by Nebuchadnezzar, seem to form the subjects of those which we have of this prophet.

'The book of the Wars of the Lord' is cited by Moses (Numb. xxi. 14.); and related some particulars, which happened when the Hebrews passed the brook Arnon. It has been inquired what this Book of the Wars of the Lord was. Some think, that it was a work of greater antiquity than Moses, and contained a recital of wars, which the Israelites had carried on in Egypt, or out of Egypt, before their Exodus under Moses. Indeed, it is most natural to quote a book, which is more ancient than the person who writes, particularly in support of any extraordinary and miraculous fact. Some are of opinion that the Book of the Wars of the Lord, is the book of Numbers itself, in which this passage is cited; or that of Joshua, or the Judges; and they translate, 'It is said in the recital of the wars of the Lord,' &c. Some think, that this narration of the wars of the Lord is contained in the hundred and thirty-fifth, and the hundred and thirty-sixth psalms. Others say, that the book of the wars of the Lord, and the book of Jasher (Josh. x. 13.) are the same. It is conjectured by Cornelius a Lapide, that this citation is added to the text of Moses, and that the Book of the Wars of the Lord related the wars of the Israelites, under Moses, Joshua, the Judges, &c. and, therefore, was later than Moses. Lastly, it may be said, that Moses either wrote himself, or procured to be written, a book, in which were related all the wars of the Lord. This book was continued under the Judges, and the Kings, and was called Annals; and from these annals were composed those sacred books, which contain the histories of the Old and New Testament. This Book of the wars of the Lord is not now extant, though we have no reason to dispute its authenticity.

'The Book of Jasher, or the Upright,' is cited in Scripture, (Josh. x. 13. 2 Sam. i. 18.); and the same difficulties are proposed concerning this, as concerning the former. 'Is not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day.' A great diversity of opinions prevails concerning this book. Some think, that it is the same as that of the Wars of the Lord; some, that it is the 'Book of Genesis,' which contains the lives of the patriarchs and other good men; and others, the 'Books of Moses.' But the opinion which seems most probable is, that from the very beginning were persons among the Hebrews, employed in writing the annals and the memorable events of their nation. These annals were deposited in the temple, or tabernacle, whither, on occasion, recourse was had to them. Therefore, the 'Book of the Wars of the Lord,' the 'Book of Days, or Chronicles,' and the 'Book of Jasher, or the Righteous,' are, properly speaking, the same, though differently denominated, according to the difference of times. Before kings reigned over the Hebrews, these records might be entitled the 'Book of the Wars of the Lord,' or the 'Book of Jasher, or the Upright.' After Saul, they might be denominated the 'Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel or Judah.' Grotius thinks, that this book was a triumphant song, purposely composed to celebrate the success of Joshua, and the prodigy, by which it was attended. M. Dupin declares for this opinion, as most probable, because (1.) the words cited by Joshua, are poetical expressions not very proper for historical memoirs; and because (2.) a book under the same title is referred to in Samuel, when David's song is repeated on the death of Saul and Jonathan. (2 Sam. i. 18.) But, if we suppose that this book contained a collection of pieces of poetry, composed on occasion of remarkable events, these opinions may perhaps coincide. In this view, the appeal to the Book of Jasher for a copy of David's Ode, called 'The Bow,' is very pertinent. Perhaps, it might contain the Songs of Moses, of Deborah, &c.; and, perhaps, Jasher, 'The Upright,' may signify the standard authentic book. Dr. Geddes, in his 'New Translation,' will not allow that Josh. x. 13. is a quotation, though it clearly appears to be a quotation.

It is disputed, whether the citation from the book of Jasher, was inserted by Joshua himself, or by those, who digested his memoirs, and arranged his book in its present form. It is credible, that this passage might be inserted afterwards; for we may easily observe, that the book of Joshua has received some additions.

It has been lately asserted, that the Book of Jasher has been discovered, and that it was obtained at a great expense by Alcurim, the most eminent man of his time, from the city of Gazan in Persia, where it appears to have been preserved from the period of the Jews' return from the Babylonish captivity, having been taken by

'The Book of Chronicles, or Days,' contained the annals and journals, written by public recorders, in the kingdoms of Israel and Judah. These memoirs, or journals, are not now extant, but are very frequently cited in the books of Kings and Chronicles, which are abstracts chiefly from such old memoirs and records, as, in all probability, were subsisting after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity. The authors were generally prophets.

The original writers of the Bible.—It is very credible that the patriarch Abraham, if we should go no higher into antiquity, possessed and brought away such information as the books, or records, of Kedem, his original country, communicated. Perhaps, it would not be improbable, if we should consider Noah himself as practising the art of writing; but, as great doubts have been entertained, whether this art be more ancient than the intercourse of Moses with the Divinity upon Mount Sinai, we shall not insist on this. It appears, that the seal of Judah (Gen. xxxviii.) contained his name, or appropriate mark, engraved on it. But we may discern traces of a still more early employment of this noble art, in the days of Abraham. In Genesis is a passage that has all the appearance of an abridgment of a title deed, or conveyance of an estate, which, indeed, is its import: 'And the (1.) field of Ephron, (2.) which was in Machpelah, (3.) which was before Mamre, (4.) the field, (5.) and the cave, which was therein, (6.) and all the trees in the field, (7.) that were in all the borders thereof round about, (8.) were made sure to Abraham, (9.) for a possession, (10.) in the presence of Heth, (11.) before all that went in at the gate of the city. (Gen. xxiii. 17.) If this be admitted as an instance of the art of writing, and of that art being practised in the days of Abraham, we may justly doubt whether this patriarch could be its first possessor. If, as the Rabbins say, Abraham himself learned of Shem, and, they say decidedly, that 'Isaac went to Shem's school,' then, we may hesitate before we deny the possibility, at least, that Shem had preserved histories of former events, and that he communicated these histories to Abraham, from whom they descended to Isaac, to Jacob, to Levi, to Moses. Some, indeed, have thought that a difference of style may be discerned between the early parts of the book of Genesis, and the original writings of Moses.

It may be considered as certain that the just arguments on behalf of the inspiration of the Scripture suffer no injury, if we suppose that Shem wrote the early history; that Abraham wrote family memoirs of what concerned himself; Jacob what concerned himself, &c.; and that, at length, Moses compiled, arranged, and edited, a copy of the holy works extant in his time. In after times, a procedure perfectly analogous to this was conducted by Ezra, on whose edition of the holy Scripture our faith now rests, as it rests in like manner on the prior edition of Moses, if he was editor of some parts, or on his authority, if he was writer of the whole.

Accepting Moses as the writer of the Pentateuch, we may nevertheless consider Joshua as adding to it some small matters, as the history of the death of Moses, &c.; and Ezra in later times, as adding to it some other small matters, as various minor observations, changes of names, which had happened during a lapse of many ages, particular directions where such or such objects were situated, &c. for the benefit of his readers, and, we may add, of remote posterity, even to ourselves.

When we come to the days of Moses, we have clear evidence, that written documents were composed, purposely, to deliver down to posterity the history of past events. Moses was not only willing to write, but he is specifically directed to write, by way of record, and to be especially careful for the preservation of these records, by placing them in the most sacred national repository, and under the immediate charge of those, who by birth and office were most intimately concerned in their preservation.

This custom of composing public records, was continued in succeeding ages in Israel, under the Judges, and the Kings; and when the schism took place between Israel and Judah, each of those kingdoms preserved copies of the writings esteemed sacred, whether historical or devotional. We have, indeed, great reason to rejoice, that, besides the Pentateuch preserved by the Jews, the Samaritans have also preserved their Pentateuch, which, if it be, as many learned men suppose, written in the truly ancient Hebrew character, is so much the more valuable, as it has had less risk and less occasion of error, than a copy transcribed into another alphabet. We ought also to recollect the natural effects of party, in matters of religion, especially when heightened by political rancour. We may be satisfied, that the Samaritans would not suffer their copies to be altered by any authority from the Jewish governors; and the Jews, we well know, would have scarcely received even a palpable truth from 'that foolish people, which dwelt in Samaria.' When, therefore, we find the copies preserved by these two opposite people generally corresponding, and differing only in some few minor matters, we ought to admire the providence of God, which has thus 'made even the wrath of man to praise him,' by transmitting more than one copy of this leading portion of holy writ, in a manner more certain, and much less liable to doubt, or collusion, or equivocation, than if a single copy had been received by us through the hands of one set of friends only, or had been preserved only by those, whose unsupported testimony might have been suspected of undue partiality, or of improper bias.

In succeeding ages, the kings of Judah were attentive to the arrangement of their sacred code. David, without doubt, authenticated the books of the prophet Samuel; and we read that Hezekiah employed several persons to collect and arrange the Proverbs of Solomon, and even to add to them a number of others, which that prince had left behind him. It is generally understood, that the Psalms, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, were added under Hezekiah; and also the book of Job, perhaps, though others think Isaiah.

The prophecies of Jeremiah were public; many of them were read to all the people, and before the king; and, therefore, many copies might be transcribed. The same may be said of most of the minor prophets; and, in short, of all that were near to the days of Ezra and Nehemiah.

It is very natural to suppose, that those chiefs of the Jewish people, after their return from captivity, would be very diligent in collecting, preserving, and maintaining the dignity of all the writings of their sacred code; and, indeed, excepting the prophet Malachi, we may confidently consider Ezra, as not only collecting, but collating, the copies of former writings, and composing additions to the historical narrations, not in the books themselves, withheld, perhaps, by their prior acknowledged sanctity, but in that separate history, which we call the Chronicles.

Here we ought to pause, because here our faith rests on Ezra's edition; and without any doubt, that 'scribe, well instructed in the law,' had not only divine guidance, but good reasons for what he did, and for his manner of doing it. Some have thought, that we have so many instances of Ezra's modesty, as there are marginal readings in our Hebrew bibles; and these amount in all to eight hundred and forty. They occur in various places of the works extant before Ezra; but they are not found in Malachi, who, for this and other reasons, has been supposed to be Ezra himself.

From the time of Ezra, the Hebrew canon was considered as effectively concluded. However, between the times of Ezra and Christ, the books of the Jews became objects of inquiry among 'neighbouring' nations; and translations of them, during this interval, being undertaken by those, whose language we also study, these translations become very important to us. By their means we have additional sanction to the articles of our inquiry, and additional means of answering the purposes to which our inquiry is directed.—Additions to Calmet.

BIBLES, Hebrew. The Jews did not confine themselves to writing copies of the holy word; they greatly exerted themselves to preserve the genuineness and integrity of the text. This produced what has been termed the Masora, which is the most stupendous monument of minute and persevering labour, in the whole history of literature. The persons employed in this work were Jewish literati, who afterwards received from it the name of Masorites, and who flourished after the commencement of the Christian era. With a reverential, not to say a superstitious attention, of which history does not furnish an instance to be compared with it, they counted all the verses, words, and letters, in all the twenty-four books of the Old Testament, in each of those twenty-four books, in every section of each book, and in all its subdivisions. 'The matter of the Masora,' says Mr. Lewis, 'consists in critical remarks on the verses, words, letters, and vowel points of the Hebrew text. The Masorites were the first, who distinguished the books and sections of books into verses, and marked the number of the verses, and of the words and letters in each verse; the verses, where they thought something was forgot; the words, which they believed to be changed; the letters, which they thought superfluous; the repetitions of the same verses; the different readings; the words, which are redundant or defective; the number of times that the same word is found in the beginning, middle, or end of a verse; the different significations of the same word; the agreement or conjunction of one word with another; the number of words that are printed above; which letters are pronounced, and which are turned upside down; and such as hang perpendicular; they took the number of each; it was they, in short, who invented the vowel points, the accents, and made divers critical remarks on the punctuation, and abundance of other things of equal importance. A great part of the labour of these Jewish doctors consisted in counting the letters of the Hebrew text.' Origines Hebrææ, vol. iv. p. 156. At first, the celebrated Masora of the Jews did not accompany the text. Afterwards, the greatest part of it was written in the margin. To bring it into the margin, the work itself was abridged; and this abridgment was called the Masora Parva. Being found too short, a more copious abridgment was inserted; and this, in contradistinction from the other Masora, was called the Masora Magna. The omitted parts were added to the end of the text; and this was denominated the Masora Finalis. In the Jewish manuscripts and printed editions, a word is often found with a small circle annexed to it, or with an asterisk over it, and a word written in the margin of the same line. The former is called the Ketibh; the latter, the Keri. In these, the Masorites have discovered much mystery. It is generally thought, that they are partly various readings collected from the time of Esdras, and partly critical observations, or, as they have been called, insinuations, of the Masorites, to substitute proper and regular for improper and irregular words, and sometimes decent for indecent expressions, in the text. See MASORA.

Till the last century, the Hebrew manuscripts of the sacred text were not collated. From the differences Lodovicus Capellus observed between the Hebrew text and the version of the Seventy, and between the Hebrew and the Samaritan Pentateuch; from the manifest and palpable corruptions he thought he perceived in the text itself; and from the many reasons, which induced him to suppose the vowel points, and the Masora, were both a modern and an useless invention, he was led to question the general integrity of the text. At length, the manuscripts themselves were examined, and in them were discovered innumerable various readings. From this time biblical criticism on the sacred text took a new turn. The celebrated collation of Dr. Kennicott was begun in the year 1760. He undertook to collate all the manuscripts of the sacred text in England and Ireland; and, during the time he should be employed in this work, which he supposed might be about ten years, to collate, as far as the expense would admit, all the Hebrew manuscripts of importance, in foreign countries. The first volume was printed in 1776; and the second in 1780. Dr. Kennicott himself collated two hundred and fifty manuscripts; and under his direction, and at his expense, Mr. Brunns collated about three hundred and fifty more. The whole number of manuscripts collated on this occasion, was, therefore, about six hundred. In the opinion of Dr. Kennicott, fifty-one of the manuscripts collated for his edition were from 600 to 800 years old; and one hundred and seventy-four, from 480 to 580. Since that time, four quarto volumes of various readings have been published by De Rossi of Parma, from more than four hundred manuscripts, some of which are said to be of the seventh or eighth century, as well as from a considerable number of rare and unnoticed editions. They appeared under the title of Varie Lectiones Veteris Testamenti, ex immensâ manuscriptorum editorumque codicum congerie, haustæ et examinatæ. Parma, 1796. From these extensive collations, a general opinion among the learned has been formed, 1st, that all manuscript copies of the Hebrew Scriptures now extant may, in some sort, be denominated Masoretic copies, since none of them have entirely escaped the rude hands of the Masorites; 2dly, that the most valuable manuscripts, generally speaking, are those which are oldest, written at first without points or accents, containing the greatest number of real vowel, or matres lectionis, exhibiting marks of accurate transcription, conforming most to the ancient versions, and with regard to the Pentateuch, conforming most to the Samaritan exemplar, and the Greek uninterpolated version; 3dly, that the Masoretic copies often disagree, and that the earlier they are, the greater is their disagreement from the present printed copy; and 4thly, that the synagogue rolls disagree the least from the printed copies, and are, therefore, of little value in ascertaining the text. From this combination of circumstances they conclude, that the surest sources of emendation are a collation of manuscripts and parallel places; a comparison of the text with the ancient versions, and of these with one another; grammatical analogy; and, where all fail, even conjectural criticism. On the other hand, the advocates of the ancient opinions contend, that a collation of Hebrew manuscripts may be valued more highly than it deserves; that, when manuscripts of an earlier date than the Masora are sought for, we should remember, that the Masorites had those manuscripts, when they settled the text; that it is not to be supposed a Christian, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, will be able to make a better use of those manuscripts than the Masoretic literati; that where it can be shown the text of the Masora is corrupt, the genuineness of the Bible reading may be doubted; but that where there is no reason to impeach the Masora, the text is fixed beyond controversy.

The printed editions, which appear to deserve particular attention, are, that of Soncino in 1483, from its being the first printed edition of the whole Bible; that at Brescia, in 1494, from its being the edition used by Luther, in his translation; and that printed in 1517, without the name of any place. These three editions were called the Soncinate, because they were printed at Soncino, a town in Lombardy, between Cremona and Brescia, by Jews, whose family came originally from Germany. They were the first Hebrew printers. The edition of Bomberg was printed five times, and is distinguished by the beauty of its type; but as it is not divided into chapters and verses, it is unfit for general use. His editions were all printed at Venice; the first appeared in 1517, and the last in 1545. They were all in quarto. The 16mo. edition of Robert Stephens is most elegantly printed.

It is in seven volumes, and was printed at Paris 1544—1546. He had printed a quarto edition at Paris, in four volumes, 1539—1544. The celebrated edition of Athias, a Jew printer at Amsterdam, was published in that city, first in 1661, and afterwards in 1667: it is the first edition in Hebrew, in which the verses are numbered. It was beautifully re-printed in two volumes octavo, 1705, by Everardus Van der Hooght. This edition has the general reputation of accuracy. His text was adopted by Dr. Kennicott in his edition. The Plantinian editions are remarkable for their neatness and accuracy. The edition of Nunes Torres, with the notes by Raschè, begun in 1700, and printed in 1705, was the favourite edition of the Jews. Most of the former editions were surpassed by that of Michaelis in 1720. Raphael Chajim Basilas, a Jew at Mantua, published a critical edition in four parts, 1742—1744. In 1806, Professor Jahn printed at Vienna the Hebrew Bible, in four octavo volumes, in which the Masoretic notes are retained, with the exception of a very few that relate to the accents, and mark the middle of a book. Professor Jahn, who has long been distinguished for his successful cultivation of oriental literature, has adopted chiefly the text of Van der Hooght, to which he has subjoined the most important various readings, taken from the collations of Bishop Walton, Grabe, Montfaucon, Dr. Kennicott, De Rossi, and Dr. Holmes.—In 1816, Dr. Boothroyd published at Pontefract and in London, in two volumes quarto, Biblia Hebraica, or the Hebrew Scriptures of the Old Testament, without points, after the text of Kennicott, with the chief various readings, selected from his collation of Hebrew manuscripts, from that of De Rossi, and from the ancient versions; accompanied with English notes, critical, philological, and explanatory, selected from the most approved ancient and modern English and Foreign biblical critics. This is perhaps the cheapest Hebrew Bible, with critical apparatus, that is extant. It is peculiarly interesting to the Hebrew scholar and critic, as it contains the substance of the most valuable and expensive works; and it furnishes the student with interesting extracts, which are calculated to assist him as well in interpreting as in obtaining a critical acquaintance with the original text.—In 1822, Mr. D'Allemand published in London a stereotyped edition, in octavo, of the Hebrew Bible, after Van der Hooght's text, in which he stated that he discovered not fewer than two hundred errata.

The most celebrated edition of the Hebrew, with a Latin translation, was that of Sebastian Munster, who was the first separatist from the see of Rome that published a Latin translation of the Bible.—The first volume of the first edition was printed in 1534, and the second in 1535; and the second edition was printed in 1546. Santes Paginus was the first Catholic who made an entirely new Latin translation. It was published at Lyons in 1528, and has been often re-published. It is an accurate and faithful translation; but the Latinity is barbarous, on account of the author wishing to frame a verbal translation, in the strictest and most literal sense of the word. The Rev. Charles Francis Houbigant, of the Oratoire at Paris, published in 1753, his celebrated edition in four volumes folio, with a Latin version and prolegomena. The merit of this edition is celebrated by all, who are not advocates for the Masora. By them it is spoken of in the harshest terms. Prior to Houbigant's edition was that of Reineccius at Leipsic, in 1725, and reprinted there in 1739. Of it a new edition was printed in 1793, under the inspection of Dr. Doederlein and Professor Meisner. It contains the most important of the various readings collected by Dr. Kennicott and De Rossi, printed under the text; and for the purpose of common use, it is an excellent edition, and supplies the want of the splendid but expensive editions and collations of Houbigant, Kennicott, and De Rossi.—Additions to Calmet;—Marsh's Lectures, Lect. x. xi.;—Horne's Introduction, vol. ii. Appendix, p. 8, 9.

BIBLES, Greek.—Dupin observes, that it is a matter of dispute among authors, whether there was a Greek version of the Old Testament more ancient than the Septuagint. It appears certain, however, that before the time of our Saviour there existed no other Greek version than that called the Septuagint. After the establishment of Christianity, some persons undertook new translations, that they might render them, as they said, more conformable to the Hebrew text. Aquila, a Jewish proselyte, of the city of Synope in Pontus, was the first who performed this design, which he executed, A.D. 128, and in the twelfth year of the emperor Adrian. St. Epiphanius says, that Aquila was excommunicated after his conversion, for addicting himself to judicial astrology, and that he undertook this version from hatred to the Christians, and with an intention of corrupting the prophecies relating to Jesus Christ. St. Jerom says, his translation is rendered word for word, and with too scrupulous a nicety.

The second Greek version after the Septuagint, is that of Symmachus, who was a Samaritan by birth, and first became a Jew, then a Christian, and at last an Ebionite, Epiphanius says, that he translated it in the reign of the emperor Severus. His version was more free than the rest, for he observed chiefly the sense, without translating word for word; and his work, therefore, approaches nearer to the Septuagint than that of Aquila.

The third Greek version is that of Theodotion of Ephesus, who was a disciple of Marcion, and afterwards became a Jew. This version was the best of the three, because he observed a medium between Aquila and Symmachus: Theodotion did not confine himself so servilely to the letter as the first, nor allow himself so much liberty as the second.

Besides these were three other Greek versions, the authors of which are unknown. For an account of the Septuagint, see SEPTUAGINT.

There exist a great number of printed editions of the Bible in Greek; but they may be all reduced to the four following: that of Complutum, or Alcalá de Henares; that of Venice; that of Rome; and that of Oxford. The first was published in 1515 by Cardinal Ximenes, and inserted in the Polyglott Bible, usually called the Complutensian Bible. This edition is not exactly the Greek of the Septuagint, being altered in many places according to the Hebrew text. However, it has been reprinted in the Polyglott Bible of Antwerp, in that of Paris, and in the quarto Bible, commonly called Vatablus's Bible.

The second Greek Bible is that of Venice, printed by Aldus in 1518. The Greek text of the Septuagint is re-printed from the manuscript, which abounds with the faults of copyists, though easily amended. This edition was re-printed at Strasburg in 1526, at Basil in 1545, at Frankfort, in 1597, and other places, with some alterations to bring it nearer to the Hebrew.—The most commodious is that of Frankfort, to which are added little scholia, that show the different interpretations of the old Greek translators.

The third Greek Bible is that of Rome, or the Vatican, in 1587, with Greek scholia, collected from the manuscripts in the Roman libraries by Peter Morin. It was begun by Cardinal Montalto, afterwards Pope Sixtus V. This fine edition was reprinted at Paris in 1628, by J. Morin, of the Oratoire, who added to it the Latin translation, which in the Roman was printed separately with scholia. The Greek edition of Rome was printed in the Polyglott Bible of London, and to it are added at the bottom the various readings of the Alexandrian manuscript. It has been also reprinted in England, in 4to. and 12mo. with alterations. It was again published at Francker, in 1709, by Bos, who added to it all the various readings he could find.

The fourth Greek Bible is that printed from the Alexandrian manuscript, and was begun at Oxford by Grabe, in 1707. In this, the Alexandrian manuscript is not printed as it is, but as it was supposed it should be, that is, it is altered where there appeared any fault of the copyists, or any word inserted from some particular dialect; this is considered by some as an excellence, and by others as a fault.

The principal Greek manuscripts now extant are the Codex Alexandrinus, in the British Museum; the Codex Cantabrigien-sis, or Codex Bezae; and the Codex Vaticanus. The Codex Alexandrinus consists of four volumes: the first three comprise the Old Testament; and the fourth contains the New Testament, together with the first epistle of St. Clement to the Corinthians, and a fragment of the second. The Codex Cantabrigiensis, or Codex Bezae, is a Greek and Latin manuscript of the four Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles. The Codex Vaticanus originally contained the whole Greek Bible. After a profound investigation, Dr. Woide places the age of the Codex Alexandrinus between the middle and the end of the fourth century. After a similar investigation, Dr. Kipling places the Codex Cantabrigiensis in the second century; but Bishop Marsh, in his notes to Michaelis, seems to prove, that it was not written earlier than the fifth century. By Mont-faucon and Blanchini, the Codex Vaticanus is referred to the fifth century. Dr. Woide published in London, in 1786, a fac-simile edition of the New Testament in the Codex Alexandrinus. Dr. Kipling published, in 1793, at Cambridge, at the expense of the University, a fac-simile edition of the Codex Cantabrigiensis, or Codex Bezae. These editions exhibit their respective prototypes, page for page, line for line, word for word, contraction for contraction, rasure for rasure, to a degree of similarity scarcely credible. The types were cast for the purpose, in alphabets of various forms, that they might be varied with the manuscript, and represent it more exactly.

The first edition of the New Testament in Greek, in point of time, was that of Erasmus, who published five editions of it, in 1516, 1519, 1522, 1527, and 1535. That of 1519 is most esteemed.—The next edition of the New Testament in Greek, is that inserted in the Complutensian Polyglott. The editors have been charged with sometimes altering the Greek text, to render it conformable to the Latin; but against this charge they have been defended by Goeze, and, to a certain extent, by Griesbach.—The editions of Robert Stephens, for exquisite beauty and delicacy of type, elegance and proper disposition of contractions, smoothness and softness of paper, liquid clearness of ink, and evenness of lines and letters, have never been surpassed, and in the opinion of many, never equalled.—He published four editions, in 1546, 1549, 1550 and 1551; and his son published a fifth edition in 1569. That in 1546 is the most correct.—Beza printed an edition of the New Testament in Greek, in 1565; and in it he principally followed the third edition of Robert Stephens. He printed other editions in 1582, 1589, and 1598. In his choice of readings, he is accused of being influenced by his Calvinism.—The celebrated edition of the Elzevirs was first printed at Leyden, in 1624, from the third edition of Robert Stephens: and where it varies from that edition, it follows, generally, the edition of Beza. By this edition, the text, which, in the preceding editions, had fluctuated, acquired a consistency. It was generally followed in subsequent editions, and has deservedly, therefore, obtained the appellation of Editio recepta. The editors of it are unknown.

The principal editions of the New Testament in Greek, with various readings, are the following: the celebrated edition of the Rev. John Mill was published at Oxford in 1707, after an assiduous labour of thirty years. The whole of the various readings collected by him are said to amount to thirty thousand; and he has enriched his work with most learned prolegomena, and a clear and accurate description of his manuscripts. He followed the third edition of Stephens.—John Albert Bengel, abbot of Alspirsbach, in the duchy of Wurtemberg, published his edition in 1734. To it he prefixed his 'Introductio in Crisin Novi Testamenti,' and subjoined his 'Apparatus Criticus et Epilogus.' He altered the text, where he thought it might be improved; but, except in the Apocalypse, he studiously avoided inserting in it any reading, which was not in some printed edition. Under the text he placed some select readings, and reserved the whole collection of various readings, and his own sentiments respecting them, for his Apparatus Criticus.—All former editions of the Greek Testament were surpassed by that of John James Wetstein, which was published at Amsterdam, in 1751, in two volumes folio. He adopted for his text the editio recepta of the Elzevirs. His collection of various readings far surpasses that of Mill or Bengel; and his notes are particularly valuable for copious extracts from the Rabbinical writers. These greatly explained the idiom and turn of expression used by the apostolic writers and Evangelists.—Dr. John James Griesbach published the first edition of his New Testament, at Halle, in 1775—1777, in two volumes octavo. In 1796, the first volume was reprinted under the patronage, and at the expense, of the Duke of Grafton. It has extracts from two hundred manuscripts, in addition to those quoted in the former edition. He has collated all the Latin versions published by Sabatier and Blanchini. His object was to give a select and choice collection of the various readings, produced by Mill, Bengel, and Wetstein, and of his own extracts, omitting such as are trifling in themselves, supported by little authority, or evidently only errata.—Michaelis's Introduction, vols. ii. iii. edit. 1802; Marsh's Lectures, Lect. v. vi. vii. viii.; Additions to Calmet.

BIBLES, Latin. See VULGATE.

BIBLES, Arabic. In 1516, Aug. Justi-

nian, bishop of Nebio, printed at Genoa, an Arabic version of the Psalter, with the Hebrew text and Chaldee paraphrase, and added Latin interpretations. Arabic versions of the whole Scripture are inserted in the Polyglotts of London and Paris. We have also an edition of the Old Testament entire, printed at Rome in 1671, by order of the congregation De propagandâ fide; but as it has been altered agreeably to the Vulgate edition, it is of little esteem. The Arabic Bibles among us are not the same as those used by the Christians in the East.

Some learned men think, that the Arabic version of the Old Testament, printed in the Polyglotts, is that of Saadias, who lived about A.D. 900. Their reason for this opinion is, that Aben Ezra, a great antagonist of Saadias, quotes some passages of his version, which are the same as those in the Arabic version of the Polyglotts. Others, however, think, that the version of Saadias is not now extant. In 1642, Erpenius printed an Arabic Pentateuch, called also the Pentateuch of Mauritania, from its being composed by the Jews of Barbary, for their own use. This version is extremely literal, and esteemed very exact. The four Gospels have also been published in Arabic, with a Latin version, at Rome, in 1591, folio. They have been reprinted since in the Polyglotts of London and Paris, with some little alterations of Gabriel Sionita. In 1616, Erpenius published, at Leyden, an Arabic New Testament entire, such as he found it in his manuscript copy, which he supposes, from the subscription, to have been written in 1342. Some other Arabic versions are mentioned by Walton, in his Prolegomena, particularly a version of the Psalms preserved at Sion College, London, and another of the prophets, at Oxford; but neither of these has been published.

It is observed by Dr. Marsh, that the Arabic versions of the New Testament may be divided into four classes: 1. those taken immediately from the Syriac; 2. from the Coptic; 3. from the Greek; 4. from the Latin. The same writer is of opinion, that Christianity was never the established religion of Arabia; and that, therefore, a translation of the Bible into Arabic was wholly unnecessary before the conquests of the Saracens, when the Arabic became the vernacular language of Christian countries.

In 1811, the Holy Bible, containing the Old and New Testaments in the Arabic language, was printed at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in quarto. This edition was superintended by the late Rev. Joseph Dacre Carlyle, B.D. chancellor of the diocese of Carlisle, and professor of Arabic in the university of Cambridge. The death of this learned and truly excellent man was a serious loss to the republic of letters.

Though the ancient Arabic version is highly valued by some oriental scholars for its general accuracy and fidelity, yet it has become antiquated in its dialect, and consequently unacceptable to the learned Arabians. On this account, in the East, a new translation of the Scriptures, in elegant modern Arabic, was commenced by Sabat, an eminent Arabian scholar, under the superintendence of the Rev. T. Thomason, M.A. In 1816, the New Testament was completed and published at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society. In 1826, a second edition of the New Testament, much revised and improved, was printed at the press belonging to the Bishop's College, Calcutta. In 1822, an edition of the Arabic New Testament, in Syriac characters, was printed at Paris, at the expense of the Bible Society. Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, vol. ii. p. 95, 317, sixth edition; Buchanan's Christian Researches in Asia, p. 195—199; Bishop Marsh's Notes to Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, vol. iii. p. 597, 598, second edition.

BIBLE, Samaritan. The Samaritan Bible is the most ancient of all the versions. Some learned men think, that it is written in the ancient Hebrew character. It contains only the five books of Moses, and is printed in the Polyglotts of London and Paris.

The Samaritans, besides the Pentateuch in the original Hebrew, have it also translated into the language which they commonly spoke. This is also published, together with the original, in the Paris Polyglott, and is so exactly literal, that Morinus was of opinion one Latin translation would serve for both. Bishop Walton followed the same method in his Polyglott, except that when a variation occurred, he marked it at the bottom of the page. This Samaritan Pentateuch has some additions, variations, and transpositions, by which it differs from the present Jewish copies.—That there should be some differences is not so much to be wondered at, as that there are not more. They who adhered to the one, and those who used the other, were at variance upwards of two thousand years; for such a length of time had passed from the apostasy of Manasseh to these copies being first brought into Europe. In so many ages, many differences might happen through the errors of transcribers; and the differences between those two copies are chiefly of this sort.

In 1790, Dr. Blayney printed at Oxford, in octavo, a neat edition of the Hebræo-Samaritan Pentateuch, in Hebrew characters. In this edition, the text of the Hebræo-Samaritan Pentateuch, printed in Bishop Walton's Polyglott, was adopted as the basis of the work; to which were added various readings from Dr. Kennicott's edition of the Hebrew Bible. Horne's Introduction, vol. ii. part i. p. 94, part ii. p. 10.; Brett's Disserta- tion on the ancient versions of the Bible in Watson's Theolog. Tracts, vol. iii. p. 46.; Prideaux's Connect. vol. ii. p. 600, 601.

BIBLES, Syriac. Of the Syriac versions, the most celebrated is the Peschito or Literal (Versio Simplex), as it is usually called, on account of its very close adherence to the Hebrew and the Greek texts, from which it has been immediately made. Bishop Walton, Carpzov, Leusden, Lowth, and Kennicott, fix its date to the first century of the Christian era. The most probable opinion is that of Michaelis, who ascribes the Syriac version of both Testaments to the close of the first, or to the earlier part of the second century. The Syriac version of the New Testament must certainly have been executed previously to the third century, because the text which it follows, according to Professor Hug, does not harmonize with the recension adopted by the churches of Palestine and Syria, subsequently to the third century. It is independent, and belongs to no family; and it sometimes presents the ancient and peculiar readings of the vetus Italia, or Old Italic version, or those occurring in the Codex Cantabrigien-sis.—The Old Testament has been evidently translated from the original Hebrew, to which it most closely and literally adheres, with the exception of a few passages, which appear to bear some affinity to the Septuagint. Dr. Boothroyd considers this version to be as ancient, and in many respects as valuable, as the Chaldee Paraphrase; and in the notes to his edition of the Hebrew Bible, he has shown that this version has retained numerous and important various readings. To its general fidelity almost every critic of note has given unqualified approbation, though it is not every where equal. It is remarkably clear in those passages, which attribute characters of deity to the Messiah. The late Rev. Dr. Buchanan, in his progress among the Syrian churches and Jews in India, discovered and obtained numerous ancient manuscripts of the Scriptures, which he deposited in the public library at Cambridge. One of these, which was discovered in a remote Syrian church near the mountains, is particularly valuable. It contains the Old and New Testaments, engrossed on strong vellum, in large folio, having three columns in a page; and it is written with beautiful accuracy. The character is Estrangelo Syriac, or Old Syriac; and the words of every book are numbered. The Syrian church assigns a high date to this manuscript, which, in the opinion of Mr. Yeates, who has published a collation of the Pentateuch, was written about the seventh century. The first edition of the Syriac version of the Old Testament appeared in the Paris Polyglott; but being taken from an imperfect manuscript, its deficiencies were supplied by a translation from the Latin Vulgate of the passages wanting. This text was reprinted in Bishop Walton's Polyglott, with the addition of some apocryphal books. Of particular parts of the Syriac Old Testament there have been numerous editions; and the Syriac New Testament has been frequently printed.

The Philoxenian or Syro-Philoxenian version derives its name from Philoxenus, or Xenayas, bishop of Hierapolis or Mabug in Syria, A. D. 488—508, who employed his rural bishop Polycarp in translating the Greek New Testament into Syriac. This version was finished in the year 508, and was afterwards revised by Thomas of Harkel, or Heraclea, A. D. 616. This version was not known in Europe till the middle of the eighteenth century, when (in 1761) the Rev. Dr. Gloucester Ridley published a Dissertation on the Syriac versions of the New Testament, three manuscripts of which he had received thirty years before from Amida in Mesopotamia. After acquiring a knowledge of the Syriac language, Dr. Ridley employed himself at intervals in transcribing the Four Gospels. These being put into the hands of the late Professor White, were published by him with a literal Latin translation in 1778, in two volumes quarto, at the expense of the delegates of the Clarendon Press at Oxford. In 1779, Professor White published from the same press the Acts of the Apostles and the Catholic epistles; and in 1804, the Epistles of Saint Paul, also in quarto, and accompanied with a Latin translation.—The Philoxenian version, though made immediately from the Greek, is greatly inferior to the Peschito, both in the accuracy of the execution, and also in its style.

The Syro-Estrangelo version is a translation of Origen's Hexaplar edition of the Greek Septuagint: it was executed in the seventh century, but its author is unknown. This version corresponds exactly with the text of the Septuagint, especially in those passages in which the latter differs from the Hebrew. From this version M. Norberg edited the prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel in 1787, 4to. Londini, Gothorum; and M. Bugati, the Book of Daniel, at Milan, 1788, 4to.

The Palæstino-Syriac, or Syriac translation of Jerusalem, was discovered in the Vatican library at Rome, by M. Alder, in a manuscript of the eleventh century. It is not an entire translation of the New Testament, but only a lectionarium, or collection of detached portions, appointed to be read in the services of the Church on Sundays and festivals. It is written in the Syriac or Chaldee dialect of Jerusalem, and was evidently made in a Roman province. Horne's Introduction, vol. ii. part i. p. 56—61.; Buchanan's Christian Researches in Asia, p. 138.

BIBLES, Chaldee, are only the glosses or expositions made by the Jews at the time they spoke the Chaldee language. These they call by the name of targums or paraphrases, as not being any strict version of the Scripture. They have been inserted entire in the large Hebrew Bibles of Venice and Basil; but they are read more commodiously in the Polyglotts, in which they are accompanied with a Latin translation. See TARGUM.

BIBLES, Ethiopic. The Ethiopians have translated the Bible into their language.—The Psalms, Canticles, some chapters of Genesis, Ruth, Joel, Jonah, Zephaniah, Malachi, and the New Testament, have been printed separately; and all of them have been since reprinted in the Polyglott of London. The Ethiopic New Testament, which was first printed at Rome, in 1548, is a very inaccurate work, and has been reprinted in the English Polyglott with all its faults. The Ethiopians ascribe this version to Frumentius, the apostle of Ethiopia, who was sent thither by Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria.

Mr. Bruce relates, that he brought with him from Abyssinia a copy of the Ethiopic version of the Old Testament, but it is not known in whose possession the MS. now is; and it does not appear that he brought a copy of any part of the version of the New Testament. He says, that copies of the whole New Testament are in that country extremely scarce, that except in the churches he had never seen a single manuscript, which comprehended all the parts of it, and that even the transcripts of the Gospels were in the hands only of men of the first distinction.

There is reason, however, to expect, that in no long time, the gift of the entire Ethiopic Scriptures will be imparted to Abyssinia. A manuscript copy of this version, in fine preservation, has been purchased by the Committee of the Church Missionary Society. From a memoir on this manuscript by Professor Lee, we learn, that it contains the first eight books of the Old Testament, written on vellum, in a bold and masterly hand, in two columns on each page. On the first page is written, in Ethiopic, the invocation usually found in the books of the Eastern Christians: "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." This valuable manuscript, which is probably about 300 years old, has been carefully transcribed, and is now printing with a fount of types, cast at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society, from the matrices (preserved at Frankfort,) of the celebrated Ethiopic scholar John Ludolph. It appears that the book was written at Axuma, the ancient capital of Ethiopia. Horne's Introduction, vol. ii. part i. pp. 64—67; Bruce's Travels, vol. i. b. ii. c. 7, p. 493.

BIBLES, Persian. In the Persian language are several versions of the Bible, most of which are in manuscript. The Persian Pentateuch, printed in the London Polyglott, is the work of rabbi Jacob, a Persian Jew, and was published at Constantinople, in 1551. Walton has also published, in the London Polyglott, the Gospels translated by one Simeon, a Christian of Persia, who lived in the year 1341. Another version was begun to be printed in London, by Wheelor, in 1652, and after his death was finished by Pierson, in 1657. There are also two Persian versions of the Psalms, translated from the vulgar Latin. Michael. Introduction, vol. ii. p. 105.

BIBLES, Coptic. There are several manuscript copies of the Coptic Bible, in some of the great libraries, especially in that of the king of the French. Dr. Wilkins published the Coptic New Testament, in quarto, in 1716, and the Pentateuch, also in quarto, in 1731, with Latin translations. He fixes the age of these versions at the end of the second, or the beginning of the third century; but this great antiquity is doubted by many. Michael. Introduction, vol. ii. p. 77.

BIBLES, Polyglott. See POLYGLOTT.

BIBLES, English. It would be difficult to ascertain every English translator, or when the Scriptures were first translated into the language of this country. Certain, however, it is, that the Saxons read the Bible in their own language; as some parts at least were translated by Adelm, bishop of Sherborne, Eadfrid (or Ecbert) bishop of Lindisferne, the venerable Bede, and king Alfred. Elfric, abbot of Malmesbury, translated the Pentateuch, Judges, and Job, which were published at Oxford in 1699. The four Gospels were also printed from an ancient Saxon MS. now in the Bodleian Library, in 1571, under the care of the martyrologist John Fox, assisted and encouraged by Matthew Parker, archbishop of Canterbury. Several parts of the Scriptures had been from time to time translated by different persons. Proofs of this, if not the very translations themselves, exist in different libraries of this kingdom. In particular, in the year 1349, the Psalms were translated by Richard Rolle, an hermit of Hampole, in Yorkshire; and in the Harleian, and the king's libraries, are specimens of other and different versions.

Soon after this, John Wiclif, or Wickliffe, translated the New Testament. He was born about the beginning of the fourteenth century, at Wiclif, in Yorkshire, and was sent to Queen's College, Oxford, from which he removed to Merton College. He gained considerable reputation by defending the interests of the University against the encroachments of the begging friars, and was chosen master of Baliol College, and presented to the rectory of Fylingham, in Lincolnshire, which he afterwards exchanged for that of Lotegarshall. December 14, 1365, he was nominated warden of Canterbury College, incorporated into Christ Church, in Oxford, by archbishop Islip, the founder; but at the death of the archbishop, he and three secular fellows were, in 1367, ejected thence, and on appeal the sentence was confirmed by the Pope's bull in 1370. After his ejection, he read lectures in divinity in that University with such applause, that almost every thing he said was received as an oracle. In 1374, king Edward III. nominated him, with the Bishop of Bangor and others, to treat with the Pope's nuncio concerning the provisions of ecclesiastical benefices in England, claimed by the Pope, and long complained of by our Parliaments as very injurious to the rights of the English church. As a reward for this service, the king gave him the prebend of Aust, in the county of Gloucester, and then in the diocese of Worcester, with the rectory of Lutterworth, in Leicestershire. But having shown himself a defender of the king's supremacy, and freely exposed the artifices and encroachments of the papal power, the Pope, in 1377, dispatched three bulls to the archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London. By the first of these bulls, they were directed to cause John Wiclif to be apprehended, imprisoned, and put in irons. This would probably have terminated in the doctor's death, if he had not been protected by the Duke of Lancaster, uncle to Richard II. who was then king. About this time, he began to translate the whole Bible into English from the Latin; as he was probably not sufficiently skilled in Hebrew and Greek to translate from the original languages. He died December 31, 1384. In the year 1731, the New Testament with a glossary, was printed in folio, under the care of the Rev. John Lewis, minister of Margate, and chaplain to Lord Malton.

In the year 1526, William Tyndal printed the first edition of his New Testament. William Tyndal, Tindale, or Tyndall, otherwise Hitchens, was a native of Wales, and was sent to Magdalen-Hall, in Oxford. Here he took his degrees, and was esteemed a man of a most virtuous disposition and an unspotted life. Wood says, that he was expelled for his Lutheran tenets. From Oxford he removed to Cambridge, whence, after some stay, he went to London. Here he was supported by Mr. Humphry Monmouth, a draper and alderman, and a favourer of Luther's opinions. Tindal studied night and day, and bent his thoughts towards a translation of the New Testament into English; but sensible of the great hazard he would incur, by printing it in England, he resolved to go into Germany, as a place of greater security and more liberty. This he was the better enabled to do by the assistance of his friend Mr. Monmouth, who gave him an annuity of ten pounds. At his first leaving England he went as far as Saxony, and conferred with Luther and other eminent reformers. Thence he returned, and settled at Antwerp, where he immediately commenced his favourite work, an English translation of the New Testament. This work was printed in 1526, in octavo, without a name. This edition is very scarce. The Bishop of London, who was then at Antwerp, procured all the copies that remained unsold to be bought up; and on the bishop's return, they were burned, says Fox, at Paul's Cross. Dr. Jortin thinks that this was done by the bishop to serve Tyndal. In 1534, Tyndal published another edition. Besides purchasing the copies at Antwerp, other means were tried: his brother John Tyndal was prosecuted, and sentenced to do penance; and his patron, Alderman Monmouth, was imprisoned, and almost ruined. In 1535, King Henry VIII. ordered all the books containing several errors, &c. with the translation of the Scriptures corrupted by William Tyndal, as well in the Old Testament as in the New, to be utterly expelled, rejected and put away out of the hands of his people. Tyndal's translation of the Pentateuch was printed the year before, and that of Jonah this year. Hall and Bale, his contemporaries, say, that he also translated Joshua, &c. to Nehemiah. The king, thinking much good might follow the people's reading the New Testament, commanded the bishops to cause a new translation to be made; but as the people still continued to read and study Tyndal's translation, the king and council employed one Henry Phillips, who induced the procurator-general of the emperor's court to seize on Tyndal. After an imprisonment of one year and a-half at Antwerp, Tyndal was tried, and condemned by virtue of the emperor's decree in the assembly at Augsburgh, 1536. He was first strangled, and then burnt. Thus died William Tyndal, with this testimony to his character, given him by the procurator-general, his adversary, that he was, 'Homo doctus, pius, et bonus;' which Fox translates, a 'learned, good, and godly man.'

The first English Bible, or complete translation of the Scriptures printed, was that by Myles Coverdale, the first edition of which is dated 1535, and dedicated to King Henry VIII. This edition is printed in folio, and the title is ornamented with an emblematical title cut in wood. He seems to have been extremely careful in the language of his translation. To him and other translators of the Scriptures, especially of our present Bible, our language owes perhaps more than to all the authors who have written since. Myles Coverdale was born in Yorkshire, about the year 1484, and being educated in the Romish religion, became an Augustine monk. But afterwards embracing the reformation, he entered into holy orders. In the year 1551, on the death of Dr. John Harman, he was promoted to the see of Exeter, on account of his singular knowledge in divinity, and his unblemished character. Under the change of religion in the reign of Queen Mary, our bishop was like others ejected from his see, and thrown into prison, but was afterwards permitted to go into banishment. He retired to Geneva, where he engaged with some Protestant refugees in a new version of the Scriptures, which was effected from the Hebrew and Greek languages with notes, and which, from the place, was called the Geneva Bible. After the death of queen Mary, he returned to England, and was collated by the Bishop of London to the living of St. Magnus. He died at the age of 81; but he did not submit altogether to the uniformity required, though he lived a quiet and peaceable life.

At the convocation in 1536, probably, the clergy petitioned the king, that he would grant to the laity the reading of the Bible in the English tongue, and that a new translation might be made for that purpose. The king, therefore, ordered, that a book of the whole Bible both in Latin and English, should be provided and placed in the choir of every parish church, that every one might read it.

In the year 1537 was printed the first edition of the Bible generally known as Matthew's. It is said, the name of Thomas Matthew was fictitious, and used by the real editor John Rogers from motives of prudence or fear; for though no clamour was raised against Myles Coverdale on account of his translation, yet the name of Tyndal had become exceedingly odious. Matthew's Bible was composed partly from Tyndal's, and partly from Coverdale's translations, with some alterations. John Rogers was a native of Lancashire, and educated at Cambridge, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts in 1525. In the reign of Edward VI. he was preferred to the vicarage of St. Sepulchre's, in London, and had a prebend in the church of St. Paul. He was the first martyr that suffered in the reign of Queen Mary, and was burnt at Smithfield, February 4, 1555.

Archbishop Cranmer's Bible was printed in the year 1539. It was perhaps first proposed in convocation six years before; but the proposal, at that time, proved abortive. In this Bible, the translations of Coverdale and Matthew seem to be corrected. The Psalms are those now used in the liturgy. In 1538, Grafton and Whitchurch had obtained permission from King Henry VIII. to print the Bible at Paris; but when the work was nearly finished, by an order of the inquisition, the printers were forbidden to proceed. It was, therefore, resumed in London, and finished in 1539. It was called Cranmer's Bible, from the preface being written by the archbishop. Thomas Cranmer was born at Arslacton, in Nottinghamshire, in 1489. He was educated at Cambridge, and admitted a fellow of Jesus College. His preferment was occasioned by his opinion concerning the king's divorce, 'That it might be decided from the Scriptures, by learned men in England, as well as at Rome.' After this he rose rapidly, till at length he was promoted to the See of Canterbury, and consecrated in 1533. In 1545-6, he procured a repeal of the six articles, the establishment of the communion in both kinds, a public liturgy, &c. On King Edward's death, he appeared in the party of Lady Jane Grey. For this he was attainted in the ensuing Parliament, and found guilty of high treason; but his treason being pardoned, he was next tried at Oxford as a heretic, and burned, March 21, 1555-6, in the sixty-seventh year of his age.

In 1539, was printed Taverner's Bible. Mr. Lewis says, that it is neither a bare revision, nor a correct edition of the English Bible, nor yet strictly a new version. It is what may be called a correction of Matthew's Bible, wherever the editor thought it necessary. He adopts a great part of Matthew's marginal notes, but omits several, and inserts others of his own. Richard Taverner was born at Brisley, in Norfolk, in 1505, and educated first at Cambridge, and afterwards at Oxford. Thence he removed to Staire-Inn, or Strond-Inn, and after that to the Inner-Temple, for the purpose of studying the law. In 1534, he went to court, and was taken into the service of Sir Thomas Cromwell. In 1537, he was appointed one of the signet in ordinary; and in this situation he made this recognition of the Bible, which was authorized by government to be read in churches. He died at Woodeaton, in Oxfordshire, July 1575.

On the accession of Edward VI. the reformation was encouraged, and the acts, which prohibited the translation of the Scriptures, were repealed. It was also enjoined, that within three months, a Bible of the larger volume in English, and within twelve months Erasmus's Paraphrase on the Gospels, should be provided, and conveniently placed in the churches, that the people might read them.

The same year, 1549, was printed the Book of Common Prayer, compiled by Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury; Day, Bishop of Chichester; Goodrich, Bishop of Ely; Skip, Bishop of Hereford; Holbeach, Bishop of Lincoln; Ridley, Bishop of Rochester; Thyrleby, Bishop of Winchester; Dr. May, Dean of St. Paul's; Dr. Taylor, Dean of Lincoln; Dr. Haines, Dean of Exeter; Dr. Robertson, Dean of Durham; Dr. Redman, Master of Trinity College, Cambridge; and Dr. Cox, almoner to the king.

The reign of Queen Mary was too unfavourable for any translation of the Scriptures to be printed in England; and, except the Geneva Testament, we meet with only a quarto primer, Latin and English, after the use of Sarum, with the Epistles and Gospels in English, printed by John Kingston, and Henry Sutton, 1557.

On the accession of queen Elizabeth, she ordered, that within three months, a Bible of the largest volume in English, and, within twelve months, the Paraphrase of Erasmus, should be provided for every parish. An act was also passed for the uniformity of common prayer, and service in the church, &c. The following year, 1559, the liturgy was reviewed, and altered in some passages; and being presented to Parliament, was by them received and established.

In 1568, was printed in folio the Bishops' Bible, which was translated under the inspection of Archbishop Parker. This work was divided into several parts, and assigned to several learned men. Most of the divisions are marked with great initial letters, which denote either the titles or names of the persons employed. To William Ally, bishop of Exeter, was given the Pentateuch, at the end of which are the letters, W. E. The rest of the portions were marked in the same manner. Archbishop Parker oversaw, directed, examined, and finished the whole. In the Psalms of this translation, the word אלהים is translated Lord, and יהוה God, contrary to general, if not (otherwise) universal custom. This circumstance, probably, prevented the Bishops' Psalms from being read in the church service, in which the Psalms of Archbishop Cranmer's Bible were used, and are continued to this day. Cranmer's Psalms are often printed in the Bishops' Bible, and sometimes in that of Geneva, either by themselves, or with the proper Psalms of those translations in opposite columns.—Matthew Parker was born at Norwich in 1504, and was sent to Cambridge, where he was first a Bible clerk of Corpus Christi College, and afterwards a fellow. His first preferment was the deanery of Stoke. By Henry VIII. he was promoted to a prebend of Ely, and the mastership of Corpus Christi. Edward VI. gave him the deanery of Lincoln, with the prebend of Coldingham, which he enjoyed till the time of Queen Mary, when he was deprived, and lived in poverty during her reign. On the accession of Queen Elizabeth, he was appointed to the vacant see of Canterbury, and was consecrated Dec. 17, 1559. He died May 17, 1575, in the seventy-second year of his age.

A translation of the New Testament by Lawrence Tonson, under-secretary to Sir Francis Walsingham, was printed in 1576. This was afterwards frequently reprinted in the Geneva Bible, instead of the former translation.

These labours of the Protestants had their effect on the Catholics. In 1582, was printed the New Testament, translated by the English college at Rheims. Twenty-seven years after, in 1609, appeared the first volume, and, in 1610, the second volume of the Old Testament and Apocrypha, printed at Douay, and thence called the Douay Bible. Both these have been reprinted several times; but an edition in five volumes 12mo. 1750, is much improved in point of language from the Douay, which in many instances is very obscure.

At a convocation in 1603, soon after the accession of James I., it was complained that many and great faults existed in the translation authorized to be read; and Fuller says, that one of the best things produced by the Hampton-court conference was a resolution of the king, that there should be a new translation of the Bible. For this office his majesty appointed fifty-four learned persons, as appears by his letter to the archbishops and bishops, in 1604. But as this letter was written three years before the commencement of the translation, it is probable that seven of the persons nominated for this performance died in the interval, or that so many might have been employed in revising the translation; for Fuller's list of the translators amounts only to forty-seven. This number ranged under six divisions, entered on the work in the spring of 1607. After the work was translated, three copies of the Bible were sent to London. One from Cambridge, another from Oxford, and the third from Westminster. Two persons were then chosen out of each company, twelve in all, to review the work, and to extract from the three copies one which should be printed. Lastly, Bilson, Bishop of Winchester, and Dr. Myles Smith, who had taken an active part in the work, revised the whole, and prefixed arguments to each book. Dr. Smith, who was soon after appointed to the see of Gloucester, wrote a preface, which is now printed in the folio editions of this Bible. This translation was first printed on a black type in 1611, as Fuller says, or in 1612, according to Dr. Durell.

In 1612, a quarto edition of this Bible was printed on Roman type, with an engraved title copied from the folio, by Jasper Isaac.

After the publication of this Bible, which was commonly called King James's Bible, all the other versions fell into disuse, except the Epistles and Gospels in the Common Prayer-book, which were still continued according to the Bishops' translation, till the alteration in the liturgy, in 1661; and the Psalms and Hymns, which are to this day continued as in the old version.

We have now seen with what difficulties the translation of the Bible had to struggle, before it could be accomplished. The perseverance of its friends is entitled to our most grateful acknowledgments. Their labours have transmitted their names to religious posterity, and to the world at large, with immortal honour. To say that their translation is free from faults, would be to describe them as angels rather than men; but let no one despise their performance, till he has qualified himself for undertaking such another, and then he will soon be sensible of the advantages we receive from those, who sustained that labour before us. It is not, however, to be denied, that a translation of the Holy Scriptures, if undertaken by authority in the present day, would possess many advantages superior to those, which attended King James's translation. The state of knowledge is much improved by the labours of many learned men, in the succeeding interval of time. Geographical knowledge is now much more correct, as well as more extensive. The knowledge of natural history, and natural philosophy, of the customs, manners, modes of thinking, and turns of expression, among the Orientals, as well as many other requisites, are better understood at present than formerly.—These are always of consequence, and, occasionally, are of the utmost importance, for conveying the true meaning of many passages of Scripture. We ought also to remark, that in the course of two centuries, our language has undergone some changes, which have varied it from being precisely the same as when our translators wrote.

It is undoubtedly much more easy to notice the obstacles to perfection, in our public version, than to prevent them, or to provide against them in a future work.—But whether the difficulty of entirely removing them be sufficient to justify the suspension of every attempt to correct them, we shall not determine. Our present version is sufficient to all purposes of piety; and these observations refer to the finishing of the already extant superstructure, rather than to the foundation of a new edifice; or, perhaps, they rather refer to the removal of some gothic protuberances, which deface or disfigure the appearance of the edifice, and which are cumbersome and unpleasant to beholders, though they be not dangerous to the stability of the building.

There have been various English Bibles with marginal references by Canne, Hayes, Scattergood, Barker, Field, Tennison, Lloyd, Blaney, Wilson, &c. Additions to Calmel's Dictionary; Johnson's Historical Account of the several English translations of the Bible.

BIBLICISTS, certain doctors of the twelfth century, who expounded the sacred writings in their public schools, illustrated the doctrines of Christianity without deriving any assistance from reason or philosophy, and confirmed their opinions by the united testimonies of Scripture and tradition. Mosheim, vol. ii. p. 427.

BIBLIOTHECA, a library. The Scripture, (Ezra v. 17; vi. 1.) mentions a library of the kings of Persia, which some think consisted of the histories of that nation, and of memoirs of the affairs of state, but which appears to have been rather a depository of laws, charters, and ordinances of the king. We do not read, that there were any libraries formed among the ancient Hebrews before the time of Nehemiah and Judas Maccabæus.

Calmet, however, thinks, that the annals of the kings of Judah and Israel, which are mentioned in so brief a manner, in the books of Kings and Chronicles, may be considered as so many libraries. Others are of opinion, that public libraries were established previously to that period.

Solomon complained in his time, that there was no end of composing books. He himself had written very many, (Eccles. xii. 12. 1 Kings iv. 32, 33.); and it is probable that he formed a large and royal library. It is particularly remarked in the second book of the Maccabees, (ii. 13.) that in Jerusalem Nehemiah founded a large library, composed of the acts of the kings, the prophets, and of David, and the epistles of the kings concerning the holy gifts. Judas Maccabæus, (Id. ibid.) imitated the diligence of Nehemiah. He collected what the war with Antiochus Epiphanes had dispersed, and repaired what it had destroyed.

BIDDELIANS, so called from John Biddle, who, in the year 1644, formed an independent congregation in London. He taught that Jesus Christ, to the intent that he might be our brother, and have a fellow-feeling of our infirmities, and thus become the more ready to help us, has no other than a human nature; and therefore that in this very nature, he is not only a person, since none except a human person can be our brother, but he is also our Lord and God.

It is observable, that Biddle, as well as Socinus and other Unitarians before and since, scrupled not to call Christ God, though they believed him to be a human creature, only on account of the divine sovereignty, with which he was invested.—Lindsey's View of the Unitarian Doctrine and Worship, p. 28-9.

BIDDING PRAYER. It formed a part of the office of deacons in the primitive church, to admonish and direct the people in their public devotions in the church.—For this purpose, they used certain known forms of words, to give notice when each part of the service commenced. Agreeable to this ancient practice is the form. 'Let us pray,' repeated before several of the prayers in the English liturgy. Bishop Burnet, in his History of the Reformation, has preserved the form used before that period, which was as follows. After the preacher had named and opened his text, he called on the people to go to their prayers, and told them for what they should pray. Ye shall pray, says he, for the king, the pope, &c. After this, all the people said their beads in a general silence; and the minister also kneeled down, and said his. They were to say a Pater-noster an Ave-maria, &c. and then the sermon proceeded. Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. ii. p. 20.

BIGOTRY consists in being obstinately and perversely attached to our own opinions; or, as some have defined it, 'a tenacious adherence to a system adopted without investigation, and defended without argument, accompanied with a malignant intolerant spirit towards all who differ.' Bigotry is a kind of prejudice, combined with a certain degree of malignity. It is thus exemplified and distinguished by a sensible writer: 'When Jesus preached, Prejudice cried, Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? Crucify him, crucify him, said Bigotry. Why? what evil hath he done? replied Candour.' Buck's Theological Dictionary, p. 124.

BIND. To bind and loose is a figurative expression, derived from carrying burdens, that is, confirming or removing a burden of the mind. It is taken in Scripture for condemning and absolving: 'I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven.' (Matt. xvi. 19.) Binding and loosing, in the language of the Jews, expressed permitting, or forbidding, or judicially declaring any thing to be permitted, or forbidden. In the promotion of their doctors, they put keys into their hands, with the following words: 'Receive the power of binding and loosing.' Hence the allusion, 'Ye have taken away the key of knowledge.' (Luke xi. 52.)

To bind is used for putting in bonds, and in prison. 'We are come to bind Samson,' (Judges xv. 10.); that is, 'to make him our prisoner.'

'To bind the law upon one's hand for a sign,' (Deut. vi. 8.) was probably meant figuratively, and implied an intimate acquaintance with its precepts; but the Jews understood it literally, and bound parts of the law upon their wrists. See PHYLACTERY. 'Bind my commandments upon thine heart, and tie them about thy neck.' (Prov. vi. 21.) 'Bind my commandments upon thy fingers, and write them upon the table of thy heart,' (Id. vii. 3.) 'Bind up the testimony, seal the law,' (Isa. viii. 16.) is to be understood in another sense. 'Seal what thou hast been writing, bind it about with thread or ribband, and set upon it thy seal; for closure and confirmation of its contents, and to witness thy confidence in its veracity, and thy expectation of its completion.'

It is said, that Daniel was the most learned of the magi, interpreters of dreams, &c. for showing, that is, explaining hard sentences, and dissolving doubts, or, as it is in the original, 'untying knots.' (Dan. v. 16.) 'Loosing things which were bound,' is used as expressing the explanation of things concealed. It appears, that superintendents of provinces are described in Persia, as untiers of knots; and as Daniel is thus described, he was, or had been, a superintendent. Perhaps, this may apply to the passage above quoted, (Matt. xvi. 19.) 'Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth,' &c. as regents, deputy-governors, delegates, superintendents, &c. in your respective provinces, shall be confirmed at court, in heaven. Fragments attached to Calmet's Dict. No. clxxiv. p. 175.

BIRDS. The general character of birds is, that they are feathered, two-legged, two-winged, have a hard bony bill, and that the females are oviparous. Their internal structure is wholly dissimilar to that of man. Formed chiefly to move or float in air, all their parts are wonderfully adapted to their destination. Light and sharp before, they cleave that fluid element with the greatest facility; and swelling gradually in the middle, they again terminate in expansive tails, which preserve the buoyancy and direction of the body, while the fore parts are cutting their way. Hence they have been compared to a vessel in the sea; the trunk of the animal's body answering to the hold, the head to the prow, the tail to the rudder, and the wings to the oars.

The external apparatus of birds is not less the object of just admiration, than their shape and figure. The position of their feathers, which tend backwards, and regularly lie over each other, produces warmth, celerity of motion, and security. Next to their skin is a soft down, to protect them from the cold; while the exterior plumage is arrayed in double beards, disposed and inserted in the most perfect and regular lines, such as no ingenuity of man can imitate. To secure them from the injury of violent attrition, or wet, birds are furnished with glands near the rump, distilling a kind of oil, which they occasionally press out with their bills, and spread over the ruffled feathers. This fluid, which is peculiar to the winged tribes, varies in quantity, according to their habits and necessities. Aquatic fowls possess it in the greatest abundance; and, though it improves their plumage, it communicates a rank flavour to the flesh, which renders some species disagreeable, and others wholly unfit for food. Linnaeus has divided birds into six orders; 1. Accipitres, or the rapacious kind, the beaks of which are hooked; 2. Picæ, or the pye kind, which have beaks in some degree resembling a wedge, and formed for cleaving; 3. Anseres, or the duck kind, which have smooth bills, covered with skin, and nervous at the points, serving as strainers to their food; 4. Grallæ, or the crane kind, which have bills formed for the purpose of searching and examining the bottom of pools; 5. Gallinæ, or the poultry kind, the bills of which are a little convex, for the purpose of gathering their food, and the upper beak projects over the lower; 6. Passeres, or the sparrow kind, which comprehend all the beautiful and vocal tribes of birds, and the bills of which resemble a forceps.

No particular characters are given in Scripture for distinguishing birds by classes, as clean or unclean; but a list of exceptions is tendered, and these are forbidden, without enumerating those, which are allowed. However, it will be found, on consideration, that those, which live on grain are not prohibited. As these are the domesticated kinds, we might almost express it in other words, that birds of prey generally are rejected; that is, such as have crooked beaks, and strong talons, whether they prey on lesser fowls or animals, or on fish; whilst those, which eat vegetables, are admitted as lawful. The number of birds prohibited in Scripture is twenty. For the sake of showing the correct natural order, in which Moses has placed them, we shall range them systematically; as it will prove that the system of Moses was the system of nature. Those also are distinguished, which are supposed to be correctly rendered:—

By tracing the order and distinctions of these birds, the reader will be able to judge of what nature they are, by that of their associates.

Birds were offered in sacrifice on many occasions: in the sacrifices for sin, he who had not a lamb or a kid, might offer two turtles, or two young pigeons; one for a sin-offering, the other for a burnt-offering. These he presented to the priest, who offered that first, which was for the sin-offering, and wrung off the head from the neck; but did not divide it asunder; the other he was to offer for a burnt-offering, according to the manner. (Levit. v. 7, 8, &c.) In another place, Moses relates more at length the manner of sacrificing fowls. The priest took that which was appointed for the burnt-offering, brought it unto the altar, wrung off its head, and burnt it on the altar; the blood of it he wrung out at the side of the altar. He plucked away his crop with his feathers, and cast it beside the altar, on the east part, by the place of the ashes; and he clave it with the wings thereof, but did not divide it asunder; and he burnt it on the altar, on the wood that was upon the fire. (Levit. i. 14, 15, 16.) Some interpreters insist, that the head of the bird was pulled off, (Id. ib. 15.); others that there was only an opening made with the larger fingernails, between the head and the throat, without entirely separating the head from the body. The text does not intimate what was done with the body, if it was separated. It is observed, that when Abraham offered birds for a burnt-offering, he did not divide them, but placed them entire upon the other victims. (Gen. xv. 10.) In other places, where Moses speaks of the sacrifice of birds, he does not command the head to be plucked off. (See Levit. v. 7, 8.) When a man, who had been smitten with a leprosy, was healed, he came to the entrance of the camp of Israel, and the priest went out to inspect him, whether he were entirely cured. (Levit. xiv. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7.) After this inspection, the leprous person came to the door of the tabernacle, and offered two living sparrows, or two pure birds, of which it was lawful to eat; he made a wisp with branches of cedar and hyssop, tied together with a thread, or scarlet ribbon; he filled an earthen pot with running water, that with it the blood of the bird might be mingled. Then the priest, dipping the bunch of hyssop and cedar into the water, sprinkled with it the leper, who was healed; and, afterwards, he let loose the living sparrow (or bird), to fly where it would.

In Palestine, dead bodies were sometimes left exposed to birds of prey, as appears from Scripture; but, generally, they were buried in the evening; and even criminals were taken down from the gallows.

Moses, to inspire the Israelites with humanity, orders, if they find a bird's nest, not to take the dam with the young, but to suffer the old one to fly away, and to take the young only; that, says he, 'it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days.' (Deut. xxii. 6, 7.)

The prophets often speak of birds of passage, the swallow, and the stork, which return to their habitation. God says that he will recall his captive people like a bird from a far country.

The Lord speaking of his people, says, 'Mine heritage is unto me as a speckled bird; the birds round about are against her; come ye, assemble all the beasts of the field, come to devour.' (Jer. xii. 9.) A speckled or striped bird, that is, unnaturally speckled or striped, as if having been dyed; for it is very conformable to the nature of birds, that such an appearance should draw together the neighbouring birds, as an owl does by day-light, and that they should molest, and often fatally injure the sufferer. Calmet, however, takes the idea directly contrary, and says, that a Chaldee word nearly related signifies to dip, or stain, as if the idea imported a bird stained, sprinkled with her own blood. The Hebrew may be translated, 'Is not mine heritage as a speckled bird? is it not with respect to me as a bird shut up (one of the most beautiful birds for a cage)? Yet, have I not given it to the beasts of prey?' Some translate the passage, 'Is not mine heritage become like an hyæna against me? Is not all mine heritage filled with wild beasts?' This is the translation of Bochart, and of the Septuagint. Bochart justly observes, that the original will bear the sense of a striped wild beast, or fierce hyæna. The Hebrew, עֵשׂ, oith, may signify simply 'the rusher,' or who rushes fiercely forward, and may apply either to bird, or wild beast. In confirmation of this rendering, it is remarked, that it agrees well with the foregoing verse, in which the heritage is compared to a yelling lion. May it not, however, be said, that the prophet having taken one metaphor from wild beasts, now selects another from birds? It is notorious, that an owl by day-light is followed and provoked by numbers, even of smaller birds. May not then this expression signify a bird streaked, wounded, and sprinkled with its own blood, surrounded by enemies, who, unable themselves completely to devour her, call on the beasts of the field to finish their purpose? Additions to Calmet; Scripture Illustrated, Expository Index, p. 53. 56, 57.

BIRTH-RIGHT, or PRIMOGENITURE, was the right of the first-born, or eldest son or child. To birth-right or primogeniture, many privileges were annexed by the Hebrews. The first-born was consecrated to the Lord, (Exod. xxii. 29.); possessed a double portion of the estate, (Deut. xxi. 17.); a dignity and authority over his brethren, (Gen. xlix. 3.); succeeded in the government of the family or kingdom, (2 Chron. xxi. 3.); and also as some think to the priesthood. These prerogatives were not confined to his person only, but descended to his latest posterity, if they conducted themselves in such a manner as to deserve them. Esau sold his birth-right to Jacob, (Gen. xxv. 29, &c.); and, therefore, Jacob had a right to the particular blessing of his dying parent, on account of the covenant, which God made with Abraham, that from his loins should come Jesus Christ. Reuben forfeited his birth-right, by his incest with his father's concubine. His tribe, therefore, continued always in obscurity; and the priesthood was conferred on Levi, the government on Judah, and the double portion on Joseph, to descend to their posterity. (Gen.

BISHOP, ἐπίσκοπος, signifies an overseer, or one who has the inspection and direction of any thing. Nehemiah speaks of the overseer of the Levites at Jerusalem. (Neh. xi. 22.) The most common acceptance of the word bishop, is that in Acts xx. 28, and in St. Paul's Epistles, (Philip. i. 1.) where it signifies the pastor of a church, with others under him. St. Peter calls Jesus Christ 'the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls,' (1 Pet. ii. 25.); and St. Paul describes the qualities requisite in a bishop. (1 Tim. iii. Tit. i. 5, 6, 7, &c.) It is not improbable, that the overseers of Christ's church are in the New Testament called ἐπίσκοποι, from the following passage in Isaiah: 'I will also make thy officers peace, and thine exactors (ἐπισκόπους, overseers) righteousness.' (Isaiah lx. 17.)

Besides two archbishops, there are in England twenty-four bishops, exclusive of the bishop of Sodor and Man. All of them, except the bishop of Man, are peers of the realm, and sit and vote in the house of lords. The bishops of London, Durham, and Winchester, take precedence of the other bishops, who rank after them according to the seniority of their consecration.

A bishop of England is also a baron in a three-fold manner, namely, feudal, with respect to the temporalities annexed to his bishoprick; by writ, as being summoned by writ to parliament; and by patent and creation. Accordingly he has the precedence of all other barons, and votes as baron and bishop. But though the peerage of bishops was never denied, yet it has been contested whether they have a right to vote in criminal matters. This right was disputed as early as the reign of Henry II.; and we find that by the decision of this controversy, archbishops, bishops, &c. as well as the rest of the barons, ought to be present at the judgment in the king's courts, till it came to diminution of members, or death. The reason given, why bishops should not be present in cases of blood, is that by this means they contract an irregularity. Yet Archbishop Cranmer, who was one of the privy-council to Edward VI. signed the warrant for the execution of Thomas Seymour, lord high admiral of England. At present, the bishops vote in the trial and arraignment of a peer; but, before sentence of death is passed, they withdraw, and vote by proxy.

The jurisdiction of a bishop in England consists in collating to benefices; granting institutions on the presentations of other patrons; commanding induction; taking care of the profits of vacant benefices, for the use of the successors; visiting his diocese once in three years; in suspending, depriving, degrading, and excommunicating; in granting administrations, and superintending the probate of wills. These parts of his function depend on the ecclesiastical law. By the common law, he is to certify the judges respecting legitimate and illegitimate births, and marriages; and to this jurisdiction, by the statute law, belongs the licensing of physicians, chirurgeons, and schoolmasters, and the uniting of small parishes. This last privilege is now peculiar to the Bishop of Norwich. The bishop's courts possess this privilege above the civil courts, that writs are issued from the former in the name of the bishop himself, and not in that of the king. The judge of the bishop's court is his chancellor, anciently called Ecclesiæ causidicus, the Church lawyer. Hurd on Religious Rites, &c. p. 631, 632; Parkhurst's Greek and English Lexicon.

BITHYNIA, Βιθυνία, signifies violent precipitation. Bithynia was a country bounded by the Euxine Sea on the north, by the river Parthenias on the east, by mount Olympus and the Rhyndacus on the south, and by the Bosphorus Thracius on the west. It is one of the countries, to whose inhabitants St. Peter addresses his first Epistle. (1 Pet. i. 1.) Since the times of the New Testament, it has been rendered famous for the first general council held at Nice, a city of Bithynia, against the Arians, by command of Constantine the Great; and for the fourth general council at Chalcedon, another city of Bithynia, against the Nestorians, by order of the emperor Marcellianus. Though Paul proposed to go into Bithynia, yet the Spirit did not suffer him. (Acts xvi. 7, 8.) Bithynia formerly contained several handsome cities, was watered by fertilizing streams, and abounded with most of the necessities of life. At present, its largest cities are either laid in ruins, or dwindled into contemptible villages; and the greatest part of its once fertile soil is totally destitute of cultivation. Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 254; Univ. Hist.

BITTERN, a bird of the heron kind, and distinguished from all others by its dismal hollow note, of which it is impossible to convey any adequate idea to such as have never heard it. This note is not unlike the uninterrupted bellowing of a bull, but more continued and hollow, and might be supposed to proceed from some formidable animal resident at the bottom of deep waters. The bird, however, that utters this terrific noise, which may be heard at the distance of a mile, is not so large as a heron. It has a short pendant crest of a black colour; and the plumage in general is of a pale dull yellow, spotted and barred with black. The bittern is a solitary bird: it conceals itself in the sedge by day, and begins its call before evening, booming six or eight times; and after a silence of some minutes, it renews its cries. It is chiefly heard from the commencement of spring till the end of autumn; and, however its sound may startle or alarm those, who are ignorant whence it proceeds, there is every reason to suppose it the call of courtship, or the expression of pleasure.

Isaiah, foretelling the destruction of Babylon, says, that the Lord will make it a possession for the bittern, (Isa. xiv. 23.); and Zephaniah, prophesying against Nineveh, says, that in it shall lodge the cormorant and the bittern. (Zeph. ii. 14.) Some interpreters, however, render the Hebrew word an owl, an ospray, a tortoise, a beaver; and Bochart supposes it to signify a hedge-hog. Scripture Illustrated.

BLASPHEMY. A man is guilty of blasphemy, when he speaks injuriously of God, or his attributes; when he ascribes to him such qualities as do not belong to him, or deprives him of those which do. The law of Moses sentenced blasphemers to death, (Lev. xxiv. 16.) Whoever heard another blaspheme, and witnessed his offence, laid his hand upon the criminal's head, to express that he was to bear the whole blame and punishment of his crime. The guilty person was led out of the city, and stoned.

It has been much controverted, what the blasphemy is against the Holy Ghost, which is pronounced to be unpardonable. (Matt. xii. 31.) Some have thought, that it was lapsing into idolatry; some denying Christ; some opposing the divinity of the Holy Ghost; and others, attributing the miraculous works of the Holy Ghost to the operations of the devil. If we consider, (says Mr. Broughton) the Scripture account of that sin, nothing can be plainer, than that it is to be understood of the Pharisees imputing the miracles, wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost, to the power of the devil. Our Lord had just healed one possessed of a devil; and the Pharisees said, 'This fellow doth not cast out devils but by Beelzebub, the prince of the devils.' The Pharisees, therefore, were the persons charged with this sin; and the sin itself consisted in ascribing to the agency of the devil that which was done by the power of God. The reason why our Lord pronounced this sin unpardonable, was, because the Jews, by opposing the evidence of miracles, resisted the strongest means of their conviction. The crime (says Wetstein) is that of men, who, though they see a miracle achieved by the power of the Holy Ghost, yet maliciously pronounce it to have been effected by the evil spirit, (Mark iii. 29. Heb. x. 29.) He who shall repent may now obtain pardon of all, even sins of the deepest dye, (Acts xiii. 38, 39.) except blasphemy of the Spirit. For he who rails against so many and great miracles, such as could not have been effected except by divine power, is incorrigible and cannot be reformed. For by what other method can he be brought to reason? He who blinks even at the solar ray, will have still less power of vision in the dark, or by the light of the moon, or by that of a candle. Having therefore rejected the last mode that can be resorted to for his cure, his disorder is irremediable. Some sins are punished in this world only, others only in the world to come. A sin, which is not remitted in the present, nor in the future state, is punished in both. He who believes not in Christ, either because he sees not his mighty works, or because he stumbles at the humility of his appearance, or because he is alienated by the authority of his teacher, is yet not past cure, and may, by the view, or the report of miracles, acknowledge his error. But he, who to contempt joins calumny, and knowingly and wilfully refers the miracles wrought before his own eyes to diabolical agency, is altogether incurable and cannot be reformed. This interpretation is confirmed by Chrysostom, Grotius, &c. and seems the most correct.

To speak irreverently of things sacred is to blaspheme; and this is a species of blasphemy, which is not very uncommon in the world, and is often held in high repute by those who wish to be accounted wits, and persons of superior discernment. Of all things, religion is the most essential to the well-being of man, and to the good of society. It is that which supplies morality with its sanctions, and without which no sense of moral obligation would long exist. It is that which operates where the terrors of human laws are ineffectual, in the shades of solitude, and in the secret chambers of the heart. Human laws may act as a preventive to crimes; but it is religion, or a thorough belief in a Being, infinite in wisdom, in power and goodness, which most effectually operates as a direct incentive to virtue. The inward intentions of man, when manifested in their consequences, are subject to civil punishment; but it is religion, which so powerfully favours the growth of good, and the exclusion of all bad intentions. To revile, therefore, what is so eminently useful, is to show a criminal indifference to the happiness of mankind. Even though any one, disregarding the strongest evidence, and slighting the most irrefragable testimony, should really disbelieve the truth of the Christian religion, it seems in him the height of cruelty to attempt to subvert in others a belief, which is so conducive to their comfort and the public good.

Some persons delight in speaking with levity on the most sacred subjects. Having, or feeling, no serious impressions themselves, they appear anxious to erase them from the minds of others. Hence, they often associate the most trifling, with the most serious subjects; images that are ludicrous, with others that are sacred. Thus they sever those pious associations of ideas, which previously existed in the mind, and which formed no inconsiderable barrier against vice. The hardest infidel cannot pretend to prove the impossibility of our future existence; and the consequent possibility of a state of retribution demonstrates the folly of the blasphemers and profane scoffer. If, indeed, there be no regions that lie beyond the grave, no future tribunal, to which we shall be summoned; if we are to lose our existence in death, and become as if we had never been; the religious and the wicked will be both alike, and they shall lie undistinguished, in equal insensibility. But if there shall be, as there certainly will be, another scene, in which we are to appear again, and live for ever; if there be a God, who will judge the world; if there will be a day when men shall rise again, and give an account of their works; how widely different will be their situation! Where then shall the blasphemer and the wicked appear? Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. p. 252—258.; Sermons by George Carr, Sermon iv.; Bishop Stillingfleet's Sermons; Bloomfield's Recensio Synoptica, vol. i. p. 160, 161; Broughton's Dictionary.

BLESS. BLESSING is an action referred first to God, and secondly to man. Without doubt, the inferior is blessed by the superior. When God blesses, he bestows that virtue, that power, which renders his blessing effectual. His blessings are either temporal or spiritual, bodily or mental; but in every thing they are productive of that which they import. On the contrary, the blessings of men are only good wishes, and, as it were, a peculiar kind of prayer to the Author of all good. God's blessings extend into the future life; but no gift of one man to another, as of a parent to his child, can exceed the limits of the present state.

Blessing was an act of thanksgiving to God for his mercies, or rather for that special mercy, which, at the time, occasioned the act of blessing.

Those predictions of the ancient patriarchs, which are usually called blessings, are much rather hints, suggestions, respecting the future character, disposition, or circumstances of those, to whom they referred. They were probably grounded, in some degree, on observations made respecting the temper and conduct of the party himself, who immediately received them. For instance, if Benjamin, the son of Jacob, was himself personally sharp, wolf-like, bold, predatory, his nature might be expected to descend in his posterity. But, often, the spirit of prophecy prompted the mind of the speaker (or writer, perhaps composer), to utter sentiments, which, in the event, were to be fulfilled strictly, literally, or verbally, yet in a manner different from what was most prominent on the mind of the speaker. When Jacob says of Simeon and Levi, 'I will disperse them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel,' he meant this dispersion by way of degradation and punishment, and it is not likely that he foresaw that one tribe should furnish men of letters, writers in the future kingdom of his descendants, and that the other should be invested with the priesthood, and by that means, both be allotted into various districts, and cities, throughout the land of Israel. However, the fact was so, and providence accomplished his prophecy, in dispersing and scattering these tribes, after a manner, which, in all probability, did not occur to the mind of the dying patriarch, when he uttered the prediction.

When Isaac foretold the different natures and properties of the countries, which should be possessed by Jacob, and by Esau, he did not confer on the persons of his sons any real possession: he merely divided to them, by prediction, the places of the future habitations of their posterity; and these places he described prophetically, and prophetically referred to the nations, rather than to the persons of Jacob and Esau.

Blessing is sometimes put for salvation; for consecration; for a promise of future good; for the reception of a good; for a gift or present; for praise; for alms; for adoration; for a man's blessing himself: in short, it implies, a felicity either expected, promised, or bestowed. In the Mosaic law, the manner of blessing is appointed by the lifting up of hands. Our Lord lifted up his hands, and blessed his disciples. It is probable, that this action was constantly used on this subject. The palm of the hand held up was precatory; and the palm turned outwards, or downwards, was benedictory. Additions to Calmet's Dictionary.

BLINDNESS is sometimes taken for a real privation of sight, and sometimes for dimness of sight. Thus, the blindness of the man in the Gospel, who was born blind, was real. The men of Sodom, who endeavoured in vain to find Lot's door, (Gen. xix. 11); and Paul, during the first three days that he was at Damascus, (Acts ix. 9.) lost the use of their sight only for a time. The Septuagint well represents the situation of the inhabitants of Sodom, by saying they were struck with an inability of seeing. Ignorance is a kind of blindness, frequently no less fatal, than a deprivation of sight; and partial, or defective information, is little better than ignorance. Moses says to Hobab, 'Leave us not, I pray thee; forasmuch as thou knowest how we ought to encamp in the wilderness, and thou mayest be to us instead of eyes.' (Numb. x. 31.)

Moses says, 'Thou shalt not put a stumbling-block before the blind.' (Levit. xix. 14.) This may be understood figuratively, as well as literally; as if Moses recommended, that charity and instruction should be shown to those, who want light and counsel, or to those who are in danger of going wrong, to instruct the ignorant, &c. Moses also says, 'Cursed be he who maketh the blind to wander out of the way.' (Deut. xxvii. 18.) This may be taken in the same manner.

The Jebusites, to insult David, who besieged Jerusalem, mocked him, saying, 'Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither.' (2 Sam. v. 6.) By this they seemed to signify, that they desired only the blind and the lame to defend their city; and, as if to render their insult greater, they had placed persons of this condition on the walls. Jerusalem, however, was taken, and David punished those blind and lame people, who had insulted him: 'He smote the lame and the blind that were hated of David's soul.' Job says, that he had been eyes to the blind, (xxix. 15.) had given good advice to those who needed it, that is, had taken pains to set those right, who, through want of light and understanding, had gone astray. In nearly the same sense, our Saviour says, that if the blind lead the blind, they shall both fall into the ditch. (Matt. xv. 14.) He designed to describe the presumption of the Pharisees, who, blind as they were in the ways of God, pretended to lead others. He tells them, that he came into the world, 'That they, who see not, might see; and that they, who see, might be made blind.' (John ix. 39, 40, 41.) The Pharisees, perceiving that this alluded to them, replied, 'Are we blind also?' He answered them, 'If ye were blind (naturally, or inevitably, or did you acknowledge your ignorance) ye should have no sin, but now ye say, we see, therefore your sin remaineth.'

A principal character of the Messiah predicted in the prophets, is, that by him the blind should be enlightened. (Isaiah xxix. 18.; xxxv. 5.; xlii. 16.) This, therefore, Jesus Christ proposed to the observation of John's disciples, who came from their master, to inquire whether he were the person they expected? 'Tell John,' says he, 'the blind see,' &c. (Matt. xi. 5.) The evangelists have preserved the memory of several miraculous cures wrought by our Saviour on the blind.

Blindness of heart in the obdurate Jews, is particularly noticed in the New Testament. (Mark iii. 5.) It was foretold by Isaiah: 'See ye indeed, but perceive not.' 'Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes.' (Isa. vi. 9, 10.) In the spirit of prophecy, Isaiah tells them, that they will be blind and obdurate, that they shall neither see, nor understand, what is designed for their salvation. It is generally understood, that the phrase, 'Make the heart of this people fat,' alludes to the effect of full feeding, and of sensual gratification of the appetite, by which a quantity of fat seats itself on the heart, where it increases till it overburdens that important source of activity. God gives, but the sinner abuses his gifts to the injury of both his body and mind. Perverting the goodness of God, and getting over-fat with food, and intoxicated with drink, they may be said to make their heart fat, and to shut their eyes. Fragments attached to Calmet's Dictionary, No. cxc. p. 188.

BLOOD, a red liquor, circulating through the arteries, veins, and other vessels of animal bodies, and serving for the support of life, and nourishment of all the parts. God from the beginning forbade the eating of blood alone, or mixed with flesh, that is, creatures suffocated, or killed without discharging their blood from them, because the life of the creature is in its blood. (Gen. ix. 4—6. Lev. xvii. 10—14. Deut. xii. 23—25.) Animal life so depends on blood, that without it no creature can live. Hence proceed several acceptations of the word blood: 1. It is taken for life. 'God will require the blood of man;' he will punish murder in what manner soever committed. 'His blood be upon us;' to us let them impute his death. 'The voice of Abel's blood crieth;' the murder committed on him crieth for vengeance. The avenger of blood is he, who is to avenge the murder of his relation. (Numb. xxxv. 24—27.) 2. Blood means relation. (John i. 13.) 3. Blood is taken for what commonly happens to women. (Lev. xx. 18.; xv. 24.; xii. 4.) 4. Flesh and blood are placed in opposition to sense and reason. 'Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven.' (Matt. xvi. 17.) 'Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God,' &c. (1 Cor. xv. 50.) 5. Wine is called the 'Pure blood of the grape;' (Deut. xxxii. 14.) and it is said, 'Judah shall wash his garment in the blood of grapes.' (Gen. xlix. 11.) 6. God established the priests to judge between leper and leper, between blood and blood; to determine, in criminal matters, whether the murder be casual or voluntary, and whether it deserves death or remission. 7. David said, he would not drink the blood of his heroes, who had exposed their lives to bring him water from the well of Bethlehem. (1 Chron. xi. 19.); that is, he would not drink that water which had so nearly cost them their lives. 8. God reserved to himself the blood of all sacrifices, as being absolute master of life and death. The blood of animals was poured upon his altar, or at the foot of his altar, according to the nature of the sacrifice; and if the temple was too remote, it was poured on the ground, and covered with dust. This blood of the sacrifices, in the Old Testament, was figurative of that blood, which Jesus Christ shed for us, for the forgiveness of sins. 9. Zipporah, when she had circumcised her son, called her husband, Moses, a husband of blood, (Exod. iv. 25, 26.) because he was the cause of the effusion of his son's blood.

The word blood is also used in various other significations: 'To build a town with blood;' (Hab. ii. 12.) that is, with oppression, and the blood of the unhappy. 'To wash one's feet in blood;' (Ps. lviii. 10.) that is, to obtain a signal and bloody victory. 'The moon shall be changed into blood' (Joel ii. 31.); that is, it shall appear red like blood. 'I said unto thee, even when thou wast in thy blood, live' (Ezek. xvi. 6.); that is, I saw thee polluted with the blood of thy birth, and, notwithstanding this impurity, I gave thee life. 'I will visit the blood of Jezreel;' that is, I will avenge the blood which Jezebel hath there shed. 'His blood crieth from the ground;' 'The land is drunken with blood;' 'Blood is in any one's hands, upon any one's head,' &c.; are expressions better understood by their own particular energy, than by any comments.

The blood of Jesus Christ is the price of our salvation; his blood has purchased his church. (Acts xx. 28.) 'We are justified by his blood.' (Rom. v. 9.) 'We have redemption through his blood.' (Eph. i. 7. Colos. i. 14.) By his blood he hath pacified all things in heaven and earth. (Colos. i. 20.) 'By his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us.' (Heb. ix. 12.)

BOANER'GES, sons of thunder. It was a name given by our Saviour to the sons of Zebedee, James and John, (Mark iii. 17.) on the occasion, probably, of their request, that he would call fire from heaven, and destroy a certain village of the Samaritans, which had refused to entertain them. (Luke ix. 53, 54.) Boanerges is neither Hebrew nor Syriac. Some think, that the Greek transcribers, instead of Bane-regem, son of thunder, or Bane-reges, son of tempest, wrote Boanerges; or that it was a corrupt way of pronouncing Bane-reges, used by the Galileans.

BO'AZ בּוֹאֵז, signifies in strength, or in the goat. Boaz was the son of Salmon and Rahab. Salmon of the tribe of Judah, married Rahab, a Canaanitess of Jericho, who bare to him Boaz, one of our Saviour's ancestors according to the flesh. Some say, there were three of this name, the son, grandson, and great-grandson, of Salmon; the last Boaz was husband of Ruth, and father of Obed. They pretend that the Scripture cannot be rendered reconcileable with itself any other way, since it reckons 366 years between Salmon's marriage and the birth of David, and yet mentions only three persons between Salmon and David, namely, Boaz, Obed, and Jesse. But Le Clerc observes, that this cannot be the case, since neither the genealogy of David, (1 Chron. ii. 11, 12.)

nor that of Jesus Christ, (Matt. i. 5.) reckons any more. Besides, if any name was omitted in this genealogy, it must have been so omitted before the time of the writer of the Chronicles, when the Jews were in captivity, as it is improbable but that, while the kingdom of Judah continued, an accurate genealogical table of the princes was preserved. Calmet remarks, that though it be difficult to fill so great a space with four persons, from father to son, succeeding one another, and though it be uncommon to see four persons in the same family successively living very long, and having children when far advanced in age, yet there is nothing in it absolutely impossible, particularly at that time, in which many persons lived above a hundred years. We may suppose that Salmon, at the age of 120, might beget Boaz; that Boaz, at a hundred, might beget Obed, who, at something more or less, might have Jesse; and that Jesse, when a hundred years old might have David. This, indeed, is only supposition; but it shows, that there is no contradiction or impossibility in the Scripture account.

The Targum on Ruth says, that Salmon is styled Salmon the Just. His works and the works of his children were very excellent. Boaz was a righteous person, by whose righteousness the people of Israel were delivered from the hands of their enemies, &c. It is, therefore, thought, that God might vouchsafe to men of such extraordinary piety a longer life than common. There were only 366 years from the first of Joshua to the birth of David; for from the Exodus to the building of the temple were 480 years. If we add to 366 the forty years' wandering in the wilderness, the life of David seventy years, and four years of Solomon, the total will be 480 years. Salmon might beget Boaz when he was ninety-six years old; Boaz, at ninety years old, Obed; Obed, at ninety, Jesse; and Jesse, at eighty-five, David. Vide Whitby on Matt. i. 1.

BOAZ, the name of one of those two brazen pillars erected by Solomon in the porch of the temple. (1 Kings vii. 21.) Boaz was on the left hand of the entrance and the other called Jachin on the right. בּוֹאֵז Boaz signifies strength, firmness. Together they were thirty-five cubits high, (2 Chron. iii. 15.); that is, each was separately seventeen cubits and a-half. In other parts of Scripture, each is said to be eighteen cubits, in round numbers, (1 Kings vii. 15. Jerem. lii. 21.) Jeremiah says, that the thickness of these columns was four fingers, for they were hollow; that the circumference of them was twelve cubits, or four cubits in diameter; and that the chapter of each was in all five cubits high. (Jerem. lii. 21. 1 Kings vii. 16.) In different parts of Scripture, these cha-piters are said to be of different heights, of three, four, or five cubits; because they were composed of different ornaments, or members, which were sometimes considered as omitted, and sometimes as included. The body of the chapter was of three cubits; the ornaments, with which it was joined to the shaft of the pillar, were of one cubit; and the row, which was at the top of the chapter, was also of one cubit. These make in all five cubits. From the different accounts in Scripture of the height of these pillars, some have thought that there were two different cubits. See CUBIT.

Mr. Hutchinson has attempted to show, that upon these columns was represented the system of this world, which he insists was given in writing by God to David, and by David to Solomon, and wrought upon the pillars by Hiram. Hutchinson's Works, vol. xi.

BODY. An assembly or community is called a body. 'We being many are one bread, and one body.' (1 Cor. x. 17.) James says, (iii. 6.) that the tongue pollutes the whole body, or influences the other members of the body. Our Saviour says, 'If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light,' (Matt. vi. 22.); if thy intentions are upright, thy general conduct will be agreeable to that character; or, if 'thine eye be single,' if thou art liberal and beneficent, all thy actions will be good; at least, thou wilt avoid many sins, which attend avarice.

St. Paul speaks of a spiritual, in opposition to the natural body, (1 Cor. xv. 44.) The body which we animate, and which returns to the earth, is an animal body; but that which will rise hereafter, will be spiritual, neither gross, heavy, frail, &c. nor subject to the wants, which oppress the present body.

Body is opposed to shadow or figure: 'A shadow of things to come, but the body is of Christ.' (Colos. ii. 17.) The ceremonies of the law, the sacred festivals, &c. are figures and shadows realized in Christ and the Christian religion. For instance, the Jewish passover is a figure of the Christian passover; the sacrifice of the paschal lamb, a shadow of the sacrifice of Christ. In Jesus Christ, the fulness of the Godhead resides bodily. 'For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily,' (Colos. ii. 9.); that is, really and essentially, and not allegorically, figuratively, and cursorily. The 'body of death,' signifies either our mortal body, or the body, which violently engages us in sin by concupiscence, and which domineers in our members.

BOGOMILES, a sect of heretics, which arose about the year 1179. Their founder was Basilus, a monk, who was burnt at Constantinople, in the reign of Alexius Comnenus. He maintained that the world and all animal bodies were formed not by the Deity, but by an evil demon, who had been cast down from heaven by the Supreme Being. Hence he concluded, that the body was only the prison of the immortal spirit, and that it was to be enervated by fasting, contemplation, and other exercises, that the soul might be gradually restored to its primitive liberty. For this purpose, marriage was to be avoided. Basilus also denied the reality of Christ's body, which he considered only as a phantom, rejected the law of Moses, and maintained that the body, on its separation by death, returned to the malignant mass of matter, without either the prospect or possibility of a future resurrection to life and felicity. The name of this sect was derived from the divine mercy, which its members are said to have incessantly implored. Mosheim, vol. ii. p. 441.

BOHEMIAN BRETHREN, a sect of Christian reformers, which arose in Bohemia, in the year 1467. They considered the pope as antichrist, and the church of Rome as the whore mentioned in the book of Revelations. They rejected the sacraments of the Romish church, and chose laymen for their ministers. They held the Scriptures as the only rule of faith, and rejected the popish ceremonies in the celebration of the mass. They used no other prayer than the Lord's prayer. They consecrated leavened bread. They allowed adoration only to Jesus Christ in the communion. They re-baptized all those who joined themselves to their congregation. They abhorred the worship of saints and images, prayers for the dead, celibacies, vows, and fasts; and they observed only the festivals of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide.

In 1504, they were accused by the Catholics to King Ladislaus II. who published against them an edict, in which he forbade them to hold any public or private meetings. When Luther declared himself against the church of Rome, the Bohemian Brethren endeavoured to join his party.—At first, that reformer showed an aversion to them; but the Bohemians sending their deputies to him in 1522, with a full account of their tenets, he acknowledged them to be a society of Christians, whose doctrine approached nearest to the purity of the Gospel. In 1535, this sect published another confession of faith, and renounced anabaptism, which they at first practised. On this, a union was concluded with the Lutherans, and afterwards with the Zuinglians, whose opinions after that they continued to follow. Mosheim, vol. iv. p. 102.

BONNET, a covering for the head, worn by the Jewish priests, (Exod. xxviii. 40.) The Hebrew word מצנפת misnepheth, which is translated mitre, and מִבְּעִיר mygbaath, translated bonnet, are said by the Rabbins to be the same. According to them, the bonnet generally used by the priests was made of a piece of linen cloth, which was sixteen yards in length, and which covered their heads like a helmet or turban, and they allow no other difference between the high priest's bonnet and that of the other priests, than that the former is flatter, and made in the form of a turban, whilst the latter rises more into a point. Josephus says, that the bonnet worn by private priests was composed of many folds of linen cloth sewed together, in the form of a thick woven crown of linen. The whole was covered with a piece of linen cloth, which descended to the forehead, that the seams might be concealed. He also says, that the high-priest's bonnet was the same, except that another piece of cloth of a violet colour covered the back part of the head, and the temples, and was encompassed with a triple crown of gold, in which were small buttons of henbane flowers. This circle of flowers was interrupted in the forepart of the tiara by the plate of gold, upon which the name of God was engraven.

BOOK, a writing composed on some subject of knowledge, for the instruction or amusement of the reader. With respect to the origin of books, we have nothing certain. The books of Moses are doubtless the oldest that are extant; but there were other books besides those of Moses, who cites several.

Several sorts of materials were anciently used in making books. Plates of lead or copper, barks of trees, bricks, stone, and wood, were originally employed for engraving such things and monuments upon, as men desired to transmit to posterity. Josephus speaks of two columns, one of stone, the other of brick, upon which the children of Seth wrote their inventions and astronomical discoveries. Hesiod's works were at first written on tablets of lead. God's laws were written on stone; and Solon's laws, on wooden planks. Tablets of wood, box, and ivory, were common among the ancients.

Afterwards, instead of wooden planks, the ancients used the leaves of the palm-tree; and the finest and thinnest bark of trees, such as the lime, the ash, the maple, the elm. Hence the word liber, which signifies the inner bark of trees, denotes also a book. As these barks were rolled up, the more easily to be carried about, these rolls were called volumen, a volume; a name given also to rolls of paper or parchments.

Paper, papyrus, is a kind of reed, which grows in the Nile. The trunk of this plant is composed of several coatings, which lie on each other, and are taken off with a needle. They are afterwards spread on a table, of which so much is moistened as is equal to the intended size of the papyrus. This first bed of leaves is covered with a layer of fine paste, or with the muddy water of the Nile warmed; then a second bed of paper leaves is laid upon this paste, and the whole is left to dry in the sun. Such was the Egyptian papyrus, from which our paper derives its name, though very different in its composition. Varro observes, and Pliny from him, that the use of writing on the papyrus was first discovered in Egypt, at the time Alexander built Alexandria. The kings of Egypt having collected a great library at Alexandria, the kings of Pergamus proposed to imitate their example; but the Egyptian monarchs, either from envy, or some other reason, prohibited the exportation of paper out of their dominions. This obliged the kings of Pergamus to invent, or rather to improve, the manufacture of parchment, thence called pergamenum, or membrana, because made of the skins, with which beasts and their members are covered. Of these leaves of vellum or parchment, two sorts of books were made. One sort was rolls, composed of many leaves of vellum, sewed or glewed together at the end. These books were written on one side only, and they were unrolled before they could be read. The other sort were like our books at present, and were composed of many leaves fastened to each other; were written on both sides; and opened like our books. The Jews still use rolls in their synagogues.

The ancients wrote also on linen. Pliny says, that the Parthians, even in his time, wrote on their clothes; and Livy speaks of certain books made of linen, on which the names of magistrates, and the history of the Roman commonwealth, were written.

The paper used at present is made of worn-out rags beaten small, and reduced to a pulp. With the origin of it we are not acquainted. We see no book written on this paper which is above five hundred years old; and, perhaps, the most ancient author, who mentions it, is Peter the Venerable. Montfaucon has also treated of cotton paper, which he shows to have been used above six hundred years ago. The origin of this paper is not very well known; but it is certainly of cotton, and has been commonly used since the tenth century. Dr. Prideaux says, that this invention seems to have been brought into Europe from the East. Most of the old manuscripts in Arabic and other Oriental languages, which are thence received, are written on this kind of paper; and some of them are certainly much more ancient than the times mentioned respecting this matter. However, we often find them written on paper made from a paste of silk as well as of linen. It is most likely, that the Saracens of Spain first brought it from the East into that country, whence it might be carried into Germany. Prid. Connect. part i. book vii.

Book of Life, Book of the Living, or Book of the Lord. Calmet thinks it probable, that these descriptive phrases, which are frequent in Scripture, are derived from the custom observed generally in the courts of princes, of keeping a list of persons in their service, of the provinces, which they govern, of the officers of their armies, of the number of their troops, and sometimes even of the names of their soldiers. Thus, when Moses desires God rather to blot him out of his book, than to reject Israel, it is almost the same as St. Paul's expression, in some sort to be accursed, (Rom. ix. 3.) separated from the company of the saints, and struck out of the Book of the Lord, to procure the salvation of his people. See ANATHEMA. Neither Moses, nor St. Paul, could wish to go to eternal perdition, to save their countrymen; but the expression means, that they were ready to lay down their lives for their brethren. Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Exod. xxxii. 32.

When it is said, that any one is written in the Book of Life, it means that he particularly belongs to God, is enrolled among the number of his friends and servants. When it is said, 'blotted out of the Book of Life,' it signifies erased from the list of God's friends and servants, as those guilty of treachery are struck off the roll of officers belonging to a prince. The same is also the opinion of Le Clerc on this subject. In a more exalted sense, the Book of Life signifies the register of those, who, through grace, have persevered to eternal life.

Book of Judgment. Daniel speaking of God's judgment, says, 'the judgment was set, and the books were opened.' (Dan. vii. 10.) This is an allusion to what is practised, when a prince calls his servants to account. The accounts are produced, and examined. It is possible he might allude also to a custom of the Persians, among whom it was a constant practice every day to write down what had happened, the services rendered to the king, and the rewards given to those, who had performed them. Of this we see an instance in the history of Ahasuerus and Mordecai. (Esth. ii. 23. vi. 2.) When, therefore, the king sits in judgment, the books are opened: he obliges all his servants to reckon with him; he punishes those, who have failed in their duty; he compels those to pay who are indebted to him; and he rewards those, who have done him services. A similar proceeding will take place at the day of God's final judgment.

Book is sometimes put for letters, memoirs, an edict, or contract. In short, the word book, in Hebrew, sepher, is much more extensive than the Latin liber. The letters, which Rabshakeh delivered from Sennacherib to Hezekiah, are called a book. The English translation, indeed, reads letter, but the Septuagint reads βιβλίον, and the Hebrew text הספריים, hese-pherim. The contract, confirmed by Jeremiah for the purchase of a field, is called by the same name (Jer. xxxii. 12.); and the edict of Ahasuerus in favour of the Jews, (Esth. ix. 20.) though our translators have called it letters. Job wishes, that his judge or his adversary would himself write his sentence, his book. (Job xxxi. 35.) The writing, which a man gave to his wife when he divorced her, was denominated, in Hebrew, a book of divorce. (Deut. xxiv.)

The book sealed, mentioned by Isaiah, (xxix. 11.) and the book sealed with seven seals in the Revelations, (v. 1, 2, 3.) are the prophecies of Isaiah and of John, and were written in a book or roll, after the manner of the ancients. They were sealed, that is, were unknown, enigmatical, obscure, mysterious; they had respect to times remote, and future events, and therefore no knowledge could be derived from them, till after that which was foretold should happen, and the seals were taken off. In old times, letters, and other writings that were to be sealed, were first wrapped round with thread or flax, and then the seal was applied. To read them, it was necessary to cut the thread or flax, and to break the seals.

The Book, or flying roll, spoken of in Zechariah, (v. 1, 2.) as being twenty cubits long and ten wide, was one of those old rolls, composed of many skins or parchments, and glued or sewed together at the end. Though some of these rolls were very long, yet, probably, none was ever so large as this. It contained the curses and calamities which should befall the Jews; and its extreme length and breadth show the excessive enormity of their sins, and the extent of their punishment.

We read of the book of the generations of Adam, (Gen. v. 1.) of Noah, and of Jesus Christ; that is, the history of the life of Adam, of Noah, and of Jesus Christ. Isaiah, describing the effects of God's wrath, says, 'The heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll.' (Isaiah xxxiv. 4.) He alludes to the ancient manner of rolling up books, when they were intended to be closed. A volume of several feet in length was suddenly rolled up into a very small compass. Thus, the heavens should shrink into themselves, and disappear, as it were, from the eyes of God, when his wrath should be kindled. This is a figurative and very energetic manner of speaking.

We read, 'In the volume of the book it is written of me, I delight to do thy will, O my God.' (Psalm xl. 7.) St. Paul has left no room to doubt the sense of this passage, since he applies it to the incarnation of Jesus Christ.

Books eaten. It has been said, that other nations had their learning in their books, but the Tartars HAD EATEN THEIR BOOKS, and had their wisdom in their breasts, whence they could draw it out as they had occasion, as divine oracles. This may lead us to the true idea of the prophets, &c. when they mention the eating of Books presented to them. The phrase imports, that the knowledge they had received should be communicated to others, from time to time, as wanted: they were treasures of wisdom and knowledge, not for themselves, but for others. Additions to Calmet's Dict.; Busbequius's Trav.

BOOTY, spoils taken in war. Moses appointed in the law, that booty taken from the enemy, should be divided equally between those, who were in the battle, and the rest of the people, (Numb. xxxi. 27.); that is, that the whole booty should be divided into two parts, of which the first, was for those, who had been in the action, and the other for the people, who continued in the camp. The law further requires, that out of that part of the spoils, which was assigned to the fighting men, the Lord's share should be separated; and that for every five hundred men, oxen, asses, sheep, &c. one was to be taken for the high-priest, as being the Lord's first-fruits. With respect to the other moiety, belonging to the children of Israel, who did not fight, out of every fifty men, oxen, asses, sheep, or other animals, they were to give one to the Levites, who had the charge of the tabernacle of the Lord.

The Rabbins pretend, that under the kings of Israel, another rule was followed in distributing the spoil. First, to the king was given every thing which belonged to the conquered king; his tent, his slaves, his cattle, his spoils, his treasure. After this, the remainder of the booty was divided into two equal parts, of which, the king had one moiety, and the soldiers the other. This last part was distributed equally between the soldiers, who had been in the action, and those, who continued behind to guard the camp. They assert that these rules had been established ever since the time of Abraham. It is difficult, indeed, to prove it; but we know that Abraham offered to the Lord the tenth of what he had taken from the five kings, and presented this tithe to Melchizedek. (Gen. xiv. 20.)

BORRELLISTS, a Christian sect in Holland, which derive their name from their founder, Borrel, a man of great learning in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin tongues. They are a sort of Anabaptists, but entertain some very singular opinions. They reject the use of churches, of the sacraments, public prayer, and all other external acts of worship. They assert, that all Christian churches in the world have degenerated from the pure apostolic doctrines, because they have suffered the word of God, which is infallible, to be expounded, or rather corrupted, by doctors who are fallible. They lead a very austere life, and employ a great part of their goods in alms. Broughton's Hist. Dict. vol. i. p. 170.

BOSOM. The wife of thy bosom, or she who rests in thy bosom, is an expression frequently used in Scripture, and signifies a lawful wife. Lazarus was carried into Abraham's bosom, (Luke xvi. 22, 23.) as a favorite child is received into the arms and bosom of his father. St. John, describing the perfect union of Jesus Christ with God, tells us, that the Son of God is in the bosom of the Father. (John i. 18.) The beloved apostle reclined his head on our Saviour's bosom, at the last supper of Jesus with his apostles. (John xiii. 23.)

BOTTLE, a keg made of goat's skin, with the hair on the inside, well pitched and sewed together, and used for preserving oil and other liquors. The mouth of such a bottle is through one of the animal's paws. Bottles are frequently mentioned in Scripture. When Abraham dismissed Hagar, he gave her and her son bread, and water in a bottle, for their journey. (Gen. xxi. 14, 15.) It has been observed, that, in this passage, the Hebrew word chemet, signifies rather an earthen pitcher, which it appears was used for carrying water, (Mark xiv. 13. Luke xxii. 10.) and also for drinking. (Hab. ii. 15.) If, however, as some think, this prophecy referred to the king of Egypt, it was perhaps, in particular, an Egyptian kind of vessel. The Gibeonites, the more effectually to deceive Joshua, and the elders of Israel, showed them their old bottles, and told them, they had brought them new from home, hoping by that means to convince them, that they came from a remote country.

The bottle of wine, which Samuel's mother brought to Eli (1 Sam. i. 24.) is called nebel, and was also rather an earthen jar or jug, but yet sufficiently distinct from that of Egypt, and not a skin bottle.

A very different name is used to signify the vessel, out of which Jael gave milk to Sisera: she opened a bottle of milk, and gave him drink. (Judg. iv. 19.) This is called naud, which refers to something supple, moist, oozing, or perhaps, imports moistened into pliancy, as that skin must be, which is kept constantly filled with milk. This kind is usually made of goat skins. This word is also used to denote the bottle, in which Jesse sent wine by David to Saul. (1 Sam. xvi. 20.) It is likewise employed to express that bottle, into which the Psalmist desires his tears may be collected, (Psalm lvi. 8.); and that to which he resembles himself, and which he calls a bottle in the smoke, (Psalm cxix. 83.) that is, a bottle, dried, blackened, shrivelled. This then may be considered as equivalent to 'The shepherd's bottle,' or 'The tent bottle.'

Besides the words already considered, another (אבוי aabut), in the plural, is used. (Job xxxii. ; 19.) Aub signifies, in general, to swell, or distend. On receiving the liquor poured into it, a skin bottle must be greatly swelled, and distended; and it must be swelled still farther by the fermentation of the liquor within it, as that advances to ripeness. In this state, if no vent be given to the liquor, it may overpower the strength of the bottle; or it may penetrate by some secret crevice, or weaker part. Hence arises the propriety of putting new wine into new bottles, which, being strong, may resist the expansion, the internal pressure of their contents, and preserve the wine to due maturity; while old bottles may, without danger, contain old wine, whose fermentation is already past. (Matt. ix. 17. Luke v. 38.) It is thought, that aub or ob is the larger kind of bottle made of skin.

Bottles of skins, therefore, are proportioned to the size of the animal which yields them; kid skins, goat skins, ox skins. Perhaps the two former are expressed by the word naud, and the latter is denoted by aub. Fragments attached to Calmet's Dict. No. lviii. p. 105—107.

BOURIGNONISTS, the followers of Antoinette Bourignon, a lady in France, who pretended to particular inspirations. She was born at Lisle, in 1616. At her birth she was so deformed, that it was debated some days in the family whether it was not proper to stifle her as a monster; but her deformity diminishing she was spared, and afterwards obtained such a degree of beauty, that she had her admirers. From her childhood to her old age, she possessed an extraordinary turn of mind. She pretended to be divinely inspired, and set apart, by a particular interposition of Heaven, to revive the true spirit of Christianity, which had been extinguished by theological animosities and dissensions. This female enthusiast, whose religious feelings were accompanied with an unparalleled vivacity and ardour, and whose fancy was very exuberant, joined to these qualities, a volubility of tongue, much adapted to seduce the unwary. Furnished with these talents, she began to propagate her theological system; and her enthusiastical notions spread through Flanders, Holland, and some parts of Germany. It was not only the ignorant multitude that believed her visionary doctrines; but several learned and ingenious men were persuaded of their truth, and caught the contagion of her fanaticism. After experiencing various turns of fortune, and suffering great vexation, on account of her religious opinions, she died at Franeker, in the province of Friesland, in the year 1680. Her writings were voluminous; but it would be impossible to draw from them an accurate and consistent scheme of religion. The greatest part of her effusions were borrowed from the productions of the Mystics; and by the intemperance of her imagination, she has given an additional air of extravagance and absurdity to the tenets derived from these enthusiasts. Her predominant principle was, that the Christian religion consists neither in knowledge, nor in practice, but in a certain internal feeling, or divine impulse, which arises immediately from communion with the Deity. Among many extravagant notions, she asserted, that Adam, before the fall, possessed the principles of both sexes; that in an ecstasy God represented Adam to her mind in his original state; that she also beheld the beauty of the first world, and the manner, in which it had been formed from the chaos. Dufresnoy's Chron. Tables, vol. ii. p. 253; Mosheim, vol. v. p. 64; Light of the World, p. 27—430.

BOW, a weapon of war well known. Among the Israelites were many very expert archers. When the Scriptures mention bending the bow, to tread under foot is generally added; because it was their custom to put their feet upon the bow to bend it. David thanks God for giving him the strength of a brazen bow in his arms. (Ps. xviii. 34.) The bows of the Hebrews were commonly of wood. When they designed to signify, that God would destroy the power of any people, they said, God will break their bow. (Hosea i. 5.) A deceitful bow, (Id. vii. 16.) denotes one that is not well strung, or does not carry straight to the mark.

It is conjectured, that additional strength was procured to the bow by composition in the time of David, and still more anciently in the days of Job; and hence it has been thought, that this conjecture might be also applied to Jacob's description of his son Joseph: 'But his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob.' (Gen. xlix. 24.) Perhaps this passage may be thus paraphrased: But his bow remained, continued in, retained, its strength, its elasticity, and fitness for action, its spring, and the arms of its hands, or its handles, were strengthened by the power of the mighty God of Jacob. Fragments attached to Calmet's Dict. No. ccxxi.

BOWELS. The bowels are the seat of mercy, tenderness, and compassion. Joseph's bowels were moved at the sight of his brother Benjamin; he felt himself softened and affected. The true mother of the child, which Solomon commanded to be divided, felt her bowels move, and consented that it should be given to the woman, who was not its real mother. (1 Kings

iii. 26.) St. Paul reproaches, as it were, the Corinthians in a friendly manner: 'Ye are not straitened in us, but ye are straitened in your own bowels.' (2 Cor. vi. 12.)

The Hebrews also sometimes place wisdom and understanding in the bowels. 'Who hath put wisdom in the inner parts?' (Job xxxviii. 36.) The Psalmist says, 'Thy law is in the midst of my bowels,' (Psalm xl. 8.) or within my heart.

BOYLE'S LECTURES, a course of eight sermons, preached annually in defence of natural and revealed religion, and instituted by the Honourable Robert Boyle. By a codicil annexed to his will, in 1691, Mr. Boyle expressed it to be his design that these sermons should be preached to prove the truth of the Christian religion against infidels, without descending to any controversies among Christians, and to answer new difficulties, scruples, &c. For the support of this lecture, he assigned the rent of his house in Crooked Lane to some learned divine within the bills of mortality, to be elected for a term, not exceeding three years. But the fund proving precarious, the salary was ill paid; to remedy this inconvenience, archbishop Tension procured a yearly stipend of 50*l.* for ever, to be paid quarterly, charged on a farm in the parish of Brill, in the county of Bucks. The discourses, which have been delivered, in consequence of this admirable institution, have been always published; and they form, at this day, a large and important collection, which is known throughout Europe, and has rendered eminent service to the cause of religion and virtue. Buck's Theol. Dict. p. 133.

BRANCH, a name sometimes applied by the prophets to the Messiah. 'Behold the man, whose name is the Branch.' (Zech. vi. 12.) 'Behold I will bring forth my servant, the Branch.' (Id. iii. 8.) The Messiah is also called by this name in Isaiah, (iv. 2.) and Jeremiah, (xxiii. 5.; xxxiii. 15.) as being a branch of the house of David, and as a prophecy of his miraculous birth of a virgin.

BREAD, in Scripture, is taken for food in general. 'In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread.' (Gen. iii. 19.) 'I will fetch a morsel of bread,' (Gen. xviii. 5.) says Abraham. 'If God will give me bread to eat,' (Gen. xxviii. 20.) said Jacob at Bethel. 'Call him that he may eat bread,' (Exod. ii. 20.) that is, invite him to come and eat with us. Manna is denominated bread from heaven. (Exod. xvi. 15.)

The ancient Hebrews had several ways of baking bread. They often baked it under the ashes. Abraham served the three angels, whom he received into his tent, with cakes baked on the hearth. (Gen. xviii. 6.) The Hebrew huggoth signifies loaves, or little cakes, much like our muff-ins, or crumpets, or other broad thin cakes, which are baked under the ashes, or upon round copper-plates, or in pans, or stoves made on purpose. The Hebrews, at their departure out of Egypt, baked some of these unleavened loaves for their journey. (Exod. xii. 39.) Elijah, when he fled from Jezebel, found at his head a cruse of water, and a cake, which had been baked on the coals. (1 Kings xix. 6.) The same Elijah desired the widow of Zarephath to make for him a cake. (1 Kings xvii. 13.)

The Arabians and other eastern people, among whom wood is scarce, often bake their bread between two fires made of cow-dung, which burns slowly, and bakes the bread very leisurely. The crumb of it is very good, if it be eaten the same day; but the crust is black, and burnt, and smells of the fuel with which it is baked. Le Bruyn says, that in Persia they use turf made of camel's dung, cow dung, sheep's dung, horse dung, and ass dung, and that even human dung is applied in the same way. He observes, that this turf is used more particularly for heating ovens, in which they bake most of their meats. This explains a passage in Ezekiel, (iv. 9, 10, 12, 15.) which is extremely shocking to the generality of readers. The Lord commands this prophet to take wheat, barley, beans, lentils, millet, and fitches, and put them in one vessel, and of them to make a loaf, and to bake it with human excrements in the sight of all the people. The prophet expressing extreme reluctance to this, God permitted him to bake it with cow dung, instead of human dung. We are not to imagine, that God intended that the prophet should eat man's dung; but he only enjoined him to bake his bread with such excrements, although he afterwards permitted him to bake it with cow dung.

The Hebrews, and other eastern people, have at this day a kind of oven, called taanour, which is like a large pitcher, of grey stone, open at the top, and in which they make a fire. When it is well heated, they mingle flour in water. This paste they apply to the outside of the pitcher; it is baked in an instant, and being dried, is taken off in thin fine pieces like our wafers.

The orientals believe, that Eve's oven was of this kind, that it was left to Noah, and that the boiling water which ran over from it occasioned the deluge. This is a strange extravagance, but it may be metaphorical of the extensive spread and effects of her sin.

A third sort of bread, used by the people of the East, is baked in a great pitcher half full of certain little flints, which are white and glistening, and on which they cast the paste in the form of little flat cakes. This bread is white, and smells well, but is good only for the day on which it is baked, unless it be mingled with leaven to preserve it. This is the most common way in Palestine.

Moses enjoined the Israelites on their arrival in the promised land, to offer up a cake of the first of their dough, for a heave offering in their generations. These first-fruits of bread, or dough, were given to the priest, or Levite, who dwelt in the place where the bread was baked; and if no priest or Levite dwelt there, that part of the dough designed for the Lord, or his minister, was thrown into the fire or the oven. The quantity of bread to be given for first-fruits was not fixed by the law; but Jerom says, that custom and tradition had determined it to be between at most the fortieth part of the whole mass, and at least the sixtieth part of the mass. Philo remarks, that, whenever they kneaded, something was set apart for the priest, but how much he does not say.

Leo of Modena tells us, that the modern custom of the Jews is, when the bread is kneaded, and a piece of dough formed of the size of forty eggs, to take from it a small part, of which a cake is made, instead of the first-fruits appointed by the law. It had been customary to give this cake to the priest; but at present, it is thrown into the fire, in which it is consumed. This is one of the three precepts to be observed by the women, as they generally make the bread. The prayer to be recited by them, when they throw this little portion of dough into the oven, is as follows: 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, the king of the world, who hast sanctified us by thy precepts, and hast commanded us to separate a cake of our dough.'

SHew-BREAD, or, according to the Hebrews, the bread of faces, was bread offered every Sabbath-day upon the golden table, in the holy place. (Exod. xxv. 30.) The Hebrews affirm, that these loaves were square, and had four sides, and were covered with leaves of gold. They were twelve in number, according to the number of the twelve tribes, in whose names they were offered. Every loaf was composed of two assarions of flour, which make about five pints and one-tenth. These loaves were unleavened. They were presented hot every Sabbath-day, the old ones being taken away, and eaten by the priests only. This offering was accompanied with salt and frankincense, and even with wine, according to some commentators. The Scripture mentions only salt and incense, but it is presumed that wine was added, because it was not wanting in other sacrifices and offerings. It is believed that these loaves were placed one upon another, in two piles, of six each; and that between every loaf were two thin plates of gold, folded back in a semicircle, the whole length of them, to admit air, and to prevent the loaves from growing mouldy. These golden plates thus turned in, were supported at their extremities by two golden forks, which rested on the ground. The twelve loaves, because they stood before the Lord, were called לחם לפני, Ἀροὶ προθέσεως, the bread of setting before (the bread of faces), and are therefore denominated in our English translation the shew-bread.

It has been remarked, that the shew-bread was eaten by priests only. David, however, having received some of these loaves from the high priest Abimelech, ate of them without scruple, in his necessity, (1 Sam. xxi. 3, 4.); and our Saviour urges his example to justify the apostles, who had bruised ears of corn, and were eating them on the Sabbath-day. (Matt. xii. 4.)

It appears from several places of Scripture, that there stood constantly near the altar a basket full of bread, to be offered with the ordinary sacrifices. (Exod. xxix. 32. Numb. vi. 15.)

Moses forbids the priests to receive from the hands of strangers bread, or any other thing that they proposed to give, because all such gifts are corrupted. (Lev. xxii. 25.) Different opinions prevail concerning the intention of this law. Some, as Tostatus, Cajetan, and others, pretend that under the name of bread, we should understand all sorts of sacrifices and offerings, because the victims that were slain, are in Scripture sometimes called the bread of God. Some think, that God forbids the receiving sacrifices of any kind, or any real offering immediately from the hand of infidel people, but permits the reception of money, with which to purchase offerings and victims. Le Clerc, however, observes, that this opinion has been confuted by Selden. Some explain it literally of offerings of flour, bread, or cakes; that none of these were to be received in the temple from the hands of idolaters or infidels. Lastly, bishop Patrick and some others think, that this prohibition relates only to sacrifices, which had such blemishes as were mentioned in the preceding verses.

God threatens to break the staff of bread, (Lev. xxvi. 26, &c.) that is, to send famine among the Israelites.

'Man doth not live by bread only, but by every word, that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord, doth man live.' (Deut. viii. 3.) By this is meant, that God can sustain us not only with bread, or ordinary food, but with any other thing, if he thinks fit to communicate to it a nourishing virtue. Thus, he fed the Israelites in the wilderness with manna; and thus, five thousand men were fed with five loaves, distributed by the hands of Jesus Christ and his apostles.

Bread and water are used for sustenance in general. (Deut. ix. 9, 18.) God complains of the Moabites and Ammonites, that they did not meet the Israelites with bread and water. (Deut. xxiii. 4.) Nabal, in answer to David's message, says, 'Shall I take my bread and my water, and give them to men whom I know not?' Obadiah, the governor of king Ahab's house, fed a hundred prophets of the Lord with bread and water. (1 Kings xviii. 13.)

Bread of affliction, and water of affliction, (1 Kings xxii. 27.) are the same as a little bread and a little water, or prison allowance.

As the Hebrews generally made their bread very thin, and in the form of little flat cakes or wafers, they did not cut it with a knife, but broke it. This gave rise to that expression, so usual in Scripture, of breaking bread, to signify eating or sitting down at table.

In the institution of the Eucharist, our Saviour broke the bread, which he had consecrated; and hence to break bread, and breaking of bread, in the New Testament, are also used for celebrating the Eucharist.

By the bread of tears, (Psalm xlii. 3; lxxx. 5.) and the bread of sorrow, (cxxxvii. 2.) the Psalmist means continual sorrows and tears, which are instead of food, or which make us lose the desire of eating and drinking; or, that we mingle our food with tears.

By the bread of wickedness, (Prov. iv. 17.) and bread of deceit, (Id. xx. 17.) are meant bread acquired by criminal and fraudulent practices.

'Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days,' (Eccles. xi. 1.); that is, be liberal of thine alms, and thou shalt receive a reward suitable to the extent of thy charity. Lightfoot; Le Bruyn's Travels, p. 228; Fragments attached to Calmet's Dictionary, No. ccxxviii. p. 120, cvi. p. 9, 10.

BREAST-PLATE, or BREAST-PLATE of Judgment, called also PECTORAL, and RATIONAL, was one part of the priest's vestments, and was anciently worn by the Jewish high-priests. It was about ten inches square, (Exod. xxviii. 15—30.) and consisted of a folded piece of the same rich embroidered stuff, of which the ephod was made. It was worn on the high-priest's breast, and was set with twelve precious stones, on each of which was engraven the name of one of the twelve tribes. These stones were placed in four rows, three in each row, and were divided from each other by the little golden squares in which they were set. The names of the stones, and of the tribes engraven on them, and the manner in which they were disposed on the breast-plate, were as follows:—

|-----------------------------|---------------------------|--------------------------------|
| Sardius , REUBEN. | Topaz , SIMEON. | Carbuncle , LEVI. |
| Emerald , JUDAH. | Sapphire , DAN. | Diamond . NAPHTALI. |
| Ligure , GAD. | Agate . ASHER. | Amethyst , ISSACHAR. |
| Beryl , ZEBULUN. | Onyx , JOSEPH. | Jasper . BENJAMIN. |

This breast-plate was fastened upon the ephod by rings of gold at the four corners, the two upper rings being hung upon, or fastened to, the shoulder-pieces with golden chains, and the two lower rings tied to the girdle of the ephod with blue strings or ribands. This ornament was called the memorial, to remind the priest how much he ought to esteem those tribes, whose names he wore on his breast. It was also denominated the breast-plate of judgment, because to it was annexed the divine oracle of Urim and Thummim. Broughton's Dictionary, vol. i. p. 175.

BRETHREN AND SISTERS OF THE FREE SPIRIT, an appellation assumed by a sect, which arose towards the close of the thirteenth century, and gained many adherents in Italy, France, and Germany. They took their denomination from the words of St. Paul, (Rom. viii. 2—14.) and maintained that the children of God were invested with full and perfect freedom from the jurisdiction of the law. They adopted a certain rigid system of Mystic theology. They held that all things flowed by emanation from God, and were finally to return to their divine source; that rational souls were portions of the Deity; that the universe was God; that every man, by the power of contemplation, might be united to the Deity in an ineffable manner, and become one with the Source and Parent of all things; and that they who, by long and assiduous meditation, had plunged, as it were, into the abyss of the divinity, had acquired by that means a glorious and sublime liberty not only from the violence of sinful lusts, but also from the common instincts of nature. Hence they concluded, that the person, who had ascended to God, in this manner, became a part of the godhead, was the son of God, as well as Christ, and was raised to a glorious freedom from the obligation of all laws human and divine. They despised the ordinances of the Gospel, and every external act of religious worship, which they considered as useless to the perfect man. Against them many edicts were published; but they continued till about the middle of the fifteenth century. Mosheim, vol. iii. p. 122.

BRETHREN AND CLERKS OF THE COMMON LIFE, a denomination assumed by a religious fraternity towards the end of the fifteenth century. They lived under the rule of St. Augustin, and were eminently useful in promoting the cause of religion and learning. They were divided into two classes, the Lettered Brethren or Clerks, and the Illiterate. The former applied themselves to the study of polite literature, and to the education of youth. The latter were employed in manual labour, and exercised with success the mechanic arts. Neither of the two classes were under the restraint of religious vows. The Sisters of this virtuous society employed themselves much in the same manner as the Brethren. Mosheim, vol. iii. p. 253.

BRETHREN, WHITE, the followers of a priest from the Alps, about the beginning of the fifteenth century. They and their leader were arrayed in white garments. They followed a cross, which their leader had erected as a standard, and, by the appearance of their sanctity and devotion, induced persons of all ranks to augment their number. The new chief practised many acts of mortification, and endeavoured to persuade the European nations to renew the war against the Turks in Palestine; and he pretended, that he was favoured with divine visions, which instructed him in the will and the secrets of Heaven. Boniface IX. thinking that this enthusiast or impostor entertained ambitious designs, caused him to be seized and committed to the flames. On his death, his followers dispersed. Mosheim, vol. iii. p. 275.

BRIDGETINS, or BRIGITTINS, or BRIGITTINS, a religious order denominated from St. Bridget, or Birgit, a Swedish lady, in the fourteenth century. Their rule is nearly the same as that of Augustin. They profess great mortification, poverty, and self-denial; and they are not to possess any thing they can call their own, not so much as a half penny, nor to touch money on any account. This order spread much through Sweden, Germany, and the Netherlands. We read of only one monastery of Brigittins in England. This was built by Henry V. in 1415, opposite to Richmond, now called Sion House; and since the dissolution, the ancient inhabitants of this monastery settled at Lisbon.

BROOK is distinguished from a river: the former flows at some times only, as after great rains, or the melting of snow; but the latter, at all times. As the Hebrew word נַחַל nachal signifies a valley as well as a brook, the one is sometimes used for the other in different translations. Thus, that which the Septuagint translate the brook of cords, (Joel iii. 18.) and the authors of the Vulgate the brook of thorns, is rendered in our English Bible the valley of Shittim, and is thought to be the brook Kedron, which runs between the city of Jerusalem and the mount of Olives, and discharges itself into the Dead Sea.

It is rather unfortunate that, in the English language, the word torrent should signify a powerful stream, rather than a current, which runs only after rain. This latter kind of stream being very common in Arabia, and frequently alluded to in the book of Job, deprives our translation, in some places, not only of emphasis and poetry, but also of correctness, if not of meaning.

The distinction between a brook and a river is not always observed in Scripture, and the one is often taken for the other, by giving great rivers, such as the Euphrates, the Nile, the Jordan, and others, the name of brooks. Thus, the Euphrates is called the brook of willows. (Isaiah xv. 7.)

BROTHER, is taken in Scripture not only in the common and literal signification of the word, but also for a relation, a man of the same country, or of the same nation, for our neighbour, and for a man in general.

It is probable that James, Josés, Judas, and Simon, (Mark vi. 3.) though called brethren of Jesus, were not strictly his natural brothers, but, at the nearest, cousins to Jesus; for it was the custom of the Hebrews, to extend names of affection from the proper kin, to which they accurately applied, to more distant relatives. James and Josés were sons of Mary, but certainly not of the Virgin, (Matt. xxvii. 56.) James and Judas were sons of Alpheus, (Luke vi. 15, 16.); and it is very probable, that Alpheus is the same as Cleophas, the husband of Mary, sister to the Virgin. (John xix. 25.)

Brother is one of the same nation, (Rom. ix. 3. &c.); of the same faith. (1 John ii. 9.); of the same nature, (Heb. ii. 17.) Additions to Calmet's Dictionary.

Brother is used sometimes for one, who resembles another in any qualities either good or bad: 'He that is slothful in his work is brother to him that is a great waster.' (Prov. xviii. 9.) Job complains, 'I am a brother to dragons (serpents), and a companion to owls,' that is, I have imitated them in their doleful cries, and in their flying from mankind. (xxx. 29.)

Brother is also understood for friend, or husband, as sister is for wife: 'O that thou wert as my brother, that sucked the breasts of my mother.' (Cant. viii. 1.) 'Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse.' (Id. iv. 9.) Job says, 'I said to the worm, Thou art my mother, and my sister.' (Job xvii. 14.)

By the law, the brother of a man who died without children, was obliged to marry the widow of the deceased, to raise up children to him, that his name and memory might not be extinct. (Deut. xxv. 7.) See WIDOW.

BROTHERS, LAY, among the Romanists, are illiterate persons, who devote themselves in some convent to the service of the monks.

BROWNISTS, the name given for some time to those, who were afterwards known in England and Holland under the denomination of Independents. It arose from a Mr. Robert Brown, whose parents resided in Rutlandshire, though he is said to have been born at Northampton, and who was educated at Cambridge, and was a man of good parts, and some learning. He began to inveigh openly against the ceremonies of the church, at Norwich, in 1580; but, being much opposed, he and his congregation left England, and settled at Middleburgh, in Zealand, where they obtained leave to worship God in their own way, and to form a church according to their own model. However, they soon began to disagree among themselves; and Brown, becoming weary of his office, returned to England in 1589, renounced his principles of separation, and was preferred to the rectory of a church in Northamptonshire. He died in prison in 1630. The revolt of Brown was attended with the dissolution of the church at Middleburgh; but the seeds of Brownism, which he had sown in England, were so far from being destroyed, that Sir Walter Raleigh, in a speech in 1592, computes no less than twenty thousand of this sect.

The articles of their faith seem to be nearly the same as those of the church of England. The occasion of their separation was not, therefore, any fault which they found with the faith, but only with the discipline and form of government of the churches in England. They equally charged corruption on the episcopal and presbyterian forms; nor would they join with any other reformed church, because they were not assured of the sanctity and regeneration of the members that composed it. They condemned the solemn celebration of marriages in the church, maintaining that matrimony being a political contract, the confirmation of it ought to be by the civil magistrate. They would not allow the children of such as were not members of the church to be baptized. They rejected all forms of prayer, and held that the Lord's Prayer was not to be recited as a prayer, being only given for a rule or model, by which all our prayers are to be formed. Their form of church government was nearly as follows. When a church was to be gathered, such as desired to be members of it made a confession of their faith in the presence of each other, and signed a covenant, by which they obliged themselves to walk together in the order of the Gospel. The whole power of admitting and excluding members, with the decision of all controversies, was vested in the brotherhood. Their church officers were chosen among themselves, and separated to their several offices by fasting, prayer, and imposition of hands. But they did not allow the priesthood to be any distinct order. As the vote of the brethren constituted a man a minister, so the same power could discharge him from his office, and reduce him to a mere layman; and as they maintained the bounds of a church to be no greater than what could meet together in one place, and join in one communion, so the power of these officers was prescribed within the same limits. The minister of one church could not administer the Lord's Supper to another, nor baptize the children of any but those of his own society. Any lay brother was allowed the liberty of exhorting the people; and it was usual for some of them after sermon, to ask questions, and reason upon the doctrines that had been preached. In a word, every church on their model is a body corporate, having full power to do every thing in themselves, without being accountable to any class, synod, convocation, or other jurisdiction whatever. The reader will judge how near the independent churches are allied to this form of government. See INDEPENDENTS.

The laws were executed with great severity on the Brownists; their books were prohibited by Queen Elizabeth, their persons imprisoned, and some of them hanged. Brown himself declared, on his death-bed, that he had been in thirty-two different prisons, in some of which he could not see his hand at noon-day. At length, they resolved to quit the country. Accordingly, many retired, and settled at Amsterdam, where they formed a church, and chose Mr. Johnson their pastor, and after him Mr. Ainsworth, author of the learned Commentary on the Pentateuch. Their church flourished nearly one hundred years. It is only justice to state, that the zeal, with which Mr. Brown and his associates maintained and propagated their notions, was highly intemperate and extravagant. He affirmed that all communion was to be dissolved with every religious society founded on a different plan from his, and in particular treated the church of England as spurious church, whose ministers were unlawfully ordained, whose discipline was Popish and antichristian, and whose sacraments and institutions were void of efficacy. It is, therefore, no wonder, that his opposition to the established form of religious discipline, should draw down upon him and his followers some severity from a government, not distinguishing by its mildness and indulgence.

It is said that Brown, in his new preference, after his return to England, forgot not only the rigour of his principles, but also the gravity of his former morals, and that he led a very idle and dissolute life. Neal's History of the Puritans; Mosheim, vol. iv. p. 98. 100. 529.

BUCHANITES, a sect of enthusiasts that arose in the west of Scotland, about the year 1783. They took their name from a Mrs. Buchan, of Glasgow, who said, that she was the woman mentioned in the Revelations, and that all who believed in her should inherit heaven without tasting death, as the end of the world was near. They never increased much; and the death of their leader within a year or two afterwards, occasioned their dispersion, by terminating their hopes of reaching the new Jerusalem without death. Buck's Theol. Dictionary, p. 136.

BUDNÆANS, a sect in Poland, that took their name from Simon Budnæus, a man of considerable abilities. Budnæus denied all worship to Jesus Christ, who, he asserted, was not begotten by an extraordinary act of Divine power, but was born, like other men, in a natural way. This doctrine gave great offence to most of those who professed Socinianism; and Budnæus who had gained a great number of proselytes in Lithuania and Russian Poland, was publicly excommunicated, with all his disciples, in 1584. It is said, however, that he afterwards abandoned his offensive sentiments, and was re-admitted to the communion of the Socinian sect. Mosheim, vol. iv. p. 199.

BUILD. Besides the proper and literal signification of this word, denoting the construction of dwellings, it is used to signify the producing of children and a numerous posterity. Thus, the prophet Nathan promises David from God, to build for him his house, (2 Sam. vii. 27.); that is, to give him children and successors.

BUL, בול, Boul, signifies old age, perishing. Bul, the eighth month in the Hebrew calendar, was afterwards called Marchesvan and answered partly to our October. It was the second month of the civil, and the eighth of the ecclesiastical year, and consisted of twenty-nine days. The sixth day of this month was a fast, because on that day Nebuchadnezzar slew the children of Zedekiah in the presence of their unhappy father, whose eyes, after they had witnessed this sad spectacle, he ordered to be put out. (2 Kings xxv. 7.) We find the name of this month mentioned only once in Scripture. (1 Kings vi. 38.)

BULL. By this word we generally understand the male of the ox kind, which being castrated, we call an ox or bullock. But as the ancient Hebrews never cut or mutilated any creature, in those passages, in which we read ox, we are to understand a bull. (Levit. xxii. 24.) The beauty of Joseph is compared to that of a bullock. (Deut. xxxiii. 17.) The Egyptians had a particular veneration for this animal; and it is thought that the Jews imitated them in their worship of the golden calves.

A bull in a figurative and allegorical sense signifies powerful, fierce, and insolent enemies. 'Many bulls have compassed me, strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round,' says the Psalmist, (xxii. 12.) 'Rebuke the company of spearmen, the multitude of the bulls.' (Psalm lxxviii. 30.)

BULLS, Popish, are letters called apostolic by the Canonists, strengthened with a leaden seal (bullæ), and containing the decrees and commandments of the Pope.

BURIAL. The Hebrews, at all times, were very careful in the burial of their dead; and to be deprived of burial, was thought one of the greatest dishonours or misfortunes that could befall any man. This last duty was denied to none, not even to enemies; but it was withheld from self-murderers, till after sun-set, and the souls of such persons were believed to be plunged into hell. This concern for burial proceeded from a persuasion of the soul's immortality.

The Scripture threatens the wicked with a deprivation of burial, as if this were among the greatest calamities that could happen. 'If a man beget an hundred children, and live many years, so that the days of his years be many, and his soul be not filled with good, and also that he have no burial; I say, that an untimely birth is better than he.' (Eccles. vi. 3.) Jeremiah threatens the kings, priests, and false prophets, who had adored idols, that their bones should be cast out of their graves, and thrown like dung on the earth. (Jer. viii. 2.) The same prophet foretold, that Jehoiakim, king of Judah, who built his house by unrighteousness, and who abandoned himself to avarice, violence, and all manner of vice, among other severe punishments, should be buried with the burial of an ass; that he should be cast out of the gates of Jerusalem into the common sewer. (Jer. xxii. 18, 19.)

The law determined nothing particularly as to the place of burying the dead. There were graves in town and country, by the highways, in gardens, and upon mountains. Those belonging to the kings of Judah were in Jerusalem, and the king's gardens. Ezekiel intimates, that they were dug under the mountain, upon which the temple stood ; since God says, that in future his holy mountain should not be polluted with the dead bodies of their kings. The sepulchre, which Joseph of Arimathea had provided for himself, and in which he placed our Saviour's body, was in his garden ; that of Rachel was adjacent to the highway from Jerusalem to Bethlehem. That of the Maccabees was at Modin, upon an eminence ; and hence it was visible at a great distance both by sea and land. The kings of Israel had their burying places in Samaria. Samuel was interred in his own house ; Moses, Aaron, Eleazar, and Joshua, were buried upon mountains ; King Saul, Deborah, and Rebekah's nurse, under the shade of trees. It is affirmed, that the sepulchres of the inhabitants of Jerusalem were in the valley of Kedron. Here also were the burying-places for foreigners.

Leo of Modena says, that what we call a church-yard or cemetery, is denominated by the Jews the house of the living, to show their belief of the immortality of the soul, and of the resurrection of the body. Buxtorf tells us, that when they come thither bearing a corpse, they address themselves to those, who are buried there, as if they were still alive, and say, 'Blessed be the Lord, who hath created you, fed you, brought you up, and, at last, in his justice taken you out of the world. He knoweth the number of you all, and will in time revive you. Blessed be the Lord who causeth death, and restoreth life.' Their respect for sepulchres is so great, that they build synagogues and oratories near those of great men and prophets. The Rabbins teach, that it is not lawful to demolish tombs, nor to disturb the repose of the dead, by burying another corpse in the same grave ; even after a long time : nor to carry an aqueduct, or a highway across the common place of burial ; nor to gather wood there ; nor suffer cattle there to feed.

When the Jews come with a funeral to a burying-place, they repeat the blessing directed to the dead, as above-mentioned ; the body is placed on the ground, and if it be a person of consideration, they speak over it a kind of funeral oration and encomium. Then they walk round the grave, and recite a pretty long prayer, which they call the righteousness of judgment, because in it they return thanks to God for having pronounced an equitable judgment on the life and person of the deceased. It begins with those words, 'He is the rock, his work is perfect,' &c. (Deut. xxxii. 4.) After this, a little sack full of earth is placed under the dead person's head, and the coffin is nailed down and closed. If the corpse be a man, ten persons go ten times round him, and say a prayer for his soul ; the nearest relation tears off a corner of his clothes ; the dead body is let down into the grave, with his face towards heaven ; and they cry to him, Go in peace, or rather, according to the Talmudists, Go to peace. The nearest relations first throw earth on the body ; after them, all present do the same, with their hands or with shovels. This being done, they retire, walking backwards ; and before they have left the burying-ground, they pluck blades of grass three times, and cast them behind their backs, saying, 'They shall flourish like grass of the earth.' (Psalm lxxii. 16.)

Monuments were erected in memory of kings, heroes, prophets, or warriors ; but it does not appear, that there were any epitaphs on the tombs of the ancient Hebrews. However, we find that king Josiah, when he destroyed the tombs of the false prophets of Baal, observed a sepulchral inscription ; for he said, 'What title is that I see ?' It is, therefore, probable, that tombs had inscriptions, distinguishing the party they contained.

The form of epitaphs used by the Jews, is as follows : 'This stone is placed at the head of N. the son of N. who was buried on such a day, in the year N. May he rest in the garden of Eden, with all the righteous, who have been there from the beginning. Amen, amen, selah.' Or, 'Let his soul be buried in the garden of Eden. Amen, amen, selah.' Or, 'This monument, or this pillar, is erected near the head of the most illustrious, most holy, and most pure virgin Rebekah, the daughter of Samuel the Levite, who died in good reputation, such a day of the month N. in the year N. May her soul be buried in the garden of Eden. Amen, amen, amen, selah.' But these forms are neither ancient nor uniform.

BURNING-BUSH, in which the Lord appeared to Moses, at the foot of Mount Horeb. (Exod. iii. 2.) See MOSES.

As to the person, who appeared in the bush, the Scripture calls him by the name of God, (Exod. iii. 2. 6. 13, 14, &c.) He denominates himself the Lord God, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob ; the God, who was to deliver his people from their bondage in Egypt. Moses blessing Joseph, desireth that the good-will of him, who dwelt in the bush, may come on Joseph. (Deut. xxxiii. 16.) In the place of Exodus, which we are examining, instead of the Lord appeared to him, the Hebrew and the Septuagint import, the angel of the Lord appeared to him. Stephen, in the Acts, reads it in the same manner. It was, probably, an angel, agent, messenger, who represented the Lord, and spoke in his name. The ancients generally thought the Son of God to be the person, who appeared in the bush ; and this is very probable, as he is called by the prophet Malachi, the angel of the covenant. Poole's Annotat.; Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Exod. iii. 2.

BUTTER is understood in Scripture, as it is generally in the East, for cream or liquid butter. Bochart shows that children were fed with butter and honey (Isaiah vii. 15. 22.); that is, with milk diet, with cream and honey, which was very common in Palestine. We read, that honey and butter, with other refreshments, were brought to king David, 'because the people were weary, hungry, and thirsty.' (2 Sam. xvii. 29.) Considering the list of articles, there seems to be nothing adapted to moderate thirst, except this butter and honey; for it is to be observed, that in the East, cream or fresh butter is mixed in a mess of honey. That this mixture of butter and honey was a delicious liquid, appears from the maledictory denunciation of Zophar: The wicked man 'shall not see the rivers, the floods, the brooks (rather torrents) of honey and butter.' (Job xx. 17.) Honey alone can scarcely be esteemed so flowing as to be compared to rivers and torrents. Cream, in such abundance, is much more fluid; and mixed with honey, it may dilute and thin it, into a state more proper for running, poetically speaking, as freely as water. 'Honey and milk are under thy tongue,' says the spouse. (Cant. iv. 11.) Perhaps, this dish was not merely a refreshment, but an elegant refreshment. This heightens the inference from the predictions of Isaiah, and the description of Zophar, who speak of its abundance; and it also increases the respect paid to David, by his faithful and loyal subjects at Mahanaim, &c. Fragments attached to Calmet's Dict. No. clxxxiii. p. 181.

BUZ, בוז, Bôz, signifies despised, or plundered. Buz, the son of Nahor and Milcah, and brother to Huz. (Gen. xxii. 21.) Elihu, one of Job's friends, was descended from Buz, the son of Nahor. (Job xxxii. 2.) The Scripture calls him the Buzite of the kindred of Ram, Ram being put for Aram. The prophet Jeremiah threatens the Buzites with God's wrath. (Jer. xxv. 23.) They dwelt in Arabia Deserta.

Buz was also the name of the son of Abdiel, and father of Jahdo, of the tribe of Judah. (1 Chron. v. 14.)

aments, and which the translators of our English Bible, as well as some others, have constantly rendered fine linen. But by this word is generally understood a fine sort of threaden matter, which was produced in India, Egypt, Judea, and about Elis in Achaia, and of which the richest apparel was anciently made, especially that worn by the priests, both Jewish and Egyptian. Pollux, in his Onomasticon says, βύσσος of Egypt in his time, that is, in the second century, was composed of flax and cotton, cotton threads being the warp, and flaxen the woof of the cloth. Calvin's and the Spanish Bible, printed at Venice in 1556, explain the word by silk, though it is evident from ancient writers, that byssus must have been very different from our silk. M. Simon renders the word by fine linen, and says, there was a kind of fine linen, which was very dear, and which only the great lords wore in this country, as well as in Egypt. Hesychius and Bochart observe, that the byssus was a finer kind of linen, which was frequently dyed a purple colour.

Calmet says, that we ought carefully to distinguish three kinds of commodities, which are generally confounded, and comprehended under the name of linen: 1. the Hebrew בור bad, which signifies linen; 2. ww schesch, which signifies cotton; and 3. בויז butz, which is commonly called byssus, and is the silk growing under a certain shell-fish, called pinna. He also observes, that the name butz or buz, is not in the text of Moses, though the Greek and Latin use the word byssus, to signify the fine linen of certain habits belonging to the priests. The word buz occurs only in the first of Chronicles, (xv. 27.); in Ezekiel, (xxvii. 16.); and in Esther, (i. 6.) In the Chronicles, David, with the singers and Levites, is dressed in a mantle of buz. Solomon uses buz in the veils of the temple and sanctuary. The tents of Ahasuerus were upheld by cords of buz, and Mordecai was clothed with a mantle of purple and buz, when Ahasuerus honoured him with the first employment in his kingdom. Lastly, it is observed, that there was a manufacture of buz in the city of Beersheba, in Palestine. Hence Calmet concludes, that this buz must have been different from common linen, since in the same place, in which it is said David wore a mantle of buz, we also read, that he had on a linen ephod.

C.

CAB, or KAB, a Hebrew measure of capacity, containing the sixth part of a seah, or an eighteenth of an ephah. The cab of wine contained two English pints; and of corn, 2 5-6th pints corn measure. At the siege of Samaria, the famine was so great that the fourth part of a cab of pigeons' dung, or rather, as Bochart translates the Hebrew, of a particular kind of pulse of the nature of chick peas, was sold for five pieces of silver. (2 Kings vi. 25.) Arbuthnot's Tables, p. 102.

CABBALA signifies tradition, and is a mysterious kind of science, said to have been delivered by revelation to the ancient Jews; for the Rabbins tell us, that the secrets of the Cabbala were discovered to Moses upon Mount Sinai, and have been delivered from father to son without interruption, and without the use of letters. Indeed, to write them is reckoned unlawful. The Cabbala is, therefore, properly the oral law of the Jews. When God delivered the law to Moses, it is pretended that he delivered also the explanation, which was not committed to writing, but transmitted by word of mouth from father to son. It is to these interpretations of the written law, that our Saviour's censure is to be applied, when he reproves the Jews for 'making the commands of God of none effect, through their traditions.' (Mark vii. 13.) The manner in which Maimonides explains the cabbala or traditions of the Jews is as follows: 'God not only delivered the law to Moses upon Mount Sinai, but also the explanation of it. When Moses came down from the Mount, and entered into his tent, Aaron went to visit him; and Moses acquainted Aaron with the laws he had received from God, and the explanation of them. After this, Aaron placed himself at the right hand of Moses, and Eleazar and Ithamar the sons of Aaron were admitted, and to them Moses repeated what he had just before told Aaron. These being seated, the one on the right, the other on the left hand of Moses, the seventy elders of Israel, who composed the Sanhedrim, entered. Moses again declared to them the same laws, with the interpretation of them, as he had done before to Aaron and his sons. Lastly, all who pleased of the common people were invited to enter, and Moses instructed them also in the same manner as the rest. Aaron, therefore, heard four times what Moses had been taught by God upon Mount Sinai; Eleazar and Ithamar, three times; the seventy elders, twice; and the people, once. Moses afterwards reduced the laws, which he had received, into writing, but not the explanations of them; these he thought it sufficient to trust to the memories of the above-mentioned persons, who, being perfectly instructed in them, delivered them to their children, and these again to their's, from age to age.'

CABBALA, artificial, consists in searching for abstruse and mysterious significations of a word, or words, in Scripture. Hence the Rabbins borrow, or rather force, explanations, by combining the letters, which compose it. This Cabbala is of three kinds; the Gematry, the Notaricon, and the Themurah, or change.

Cabbala Gematry consists in taking the letters of a Hebrew word for arithmetical numbers, and explaining every word by the arithmetical value of the letters, of which it is composed. Thus, the Hebrew letters of יבֶּה שִׁלֹה Jabo-shiloh, Shiloh shall come, (Gen. xlix. 10.) when reckoned arithmetically, form the same number as those of the word מְשִׁיחַ Messiah; and hence the Rabbins infer, that Shiloh signifies the Messiah.

Cabbala Notaricon consists in taking each letter of a word for an entire diction. Thus, of Bereschith, the first word of Genesis, composed of B. R. A. Sch. I. T. the Rabbins make Bara-Rakia-Arez-Scha-maim-lam-Tehomath; that is, he created the firmament, the earth, the heavens, the sea, and the deep. This cabbala is varied by taking, on the contrary, the first letters of a sentence to form one diction. Thus, Atah-Gibbor-Leholam-Adonai; that is, 'Thou art strong for ever, O Lord.' They unite the first letters of this sentence, A. G. L. A. and form AGLA, which may signify, 'I will reveal,' or 'a drop of dew.'

Cabbala Themurah, or change, consists in transpositions of letters, placing one for another, or one before another. In nearly the same manner as anagrams.

'The Talmudists,' says Mercier, 'are of opinion, that Hezekiah and his company wrote the books denoted by the symbolical word יִמְשֹׁק JimShoK, viz. Isaiah, Proverbs, Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes. Into this opinion they seem to have been led by its being said, 'These are also proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah, copied out.' (Prov. xxv. 1.)

Every letter in the word IMSK, or Jimshok, as they pronounce it with the points, is put to denote a particular book, the title of which begins with that letter, viz. as it is here explained, Isaiah, Meshalim, Shir-ha-shirim, and Koheleth; the Hebrew names of the four books, Isaiah, Proverbs, Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes.

These Talmudical doctors, then, had an obscure tradition delivered down to them of something done in Hezekiah's time relating to these books of Scripture. But they evidently mistook the meaning of it, if they supposed the books to have been written by Hezekiah and his men; instead of being then collected, and revised, or solemnly approved, and added to the sacred canon. For this, no doubt, was the truth of the case: and such a tradition might have been conveyed down from remote times, in the very symbol here specified. For it appears that the use of these symbols was very ancient with this people.

The use of these symbols, then, being very ancient, if the first letter, in this word Jimshok, stand for Isaiah, it seems to intimate to us the part, which this great prophet had, in the revising and fixing the authority of these books of Solomon. But it appears more probable, that the book of Job might be here meant by the first letter of the word Jimshok.

It has been said that Shiloh שִׁילֹה, in old Jacob's celebrated prophecy of the Messiah, (Gen. xlix. 10.) should be pronounced Shilah, and signifies her child; and it appears that this is the most probable meaning of the word. And so says D. Kimchi, the completest master of the Hebrew language, perhaps, of all the Rabbins. Both Jews and Christians acknowledge the Messiah to be here intended; but how to explain the name is the difficulty.

The Chaldee paraphrast, Onkelos, certainly took it for one of those symbolical words that are made up of initial letters; for he explains it of the Messiah, dedeliah hi malcutha, whose is the kingdom. This turned into Hebrew will be thus, exactly answering to the word SHILAH, שִׁי-שִׁי-לֹה-הַמְּלֹכָה, She-Jesh-Lo-Hammelucah, literally, who to him is the kingdom. For this is the usual turn of the Hebrew phrase. The interpretation here given of the word may be nearly as old as the first use of the Chaldee paraphrasing; which commenced of course soon after the return from the Babylonish captivity.

That it was older than the Septuagint translation seems plain from hence, that these translators give it to us curtailed, omitting the last word hammelucah; lest, perhaps, that living in Egypt and amongst their Gentile masters, the word kingdom might create a jealousy that would turn to their disadvantage. At least, this is the best reason that can be given why they should turn the word Shilah by φ ἀπόκειται, for whom it is reserved, or τὰ ἀποκείμενα αὐτῷ, which are reserved for him, answering to She-Lo, or She-Jesh-Lo, and thus leave the thing itself, (viz. hammelucah, the kingdom,) to be understood, or to remain a secret with themselves. Peters on Job, preface; Additions to Calmet's Dictionary.

CABBALISTS, a name given to the Rabbinical doctors among the Jews. They receive not only the texts of Scripture; but also the explanations of the Talmud, and the Jewish traditions. They also study to discover mysterious and concealed meanings in the words, the letters, and their arrangement in Scripture; for they hold the opinion, that every word, letter, or accent in the law, includes some mystery.

The Cabbalists, says Dr. Jennings, were a sort of mystical doctors, who discovered great mystery in the letters of the sacred text, either by considering their numeral power, or by changing and transposing them, in different ways, according to the rules of their art. By these means they extracted senses from the sacred oracles very different from those, which the expression seemed naturally to import, or which were ever intended by the authors. They are supposed to have arisen soon after the time of Ezra. Jennings's Jewish Antiq. b. i. ch. vi.; Prideaux's Connect. part i. book v. p. 507.

CA'BUL' כַּבּוּל, Χοβῶλ, signifies which is bound; otherwise, which grows old, and which decays. Cabul was the name given by Hiram, king of Tyre, to the twenty cities which Solomon presented to him, as an acknowledgment for his great services in building the temple. (1 Kings ix. 13.) These cities not pleasing Hiram, when he came to see them, he called them the land of Cabul; the word Cabul in the Hebrew language denoting, as some think, displeasure or dirty. It is very probable that these cities were situated near to Tyre, of which Hiram was king.

Grotius is of opinion, that the cities, which Pharaoh had conquered from the Philistines, and yielded to Solomon, were among the cities of Cabul. Most commentators think, that the city of Cabul (Josh. xix. 27.) was one of them; and that it was on this occasion that Hiram gave this name to the other cities ceded to him by Solomon. Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 58.

CÆ/SAR, Καῖσαρ, a Latin word from cædo, I cut, because the subject of it was cut out of his mother's womb at the time of her delivery; or, from cæsaries, a head of hair; otherwise, one that has blue eyes. Cæsar was a name given to all the Roman emperors after Julius Cæsar. In the New Testament, the reigning emperor is generally denominated Cæsar, without mentioning any other name that belonged to him. Jesus Christ calls the emperor Tiberius simply, Cæsar: 'Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's.' (Matt. xxii. 21.) St. Paul mentions Nero by the same name: 'I appeal unto Cæsar,' (Acts xxv. 11.) that is, to Nero, who then reigned. It is probable, however, that this title rather denoted the political power than the person of the emperor. Festus, a Roman officer, seems to use a different phraseology. (Acts xxv. 25.)

CÆSARE'A, a city built by Herod the Great, in honour of Augustus, and formerly called the Tower of Strato. This city was situated on the sea-side, on the coast of Phœnicia, and was very convenient for trade, except that it had a bad harbour. To remedy this, Herod ordered a mole to be made in the form of a half-moon, and large enough for containing a royal navy. The buildings of this town, as well private houses as palaces, were all of marble. This city, which was six hundred furlongs from Jerusalem, is often mentioned in the New Testament. Here Herod Antipas was smitten by the Lord, for neglecting to give God the glory, when the people were so liberal to him of their flattery. (Acts xii. 23.) Cornelius the centurion, who was baptized by St. Peter, lived at Cæsarea. (Acts x. 1, &c.) Here also resided Philip the Deacon, with his four maiden daughters. (Ibid. viii. 40; xxi. 8, 9.) At Cæsarea, the prophet Agabus foretold to the apostle Paul, that he would be bound at Jerusalem. (Ibid. xxi. 10, 11.) Paul continued two years a prisoner at Cæsarea, till he could be conveniently conducted to Rome, because he had appealed to Nero. (Ibid. xxiii. xxiv. xxv.)

Cæsarea now retains nothing of its former splendour. 'The remains of this city,' says Dr. Clarke, 'although still considerable, have long been resorted to as a quarry, whenever building materials are required at Acre. The place at present is inhabited only by jackals and beasts of prey. Perhaps there has not been in the history of the world an example of any city, that in so short a space of time rose to such an extraordinary height of splendour as did this of Cæsarea; or that exhibits a more awful contrast to its former magnificence, by the present desolate appearance of its ruins. Not a single inhabitant remains. Its theatres, once resounding with the shouts of multitudes, echo no other sound than the nightly cries of animals roaming for their prey. Of its gorgeous palaces and temples, enriched with the choicest works of art, and decorated with the most precious marbles, scarcely a trace can be discerned.' Clarke's Travels in the Holy Land, vol. iv. pp. 446—448; Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 284.

CÆSAREA PHILIPPI was the name of a city formerly called Paneas, which was situated near the springs of the river Jordan. It was first called Laish or Lechem, (Judg.

xviii. 7.) and after it was subdued by some Israelites of the tribe of Dan, it received the name of Dan. Cæsarea was situated a day's journey from Sidon; and a day and a half from Damascus. It was built, or at least embellished and enlarged by Philip the Tetrarch, who named it Cæsarea in honour of Tiberius; and it was afterwards called Neronias, in compliment to Nero. The woman, who was troubled with an issue of blood, and healed by our Saviour, (Matt. ix. 20. Luke viii. 43.) is said to have been of Cæsarea Philippi. The present town of Paneas is small; and the ground, on which it stands, is of a triangular form. From this compressed situation the ancient city could not have been of great extent. Irby's and Mangles's Travels, p. 289; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 569.

CAIAPHAS, Καϊάφας, signifies he that seeks with diligence; otherwise, vomit. Caiaphas, or Caiphas, or Joseph Caiphas, was high-priest of the Jews, and succeeded Simon, the son of Camith; and after possessing the dignity nine years, he was succeeded by Jonathan, the son of Ananas, or Annas. Caiaphas was high-priest in the year of Jesus Christ's death. Macknight is of opinion, that he enjoyed the sacerdotal dignity during the whole of Pilate's government in Judea; for he was advanced by Valerius Gratus, Pilate's predecessor, and divested of his office by Vitellius, governor of Syria, after Pilate had been deposed from the procuratorship. Caiaphas married a daughter of Annas, who, in the Gospel, is also called high-priest, because he had long enjoyed that dignity.

When the priests deliberated on the seizure and death of Jesus Christ, Caiaphas told them, that it was expedient for one man to die for the people, that the whole nation might not perish. (John xi. 49, 50.) It has been observed, that this sentiment was a kind of prophecy, which God suffered to proceed from the mouth of the high-priest on this occasion, and which imported, though contrary to the intention of Caiaphas, that the death of Jesus would be the salvation of the world. When Judas had betrayed Jesus, he was first taken before Annas; and Annas, after asking him some questions, sent him to his son-in-law, Caiaphas. (John xviii. 24.) The priests and doctors of the law assembled to judge and condemn Jesus. It is not probable, that they met in the residence of the high-priest. The accounts of the evangelists evidently imply, that the examination of Jesus was in the regular and usual mode before the sanhedrim; and certainly at the house of Caiaphas, the sanhedrim, &c. could not regularly assemble for the purposes of judgment. It is, therefore, obvious that they met in the official hall, where the high-priest sat at the head of the sanhedrim.

The depositions of certain false witnesses not being sufficient to justify a sentence of death against Jesus; and Jesus continuing silent, Caiaphas, as high-priest, said to him, 'I adjure thee, by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God!' To this adjuration, thus solemnly made by this superior judge, Jesus answered, 'Thou hast said: nevertheless I say unto you, hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven!' On hearing these words, Caiaphas rent his clothes, saying, 'What further need have we of witnesses? Behold, now ye have heard his blasphemy. What think ye?' They answered, 'He is guilty of death.' As the power of life and death was not at this time in their hands, but was reserved to the Romans, they conducted him to Pilate the governor, that he might confirm their sentence, and order his execution. This, at length, they extorted from Pilate.

Two years after, that is, in the year of our Lord 38, Vitellius, governor of Syria, deposed the high-priest Caiaphas. What was the end of Caiaphas, and when he died, history does not relate. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. cxxxvii. p. 69.

CAIN, כַּיִן, signifies possession, or possessed. Cain, the eldest son of Adam and Eve, was born towards the end of the first year of the world. Some believe, that Eve at the same time brought forth a daughter; respecting this, however, the Scripture is silent. About a year after, his brother Abel was born.

Cain applied himself to agriculture, and his brother Abel to the feeding of flocks. (Gen. iv. 2, &c.) Cain offered the first-fruits of his ground to the Lord, but Abel offered the fat of his flock. God showed, that Abel's offerings were agreeable to him, and that Cain's were not. This so enraged Cain, that his countenance was entirely changed. The Lord, therefore, said to him, 'Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen?'

Cain, unrestrained by this admonition, and suffering evil passions to mislead him, killed his brother Abel. The Lord inquired into this murder, and for it punished Cain, who became an exile and a vagabond. Yet, he received an assurance, that he himself should not be murdered. Of this God gave to Cain a token; for so the words may be understood, though they are commonly considered as expressing a mark of guilt, strongly imprinted on his person.

Cain quitted the presence of the Lord, and retired to the land of Nod, east of Eden. Here he had a son, whom he called Enoch, and in memory of whom he built a city of the same name. Lightfoot, Heidegger, and Le Clerc, seem to think, that what is rendered in our translation of the Bible, 'The presence of the Lord,' was the proper name of the place, in which Adam dwelt, after his expulsion from Paradise. Accordingly, that part of the country, which is contiguous to what is supposed by some to be the situation of Paradise, is called by Strabo, (lib. xvi.) Πρόσωπον Θεού. Some, however, are of opinion that the expression, 'presence of the Lord,' denotes that happy converse with the Deity, which was enjoyed by good men in the first ages of the world.

Respecting Cain, several questions are proposed; as, What was his pretence or motive for killing his brother Abel? What instrument he used? Whose resentment and revenge he dreaded? To what country he retired? What was the mark, which God fixed upon him, or appointed to him? And what death he died? There has also been much debate on the proper rendering of the sentence, 'If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door,' (Gen. iv. 7.); that is, if thou doest not well, 'sin,' a sin-offering, 'lieth,' croucheth 'at the door.' Perhaps, the true import of the expression is to this effect: If thou hast done well, thou shalt have praise, but if not, lay a sin-offering at the door, by way of sacrifice; at the door either of the garden of Paradise, or at the door of a place for worship. This rendering takes the word lie, crouch, actively, instead of passively, and literally signifies, at the opening, the sin-offering crouching shall be thy atonement. Additions to Calmet's Dict.

Josephus says, that Cain having settled at Nod, instead of being reformed by his punishment and exile, became more wicked and violent, and headed a band of thieves, whom he taught to enrich themselves at the expense of others. He entirely changed the simplicity and honesty of the world into fraud and deceit. He invented weights and measures, and was the first, who set bounds to fields, and who built and fortified a city.

CAINAN, כַּיִן, signifies possessor, or purchaser; otherwise, one that laments.

CAINAN, the son of Enos, was born in the year of the world 325, when Enos was ninety years old. (Gen. v. 9.) At the age of seventy, he begat Mahalaleel, and died aged 910, in the year of the world 1235, and before Jesus Christ 2769.

CAINAN, the son of Arphaxad and father of Salah, is mentioned in the Septuagint version of the Bible. (Gen. x. 21.; xi. 12.) He is also mentioned by St. Luke, who places him between Salah and Arphaxad: 'Which was the son of Salah, which was the son of Cainan, which was the son of Arphaxad.' (Luke iii. 36.) Cainan, however, is not to be found in the Hebrew text, the Samaritan, or the Vulgate. Some have suggested, that the Jews expunged the name of Cainan from their copies, with a design of rendering the Septuagint and St. Luke suspected. Some, that Moses omitted Cainan, from a desire of reckoning ten generations only from Adam to Noah, and from Noah to Abraham. Some, that Arphaxad was father of both Cainan and Salah; of Salah naturally, of Cainan legally. Others, that Cainan and Salah were the same person under two names; this they allege in support of that opinion, which maintains Cainan to be really the son of Arphaxad, and father of Salah. They who assert, that Cainan was surreptitiously inserted into the Septuagint, and thence transcribed by St. Luke, observe, that the authority of the Hebrew, Vulgate, Chaldee, and Syriac is superior to that of the Septuagint; that Luke having copied only the Septuagint, his text in this place rests on their authority; that the changes, which appear in the years of the patriarchs, destroy their authority, wherever they contradict the Hebrew; and that the additions of the Septuagint do not agree with each other. Some, however affirm, that the name of Cainan is an insertion into the text of the Septuagint, and that it was not read there by the most ancient fathers; and, indeed, neither Josephus nor Philo knew any thing of a Cainan, the son of Arphaxad. Many learned men believe, that this name was not originally in the text of Luke, but has been added by inadvertent transcribers, who observed it in some copies of the Septuagint. The authors of the Universal History, in particular, think it probable, that this name may have been inserted in St. Luke, by being added from some erroneous copies of the Septuagint, and being first placed in the margin, it has since crept into the text. This, indeed, seems to be the most probable opinion, and that which is generally adopted. *Univ. CAINITES, heretics, who lived in the second century after Christ, and who believed that Cain was produced by some greater power than Abel, and for that reason Cain prevailed over Abel. On the same principle, they honoured those persons, who are recorded in Scripture as the worst of mankind: such as the inhabitants of Sodom; Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; and, in particular, the traitor Judas, who, they said, knowing that the salvation of mankind was to be procured by the death of Jesus Christ, delivered him to his enemies to be executed, notwithstanding the resistance of certain powers, that wished ill to our happiness and would have prevented him. The Cainites adopted whatever was most impure and ignominious among the Gnostics and other heretics.

CAKES. The Hebrews had several sorts of cakes, which they offered in the temple. They were made of meal, of wheat, or of barley; and they were kneaded sometimes with oil, sometimes with honey, and sometimes only rubbed over with oil when baked, or fried with oil in a pan. At Aaron's consecration, they offered unleavened bread, and cakes unleavened, tempered with oil; and wafers unleavened, anointed with oil; the whole being made of fine wheaten flour. (Exod. xxix. 1, 2.)

All offerings made of grain, flour, paste, bread, or cakes, are denominated in the Hebrew מִנְחָה mincha. These offerings were either alone, or with other things. Sometimes fine flour was offered, (Levit. ii. 1.); or cakes, or other things baked, (Id. ib. 4.); or cakes baked in a frying-pan, (Id. ib. 5.); or in a frying pan with holes, or upon a gridiron. (Id. ib. 7.) Ears of corn were sometimes offered, in order to be roasted, and the corn separated from them.

These offerings of corn, cakes, &c. were instituted principally in favour of the poor. This, however, is to be understood of voluntary offerings, not appointed by the law; for, with respect to certain sacrifices, the law, instead of two lambs and an ewe, permits the poor to offer only one lamb and two young pigeons.

These cakes offered in sacrifice were salted and unleavened; for nothing not salted or having leaven in it, might be offered to God, though leavened or common loaves might be given to the priest as presents, for food. If, therefore, the cakes, which were offered, were baked in an oven, and sprinkled or kneaded with oil, the whole was presented to the priest, who waved the offering before the Lord; and then taking so much of it as was to be burned on the altar, he threw that into the fire, and kept the rest himself. (Levit. ii. 9.) If the offering was a cake kneaded with oil, and baked in a frying-pan, it was broken, and oil was poured on it; and it was then presented to the priest, who took of it a handful, which he threw on the fire of the altar, and reserved the rest for himself. It is observable, that in the East oil answers the purpose of butter.

Cakes or loaves offered with sacrifices of beasts, as was customary, were kneaded with oil. The wine and oil were not poured upon the head of the animal about to be sacrificed, but on the fire, in which the victim was consumed. (Numb. xxviii. 1, 2, 3, &c.) The law regulated the quantity of meal, wine, and oil, for each kind of victim. To the sacrifice of a bullock, were added three assarions of flour, kneaded with half-a-hin of oil, and as much wine; to a ram, two assarions, or two-tenths of an ephah of flour, with the third of a hin of oil, and as much wine; to a goat, or ewe, of lambs or kids, one tenth deal of flour kneaded with one fourth part of a hin of oil, and another of wine.

CA'LAH, כַּלָּה, Χαλάχ, signifies favourable, opportunity; otherwise, as the verdure, or green fruit; otherwise, humility; otherwise, a table, a floor. Calah was a city of Assyria, built by Ashur, or by Nimrod, (Gen. x. 12.); for some suppose the phrase, in which the founding of this city is mentioned, to be ambiguous. It is observed, that whoever founded it, it was distant from Nineveh, and that the city Resen was situated between Calah and Nineveh.

Since we find in Strabo a country about the head of the river Lycus, called Calachene, it is very probable that this country took its name from Calach, which was once its capital. To this city and country it was, in all probability, that Shalmaneser carried some of the ten tribes of Israel. (2 Kings xvii. 6.) For though the word in that place seems rather differently spelt, yet the two letters, in which the difference consists, are frequently used for each other; and what in this passage is written in our Bible, Halah, may be written, agreeably to the Hebrew, Chalah, or Chalach, and therefore little differing from Calah or Calach. Bochart also thinks, that this is the same city as is called Halah. Cellarius understands it to be Holwan, a famous town under the caliphs, in the Syriac spoken dialect called Hhulon, but in the Syriac documents written Hhalach. However, the different initial letter militates against this change. Ephraim, the Syrian, understands Hatra, a city in the region of the Zab, which falls into the Tigris. The Arab Geographer calls this city Aklah, which certainly differs in some respects from the Hebrew Calach, and from the Syriac Hhalach; yet this last word not only approaches it as it stands, but, by transposition of the syllables, forms the name Ach-lahh. Sacred Geography; Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 120.

CAL'AMUS, as it is termed in Canticles, (iv. 14.) and Ezekiel, (xxvii. 19.) or SWEET CALAMUS, as it is denominated in Exodus, (xxx. 23.) or SWEET CANE, as it is rendered in Isaiah, (xliiii. 24.) and Jeremiah, (vi. 20.) is the Calamus Aromaticus in the Materia Medica of the ancients. It consists of the stalk, not the root, as Calmet thinks, of a plant of the reed kind, found in pieces of ten or twelve inches long, from the thickness of a goose-quill to that of a wheaten straw. It is full of knots or joints in the manner of our common reed, and has an agreeable aromatic smell, when fresh broken. It grows very common in many places in the East Indies, where the inhabitants use it in their sauces, and esteem it as a cordial and stomachic. It is said to be a diuretic, and the fume of it, burnt with turpentine, is recommended for diseases of the breast.

Among the moderns it is known only as an ingredient in the theriaca. In Scripture, it is mentioned among the particular drugs, of which the sacred perfumes were compounded.

CA'LEB, כִּלְב, signifies a dog, or a crow, or a basket; otherwise, as the heart. Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, of the tribe of Judah, was sent with Joshua and others of Israel, to view the land of Canaan. (Numb. xiii. 2, &c.) They went through the country, and brought with them some of its finest fruits, as specimens of its productions; but, after this report of the beauty and goodness of the country, some of the spies added, 'The inhabitants are of extraordinary strength, and the cities are large, and enclosed with prodigiously high walls.' This raised a murmuring among the people; but Joshua and Caleb said to them, 'The country is excellent, let us go boldly, and take possession.' But the other deputies told the people, that they could never make themselves masters of it, because the inhabitants, who possessed it, were giants, in comparison of whom, they said, we appeared only as grasshoppers. This happened in the year of the world 2514, and before Jesus Christ 1490; when Caleb was forty years of age.

The people, therefore, openly declared against this expedition. Joshua and Caleb encouraged the undertaking; but the people would have stoned them, if the glory of the Lord had not appeared, and sentenced the whole multitude to die in the desert, except Joshua and Caleb. (Numb. xiv.)

When Joshua had invaded and conquered a great part of Canaan, Caleb with his tribe came to Gilgal to see him. Caleb said to Joshua, Thou knowest what the Lord said to Moses in my favour: I was forty years old when Moses sent me to view this country. I made my report with truth, and repressed, as far as I was able, the murmurs of the people. I am now above fourscore; and my health and my strength are not impaired. Give me, I pray thee, this mountain, in which the Anakim dwell, that I may possess it. Joshua bestowed on him many blessings, and granted his request. (Josh. xiv. 6, &c.)

Caleb, therefore, in the year of the world 2559, marched with his tribe against the city of Arba, afterwards called Hebron, (Id. xv. 13, 14.); and having taken it, he killed three giants of the race of Anak, viz. Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmi. Thence he went to Debir, otherwise Kirjath-sepher; but as this place was extremely strong, Caleb promised his daughter Achsah in marriage to the man, by whom it was taken. Othniel, the son of Kenaz, took it, and married Caleb's daughter. It is thought that Caleb survived Joshua; but the time of his death is unknown.

CALEB, (1 Chron. ii. 18.) or CHELUBAI, (Id. ib. 9.) was the son of Hezron, who first married Azubah, and afterwards Ephrath. (Id. ib. 18, 19.) In the twenty-fourth verse of this chapter is a difficulty in the Hebrew text. By our translators it is rendered, 'And after that Hezron was dead in Caleb-Ephratah', which is supposed by Le Clerc and others to be the name of a place so denominated from Caleb and his wife. In the Septuagint it is ἡλθε Χαλὲβ εἰς Ἐφραθά, and in the Vulgate Ingressus est Chaleb ad Ephrata; but Le Clerc is of opinion, that the translation in our Bible is the best.

CALF, the young of the ox kind. The Scripture frequently mentions calves, because they were commonly used in sacrifices. Sometimes the word calf is put for a heifer, and sometimes in opposition to a sucking calf under the care of its dam. The fattened calf, mentioned in several places of Scripture, (1 Sam. xxviii. 24. Luke xv. 23.) was fattened for some certain festival, or extraordinary sacrifice. It is said in Hosea, 'We will render the calves of our lips.' (Hos. xiv. 2.) By the calves of the lips, in this passage, we are to understand sacrifices of praise, prayers which the captives of Babylon addressed to God, when they could not offer sacrifices in his temple. The Septuagint read 'the fruit of our lips,' and their reading is followed by the Syriac, and by the apostle in his Epistle to the Hebrews, (xiii. 15.)

Jeremiah mentions a remarkable ceremony, which is scarcely noticed in the historical books of Scripture. The Lord says, 'I will give the men that have transgressed my covenant, that have not performed the words of the covenant, which they had made before me, when they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof,' &c. (Jerem. xxxiv. 18.) When, or on what occasion, this covenant was sworn to, is unknown. It is, however, probable, that it was not a long time preceding, as the men, who had sworn to observe this covenant, were still living. The custom of cutting a victim in two, of putting the several parts on two different altars, and obliging those, who contracted any covenant, to pass between them, is well known in Scripture and profane authors. See Genesis xv. 9, 10, 17.

CALF, Golden, which the Israelites worshipped at the foot of mount Sinai. (Exod. xxxii. 4, &c.) When the people saw that Moses delayed to come down from the mount, they assembled around Aaron, and said, 'Up, make us gods, which shall go before us. Aaron demanded their ear-rings, which were melted and cast into the form of a calf. When this was about to be consecrated, Moses being informed of it by God, came down from the mount, and calling on all, who detested this sin, the sons of Levi armed themselves, and slew of the people, who were utterly unprovided to resist an enemy, about twenty-three thousand men. It is, however, to be observed, that the Hebrew, Samaritan, Chaldee, Septuagint, and the greatest part of the old Greek and Latin fathers, instead of twenty-three thousand, read three thousand men; and it is scarcely probable, that more than three thousand could be put to death in so short a time. Our English translation gives three thousand as the number slain.

Our version of the Bible says, that Aaron formed this calf with a graving-tool, after he had cast it in a mould; and the Geneva translation, still worse, that he first engraved, and afterwards cast it. But it is thought, that the verse is more properly rendered in the following manner: 'And Aaron received them (the golden ear-rings) and tied them up in a bag, and got them cast into a molten calf.'

In the history of the golden calf we may observe, first, that Aaron calls his calf in the plural, 'gods:' 'these are thy gods—they who brought thee out of Egypt,' &c.; and the people say, 'Make us gods,' though only one image was made.

Secondly, the second commandment forbids the making to thyself of any graven image. However, in the instance of the cherubim, graven images were made, though not to thyself, that is, to any private individual, nor for the purpose of visible worship, but for interior emblems, in the most holy place, never seen by the people.

Thirdly, Aaron did not make his calf with his own hands, most probably, but committed it to some sculptor, who wrought not openly in the midst of the camp, but in his workshop. The Jews say, that the image was formed into a calf by some evil spirits, who accompanied the Israelites from Egypt; and if they mean evil human spirits, it is probable that they are right. The sacred writers in succeeding ages plainly speak of the golden calf as a very great sin. (Psalm cvi. 19, 20. Acts vii. 41. Deut. ix. 21.)

Fourthly, Aaron though greatly misled, must have meant by this worship something more than the mere worship of Apis, for in what sense had Apis 'brought Israel out of the land of Egypt?' He would rather have kept them there than have thence liberated them. Jeroboam uses the same language. (1 Kings xii. 28.) It is strange, that Jeroboam, so long after the Exodus, should so strongly allude to that event, if Apis had been the object of his calves. Were his idols exposed to public view, so that whereas the cherubim at Jerusalem were unseen by worshippers, those at Dan, or at Bethel, were open to the inspection of all comers? It is hence usually thought, that the Hebrews, on this occasion, imitated the worship of the god Apis, whom they had seen adored in Egypt under the figure of a living bull, or of a bull made by art; or of a man with a bull's head; for several of the fathers, speaking of the golden calf, express themselves as if this figure had possessed only the head of a calf or bull.

Monceau, in his Aaron Purgatus, has endeavoured to show that the golden calf made by Aaron resembled the cherubim, upon which, as he supposes, the Lord sat, when he appeared to Moses on mount Sinai. By his account, these cherubim were winged oxen, such as Moses afterwards made to the mercy-seat. He adds, that the sin of Aaron did not consist so much in making the golden calf, as in giving the people an opportunity of a superstitious and an idolatrous worship, and of transferring to a figure the worship due to God alone.

Though Aaron was blameably active in this matter, yet he seems more to have suffered and tolerated, than to have promoted the evil. The expression is remarkable: 'The Lord plagued the people, because THEY made the calf, which Aaron made.' (Exod. xxxii. 35.) Though he received the ear-rings from the people, yet whether the calf was made by his own hands, or even under his express direction, may be reasonably doubted. It would seem, that Aaron had given the gold, of which he had the custody, to a workman appointed by the people; that he followed the people in every part of this transaction; and that he endeavoured to guide, perhaps to oppose their opinion, in varying and appointing to the honour of Jehovah, what many, at least, the mixed multitude, would refer to the honour of the gods they had seen in Egypt. In this view, his expression deserves notice:—'to-morrow is a solemnity to JEHOVAH;' not to Apis, or to any other god, but to JEHOVAH. Such was the sentiment of Aaron, whatever sentiments some of the people might entertain; and his confession to Moses may be so taken: 'I cast it, that is, I gave it to be cast.' This making of the calf was certainly a work of time. It was not cast in a moment, nor in the midst of the camp, but in a proper workshop, or some other convenient place; and it was perhaps even forwarded more briskly than Aaron knew, or wished. It is probable, that he used all means of delay, though he sinfully yielded at last to a prevarication, or to a worship of JEHOVAH by an image, an impure medium of worship, forbidden by the second commandment. Perhaps the people fancied, that in referring this image to God, they avoided the sin of idolatry; and it is not improbable, that Aaron might entertain the same opinion. They might not understand the commandment already given as a prohibition of worshipping God by mediatorial representations, or public symbols of his presence.

CALVES, golden, of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat. This prince having been acknowledged king by Israel, to separate the ten tribes more effectually from the house of David, he provided for them new gods, whom they might worship in their own country, without going to the temple at Jerusalem. 'He made two calves of gold, and said unto the people, Behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt. Then he set up the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan, at the two extremities of his kingdom. And this thing became a sin: for the people went to worship before these calves even unto Dan and Bethel.' (1 Kings xii. 28, 29, 30.)

Monceau thought, that these golden calves of Jeroboam were imitations of the cherubim, and that they occasioned rather a schismatic than an idolatrous worship; and it is confessed, that all Israel did not renounce the worship of the Lord by adopting that of the golden calves, and by ceasing to go up to Jerusalem. God did not altogether abandon Israel; but he sent them prophets, and preserved a great number of faithful worshippers.

It is certain that Jeroboam's calves were not images of Baal, (1 Kings xvi. 31, 32. 2 Kings x. 28. 31.) Most commentators think, that Jeroboam designed by his golden calves to imitate the worship of Apis, which he had seen in Egypt. (1 Kings xi. 40.) The Scripture frequently reproaches him with having made Israel to sin; and when it would describe a bad prince, it says, that he imitated the sins of Jeroboam. The prophets every where bitterly exclaim against the worship of these golden calves. 'The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear,' says Hosea, 'because of the calves of Bethaven.' (Hos. x. 5.) The Assyrians having taken Samaria, carried off the golden calves, with their worshippers. Additions to Calmet's Dictionary; Ancient Universal History, lib. i. cap. 7.

CALIXTINES, a branch of the Husites in Bohemia and Moravia, in the fifteenth century. They obtained their denomination from their insisting to be allowed the use of the cup or chalice, in the celebration of the eucharist. They were temperate in their proceedings, and showed no disposition to overturn the ancient system of church-government. They demanded, that the word of God should be explained to the people in a plain and perspicuous manner, without any superstitious comments or inventions; that the sacrament of the Lord's Supper should be administered in both kinds; that the clergy, instead of employing all their attention in acquiring riches and power, should turn their thoughts to objects more suitable to their profession, and endeavour to live and act as became the successors of the apostles; and that transgressions of a heinous kind should be severely punished.

CALIXTINES was also a name given to those among the Lutherans, who followed the opinion of George Calixtus, a celebrated divine in the seventeenth century. Calixtus endeavoured to unite the Romish, Lutheran, and Calvinistic churches, in the bonds of charity and mutual benevolence. He maintained, first, that the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, by which he meant those elementary principles, whence all its truths flow, were preserved pure in all the three communions, and were contained in that ancient form of doctrine commonly known by the Apostles' Creed; and, secondly, that the tenets and opinions, which had been constantly received by the ancient doctors, during the first five centuries, were to be considered as of equal truth and authority with the express declarations and doctrines of Scripture. The freedom and plainness, with which he delivered his sentiments, drew upon him a host of enemies; but in the year 1656, death terminated his labours, and removed him from scenes of dissension and tumult into the regions of peace and concord. Mosheim, vol. iv. p. 450, 451; Broughton, vol. i. p. 192.

CALL frequently signifies to be; but, perhaps, it includes the idea of admitted to be, acknowledged to be, well known to be, the thing called; since men do not commonly call a thing otherwise than what they conclude it is. 'His name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace,' (Isaiah ix. 6.); that is, he shall possess all these qualities, and shall be truly the wonderful, the mighty God, &c. 'He shall be called the Son of God,' (Luke i. 35.); that is, he shall be truly the Son of God. Of John the Baptist it is said, he shall be called the prophet of the Highest; that is, he shall be acknowledged under that character.

To call, in the sense of a vocation, to an employment; to the Christian religion. Paul says, he was called to the apostleship, (Rom. i. 1.) Jesus Christ says, 'Many are called, but few are chosen.' (Matt. xx. 16.) We are exhorted to live in a manner worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called.

To call any thing by its name; to affix a name to it, is an act of authority. The father names his son; and the master, his servant, 'God calleth the stars by their names.' (Psalm cxlvii. 4.)

To call on the name of God, signifies to call him to our assistance, to intreat him in our necessities. 'Then began men to call on the name of the Lord,' (Gen. iv. 26.); but some translate it, to profane the name of the Lord. See ENOS.

To call on God, sometimes signifies all the acts of religion, the whole public worship of God. 'Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord;' that is, whosoever shall believe, trust, love, pray, &c. as he ought, 'shall be saved.' (Rom. x. 13.) God, in some sort, receives it as an honour that we should call on him; he is, in some sort, jealous of our adoration, and requires, that we should call on no other god besides himself. 'Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me.' (Psalm l. 15.)

CAL'NEH, כַּלְנֶה, signifies our consumption; or, all we; or, as murmuring; otherwise, he that abodes or sojourns. Calneh was a city in the land of Shinaar, built by Nimrod, and formerly the seat of his empire. (Gen. x. 10.) It is supposed to be the Calno of Isaiah, (x. 9.) and the Canneh of Ezekiel, (xxvii. 23.) It is observed, that Calneh must have been situated in Mesopotamia, since these prophets join it with Haran, Eden, Assyria, and Chilmad, which traded with Tyre. It is said by the Chaldee interpreters, and also by Eusebius and Jerom, to be the same as Ctesiphon, which was situated on the Tigris, about three miles from Seleucia, and that it was for some time the capital city of the Parthians.

In the Memoirs of the Royal Academy of France, it is said, that 'the name of Calneh (which is construed habitaculum perfectum), the fourth city founded by Nimrod, seems to be found in that of Chalonite, a district of Babylon on the east of the Tigris. This induces a very general opinion that Calneh is Ctesiphon, originally the capital of that province, and since the metropolis of all the Parthian empire, and the winter residence of their kings.' Memoires de l'Academie Royale, tome xxvii. p. 31; Buckingham's Travels in Mesopotamia, vol. ii. p. 463; Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 113.

CAL'VARY, or GOLGOTHA, signifies the place of a skull, and is supposed to be so called by reason of its similitude to the figure of a skull. It was a small hill north of Mount Sion; and being appropriated to the execution of malefactors, it was excluded the walls of the city, as an execrable and a polluted place. But since our Saviour suffered upon it, it has been resorted to with such devotion by Christians, that it has become the centre of the new city of Jerusalem, and a great part of the hill of Sion has been excluded for the admission of Mount Calvary. See JERUSALEM.

This mount is also honoured with a church, called the Church of the Sepulchre, from its being built over the place where was our Lord's sepulchre.

CALVINISTS, those who embrace the doctrine and sentiments of Calvin, the celebrated reformer of the Christian church from Romish superstition and doctrinal errors.

John Calvin was born at Noyon, in Picardy, in 1509. He received his education at Paris and other places, where different branches of literature were taught with celebrity. Discovering early marks of piety, he was designed by his father for the church, and was accordingly presented to a living near Noyon, the place of his nativity. But conceiving a dislike to the corruptions of popery, he quitted the church, and turned his attention to the law. Visiting Paris, he made himself known to those, who had privately embraced the reformation. A persecution arising against the reformers, he went to Basle, where he published his famous work, The Institutes of the Christian Religion, which spread abroad his fame, though, it is said, he was then desirous of living in obscurity. Not long after this, he became minister and professor of divinity at Geneva. In this department he acquitted himself with great ability, and was indefatigable in promoting the reformation. He continued to discharge the duties of his station with fidelity, till his death, which happened in the year 1564. Calvin was a man, whose extensive genius, flowing eloquence, immense learning, extraordinary penetration, indefatigable industry, and fervent piety, placed him at the head of the reformers; all of whom he surpassed in learning and ability, and most of them in obstinacy, asperity, and turbulence. His burning Servetus, a Spanish physician, for writing against the doctrine of the Trinity, has left an indelible stain on his memory.

At first, the name of Calvinists was given to those, who embraced not merely the doctrine, but the church-government and discipline established at Geneva, and was intended to distinguish them from the Lutherans. But since the meeting of the synod of Dort, this appellation has been applied chiefly to those, who embrace his leading views of the Gospel, and is intended to distinguish them from the Arminians.

The leading principles of Calvin were the same as those of Augustin. The principal doctrines, by which those called Calvinists are distinguished from the Arminians, are reduced to five articles, which, from their being the chief points discussed at the synod of Dort, have since been denominated the five points. These are, predestination, particular redemption, total depravity, effectual calling, and the certain perseverance of the saints.

1. The Calvinists maintain, that God hath chosen unto eternal glory a certain number of the fallen race of Adam in Christ, before the foundation of the world, according to his immutable purpose, and of his free grace and love, without the least foresight of faith, good works, or any conditions performed by the creature; and that he was pleased to pass by, and ordain to dishonour and wrath, the rest of mankind, for their sins, to the praise of his vindictive justice.

In proof of this, they adduce, among many other Scripture passages, the following: 'According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy, and without blame before him in love.' God saith to Moses, 'I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. So, then, it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God, that showeth mercy. Thou wilt say then, Why doth he yet find fault; for who hath resisted his will? Nay, but, O man! who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump, to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?' (Rom. ix. 15—21.; xi. 1—6.; viii. 29, 30. 2 Thess. ii. 13.) The Calvinists, however, do not consider predestination as affecting the agency or accountableness of the creature, or as being to him any rule of conduct. On the contrary, they suppose him to act as freely, and to be as much the proper subject of calls, warnings, exhortations, promises, and threatenings, as if no decree existed.

2. They maintain, that though the death of Christ be a most perfect sacrifice, and satisfaction for sins, of infinite value, and abundantly sufficient to expiate the sins of the whole world; and though on this ground the Gospel is to be preached to all mankind indiscriminately; yet it was the will of God, that Christ, by the blood of the cross, should efficaciously redeem those only, who from eternity were elected to salvation, and given to him by the Father.

In proof of this doctrine, they adduce, among others, the following Scripture passages: 'Thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him.'—'The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep.'—'He died not for that nation only, but that he might gather together in one the children of God that are scattered abroad.'

3. The Calvinists maintain, that mankind are totally depraved, in consequence of the fall of the first man, the sin of whom, as their public head, involved the corruption of all his posterity; and that this corruption extends over the whole soul, and renders it unable to turn to God, or to do any thing truly good, and exposes it to his righteous displeasure, both in this world and in that which is to come.

In proof of this doctrine, they adduce the following passages from Scripture, besides many others: 'By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned.'—'By one man's disobedience many were made sinners.'—'I was born in sin and shapen in iniquity.'—'God looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, that did seek, God. Every one of them is gone back; they are altogether become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no not one.'—'And you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins. Wherein in time past ye walked according to the course of this world, among whom also we all had our conversation in times past, in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind; and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others.'

4. The Calvinists maintain, that all, whom God hath predestinated unto life, he is pleased, in his appointed time, effectually to call by his Word and Spirit out of that state of sin and death, in which they are by nature, to grace and salvation by Jesus Christ.

They admit that the Holy Spirit, as calling men by the ministry of the Gospel, may be resisted, and that where this is the case, the fault is not in the Gospel, nor in Christ offered by the Gospel, nor in God calling by the Gospel, and also conferring various gifts upon them, but in those who are called. Yet, they contend, that when men are converted, it is not to be ascribed to themselves, as though by their own free will they made themselves to differ, but merely to him, who delivers them from the power of darkness, and translates them into the kingdom of his dear Son, and whose regenerating influence is certain and efficacious. In proof of this doctrine they adduce, among others, the following passages of Scripture: 'Whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also glorified.'—'That ye may know what is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead.'—'We are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works.'

5. Lastly, the Calvinists maintain, that those, whom God has effectually called and sanctified by his Spirit, shall never finally fall from a state of grace. They admit that true believers may fall partially, and would fall totally and finally, unless it were for the mercy and faithfulness of God, who keepeth the feet of his saints; that he, who bestoweth the grace of perseverance, bestoweth it by means of reading and hearing the word, of meditation, exhortations, threatenings, and promises; but that none of these things imply the possibility of a believer's falling from a state of justification.

In proof of this doctrine, they adduce, among others, the following passages of Scripture: 'I will put my fear in their hearts, and they shall not depart from me.' 'He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved.' 'The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life.' 'This is the Father's will, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing.'

Such were the doctrines of the Old Calvinists, and such in substance are those of the present time. In this, however, as in every other denomination, are considerable shades of difference. Some, who are called Moderate Calvinists, are of opinion, that Calvin, though principally right, has yet carried matters too far. Others, who are denominated High Calvinists, think that he did not go far enough.

It is necessary to add, that the Calvinistic system includes in it the doctrine of three co-ordinate persons in the Godhead, in one nature; and of two natures in Jesus Christ, forming one person. Justification by faith alone, or justification by the imputed righteousness of Christ, constitutes also an essential part of this system. The Calvinists suppose, that on the one hand our sins are imputed to Christ, and on the other, that we are justified by the imputation of Christ's righteousness to us; that is, Christ, the innocent, was treated by God as if he were guilty, that we, the guilty, might, from regard to what he did and suffered, be treated as if we were innocent and righteous.

Calvin considered every church as a separate and an independent body, invested with the power of legislation for itself. He proposed that it should be governed by presbyteries and synods, composed of clergy and laity, without bishops, or any clerical subordination; and he maintained, that the province of the civil magistrate extended only to its protection and outward accommodation. He acknowledged a real, though spiritual, presence of Christ in the eucharist; and he confined the privilege of communion to pious and regenerate believers. These sentiments, however, are not imbibed by all, who are called Calvinists.

Calvinism originally subsisted in its greatest purity in the city of Geneva. From this place, the doctrine and discipline of the reformed church, as modelled by Calvin, were propagated, first, in Germany, where they were established in a permanent manner. At first, the French Protestants were uniform only in their antipathy to the church of Rome; but afterwards they entered into communion with the church of Geneva. By the edict of Nantes in 1598, Henry IV. allowed them the liberty of serving God according to their consciences. The church of Scotland acknowledges as its founder John Knox, the disciple of Calvin; and, accordingly, from its first reformation, it adopted the doctrine, rites, and form of ecclesiastical government, established at Geneva. To these it has always adhered, and maintained them with the greatest jealousy and zeal. A different constitution of things is observable in the church of England, which refused entirely to comply with the ecclesiastical laws of Geneva, and which retained only for a short time even those, which it adopted. In the reign of Edward VI., Geneva was acknowledged as a sister-church; and the theological system established by Calvin, was adopted, and rendered the public rule of faith in England. However, no change took place in the form of episcopal government, which was entirely different from that of Geneva; and several rites and ceremonies, which were considered as superstitious by some of the reformed, were retained. This difference between the two churches afterwards proved a source of many calamities and dissensions, which were highly detrimental to the civil and ecclesiastical constitution of Great Britain. Ever since 1571, Calvinism has been the prevailing religion in the United Provinces. Adam's Religious World, vol. ii. p. 220, &c.; Evans's Sketch, p. 68, &c. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iv. p. 70, &c.; Adam's View of Religions, Art. Calvin.

CAMALDOLITES, an order founded in 1023, upon the Apennines, by St. Romuald, an Italian fanatic. The manner of life he enjoined his disciples to observe was as follows: They dwelt in separate cells, and met together only at the time of prayer. Some of them during the two Lents in the year, and others for the space of a hundred days, observed an inviolable silence. On Sundays and Thursdays they fed on herbs; and the rest of the week on bread and water only. Mosheim, vol. ii. p. 306.

CAMEL, in the Linnæan system, a genus of quadrupeds of the order of the pecora, or those which have cutting teeth in their under, but none in their upper jaw, and only five molar teeth in both. There are two varieties of this very useful animal: one, which is called more peculiarly the camel, has two protuberances upon its back; the other, which obtains the name of dromedary, has only one, and is neither so large nor so strong as the former. Both races intermix. The camel has a small head, short ears, and a long bending neck. Its height to the top of the dorsal protuberance, is about six feet and a-half. The colour of the hair on the protuberances is dusky, and that on the other parts is reddish ash. It has a long tail; small hoofs; and flat feet, divided above, but not separated. On the legs are six callosities; and besides the four stomachs, which all ruminating quadrupeds possess, it has a fifth, which serves as a reservoir for carrying a supply of water in the sandy parched deserts, that it is obliged to traverse.

Moses ranks the camel among unclean animals, (Deut. xiv. 7. Levit. xi. 4.) because it does not 'divide the division of the hoof,' the characteristic mark required in a clean beast. However, every part of it is now applied to some beneficial purpose. The flesh, milk, hair, urine, and even dung of this animal, are all turned to advantage. But its chief utility consists in its being a beast of burden in countries where no other quadruped could live and perform that office. By means of this useful creature, the trade of Turkey, Arabia, Persia, Barbary, and Egypt, is principally carried on. It is qualified not only to carry heavy burdens, but to support extreme abstinence, and to travel with great expedition; and it is, therefore, essentially serviceable to the natives in the parched deserts of Africa, Arabia, and other tropical countries. Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Ind. p. 51.

CAMELEON, a species of lizard. This animal has a crooked cylindrical tail, and, including this appendage, measures about a foot in length. Its thickness varies at different seasons, as it possesses the faculty of contracting or expanding itself at pleasure. The skin is very unequal, but soft. When the creature is at rest, the eminences on its surface appear of a bluish grey, and the spaces between them of a pale red and yellow; but when viewed in different lights, it assumes every tint of colouring, and no two individuals can agree as to the exact shades it presents to the eye. Hence, in all ages, it has been alluded to as the emblem of a fickle unsettled mind, which varies with every turn of opinion, and is constant in nothing but perpetual change. It feeds on flies and other insects, which it catches with its tongue. The flesh of this creature, was forbidden by the law of Moses. (Levit. xi. 30.)

It has been questioned whether the Hebrew word הכח hecoch, be truly aameleon. Bochart is of opinion, that hecoch signifies a large lizard, which is found in Arabia, and which attacks serpents in their holes, and kills them. By the Arabians it is called aluarlo.

CAMERONIANS, or CAMERONITES, the denomination of a party of Calvinists in France, who asserted that the will of man is determined only by the practical judgment of the mind; that the cause of men's doing good or evil proceeds from the knowledge, which God infuses into them; and that God does not move the will physically, but only morally, in virtue of its dependence on the judgment. They obtained this name from John Cameron, who was born at Glasgow, in 1580, and who was professor there, and afterwards at Bourdeaux, Sedan, and Saumur. The synod of Dort was severe against them; yet it seems the only difference was as follows:—The synod had defined that God not only illuminates the understanding, but gives motion to the will, by causing in it an internal change. Cameron admitted only the illumination, by which the mind is morally moved; and he explained the sentiment of the synod of Dort, so as to render the two opinions consistent. Adam's View of Religions, p. 114.

CAMERONIANS, is a name sometimes given to the old Presbyterian dissenters of Scotland, from the Rev. Richard Cameron, who fell at Airmoss, in Kyle, in 1680, by the sword of his bloody persecutors. They have been also called Whigs, a term often applied to the friends of civil and religious liberty; Mountain-men, on account of their adhering to the same cause with those, who preached the Gospel upon the mountains and moors of Scotland, during the persecution; and M'Millans, from the name of the first minister, who espoused their cause, after the revolution. But they have assumed to themselves the appellation of Old Presbyterian Dissenters, on account of the part, which their forefathers acted at the revolution in 1688-9, in openly and candidly dissenting from the public deeds of those, who acted as the nation's representatives, in both church and state; and because they are of a longer standing, as a distinct body, than any other denomination of Presbyterians, that have separated from the established church.

The Old Dissenters contend only for the same opinions, which were generally received by all ranks of men in the purest time of the reformation, between 1638 and 1649. During the usurpation of Cromwell, from 1651 till 1660, and the succeeding twenty-eight years of bloody persecution, from the restoration of Charles II. in 1660 till the revolution in 1688, was a gradual and most alarming defection from the principles of the reformation. However, in these days of trouble, rebuke, and blasphemy, were some faithful witnesses for Christ and his cause. The last ordained minister, who openly espoused their opinions, previously to the revolution, was the Rev. James Renwick, who suffered at the grass market of Edinburgh, Feb. 17, 1688. When the general assembly met at Edinburgh, in 1689, three ministers, who had succeeded Mr. Renwick, deserted their flock, and acceded to the judicatories of the revolution church. Thus the people, who wished closely to adhere to the attainments of the reformation, were left as sheep without a shepherd. In this trying situation, they continued to have praying societies, into which they had formed themselves for some time before; and they stedfastly retained the same principles, which had been openly espoused, and solemnly ratified, by the covenanted church of Scotland, in the times of her purest reformation. In 1706, the Rev. John M'Millan, who had been minister of Balmaghie, in Galloway, but previously to this had separated from the judicatories of the revolution church, acceded to them, and espoused their cause. Having received an unanimous call to be their minister, he took the pastoral charge of them, and laboured successfully amongst them for many years. After some time, he was joined by the Rev. Thomas Nairn, who had been in connection with the secession church, but dissented from them, for reasons, which were published to the world. Mr. M'Millan and he, with some ruling elders, who had been regularly ordained before, and held the same principles, constituted a presbytery, in the name of Christ the sole head of his church, on the first of August, 1743, under the title of the reformed presbytery. This title it still bears, for the reason that it is at least the honest intention of this people, faithfully to adhere to all the attainments of the reformation, in both church and state. On this account, they think that they may be justly called the reformed, or reformation-presbytery; whilst, in another point of view, they might, with equal propriety, be denominated the dissenting presbytery. Mr. Alexander Marshall, who had studied divinity for a competent number of years, was approved by the reformed presbytery, and licensed by them to preach the Gospel, in April 1744. Soon after, he received a call, was regularly ordained, and took his seat with the other two, as co-presbyter. After this, the reformed presbytery gradually increased in the number of both ministers and people.

The Old Dissenters are so far from being unfriendly to civil government as some have supposed, that they have uniformly and strenuously contended, that it is a valuable ordinance, instituted by the Creator of heaven and earth, and made known in the revelations of his will, for his own glory, the external protection of his church, and the good of mankind. They find no fault with the particular kind of government established in this country. They object only to the terms, or fundamental conditions, on which persons are admitted into places of power, and trust in the nation. If they thought these agreeable to the revealed will of God, and consistent with the fundamental laws of the kingdom, in the purest times of that reformation, to which they wish still to adhere, they would feel a pleasure in concurring with the other inhabitants of Britain, in an acknowledgment of the civil powers. But believing that the present terms of advancement to power are of a different nature, and especially perceiving that an unwarranted supremacy over the church of Christ forms an essential part of the constitution, and the support of it the positively fixed and indispensable condition, upon which persons are admitted into places of trust, the Old Dissenters cannot in judgment approve of these terms. On the contrary, they find themselves under the disagreeable necessity of openly entering their protest against national backsliding, in both church and state. In acting thus, they consider themselves as proceeding on the great and generally admitted principle, that human society is formed by mutual consent, and not by compulsion. The Old Dissenters, therefore, cannot consistently be refused the privilege of openly avowing their satisfaction with the fundamental laws of that great national society, to which, in the persons of their worthy ancestors, they heartily gave their consent, and to which they still consent in their own persons. Nor can they be justly blamed, after using the best means of information in their power, for following the dictates of their own minds, in dissenting from the acts of those, who, in their opinion, receded at the revolution from the former laudable attainments, and re-organized the society on principles entirely different. But after publicly entering their dissent from the government of church and state, as settled at the revolution, and candidly assigning their reasons for that dissent, it ever has been, and they trust, it ever will be, their study to live peaceably and inoffensively. They sincerely wish, by every consistent means in their power, to promote the peace and happiness of human society, wherever Providence orders their lot. They are strenuous advocates for the binding obligation of the national covenant of Scotland, and of the solemn league and covenant of the three kingdoms, Scotland, England, and Ireland. Believing that the holy Scriptures warrant public vowing, or covenanting unto the Lord; and that either the church, a whole nation, or any other organized body of professing Christians, may, as well as the individual, bind their own souls by solemn covenant to serve God, and keep his commandments; they conclude that such acts, when regulated by the revealed will of God, must be of perpetual obligation, and that such a society becomes a permanent society, which is not dissolved by the death of those, who compose it, but continues with their posterity.

The Old Dissenters are strict presbyterians: they consider the Scriptures as their infallible standard; and in subordination to them, they adopt the form of presbyterian church-government, agreed on by the assembly at Westminster. They receive the form of sound words, delivered by Christ himself in the sacred oracles, as the rule of their doctrine. Subordinate to this, they adopt the Westminster Confession of Faith, with the larger and shorter Catechisms; which they consider as a well-digested summary of what ought to be taught in the church. Public prayers, with the heart and the understanding, and in a known tongue, but not in written or humanly prescribed forms; singing psalms of divine inspiration only; reading and expounding the Scriptures; preaching and hearing the word; administering and receiving the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper; together with public fasting and thanksgiving, as the circumstances of the church require; all these are considered by them as the divinely appointed ordinances of religious worship. At the same time, they reject all rites and ceremonies of human invention. They also follow in substance, as a subordinate rule, the Westminster Directory for Public Worship. For regulating their discipline, they wish carefully to attend to what the Spirit saith to the churches, especially in the New Testament. In conformity with this, they obtain what aid they can from the ancient books of discipline, of public authority, in the Church of Scotland, together with the acts and decisions of the Assembly, in the time of the reformation. With respect to the mode of proceeding in these matters, they observe nearly the same forms of process as the other presbyterian churches of Scotland.

The Old Dissenters have not been accustomed to take any particular notice of their eminent men; but they hope that there are amongst them those, who have endeavoured honestly to declare the counsel of God. They cannot boast of the numbers of either their ministers or their people; and they adopt the language of the Psalmist, that they are 'small and despised.' In 1810 the Reformed Presbytery in Scotland formed itself into a synod of three presbyteries, which is called the Reformed Presbyterian Synod of Scotland. It has under its charge twenty-six congregations, of which sixteen have fixed pastors. Nearly about the same period, the Reformed Presbytery in Ireland constituted itself into the Reformed Presbyterian Synod of Ireland; including four presbyteries, in which are twenty-one congregations. Of these fifteen have fixed pastors. In America also there is now a Reformed Presbyterian Synod, which in 1819 comprehended four presbyteries. There were then twenty congregations in America with fixed pastors.

In Scotland the number of ministers is increasing, while the members continue nearly the same. They have now, moreover, a Professor of Theology, under whose charge candidates for the ministry are placed for four years' preparation.

CAMPHIRE, or CAMPHOR-TREE, the tree, from which a well-known drug of the same name is prepared. It is a species of laurel. The drug is neither a resin, a volatile salt, an oil, a juice, a bitumen, nor a gum; but it is a mixed substance, dry, white, transparent, and brittle, and is of a strong and penetrating fragrant smell. Every part of the tree, which produces camphire, abounds with it; yet it is not collected from the tree in the manner of other resins, but by a sort of chemical process. The Indians distinguish two kinds of camphire, a finer and a coarser: the finer is produced in Borneo and Sumatra, is very rare, and never imported into Europe; the coarser, in Japan, and is common both in India and Europe. The spouse in the Canticles observes, 'My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire in the vineyards of Engedi,' (i. 14.); and it is said, 'Thy plants are an orchard of pomegranates, with pleasant fruits, camphire with spikenard.' (Ibid. iv. 13.)

CANA, כנע, signifies zeal, or jealousy, or possession, or grief; or his nest; or cane, that is, a reed. Cana, in Galilee, is a small town, in which Jesus performed his first miracle. (John ii. 2, &c.) It is said to be situated between Sephoris and Nazareth, six miles west from Sephoris. Nathanael, whom our Lord received as a disciple, was of this place. (John xxi. 2.) It is called Cana of Galilee, to distinguish it from Cana, or Kana, which is mentioned in Joshua, (xix. 28.) and which belonged to the tribe of Asher, and was situated not far from Sidon. Cana of Galilee was in the tribe of Zebulun.

Cana, in Galilee, says D'Arvieux, was formerly a city, but is now a village almost deserted. Here is a church built by Helena, in the place where the marriage feast (John ii. 1.) was held. It is a building of wrought stones, now very old, and is divided by a great court. Sacred Geography; Wells's Geog. vol. ii. p. 155.

CANAAN, כנען, signifies, merchant, trafficker, or negotiant; otherwise, contrite, or broken; otherwise, rightly answering, or rightly afflicting. Some think it denotes 'a deep humiliation;' that is, either of his mother when pregnant, or of the enemy, or of strangers. But as the word seems to imply to lay low, to lay on the ground, it is probable that Canaan himself, at his birth, was, by some incident, laid on the ground, and derived his name from such an occurrence.

CANAAN, the son of Ham. The Hebrews believe, that Canaan having first discovered Noah's nakedness, told his father Ham; and that Noah, when he awoke, having understood what had passed, cursed Canaan, the first author of his indecency. Others are of opinion, that Noah, knowing nothing more displeasing to Ham than cursing

Canaan, resolved to punish him in his son. (Gen. ix. 25.)

Interpreters have invented several other reasons why the curse, which properly belonged to Ham, was inflicted on his son Canaan. 1. When Canaan is mentioned, Ham is not exempted from the malediction. On the contrary, he suffers more for it; for parents are more affected with their children's misfortunes than with their own, especially if the evils have been inflicted through some fault or folly of theirs. 2. God having blessed the three sons of Noah, when they went out of the ark, it was not proper that Noah's curse should interfere with the divine blessing, but very proper that it should be transferred to Canaan, with respect to the future extirpation of the people, that were to descend from him. 3. Some imagine, that in this place is an ellipsis of the word father, since such relative words are frequently omitted or understood in Scripture. Thus James of Zebedee, (Matt. iv. 21.) for the son of Zebedee; Mary of Cleophas, (John xix. 25.) for the wife of Cleophas; and Emmor of Sychem, (Acts vii. 16.) for the father of Sychem, which is properly supplied in our translation. In like manner, Canaan may be put for the father of Canaan, that is, Ham, as it is rendered in the Arabic and Septuagint translations. Though Ham had more sons, yet he may in this place be designated by his relation to Canaan, in whom the curse was more fixed and dreadful, and extended to his utter extirpation, whilst the rest of Ham's posterity, in succeeding ages, were blessed with the knowledge of the Gospel. In the Indian history of Noah, as given in the Asiatic Researches, Satyavarman (Noah) is said to have cursed Charma (Ham.)

The posterity of Canaan were numerous. His eldest son Sidon founded the city of Sidon, and was father of the Sidonians and Phœnicians. Canaan had ten other sons, who were fathers of as many tribes, dwelling in Palestine and Syria; viz. the Hittites, the Jebusites, the Amorites, the Girgasites, the Hivites, the Arkites, the Sinites, the Arvadites, the Zemarites, and the Hamathites. It is believed that Canaan lived and died in Palestine, which from him was called the land of Canaan. His tomb, twenty-five feet in length, was shown in a cave upon the Mountain of Leopards, not far from Jerusalem. Asiatic Researches, vol. iii. p. 263; Poole's Annotations.

CANAAN, land of, the country so denominated from Canaan, the son of Ham. The land of Canaan is situated between the Mediterranean Sea and the mountains of Arabia, and extends from Egypt to Phœnicia. It is bounded on the east, by the mountains of Arabia; on the south, by the wilderness of Paran, Idumæa, and Egypt; on the west, by the Mediterranean, called in Hebrew the Great Sea; and on the north, by the mountains of Libanus. Its length from the city of Dan, since called Cæsarea Philippi, or Paneas, to Beersheba, is about seventy leagues; and its breadth from the Mediterranean Sea to its eastern border, is in some places thirty leagues. Moses seems to intimate what was the original extent of the land of Canaan. 'The border,' says he, 'of the Canaanites was from Sidon, as thou comest to Gerar, unto Gaza; and as thou goest unto Sodom, and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Zeboim, even unto Lasha.' (Gen. x. 19.) By this sentence Moses accurately describes the four angles, in which the four borders of the land of Canaan met, as may be represented by the following diagram.

In process of time, we find some of the families of Canaan seated without these bounds, especially to the north; where in the sequel of the sacred history we meet with the Arvadites, the Hamathites, and other Canaanitish families. This seems also to be intimated by Moses, who says, 'And afterwards were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad.' (Gen. x. 18.)

This country, which was first called Canaan from the son of Ham, was afterwards denominated Palestine, from the Philistines. It had also the name of the Land of Promise, from the promise made by God to Abraham, that it should be given to him; of the Land of Israel, from the Israelites, who rendered themselves masters of it; the Land of Judah, from the tribe of Judah, which was the most considerable of the twelve; and of the Holy Land, which it retains to this day, and which it obtained from being sanctified by the presence, actions, miracles, and death of Jesus Christ. In modern writers, however, all distinction is frequently lost in the general name of Syria, which is given to the whole country east of the Mediterranean, between the sea and the desert.

The first inhabitants of this land were the Canaanites, descended from Canaan. Here they multiplied extremely. Trade and war were their principal occupations; and by these they gained great riches, and settled colonies in almost all the islands, &c. of the Mediterranean. When the measure of their idolatries and abominations was completed, God delivered their country into the hands of the Israelites, who conquered it under Joshua. Joshua destroyed great numbers, and obliged the rest to flee, some into Africa, and others into Greece. Some however, think, that many of them emigrated into Germany and Slavonia, and that others retired into America. In the time of Athanasius, the Africans continued to say, that they were descended from the Canaanites; and when asked their origin they answered Canani. It is agreed, that the Punic tongue was nearly the same as the Canaanitish and Hebrew.

The colonies, which Cadmus carried to Thebes in Bœotia, and his brother Cilix into Cilicia, were from the stock of Canaan. Sicily, Sardinia, Malta, Cyprus, Corfu, Majorca and Minorca, Gades and Ebusus, are thought to have been peopled by Canaanites. Bochart, in his Canaan, has set this matter in a good light.

Jacob and Moses, at the approach of their deaths, foretold the very soil and situation of every particular country, that should fall to the lot of each tribe. The division happened according to their prophecies. To the tribe of Judah was allowed a country abounding with vines and pasture ground, (Gen. xlix. 11.); to that of Asher, one plenteous in oil, iron, and brass, (Deut. xxxiii. 24, 25.); to that of Naphtali, one rich and fertile, (Id. ib. 23.); to that of Benjamin, one in which the temple was afterwards built, (Id. ib. 12.); to that of Zebulun, such territories as had many seaports, (Gen. xlix. 13.); to that of Issachar, a territory pleasant and fruitful, (Ibid. 15.); to those of Ephraim and Manasseh, such as were remarkable for precious fruits, (Deut. xxxiii. 14.); and to those of Simeon and Levi, no particular lands, the former obtaining a portion with Judah, and the latter being interspersed among the several tribes. Since, therefore, each particular lot corresponded so exactly with each prediction, it would be the height of stupidity not to acknowledge in these predictions the divine inspiration, and in these lots the divine direction.

Many of the ancient inhabitants in the north-west of the land of Canaan, particularly in the coast of Tyre and Sidon, were not expelled by the Israelites, and hence this tract seems to have retained the name of Canaan long after the other parts of the country, which were better inhabited by the Israelites, had lost that appellation. The Greeks called this tract inhabited by the old Canaanites, on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, Phœnicia, and the more inland parts, which were inhabited partly by Canaanites, and partly by Syrians, Syro-Phœnicia. Hence, the woman, whose daughter Jesus cured, is said by St. Matthew to be a woman of Canaan, (Matt. xv. 22.); and by St. Mark, as she was a Greek by religion and language, a Syro-Phœnician by nation. (Mark vii. 26.) Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 180.

We read in the life of Abraham (Gen. xii. 6; xiii. 7.) that the Canaanites were then in the land. This signifies that the sojourning of Abraham was prior to the seizure of the land of Canaan by a horde of foreigners, the same as afterwards overran Egypt; for the primary settlers, the true descendants of Canaan, were actually at this time in the land. It appears also, that Esau took to wife two Canaanite women, (Gen. xxxvi. 2.); which implies that the parents and relations of these women were Canaanites, as Anah and Zibeon, (Ib. 24, 25.) though of Hittite or Hivite families. We may, therefore, safely make a distinction between the truly ancient Canaanites, who first inhabited this country, and those Canaanites, who were destroyed, or expelled, by Joshua. In fact, the latter were late interlopers, and of the same Eastern origin as the Egyptian kings, of that newly introduced race, which 'knew not Joseph.' It is probable, that there was a considerable indisposition in the minds of the descendants of the old Canaanites towards their recent masters, which was no disadvantage to the arms of Joshua. It is most likely, that Rahab was not the only one of the old race, who was desirous of seeing the country revert to those, to whom it had been originally allotted.

It does not appear that the Israelites restricted themselves to this country; and in the time of the kings, their power extended over distant districts.

When the Israelites returned from Babylon, they did not regain the whole land, nor even the whole of what was marked by the boundary line of Moses. The district south of Gaza, and of a line drawn from Gaza to Kadesh Barnea, was excluded from the national territory.

During the Babylonish captivity, the Idumæans had also encroached, and settled themselves in many towns on the south of Judah. Idumæa, therefore, was considered as divided into the greater and the less, or the upper and the lower; but these being subdued by Hyrcanus, the inhabitants embraced Judaism, and were afterwards reckoned 'as Jews. Palestine, says Pomponius Mela, was divided into five countries; Idumæa, Judea, Samaria, Galilee, and beyond Jordan.

The land of Canaan was supposed by the Jews to be peculiarly holy, as it furnished holy offerings for the temple; but not all parts of it indiscriminately. They also supposed, that neither the Shechinah, nor the sacred Spirit, dwelt on any person, even a prophet, out of this land.

As Moses draws a line from Sidon to Lasha, and from Sidon to Gāza, in like manner, the Rabbins draw a line 'from the mountains of Amana to the river of Egypt: whatever is within that line, belongs to the land of Egypt; but whatever is without that line, is without the land.' They mean, that the islands in the Mediterranean, as Arvad, Tyre, &c. were never occupied by the Hebrew nation. These appear to have been strongly fortified, and not only inhabited by a hardy race of people, but capable of being supplied by sea, with reinforcements, and necessaries of all kinds. They resisted the power of the Israelites; and the conquest of them is particularly boasted of, by a subsequent invader. (2 Kings xviii. 34.; xix. 13.) Sacred Geography; Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 127; Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. i. p. 242; Lamy's Introduction.

CANDA'CE, Κανδάκη, signifies who possesses contrition; or, according to the Hebrew and the Syriac, pure possession. Candace was an Ethiopian queen, whose eunuch having been at Jerusalem to worship, was met, converted, and baptized by Philip the Deacon, near Bethsura, in the way to Gaza, as he was returning to his own country. (Acts viii. 27.) See PHILIP.

Some think that the word Candace signifies royal authority, and that this was the name of all those queens, who reigned in the island or peninsula of Meroe, which is the country here called Ethiopia, and which is situated in Africa, below Egypt. Of this particular queen it is said, that she was converted by her eunuch. Whitby's Annot.

'There is a tradition at Chendi, that a woman whose name was Hendaqué, once governed all that country, whence we might imagine, that this was part of the kingdom of Candace; for writing this name in Greek letters, it will come to no other than Hendaqué, the native or mistress of Chendi, or Chandi. However this may be, Chendi was once a town of great resort.' Bruce's Travels, vol. iv. p. 529.

CANON, is a Greek word signifying rule. It is used in the ecclesiastical language, to signify a rule concerning faith, discipline, or manners; and also to distinguish those books of Scripture, which are received as inspired, and indisputable, from profane, apocryphal, or disputed, books.

The Old Testament, according to our Bibles, consists of thirty-nine books; but among the Jews they formed only twenty-two, which was also the number of letters in their alphabet. These twenty-two books were divided into three classes. The first class consisted of five books, namely, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, which were called the Law: the second class consisted of thirteen books, namely, Joshua, Judges and Ruth in one book; the two books of Samuel, of Kings, and of the Chronicles respectively, in single books; Ezra and Nehemiah, in one book; Esther, Job, Isaiah, the two books of Jeremiah in one; Ezekiel, Daniel, and the twelve minor prophets in one book; these thirteen books were called the Prophets:

the third class consisted of the four remaining books, namely, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon, which four books were called by the Jews Chetubim, and by the Greeks Hagiographa; this class was also called the Psalms, from the name of the first book it contains. This threefold division was naturally suggested by the books themselves; it was used merely for convenience, and did not proceed from any opinion of difference in the authority of the books of the several classes. Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, are now generally known by the name of the Pentateuch, and are frequently cited in both the Old and New Testament under the name of the Law. It appears from Deuteronomy, that the book of the Law, that is, the whole Pentateuch, written by the hand of Moses, was, by his command, deposited in the tabernacle, not long before his death. (Deut. xxxi. 26.) It was kept there not only while the Israelites remained in the wilderness, but afterwards, when they were settled in the land of Canaan. To the same sanctuary were consigned, as they were successively produced, the other sacred books, which were written before the building of the temple at Jerusalem. When the temple was finished, Solomon directed that these books should be removed into it, and also that the future compositions of inspired men should be secured in the same holy place. It may therefore be concluded, that the respective works of Jonah, Amos, Hosea, Joel, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, Habakkuk, and Obadiah, all of whom flourished before the Babylonian captivity, were regularly deposited in the temple. We are not informed whether these manuscripts perished in the flames, when the temple was burnt by Nebuchadnezzar; but as the burning of the Scriptures is not lamented by any of the contemporary or succeeding prophets, and as the other treasures of the temple were preserved and set apart as sacred by Nebuchadnezzar, it is probable that these autographs also were saved. Certain, however, it is, that at that time numerous copies of the Scriptures were extant; and we cannot doubt but some of them were carried by the Jews to Babylon, and that others were left in Judea. We find Daniel when in captivity, (Dan. ix. 11. 13.) referring to the book of the Law as then existing; and soon after the captivity, Ezra not only read and explained the Law to the people, (Nehem. viii. 1, &c.) but he restored the public worship and the sacrifices according to the Mosaic ritual. Ezra must, therefore, have been in actual possession either of the original manuscript of the Law, or of a copy so well authenticated as to leave no doubt of its accuracy.

An uncontradicted tradition exists in the Jewish church, that about fifty years after the temple was re-built, Ezra, in conjunction with the great synagogue, formed a collection of the sacred writings, which had been increased since the Jews were carried into captivity, by the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and the prophecies of Ezekiel, Daniel, Haggai, and Zechariah. As Ezra was himself inspired, we may rest assured, that whatever received his sanction was authentic. To this genuine collection, which, according to former custom, was placed in the temple, were afterwards annexed the sacred compositions of Ezra himself, as well as those of Nehemiah and Malachi, which were written after the death of Ezra. This addition, which was probably made by Simon the Just, the last of the great synagogue, completed the Canon of the Old Testament; for after Malachi no prophet arose till the time of John the Baptist, who, as it were, connected the two covenants, and of whom Malachi foretold, that he should precede 'the great day of the Lord,' (Malachi iv. 5.); that is, the coming of the Messiah. It cannot now be ascertained, whether Ezra's copy of the Scriptures was destroyed by Antiochus Epiphanes, when he pillaged the temple; but we know that Judas Maccabæus repaired the temple, and replaced every thing requisite for the performance of divine worship, which included a correct, if not Ezra's own copy, of the Scriptures. This copy, whether Ezra's or not, remained in the temple till Jerusalem was taken by Titus, and was then carried in triumph to Rome, and laid up with the purple veil in the royal palace of Vespasian. Thus while the Jewish polity continued, and nearly 500 years after the time of Ezra, a complete and faultless copy of the Hebrew Canon was kept in the temple of Jerusalem, with which all others might be compared. Though Christ frequently reprovèd the rulers and teachers of the Jews for their erroneous and false doctrines, yet he never accused them of any corruption in their written Law, or other sacred books; and St. Paul reckons among the privileges of the Jews, 'that unto them were committed the oracles of God,' (Rom. iii. 2.) without insinuating that they had been unfaithful to their trust. After the final destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, the dispersion of the Jews into all countries, and the numerous converts to Christianity, became a double security for the preservation of the Hebrew Scriptures, which were held equally sacred by Jews and Christians, and to which both constantly referred as to the written word of God. The books of the Old Testament have been always allowed in every age, and by every sect of the Hebrew church, to be the genuine works of those persons, to whom they are usually ascribed. The Saviour of the world himself, even he, who came expressly 'from the Father of Truth to bear witness to the truth,' in the last instructions which he gave to his apostles just before his ascension, said, 'These are the words which I spake unto you while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the Law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me.' (Luke xxiv. 44.) By thus adopting the common division of the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms, which comprehended all the Hebrew Scriptures, our Lord ratified the Canon of the Old Testament as it was received by the Jews.

The Canon of the New Testament consists of twenty-seven books, which were written by eight different authors, all of whom were contemporary with our Saviour. These books were written at different times, and at places remote from each other; and when the latest of them was published, the Gospel had been preached, and churches founded, in many parts of Asia, Europe, and Africa. Different churches at first received different books, according to their situation and circumstances; their canons were gradually enlarged, and it was not long, though the precise time is not known, before the same, or very nearly the same, books were acknowledged by the Christians of all countries. This canon was not determined by the authority of councils, but the books, of which it consists, were known to be the genuine writings of the apostles and evangelists, in the same way and manner as the works of Cæsar, Cicero, Virgil, Horace, and Tacitus, are known to be theirs; and the canon has been formed on the ground of an unanimous, or generally concurring, testimony and tradition. Origen, who lived in the beginning of the third century, is the first writer that has left us a regular catalogue of the books of the New Testament, though these books are all mentioned separately by much earlier authors. This catalogue is the same as our present canon, except that the Epistles of St. James and St. Jude are omitted; but, in other parts of his writings Origen refers to these epistles as the productions of those apostles.

In the following century we have catalogues in the remaining works of Eusebius, Athanasius, Cyril, Epiphanius, Gregory Nazianzen, Philaster, Jerom, Ruffin, and Augustin, and those settled at the provincial councils of Laodicea and Carthage. Of these eleven catalogues, seven exactly agree with our canon; three omit the Revelation only; and one, namely, that of Philaster, wants the Epistle to the Hebrews, as well as the Revelation, but he acknowledges both these books in other parts of his works. These catalogues include no books, which are not in our canon; and we learn from Polycarp, who was contemporary with the apostles, and from Justin Martyr, Tatian, Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria, all of whom lived in the second century, that the primitive church admitted no other Gospels, than those of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. We are also assured by these authors and many others, that the Scriptures were publicly read in Christian congregations. Copies of these books were dispersed every where. In all their various controversies, Christians of every denomination appealed to them as authentic testimony; and both the Jewish and Pagan enemies of the Gospel understood, that they contained the faith of Christians. This publicity of the books of the New Testament rendered designed corruption utterly impracticable; but it is to be expected that the purity of these books, like that of the Old Testament, should have suffered, in a long series of years, from the negligence of transcribers. In collating the remaining manuscripts of the whole, and of every part of the New Testament, a considerable number of various readings have been discovered, but not of such a nature as to affect any essential article of our faith, or any indispensable rule of life. Indeed, Providence seems to have wisely ordered, that no important doctrine or precept should rest upon a single text of Scripture, or even upon the credit of one writer; and we are, therefore, never compelled to have recourse to a disputed passage in support of any fundamental principle of our religion. Whilst we contend, that a single inspired authority is a sufficient proof of any proposition in theology or morals, we acknowledge that the different writers of the New Testament, by their perfect agreement in all material points, confirm and strengthen each other, and that the Gospel derives great advantages from the number and consistency of the witnesses to its truth. The four Gospels, the first thirteen Epistles of St. Paul, the first Epistle of St. Peter, and the first Epistle of St. John, were always acknowledged to be written by those, whose names they bear, and the Acts of the Apostles by St. Luke. The genuineness of the other seven books, namely, the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Epistle of St. James, the second Epistle of St. Peter, the second and third Epistles of St. John, the Epistle of St. Jude, and the Revelation, was never denied by the Catholic church; doubts only were entertained, at a very early period, concerning the right of these books to be admitted into the canon, because sufficient evidence had not been received at all places that they were really apostolical writings. As soon, however, as there were time and opportunity for making the necessary inquiries, and for ascertaining the authors of these books, the genuineness of them all was universally allowed; and therefore this circumstance of temporary doubt, instead of invalidating the authority of these books, gives a sanction to the whole collection, by proving the caution, with which any book was admitted into the sacred canon. Indeed, the early Christians had such means of knowing the truth, and exercised so much care and judgment in settling the canon of the New Testament, that no writing, which was pronounced by them genuine, has been found to be spurious, and none genuine, which they rejected. Celsus, Porphyry, Julian, and all the other early adversaries to Christianity, admitted that the books of the New Testament were all written by the persons whose names they bear; and this circumstance is of itself a sufficient proof of the genuineness of these books. The books of the New Testament have been differently arranged, at different times, and by different persons, but Dr. Lardner contends, that the order in which they stand in our Bibles is the most ancient, and is free from every objection. They may be divided into four parts; the Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles, and the Revelation. Bishop of Lincoln's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. p. 3, &c. 269, &c.; Prideaux's Connect. part i. b. v.; Lardner's Works, vol. vi. p. 27.

CANONIZATION, a ceremony in the Romish church, by which persons deceased are ranked in the catalogue of saints. It succeeds beatification.

When a person is to be canonized, the pope holds four consistories. In the first, he causes the petition of those, who request the canonization, to be examined by three auditors of the rota, and directs the cardinals to revise all the necessary instruments. In the second, the cardinals report the matter to his holiness. In the third, which is held in public, the cardinals pay their adoration to the pope; and an advocate makes a pompous oration in praise of the person, who is to be created a saint. This advocate expatiates at large on the miracles, which the person has wrought, and even pretends to know from what motives he acted. In the fourth consistory, the pope, having summoned together all the cardinals and prelates, orders the report concerning the deceased to be read, and then takes their votes, whether he is to be canonized or not.

On the day of canonization, the church of St. Peter is hung with rich tapestry, on which are embroidered the arms of the pope, and those of the prince, who desires the canonization. The church is most brilliantly illuminated, and filled with thousands of devout Catholics, ready to attend the ceremony of the saint being conducted to paradise. To attend this ceremony affords these persons great encouragement, as they think that the more respect they show to the saint, the more ready he will be to hear their prayers, and offer them to God. During this ceremony the pope and all the cardinals are dressed in white. It costs the prince, who requests the canonization, a great sum of money, as all the officers belonging to the church of Rome must have their fees; but this is considered only a trifle, when it is expected that the saint will intercede in heaven for his subjects, who, indeed, poor as they are, generally pay all the expenses attending the ceremony.

Canonization of saints was not known in the Christian church till towards the middle of the tenth century. So far as we are able to form an opinion, the Christians in that age borrowed this custom from the Heathens; for it was usual with both the Greeks and Romans to deify all those heroes and great men, who had rendered themselves remarkable. It is not allowed to enter into the inquiries prior to canonization, till at least fifty years after the death of the person to be canonized. This regulation, however, though now observed, has not been followed above a century.

It has been properly objected against canonization, that it is performed by human beings, who assume a power of rendering something an object of divine worship, which, while in this life, was no more than mortal. Hurd on Religious Rites, Ceremonies, &c. p. 244, &c. Broughton's Hist. Dict. vol. i. p. 201.

CANTICLES, literally signifies songs, but is peculiarly applied to a canonical book of the Old Testament, called in Hebrew the Song of Songs, that is, the most excellent of all songs. It is believed that Solomon composed it on occasion of his marriage with the daughter of the king of Egypt; but this book is a continued allegory, in which, under the terms of a common wedding, a divine and supernatural marriage is expressed. In this song, seven nights and seven days are distinctly marked: and, because weddings among the Hebrews were celebrated seven days, this song poetically relates the adventures of these seven days; or, as some think, only of the five days preceding, and the day of the marriage. The Hebrews, apprehending it might be understood grossly, forbade the reading of it by any person before the age of thirty. The church, as well as the synagogue, generally received this book as canonical. If it be objected, that neither Christ nor his apostles have cited it, and that the name of God is not found in it, we answer, that there are several other books not cited by our Saviour, and that in an allegory, in which the Son of God is concealed under the figure of a husband, it is not necessary that he should be expressed by his proper name. This would destroy the allegory.

The Hebrews had a custom of composing songs on important occasions. Moses composed one after the passage of the Red Sea, in honour of that miracle. (Exod. xv. 1, 2, &c.) David composed a mournful song on the death of Saul and Jonathan, (2 Sam. i. 17.) and another on the death of Abner, (Ib. iii. 33.) Jeremiah wrote his Lamentations, a song, or series of songs, in which he deploras the ruin of Jerusalem; and he composed others on the death of Josiah, king of Judah. (2 Chron. xxxv. 25.) Deborah and Barak made a triumphant hymn after the defeat of Sisera, (Judg. v.); and Judith, after the defeat of Holofernes, (Judg. xvi.) Hannah, the mother of Samuel, and king Hezekiah, returned thanks to God in solemn hymns, and spiritual songs. The Canticles, composed by the Virgin Mary, by Zacharias, and by old Simeon, are of the same nature. We read, that Solomon composed one thousand and five songs (1 Kings iv. 32.); but we have only his Song of Songs remaining. Josephus renders it five thousand odes; but the generality of commentators explain it by five thousand pieces in verse, or by five thousand verses.

CAPERNAUM, Καπερναούμ, signifies, the wall of penitence, or the town of consolation, or the propitiation of the penitent, or rather the village of Naum, or the pleasant village. Capernaum, a city celebrated in the Gospels, and where Jesus Christ chiefly abode, during the three years of his ministry. This city is not mentioned in the Old Testament by this or any other name; and hence it is not improbable, that it was one of those towns, which the Jews built after their return from the Babylonish captivity. It was situated on the sea-coast, that is, on the coast of the sea of Galilee, in the borders of Zebulun and Naphtali, (Matt. iv. 15.) and consequently towards the upper part of that coast. Some think it derived its name from an adjacent spring of clear water, which, Josephus says, was called by the inhabitants Capernaum. This spring might be some inducement for building the town where it stood; and the situation of Capernaum, which was convenient for passing from Galilee to the other side of the sea, might induce our Lord to make it the place of his residence. On this account, Capernaum was highly honoured, and said by our Lord himself to be exalted unto heaven; but because it used this signal favour improperly, it drew from him the severe denunciation, that it should be brought down to hell. (Matt. xi. 23.) This has been fulfilled: Capernaum, so far from being the metropolis of Galilee, as it once was, consisted long ago of only six poor fishermen's cottages. In 1817, Mr. Buckingham found various remains of some ancient settlement in its vicinity; but in 1823, scarcely a vestige remained to attest its former existence. Buckingham's Travels in Palestine, p. 469; Jowett's Researches in Syria, p. 168; Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 165.

CAPH'TOR, or CAPH'TORIM, כפתור, signifies a globe, or apple, otherwise, the grasp, or palm of the turtle, or of discovery. Some think it imports islands. Caphtor an island, whence came the Caphtorim, (Deut. ii. 23.) otherwise called the Cherethim, Cherethites, or Philistines. Ramban says, 'Caphtor is what is called by the Arabians Damiatia.' The Targums of Jerusalem and Jonathan on Gen. x. 14, for Caphtorim read Cappadokia: the Arabic Damiatenos. The Septuagint, (Deut. ii. 23.) for Caphtorim also read Cappadokia. Damiatia is said to be the ancient Pelusium; and this word signifies muddy. It has been thought by some, that Caphtor is derived from כפר, CaPoT, and תור, TuR. Capot is the Hindoo name for a dove, and Tur is the Hebrew name for a dove. Hence it is argued, that these words, in each language, were in process of time united, though separately they signify the same thing. Capotesi, or the deity in the shape of a dove, was worshipped in all the Hindoo nations.

Calmet thinks, that the Philistines came from Crete, and that Crete was Caphtor. The Philistines, says he, were strangers in Palestine. This is expressly observed by the Scriptures; and the Septuagint always translate this name strangers. The proper name of the Philistines is Cherethim: 'I will stretch out mine hand upon the Philistines, and I will cut off the Cherethim.' (Ezek. xxv. 16.) Zephaniah says, (ii. 5.) 'Woe unto the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, the nation of the Cherethites.' In the First Book of Samuel, (xxx. 14.) it is said, that the Amalekites made an irruption into the country of the Cherethites, that is, of the Philistines, as the sequel proves. Afterwards, the kings of Judah had foreign guards, called Cherethites and Pelethites, Philistines.

The Septuagint, by the name of Cherethites, understood the Cretans, and by Chereth, Crete. The Scripture says, the Philistines came from the isle of Caphtor. Now, observes Calmet, we see no island in the Mediterranean, to which the marks of Caphtor and Cherethim, as described in Scripture, agree better than to the isle of Crete. The name Cherethim is the same with Cretenses. The Cretans are among the most ancient and celebrated people, that inhabited the islands of the Mediterranean. They pretended to have been produced originally out of their own soil. This island was well peopled in the time of the Trojan war. Homer calls it the island with a hundred cities. The city of Gaza, in Palestine, went by the name of Minoa, because Minos, king of Crete, coming into that country, had called this city by his own name.

Herodotus acknowledges, that the Cretans were originally Barbarians, and not derived from Greece. Homer says, that a different language was spoken in Crete; that there were Greeks, true Cretans, Pelasgians, &c. The ancient Cretans are the Cherethites; and the Pelasgians, the Philistines, or Perethites of Scripture. Their language was that of the Canaanites or Phœnicians, that is, Hebrew. They were descended from Ham, by Mizraim. (Gen. x. 6. 13, 14.)

The manners, arms, religion, and gods of the Cretans and Philistines were the same. The arms of both were bows and arrows. Dagon, the god of the Philistines was the Dictimus of the Cretans. It is said by Stephen the geographer, that Marnas, of Gaza, is the Jupiter of the Cretans. In all probability, the god Beelzebub, or the god fly, was honoured in memory of the bees, which fed Jupiter upon mount Ida.

Notwithstanding these arguments, Dr. Wells is of opinion, that the Caphtorim came from Egypt, and that the name Caphtor is still preserved in an ancient city of Egypt, named Coptus.

It is, indeed, allowed, that the Philistines and the Cretans were the same people; but it is thought that Crete was peopled from Philistia. For this latter opinion we have the evidence of Herodotus and Pausanias, who say that the Cretans received their worship from Syria; and how an island not larger than Crete should people a coast so extensive as Syria, requires some explanation. Calmet says, that Gaza, in Palestine, went by the name of Minoa, from Minos, king of Crete; but if we read Menuel, from the Hindoo histories this is sufficiently explained. In short, it is very probable, say some, that the Caphtorim emigrated from India; and that they were a primary nation of the Philistines, settled on the Red Sea, and in Egypt; whence a colony occupied the southern coast of Judea, the islands of Crete, Cyprus, and others in the Mediterranean Sea. This people might have towns or districts in that part of Egypt adjoining to the Nile eastward; but it may be very much doubted whether these were their original or primary stations. Sacred Geography; Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 101.

CAPPADOCIA, Καπποδοκία, in Hebrew Caphtor. Cappadocia joined Galatia on the east, and is mentioned in Acts, (ii. 9.) and by St. Peter, who addresses his First Epistle to the dispersed throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Bithynia, and Asia. The people of this country were formerly infamous for their vices; but after the promulgation of Christianity, it produced many great and worthy men. Among these may be reckoned Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory-Nyssen, and St. Basil commonly styled the Great. Among many martyrs of much faith and constancy, St. George, a noble Cappadocian, and a tribune under Dioclesian, was most celebrated in the churches of both the East and West, and for that reason was created patron of the Order of the Garter by king Edward III. Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 253.

CAPTIVITY. God generally punished the sins and infidelities of the Jews by different captivities or servitudes. The first captivity is that of Egypt, from which they were delivered by Moses, and which should be considered rather as a permission of Providence, than as a punishment for sin.

Six captivities are reckoned during the government by Judges; the first, under Chushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, which continued about eight years; the second under Eglon, king of Moab, from which the Jews were delivered by Ehud; the third under the Philistines, from which they were rescued by Shamgar; the fourth, under Jabin, king of Hazor, from which they were delivered by Deborah and Barak; the fifth under the Midianites, from which Gideon freed them; and the sixth under the Ammonites and Philistines, during the judicatures of Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, Abdon, Samson, Eli, Samuel.

But the greatest and most remarkable captivities were those of Israel and Judah, under their regal government.

CAPTIVITIES OF ISRAEL. In the year of the world 3264, Tiglath-pileser took several cities, and carried away captives, principally from the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh. (2 Kings xv. 29.) In the year of the world 3283, Shalmaneser took and destroyed Samaria after a siege of three years, and transplanted the tribes, that had been spared by Tiglath-pileser, to provinces beyond the Euphrates. (2 Kings xviii. 10, 11.)

It is generally believed, there was no return of the ten tribes from this second captivity. But when we examine carefully the writings of the prophets, we find the return of at least a great part of Israel from the captivity clearly pointed out. Hosea (xi. 11.) says, 'They shall tremble as a bird out of Egypt, and as a dove out of the land of Assyria; and I will place them in their houses, saith the Lord.' Amos (ix. 14.) says, 'And I will bring again my people Israel from their captivity; they shall build their ruined cities, and inhabit them,' &c. Obadiah, (20.) observes, 'and the captivity of this host of the children of Israel shall possess that of the Canaanites,' &c. To the same purpose speak the other prophets. Isaiah, (xi. 12, 13.) says, 'The Lord shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah.' Ezekiel received an order from God to take two pieces of wood and write on one, 'For Judah and for the children of Israel;' and on the other, 'For Joseph and for all the house of Israel,' and to join these two pieces of wood, that they might become one, and designate the re-union of Judah and Israel. (Ezek. xxxvii. 16.) Jeremiah is equally express: 'The house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel, and they shall come together out of the north, to the land, which I have given for an inheritance to their fathers.' (Jerem. iii. 18.) See, also, Jerem. xxxi. 7, 8, 9, 16, 17, 20.; xvi. 15.; xlix. 2, &c.; Zechar. ix. 13.; x. 6, 10.; Mic. ii. 12.

In the historical books of Scripture, we find that the Israelites of the ten tribes, as well as of Judah and Benjamin, returned from the captivity. Among those that returned with Zorobabel are reckoned some of Ephraim and Manasseh, who settled at Jerusalem with the tribe of Judah. When Ezra numbered those, who returned from the captivity, he only inquired whether they were of the race of Israel; and at the first passover, which was then celebrated in the temple, was a sacrifice of twelve he-goats for the whole house of Israel, according to the number of the tribes. (Ezra vi. 16, 17.; viii. 35.) Under the Maccabees, and in our Saviour's time, we see Palestine peopled by Israelites of all the tribes indifferently. The Samaritan Chronicle asserts, that in the 35th year of the pontificate of Abdellus, 3000 Israelites, by permission of king Sauredius, returned from captivity, under the conduct of Adus, son of Simon.

CAPTIVITIES OF JUDAH. The captivities of Judah are generally reckoned four: the first in the year of the world 3398, under king Jehoiakim, when Daniel and others were carried to Babylon; the second in the year of the world 3401, and in the seventh year of the reign of Jehoiakim, when Nebuchadnezzar carried 3023 Jews to Babylon; the third in the year of the world 3406, and in the fourth of Jehoiachin, when this prince, with part of his people, was sent to Babylon; and the fourth in the year of 3416, under Zedekiah, from which period begins the captivity of seventy years, foretold by the prophet Jeremiah. Dr. Hales computes, that the first of these captivities, which he thinks formed the commencement of the Babylonish captivity, took place in the year before Christ 605.

The Jews were removed to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, who, designing to render that city the capital of the East, transplanted thither very great numbers of people subdued by him in different countries. In Babylon, the Jews had judges and elders, who governed them, and who decided matters in dispute juridically, according to their laws. Of this we see a proof in the story of Susanna, who was condemned by elders of her own nation. Cyrus, in the year of the world 3467, and in the first year of his reign at Babylon, permitted the Jews to return to their own country. (Ezra i. 1.) However, they did not obtain leave to rebuild the temple; and the completion of those prophecies, which foretold the termination of their captivity after seventy years, was not till the year of the world 3486. In that year, Darius Hystaspes, by an edict, allowed them to rebuild the temple. In the year of the world 3559, Artaxerxes Longimanus sent Nehemiah to Jerusalem. The Jews assert, that only the refuse of their nation returned from the captivity, and that the principal of them continued in and near Babylon, where they had been settled, and where they became very numerous.

It may, however, be doubted, whether the refuse of Judah was really carried to Babylon. It appears from incidental observations in Scripture, that some remained; and major Rennell has offered several reasons for believing that only certain classes of the Jews were deported to Babylon, as well as into Assyria. Nebuchadnezzar carried away only the principal inhabitants, the warriors, and artisans of every kind; and he left the husbandmen, the labourers, and, in general, the poorer classes, that constitute the great body of the people. (2 Kings xxiv. 14.; xxv. 12, 22.) It is, indeed, most probable, that the policy of Nebuchadnezzar would induce him to carry away only those whom he could usefully employ. It seems also probable, that the same inferior classes were left in Israel; and these were under the influence, if not under the direct authority of king Josiah, and other kings of Judah. In this respect, therefore, both countries were on an equality. Additions to Calmet's Dict.; Sacred Geography; Geog. Excurs. p. 88.; Hales's Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. p. 478.

PRINCES OF THE CAPTIVITY. Since the destruction of the temple by the Romans, the Hebrews affirm, that they have always had, both in the East and West, their heads or princes, called princes of the captivity. They say, the prince of the captivity in the East governed the Jews of Babylon, Chaldaea, Assyria, and Persia; and the prince of the captivity in the West, those of Judea, Egypt, Italy, and the Roman empire. The Jews make a great difference between the patriarchs of Judea, and the princes of the captivity at Babylon. The former are called Rabbans, and the other Rabbana. These last are said to be descended from David, in a direct line by the males; and the patriarchs, from him by the females. The Jews also say, that the house of David continues in vigour, because at Bagdad are illustrious persons of this family, among whom the princes of the Jewish nation are now chosen, as they have been from time immemorial.

With respect to the princes of the captivity at Babylon, or in the East, we know neither their origin, nor their succession; it appears only, that they arose about the end of the second century. So long as the temple subsisted, the Eastern, as well as the Western Jews, continued subject to the high-priest at Jerusalem. No historian, prior to the destruction of the temple, has mentioned these supposed princes of the captivity. The first of these princes was Huna, at the close of the second century; and from Huna to the perfection of the Talmud, that is, in three hundred years, they scarcely produce three. The Jews affirm, that among these princes of the captivity of Babylon, who were all of the tribe of Judah, and race of David, was the sceptre of Judah, foretold by the patriarch Jacob; and that in Judea, among the patriarchs above-mentioned, was the lawgiver. (Gen. xlix. 10.)

CAPUCHINS, a religious institution of the order of St. Francis. They owe their origin to Matthew de Bassi, a Franciscan of the duchy of Urbino. Having seen St. Francis represented with a sharp-pointed capuchin, or cowl, he began to wear one like it, in 1525, by the permission of pope Clement VII. His example was soon followed by two other monks, called Lewis and Raphael de Fossembrun; and, in 1528, the pope confirmed to them the privilege of wearing the square capuchin, and admitted among them all who would take the habit. The vows of this order implied the greatest contempt of the world, and the most austere gravity; and its reputation and success excited in the other Franciscans the bitterest feelings of indignation and envy. Mosheim, vol. iii. p. 442.

CAPUTIATI, a denomination that appeared in the twelfth century, and obtained their name from a singular kind of cap, which distinguished their party. They wore upon their caps a leaden image of the virgin Mary, and publicly declared, that their purpose was to level all distinctions, to abrogate magistracy, to remove all subordination among mankind, and to restore that primitive liberty, that natural equality, which were the inestimable privileges of the first mortals. Hugo, bishop of Auxerre, attacked them with arms, instead of arguments. Mosheim, vol. ii. p. 456.

CARAITES, קראים, signifies readers, and is the name of a Jewish sect, that adheres closely to the text and letter of the Scriptures. This distinguished the Caraites from the Rabbins, who admit traditions.

The Caraites are said to glory in a descent from Ezra, and to prove the succession of their doctrine by a catalogue of all who have either taught or opposed Cara-

ism. Some boast of still greater antiquity, and pretend that they are descended from the ten tribes led captive by Shalmaneser. It is believed, that the Caraites first appeared about the eighth century. The compilation of the Talmud took place in the beginning of the sixth century; and persons of sense were so shocked with the trifles, the ridiculous and incredible fables, which filled that work, and to see at the same time men daring to assert all this as coming from God, that many resolved to establish their faith only on the word of God, the Scriptures. However, this refusal to admit the Talmud as a rule of faith did not, for a long time, produce any schism. At length, about A. D. 750, Anan, a Babylonish Jew of the race of David, and his son, Saul, declared openly for the written word of God alone, exclusive of all traditions. This declaration produced a schism: those who supported the Talmud and traditions, being almost all Rabbins, or their disciples, were called Rabbinites; and the others were denominated Caraites, or Scripturists, from Cara, which, in the Babylonish language, signifies Scripture.

The Rabbinites charge the Caraites with most of the errors of the Sadducees; as denying the immortality of the soul, and the existence of spirits. The Caraites, however, deny these accusations, and maintain the purity of their faith, and their particular sense of those articles. They expect the Messiah, whom, with the rest of the Jews, they consider as a temporal king; but they forbid all computation of the years, in which he is to appear. They reject all books not in the old canon of the Jews; and they require an implicit faith in holy Scripture, without examining whether any article of the law be true or false. They have neither phylacteries, nor parchments on the doors of their houses, nor frontlets upon their foreheads. When they see the Jews with parchments upon their foreheads, they call them bridled asses. They explain figuratively those passages, in which phylacteries are mentioned, and which are understood literally by Rabbinical Jews. There are Caraites at Constantinople, in Syria, Palestine, and beyond the Euphrates. In the West are few Caraites. The greater part are in Poland, Muscovy, and the East. About the middle of the seventeenth century, there were in Poland two thousand; at Caffa, in Crim Tartary, twelve hundred; at Cairo, three hundred; at Damascus, two hundred; at Jerusalem, thirty; in Babylon one hundred; and in Persia, six hundred Caraites. This number, which amounts only to 4,430, is very small, when compared with the mass of the nation, who are Rabbinites.

The Caraites are esteemed the most learned of the Jewish doctors. The Rabbinites hold them in such abhorrence, that they will form with them no alliances, nor even converse. They treat the Caraites as manzerim, or bastards, because they observe none of the constitutions of the Rabbins in their marriages, divorces, and purifications of their wives; and even if a Caraité would turn Rabbinist, the other Jews would not receive him. Basnag. Hist. of the Jews, lib. ii. 16, 17; Prideaux's Connect. vol. iii p. 476. 479; Jennings's Jewish Antiquities, b. i. ch. ix.

CARCHEMISH, כרְכִישׁ, Καρχημις, signifies a lamb, which bleats, or palpitates; or, from the Hebrew and Syriac, the city of bleating. Carchemish was a town situated on the Euphrates, and belonging to the Syrians. Necho, king of Egypt, took it, and left in it a garrison, which was captured and cut in pieces, in the fourth year of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, (2 Chron. xxxv. 20. 2 Kings xxiii. 29.) Isaiah speaks of Carchemish, and seems to say, that Tiglath-pileser conquered it, perhaps from the Egyptians. It is thought to be the same city as that called Circesium by the Greeks and Latins. Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 92.

CARDINAL, one of the chief governors of the Romish church. The cardinals are ecclesiastical princes in the church of Rome, or the principal ecclesiastics next to the pope, by whom they are created, and whose senate and council they compose. They are divided into three classes or orders, consisting of six bishops, fifty priests, and fourteen deacons, forming in all seventy persons, who constitute what is called the Sacred College. The six cardinal bishops are those of Ostia, Porto, Sabina, Præneste or Palestrina, Tusculum or Frascati, and Albano.

The cardinals, to whom are given the title of Eminence and Most Eminent, and who wear a scarlet hat and cap, fill most of the great offices in the court of Rome, and have very extensive privileges. They possess an absolute power in the Church during the vacancy of the Holy See; they have the sole right to elect the pope, and are themselves the only persons on whom the choice can fall. Adam's Religious World, vol. ii. p. 40; Broughton's Hist. Dict. vol. i. p. 206.

CARMEĻ, כרמל, signifies knowledge or circumcission, or the lamb of circumcission, or of clamminess, or of the scarlet insect. Simon and Parkhurst think that it denotes green-fields, or verdant pastures.

CARMEĻ, a city of Judah, situated upon a mountain of the same name, in the southern part of Palestine. Here dwelt Nabal the Carmelite, the husband of Abigail, (Josh. xv. 55. 1 Sam. xxv.) Jerom says, that in his time the Romans had a garrison at Carmel. Here Saul, returning from the slaughter of the Amalekites, erected a trophy. (1 Sam. xv. 12.)

CARMEĻ, a mountain south of Ptolemais, and north of Dora, on the shore of the Mediterranean Sea. At the foot of this mountain, on the north side, runs the brook Kishon; and a little farther north, the river Beleas. Josephus makes Carmel a part of Galilee; but it rather belonged to Manasseh, and to the south of Asher. (Josh. xv. 26.) On the side next the sea, is a cave, to which some suppose the prophet Elijah desired Ahab to bring Baal's prophets, when fire from heaven descended on his burnt sacrifice. (1 Kings xviii.)

Mount Carmel, says Volney, is a flattened cone, and very rocky, and is about two thousand feet high. We still find among brambles, many wild vines, and olive trees, which prove that industry has been formerly employed even on this ungrateful soil. Upon the summit is a chapel dedicated to the prophet Elias, which affords an extensive prospect over the sea and land. To the south, the country presents a chain of rugged hills, upon the tops of which are a great number of oak and fir trees, the retreat of wild boars and lynxes.

Mount Carmel, says D'Arvieux, is on the borders of the Mediterranean Sea, and one of its principal points advances considerably into the sea, and forms a cape or promontory, the most elevated of any on the coast. The lesser mountains of this group are cultivable lands, of a good soil, deep, and remarkably fertile, capable of producing in a very uncommon degree.—There were formerly many more vineyards than at present. The Christians, who inhabit part of these villages, cultivate only as many vines as may furnish what wine they want, and dried grapes for their own consumption. They neglect the cultivation of fruit trees, which here would reach great excellence, as may easily be inferred from those here gathered, though chiefly from wild stocks. They have delicious melons, and water melons. Those mounts which appear most dry and arid are covered with oaks and other trees. We find also olives, but under no management. The air of these mountains is very good, and how sultry soever it may be on the border of the sea, these regions are refreshed every morning by a cool sea breeze. These mountains feed an infinity of bees, sheep, goats, hares, rabbits, partridges, antelopes, and other species of animals; all excellent in their kinds, because they here find excellent pasture and corn. Sacred Geography.

CARMEĻITES, one of the four tribes of mendicant or begging friars. About the middle of the twelfth century, a certain Calabrian, called Berthold, set out with a few companions for Mount Carmel; and on the very spot where the prophet Elias is said to have disappeared, he built a humble cottage, and an adjoining chapel, and led a life of solitude, austerity, and labour. This small colony continued to subsist, and, in 1205, was erected into a monastic community by Albert, patriarch of Jerusalem. This prelate composed a rule of discipline for the new monks, which was afterwards confirmed by the authority of the Roman pontiffs, who mitigated its excessive rigour and severity. Such was the origin of the Order of Carmelites, which was afterwards transplanted from Syria into Europe, and obtained the principal rank among the mendicant or begging orders. The Carmelites, however, reject with indignation an origin so recent and obscure, and pretend that the prophet Elias was the parent and founder of their community. They say that Elias was introduced into the state of monachism by the ministry of angels; that his first disciples were Jonah, Micah, and Obadiah, whose wife, after the departure of her husband, bound herself by a vow of chastity, received the veil from the hands of father Elias, and became the first abbess of the Carmelite Order. They add, that Pythagoras was a member of this ancient order, that he drew all his wisdom from mount Carmel, and that he had several conversations with the prophet Daniel at Babylon, on the subject of the Trinity. They even assert, that the Virgin Mary, and Jesus Christ himself, assumed the habit and profession of Carmelites.

The Carmelites came into England in the year 1240. Their habit was at first white; but pope Honorius IV. commanded them to change it for that of the Minims. They wear shirts of linsey-wolsey, instead of linen. Mosheim, vol. ii. p. 412, &c.; vol. iii. p. 52, &c.

CARPOCRATIANS, the followers of Carpocrates, in the second century. Carpocrates, who was a native of Alexandria, was a man of the most dissolute morals, and taught that a community of wives was not only lawful, but also meritorious. He even asserted, that a man could never be happy till he had passed through all sorts of debauchery, and held it as a maxim that nothing is evil in its own nature, but only in the opinion of men. His followers believed that the world was made by angels; that Jesus Christ was the son of Joseph and Mary, in the same manner as other men; and that the body of Christ continued in the grave, and his soul only ascended into heaven. They denied the resurrection of the dead. Gregory's Hist. vol. i. p. 98.; Hurd on Religious Rites, &c. p. 164.

CASTOR AND POLLUX. It is said, that the vessel, which carried Paul to Rome, had the sign of Castor and Pollux. (Acts xxviii. 11.) Castor and Pollux were sea-gods, and invoked by sailors; and even the lights, which were sometimes seen on their ships, were called Castor and Pollux. An inscription in Gruter proves that seamen implored Castor and Pollux in dangers at sea. These deities are fabled to have been brothers, sons of Jupiter and Leda, the wife of Tyn-darus, king of Sparta.

It is to be observed, that St. Luke does not mention the name, but the sign, of the ship. By the word sign, the sacred writer meant a protecting image of the deity, to whom the vessel was in some sort consecrated; as at present in Catholic countries, most of their vessels are named after some saint, St. Xavier, St. Andero, St. Dominique, &c. It appears to be certain, that the figure, which gave name to the ship, was at the head, and the tutelary deity was placed on the poop. Fragments attached to Calmet's Dictionary, No. ccxiv. p. 55.

CATHARISTS, a sect that spread much in the Latin church in the twelfth century. They were the same as the Paulicians. Their religion resembled the doctrine of the Manichæans and Gnostics. They supposed that matter was the source of evil; that the Creator of the world was a distinct being from the supreme Deity; that Christ was not clothed with a real body; that human bodies were the production of the evil principle; and that Baptism and the Lord's Supper were useless institutions, and destitute of all efficacy. They exhorted their converts to abstain from animal food, wine, and wedlock. They treated with contempt all the books of the Old Testament, but expressed great veneration for the New, particularly for the Four Gospels. To omit many other peculiarities in their doctrine, they maintained that human souls endowed with reason were shut up by an unhappy fate in the prisons of mortal bodies, whence they could be delivered only by fasting, mortification, and continence of every kind. Mosheim, vol. ii. p. 444.

CATHOLIC denotes any thing that is universal or general. The rise of heresies induced the primitive Christian church to assume to itself the appellation of Catholic, as a characteristic, by which to distinguish itself from all sects, who, though they had party names, sometimes sheltered themselves under that of Christians. The Romish church now distinguishes itself by the appellation of Catholic, in opposition to all, who have separated from her communion, and whom she considers as heretics and schismatics; and herself only as the true and Christian church. In the strict sense of the word, there is no catholic church in existence, that is, no universal Christian communion. When, therefore, in repeating the Apostles' Creed, we profess to believe in the Holy Catholic Church, we must mean, as Mr. Chillingworth expresses it, 'the right that the church of Christ, or rather, to speak properly, the Gospel of Christ, hath to be universally believed. And therefore the article may be true, though there were no Christian church in the world.' The catholic church is the universal church spread throughout the world; and the catholic faith, is the universal faith, or that form of doctrine, which the apostles delivered to the whole church. Every church or society of Christians, that preserves this catholic or universal faith, accompanied with true charity, is a part of the catholic or universal church; and because the parts are of the same nature as the whole, it has been usual to call every church singly, which is so qualified, a catholic church. In this sense, churches that differ widely in several rites and customs, may still be truly catholic churches. Chillingworth's Works, fol. p. 196; Secker's Lectures on the Catechism, Lect. xiv. p. 113.

CATHOLIC, general or canonical, EPISTLES, are seven in number; one of James, two of Peter, three of John, and one of Jude. They are called catholic, because addressed to Christian converts generally, and not to any particular church. Some difference exists in the order in which these Epistles are placed in our Bibles, from that in which they stood among the Greeks. Among the ancients some received all the seven; others three only, and rejected the Second of Peter, the Second and Third of John, and that of Jude. The principal design of these Epistles, is to warn the reader against the heresies of the times, and to establish Christian converts, against efforts made to seduce them to Judaism, or to a mixture of legal notions with Christianity, or of idolatrous principles and practices with the Gospel. These having former influence, and deep antiquity, and general reception, to plead in their favour, were very prevalent among many professors in countries only recently converted.

CEDAR-TREE, according to Tournefort, is a distinct genus of plants, but is included by Linnæus among the junipers. This tree is greatly celebrated in the Scriptures. A few cedars are still standing upon mount Libanus, above Byblos and Tripoli, east; but none are to be found in any other parts of all these mountains. In former times they must have been very abundant, since they were used in so many great buildings. These trees are prodigiously thick and tall; and some among them are from thirty-five to forty feet in girth. The cedar-tree shoots out branches at ten or twelve feet from the ground. These branches are large and distant. Its leaves rather resemble those of rosemary. It is always green; and it distils a kind of gum, to which different effects are attributed. Cedar-wood is incorruptible, beautiful, solid, and inclining to a red-brown colour. It bears a small cone, like that of the pine. The cedar grows upon mount Libanus, in Africa, in Cyprus, and in Crete, or Candia. The wood of this tree was used in making statues intended for duration. The temple of Jerusalem, and the palace of king Solomon, were built with cedar. According to Pliny, the roof of Diana's temple at Ephesus was of cedar. Josephus says, that Solomon multiplied cedars in Judea till this tree was as common as sycamores, which are very general in that country.

The cedar loves cold and mountainous places; and if the top be cut it dies. The branches which it shoots lessen as they rise, and give it the form of a pyramid. Le Bruyn, in his journey to the Holy Land, informs us the leaves of the tree point upwards, and the fruit hangs downwards. The fruit grows like cones of the pine-tree, but is longer, harder, and fuller, and not easily separated from the stalk. It contains a seed like that of the cypress-tree, and yields a glutinous thick sort of resin, transparent, and of a strong smell, which does not run, but falls drop by drop. Le Bruyn measured two cedars of Lebanon, and found them to be, one fifty, and the other forty-seven palms, in circumference. Naturalists distinguish several sorts of cedars; but we confine ourselves to that of Lebanon, of which only the Scripture speaks.

The number of the largest trees has varied at different times. Mr. Maundrell, who travelled in the region of Lebanon in 1696, reckoned sixteen of the largest size, one of which he measured, and found it to be twelve yards and six inches in girth; and thirty-seven yards in the spread of the boughs. Mr. Burckhardt, the celebrated oriental traveller, who traversed mount Libanus in 1810, counted eleven or twelve of the oldest and best looking trees, twenty-five very large ones, about fifty of middling size, and more than three hundred smaller and young ones. Mr. Kinneir, who visited this country at the close of the year 1813, observes, that the once celebrated cedars are now to be found only in one particular spot of the great mountainous range which bears the name of Libanus, and that in so scanty a number as not to exceed four or five hundred. In 1816, Mr. Buckingham computed them to be about two hundred in number, twenty of which were very large. In 1817-1818, Captains Irby and Mangles, stated that there might be about fifty of them, not one of which had much merit either for dimensions or beauty; the largest among them appearing to be the junction of four or five trunks into one tree. In 1818, Dr. Richardson stated the oldest trees to be no more than seven. Lastly, in 1825, Mr. Carne states that the forests, the cedar-trees, the glory of Lebanon, have, in a great measure, disappeared, to make way for innumerable plantations of vines.

This wood was used not only for beams, for planks which covered edifices, and for ceilings to apartments, but also in the substance of the walls. (1 Kings vi. 36.; vii. 12. Ezra vi. 3, 4.)

In the purification of a leper, Moses orders, that cedar, together with hyssop, should be used in making a wisp, with which the leper was to be sprinkled. (Lev. xiv. 4.) Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 46, 47.

CELESTINES, a religious order in the thirteenth century. They derived their name from their founder, Peter Di Murrone, who was raised to the pontificate under the name of Celestine V. The austerity of his manners rendered this pontiff extremely disagreeable to a degenerate and licentious clergy, and he was obliged to abdicate the papacy three months after his election.

The Celestines rose two hours after midnight to say matins, ate no flesh except when sick, and often fasted. Their habit consisted of a white gown, a capuche, a black scapulary, and shirts of serge. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iii. p. 45, 46.

CELIBACY, the state of unmarried persons, and is a word used chiefly in speaking of the single life of the Popish clergy, or the obligation they are under to abstain from marriage.

At the time of the reformation, scarcely any point was more canvassed, than the right of the clergy to marry. With reason, the celibacy of the Romish clergy was considered as a principal cause of their irregular and dissolute lives; and the wisest of the reformers were exceedingly anxious to abolish a practice, which had been injurious to the interests of religion, by its tendency to corrupt the morals of those, who ought to have been examples of virtue to the rest of mankind.

The marriage of priests was so far from being forbidden by the Mosaic institution, that the priesthood was confirmed to the descendants of one family, and consequently there was not only a permission, but an obligation upon the Jewish priests to marry. Hence we conclude, that there is no natural inconsistency, or even unsuitableness, between the married state and the duties of the ministers of religion. Not a single text in the New Testament can be interpreted into a prohibition against the marriage of the clergy under the Gospel dispensation; but, on the contrary, there are many passages, from which we may infer, that they are allowed the same liberty upon this subject as other men enjoy. One of the twelve apostles, namely, St. Peter, was certainly a married man, (Matt. viii. 14.); and it is supposed, that several of the others were also married. Philip, one of the seven deacons, was also a married man, (Acts xxi. 8, 9.); and if Christ did not require celibacy in the first preachers of the Gospel, it cannot be thought necessary in their successors. St. Paul says, 'Let every man have his own wife,' (1 Cor. vii. 2.); and that marriage is honourable in all, (Heb. xiii. 4.) without excepting those, who are employed in the public offices of religion. He expressly says, that 'a bishop must be the husband of one wife' (1 Tim. iii. 2.); and he gives the same direction concerning elders, priests, and deacons. When Aquila travelled about to preach the Gospel, he was not only married, but his wife Priscilla accompanied him (Acts xviii. 2.); and St. Paul insists that he might have claimed the privilege 'of carrying about a sister or wife, (1 Cor. ix. 5.) as other apostles did.' The 'forbidding to marry,' (1 Tim. iv. 3.) is mentioned as a character of the apostasy of the latter times.

That the ministers of the Gospel were allowed to marry for several centuries after the days of the apostles, appears certain. Polycarp mentions Valens, presbyter of Philippi, and Phileas, bishop of Thonius, as married men; and Eusebius says, that the latter had both wife and children. There are now extant two books of Tertullian, a presbyter of the second century, addressed to his wife. Novatus was a married presbyter of Carthage, as we learn from Cyprian, who was himself a married man; and so was Cæcilius, the presbyter, who converted him, and Numidius, another presbyter of Carthage. That they were allowed to cohabit with their wives after ordination, appears from the charge, which Cyprian brought against Novatus, that he had struck and abused his wife, and by that means caused her to miscarry. We have also a letter from Hilary of Poitiers, written to his daughter when he was in exile; and from what can be collected concerning her age, it seems probable, that she was born when he was a bishop. At the same time it must be owned, that many things are said in praise of a single life in the writings of the ancient fathers; and the law of celibacy had been proposed before, or about the beginning of the fourth century, by some individuals. The allowed necessity of a Christian's separating himself from the criminal pleasures and pursuits of this world, soon connected the ideas of holiness and solitude; and the reputed sanctity of those persons, who condemned themselves to live alone in the deserts, attached a degree of merit to celibacy, and by degrees led to those monastic institutions, which have produced such various mischief, though not without a mixture of some good. Siricius, who, according to Dufresnoy, died in the year 399, was the first pope that forbade the marriage of the clergy; but it is probable that this prohibition was little regarded, as the celibacy of the clergy seems not to have been completely established till the papacy of Gregory the Seventh, at the end of the eleventh century, and even at that time it was loudly complained of by many writers. The history of the following centuries abundantly proves the bad effects of this abuse of church power. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. ii. p. 512, &c.; Adams's Religious World, vol. ii. p. 46, note.

CERDONIANS, a branch of the Gnostics in the second century. They derived their name from Cerdo, and are also called Marcionites, from Marcion, who propagated his doctrines with astonishing success throughout the world.

The Cerdonians taught that there are two principles, the one perfectly good, and the other perfectly evil; and that between these is an intermediate kind of deity, who is neither perfectly good, nor perfectly evil, but of a mixed nature, and who is so far just and powerful as to administer rewards and inflict punishments. This middle deity is the creator of this inferior world, and the god and legislator of the Jewish nation. He wages perpetual war with the evil principle; and both the one and the other aspire to the place of the Supreme Being, and ambitiously attempt to subject to their authority all the inhabitants of the world.

The Jews are the subjects of that powerful genius, who formed the globe. The other nations, that worship a variety of gods, are under the empire of the evil principle. Both these contending powers exercise oppressions upon rational and immortal souls, and keep them in a tedious and miserable captivity. Therefore, the Supreme Being, in order to terminate this war, and to deliver from their bondage those souls, whose origin is celestial and divine, sent to the Jews a being most like to himself, even his own Son Jesus Christ, clothed with a certain shadowy resemblance of a body, that he might be visible to mortal eyes. The commission of this celestial messenger was to destroy the empire of both the evil principle and the author of this world, and to bring back wandering souls to God. On this account, he was attacked with inexpressible fury by the prince of darkness and the god of the Jews, but without effect; since, having a body in appearance only, he was by that means rendered incapable of suffering. Those who follow the sacred directions of the heavenly conductor, and turn their eyes towards the Supreme Being, shall after death ascend to the mansions of felicity and perfection.

It is said to have been in opposition to this heresy, that the articles, 'the resurrection of the dead,' and he 'suffered under Pontius Pilate,' were inserted in the creed. Mosheim, vol. i. p. 178.; Hurd's History of Religious Rites, &c. p. 165.

CEREMONIES, the external rites and manner, in which the ministers of religion perform their sacred functions. Under the old covenant, God first delivered the great precepts of his law. It was not till afterwards that he prescribed ceremonies. The multitude of external observances might be intended to check that inclination, which the Hebrews had discovered for idolatry, and to induce them to desire with more ardour the coming of their great deliverer. In the new covenant, few ceremonies are enjoined. They are considered as accessories only to Christianity; and they are employed as means only, not as the end, and in condescension to the weakness of the worshippers, who are men, and not angels.

It has been questioned, whether the ceremonies of the Jews were borrowed from the Egyptians, or those of the Egyptians from the Jews? The striking conformity between the laws, the observances, and the ceremonies of these two nations, has divided the opinions of learned men. Sir John Marsham and Dr. Spencer have attempted to prove, that Moses, in many things, imitated the Egyptians. This opinion has had many followers. Indeed, a great resemblance exists between certain ceremonies common to both people; whilst in others, there are differences, which appear to be even studied. There seems also to have been a very great strangeness reciprocally between the two people, though the Israelites were prone to imitate the worship of the Egyptians. These opposite inclinations must necessarily have produced in the two nations many laws and ceremonies entirely adverse, and others absolutely alike. When we accurately examine the laws and ceremonies of each people, we perceive certain ceremonies and practices, which Moses, from condescension to the humour, inclination, custom, prejudices, and even hardness of the hearts of the Hebrews permitted, or prohibited, and which were permitted or prohibited among the Egyptians. He might conform to the Egyptians in the habits and ornaments of the priests, in the choice of some sacrifices, their colour, sex, age, and manner of offering them. He might borrow something from the forms of their temples, and their altars. Many of the judicial laws of the Hebrews appear to be copied from those of the Egyptians. It should be remembered, that many religious rites originated before the establishment either of the Egyptian or Jewish polity. Such of these as were truly patriarchal were not to be rejected under the Mosaic dispensation, merely because they had also descended to the Egyptians, by whom they were used. For instance, it was not necessary that Moses should refuse to adopt the rite of sacrifice, because this rite was common among Heathen nations. Sacrifice was a traditional mode of worship, derived from the earliest ages, and the most respectable sources; and it was transmitted from the ancestors of the Hebrews, and practised by all, whose memory they venerated. It was not necessary that Moses should omit to mention the new moons. This had been a patriarchal custom from time immemorial. In short, God had given certain ordinances to man, and more or less of them to his posterity in every part of the world. Such of them as the Egyptians had retained, though intermingled among others not so authorized, were adopted by Moses, who was so far the instrument of reforming the religious worship of his time. To these institutions thus separated from human inventions, he added others congenial in their nature, and particularly adapted to the temper, circumstances, and future situation of the Jewish people. These additions are truly the Mosaic, and were intended to preserve the Jews distinct and separate from all other nations. How well they have answered this purpose, appears not only from their history, but from their present dispersed state. The Jews are now a distinct people, still preserved as memorials confirming historic truth; whilst nations, which were infinitely more powerful, and which long triumphed over them, have become extinct, and are mingled with their conquerors. From this we perceive, that the design of these rites was not merely to restrain the Jews from idolatry, but that after they were no longer exposed to that temptation, they should by that means be preserved as a certain evidence of the truth of prophecy, of the providence of God displayed towards them, and especially of the verity of Jesus Christ, of his apostles, and of the Christian religion in general.

Dr. Middleton has shown the conformity between the pagan and the popish ceremonies, which he exemplifies in the use of incense, holy water, lamps, and candles before the shrines of saints, votive gifts round the shrines of the deceased, &c. He proves, that the altars, images, crosses, processions, miracles, legends, even the very hierarchy, pontificate, religious orders, &c. of the present Romans, were all copied from the Heathens. The church of Rome has not so much accommodated itself to human weakness, as it has abused that weakness, by establishing an endless variety of ridiculous ceremonies, destructive of true religion, and adapted only to promote the riches and despotism of the clergy, and to keep the multitude in ignorance and superstition. How far a just antipathy to the church puppet-shows of the papists has improperly driven some protestant churches into the opposite extreme, is a matter that deserves a serious consideration.

It has been sometimes objected to the discipline of the church of England, that several of its ceremonies are still the same as those of the church of Rome. To this it may be answered, that we have retained none, which have not been authorized by the practice of the early Christians, or suiued to the important purposes of religious worship. Such were the moderation and wisdom of our reformers, that they did not think it necessary to abolish rites, merely because they were used by the church of Rome. Though they loudly exclaimed against the antichristian power, which it had usurped, and were fully aware of its numerous corruptions, yet they were sensible that it retained some of the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel, and that some of its practices were founded in Scripture and reason, and conformable to the constant usages of the early Christians. By thus keeping their minds unbiassed by any improper prejudice, they were enabled to form a just discrimination, and to avoid those absurdities and excesses, into which some protestant churches unfortunately fell. The ceremonies of our public offices are grave, simple, and significant, and calculated to excite devotion in the mind, while 'all things are done decently, and in order.' (1 Cor. xiv. 40.) In the primitive times, every particular church ordained, and varied at its pleasure, its own rites and ceremonies; and a considerable difference existed in the rituals of different churches very near to the days of the apostles. Augustin, who had been consulted respecting the obedience, which was due to the different customs of different churches, observes as follows: Quod enim neque contra fidem, neque contra bonos mores esse convincitur, indifferenter est habendum; et propter eorum, inter quos vivitur, societatem servandum est. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christ. Theology, vol. ii. p. 530, &c.; Additions to Calmet's Dict.; Buck's Theolog. Dictionary.

CERINTHIANS, ancient heretics, the followers of Cerinthus. This man, who was a Jew by birth, attempted to form a new and singular system of doctrine and discipline, by combining the doctrines of Christ with the opinions and errors of the Jews and Gnostics. He taught, that the creator of the world, whom he considered also as the sovereign and law-giver of the Jews, was a being endued with the greatest virtues, and derived his birth from the Supreme God; that this Being gradually degenerated from his former virtue; that, in consequence of this, the Supreme Being determined to destroy his empire, and, for that purpose, sent upon earth one of the ever happy and glorious æons; whose name was Christ; that this Christ chose for his habitation the person of Jesus, into whom he entered in the form of a dove, whilst Jesus was receiving the baptism of John in the waters of Jordan; that Jesus, after his union with Christ, opposed the god of the Jews, at whose instigation he was seized and crucified by the Hebrew chiefs; that when Jesus was taken captive, Christ ascended on high, and the man Jesus alone was subjected to the pains of an ignominious death.

The Cerinthians admitted only parts of the Gospel of St. Matthew. They also rejected the Acts of the Apostles and all the Epistles. Mosheim, vol. i. p. 117; Gregor. Hist. vol. i. p. 59.

CHALDÆA, כַּשְׁדִּים, Chasdim, Χαλδαία, signifies like demons; otherwise, like plunderers, or like beasts, or like fields. Chaldæa was a country of Asia, near the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, and the capital of which was Babylon. See BABYLON.

Chasdim or Chashdim, and not Chaldæa, is in the Hebrew text. It is uncertain whether Chaldæa derived its name from Chesed, the son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, though Dr. Wells is of this opinion. Some think, that the inhabitants of this country journeyed from the East, Kedem, (Gen. xi. 2.) and that Kedem was situated in the neighbourhood of Caucasus. When a considerable division of mankind withdrew to Shinar, they were accompanied by a certain proportion of Chaldæans, or Chashdim, who were a superior family, or in stations of trust and dignity, that is, they were at least priests, if not also governors. Out of this body, the governors, rulers, and kings were elected; and hence the Babylonian kingdom, &c. is called the kingdom, &c. of the Chasdim. Chaldæa, in ancient times, was known by the names of Shinar, Shinaar, &c. &c. and was situated between thirty and thirty-five degrees of north latitude. According to Ptolemy, it was bounded, on the north, by Mesopotamia; on the east, by the Tigris; on the west, by Arabia Deserta; and on the south, by the Persian Gulf, and part of Arabia Felix.

The Chaldæans were the philosophic or priestly order among the Babylonians, and were rather a tribe among a nation, than a nation of themselves. They were famous for their learning, and were priests, philosophers, astronomers, astrologers, soothsayers, &c. They gloried in having among them astronomical observations for 472,000 years; Cicero says, 470,000; Epigenes, cited in Pliny, 720,000; but the longest date, which has any appearance of truth, is 1903 years. In consequence of this pretended claim to learning and supernatural knowledge, the Chaldæans are distinguished from the Babylonians; and they are said to have inhabited a region peculiar to themselves, and situated next to the Arabians and the Persian Gulf. Universal History, lib. i. c. 9; Sacred Geography, Excursions, No. x. p. 32.

CHAMBER. The houses in the East contain many chambers on the sides of an open court, or gallery built around it. Describing a house built in the eastern fashion, Niebuhr says, 'There was not one well-furnished room in it; yet it consisted of several distinct apartments, into which the entrance was through an open gallery which extended all around it.' Something like this seems to be what Solomon means by his wide house, or as it should be rendered, house of chambers. (Prov. xxv. 24.) As if he had said, 'If a person, by good fortune, should dwell in the most distant part of the gallery, from a quarrelling woman, yet her contention will disturb the whole dwelling, and every one of its inhabitants will suffer by their troublesome neighbour, who will either spread the flame of strife from chamber to chamber, or annoy the whole gallery by her brawls and squabbles.' Niebuhr, Travels, vol. i. p. 251; Fragments attached to Calmet's Dictionary.

CHAMOIS. The word rendered chamois by our translators, (Deut. xiv. 5.) is evidently improper. The Hebrew word is tzamor, which the Septuagint render camelopardalis; with this the Vulgate agrees, and also the Arabic, which translates it zîrafte. However, the zîrafte, or giraffe, being a native of the torrid zone, and Southern Africa, is equally unlikely from its attachment to hot countries to be abundant in Judea, and used as an article of food, as the chamois, which inhabits the chilly regions of mountains only, and seeks their most retired shades, to shelter it from the warmth of summer, preferring those cool retreats where snow and ice prevail. The class of antelopes bids fairest to contain this animal, the tzamor, though Mr. Parkhurst rather inclines to seek it among the goat kind, and supposes that it derives its name from its remarkably browsing on the shoots and twigs of trees. Parkhurst's Heb. Lexicon, p. 177, octavo edit. 1811; Scripture Illustrated.

CHAOS, the mass of matter supposed to be in confusion before it was divided by the Almighty into its proper classes and elements. It does not appear, who first asserted the notion of a chaos. Moses, the earliest of all writers, derives the origin of this world from a confusion of matter, dark, void, deep, without form, which he calls tohu bohu. This is precisely the chaos of the Greek and Barbarian philosophers.

CHARIOTS of War. The Scripture speaks of two sorts, one for princes and generals, the other to break the enemy's battalions, by rushing in among them, armed with iron, which caused terrible havoc. The most ancient chariots of war of which we know, are those of Pharaoh that were drowned in the Red Sea. (Exod. xiv. 7.) The Canaanites, whom Joshua engaged at the waters of Merom, had cavalry, and a multitude of chariots. (Josh. xi. 4.) Sisera, the general of Jabin, king of Hazor, had nine hundred chariots of iron in his army. (Judges iv. 3.) The tribe of Judah could not obtain possession of the lands belonging to their lot, because the ancient inhabitants of the country were strong in chariots of iron. (Id. i. 19.) The Philistines,

In the war carried on by them against Saul, had thirty thousand chariots, and six thousand horsemen. (1 Sam. xiii. 5.) David having taken a thousand chariots of war from Hadadezer, king of Zobah, hamstringed the horses, and burned nine hundred chariots, reserving only a hundred. (2 Sam. viii. 4.)

It does not appear that the Hebrews ever used chariots in war. Solomon had a considerable number, but we know of no military expedition in which they were employed. (1 Kings x. 26.) As Judea was a mountainous country, chariots could be of no use. In the books of Maccabees, mention is made of chariots armed with scythes, which the king of Syria led against Judea. (2 Macc. xiii. 2.)

CHARITY is to be understood not of gifts to the poor, though that be one of the external actions of charity, but of that internal principle whence proceed all outward good actions. This principle is love, kindness, affection, sympathy. The bases of charity are love to God, and good-will to man. These principles will regulate the mind to complacency, forgiveness, meekness, and a desire to promote the welfare of others. Charity views dubious things in the most favourable light, and never makes the worst of bad things. Charity is not wearied out by disappointed hopes, nor overwhelmed by too plausible fears. It is not satisfied with empty wishes only, but uses endeavours and exertions to accomplish its benevolent purposes. It is not confined to a family, a tribe, or a nation, but embraces all mankind. In some degree, charity is rewarded in this world; but in the world to come, it may justly expect the most gracious remuneration.

Charity, in Scripture, is often expressed by the word love, as when our Saviour says, 'This is my commandment,' the sovereign and most essential precept of my religion, 'that ye love one another.' The suggestions of reason are in exact unison with the injunctions of revelation; and we ought, without any limitations or exceptions, to cherish the feeling of love towards the whole race of man. From a general view of human nature, without reference to any particular individuals of any manners, religion, or country, we discern a striking similitude, not only in the corporeal structure, but in the mental and moral constitution of all mankind. Our near approximation to each other affords many arguments for our reciprocal regard. Is our contempt of our neighbour excited by his obscurity, indigence, or weakness? We ought to recollect, that God made both rich and poor, high and low, strong and weak. Has not our Saviour forcibly taught us a better lesson by appearing on the earth in circumstances of poverty and distress, and by choosing his companions and apostles from men in the lowest stations and the most inglorious occupations?

Charity will induce us, instead of envying the prosperity of our neighbour, to make it the subject of our rejoicing. It will give us an interest in his interests, and render his happiness an addition to our own. If charity rejoices with those that rejoice, it will weep with those that weep. Is any one sick or unfortunate, and is not charity depressed? Is any in want, and does not charity feel the most painful solicitude for his relief? The disappointments of others are its vexations; and others' losses are its cares. In short, no pain or suffering can befall those around it, and charity be an indifferent spectator.

Charity renders our principles of action more liberal and humane. It suffers nothing sordid, nothing contracted in our views; and teaching us to regard all men as brethren, the children of the same heavenly Father, it represses the emotions of religious and political intolerance, of professional and national antipathies. Where charity prevails, no sectarian bitterness, no exclusive attachments to a party or a sect, will exist. It suppresses all those unsocial habits and sensations, which are the source of so many divisions and of so much animosity among men, while it encourages all those qualities and affections, which are the best cement of amity and peace. It will sympathize with the feelings and circumstances of others, and, as far as it has ability, will supply their wants and soothe their cares. It will provide not only for the temporal, but also for the moral necessities of its fellow-creatures. It will have compassion not only on the afflicted and the indigent, but on the ignorant and the vicious. It will assiduously labour to instruct the one, and reclaim the other; and it will strenuously endeavour to promote the knowledge of true religion and virtue. The knowledge of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, which will be found the most fruitful source of every good habit, charity will endeavour to diffuse. It will constantly propose for its own imitation, and earnestly recommend to the imitation of others, the example of Jesus Christ, whose conduct was one continued series of the most beneficent actions, who went about doing good, healing the sick, feeding the hungry, comforting the afflicted, and, above all, labouring to soften the prejudices, appease the animosities, correct the vices, and increase the virtues of mankind.

It is one of the properties of charity, that 'it is not puffed up,' that it is not inflated with pride or arrogance, that it represses all supercilious and contemptuous emotions, and that it is respectful to its superiors, and kind and courteous to its equals, its inferiors, and to all with whom it has any intercourse. It smooths the gradations between the high and the low, the rich and the poor. It teaches us that Christ is our master, and that we are all brethren. It renders servants meek and assiduous, and induces masters to practise a becoming gentleness and forbearance. It excites the rich to conciliate love by a liberal distribution of their wealth to the necessitous; and it persuades the powerful to dispel fear and win affection by an unaffected complacency of demeanour. Always intent on the good of others, it will deem no employment a disgrace, and no office a degradation, by which it can promote the happiness of its fellow-creatures. It will forgive even its greatest enemies, not unmindful that it may have need of forgiveness. It will always be willing to judge favourably of others, and to impute its neighbour's actions to the best intentions. It will not judge hastily, nor condemn rigorously; and it will be always more prone to lament, than to punish the errors of humanity. Without it, all our moral performances are worth nothing in the sight of God; without it all our virtues are merely the vain shows, rather than the substantial realities of virtue; and without it, faith is only a vapid confidence or a barren speculation. In every individual breast, in which charity resides, it will be found a source of pure and unspeakable delight, productive of the greatest temporal good, and leading to everlasting happiness. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. p. 64, &c.; Bishop Burnet on the Love of our Neighbour, in Warner's System of Divinity, vol. ii. p. 131.

CHE DORLA'OMER, כרל-עמר, Χεδωρλογομωρ, signifies as a generation of servitude; otherwise, the roundness of the sheaf. Chedorlaomer, a king of the Elamites, who were either Persians, or a people bordering on the Persians. Chedorlaomer was one of the four kings, who were confederated against the five kings of the Pentapolis of Sodom, and who, having defeated them, and taken a great booty, were pursued and dispersed by Abraham. (Gen. xiv. 1, 2, &c.) This happened in the year of the world 2092, and before Jesus Christ 1912.

Chedorlaomer, for twelve years, kept five kings subject to him; viz. Bera, king of Sodom, Birsha, king of Gomorrah, Shinab, king of Admah, Shemeber, king of Zeboim, and the king of Bela or Zoar. At length, they revolted from him, about the year of the world 2091. Chedorlaomer gathered a great army, and entered into a confederacy with Amraphel, king of Shinar, Arioch, king of Ellasar, (perhaps Thalasser, near Assyria, in the province of Eden), and with Tidal, king of the nations, or Goim, probably the nations beyond Jordan, in Galilee of the Gentiles. (Matt. iv. 15. Isaiah ix. 1.) These four kings marched towards Canaan. In their way they attacked the inhabitants of the countries beyond Jordan; the Rephaim, giants who lived between the brook Jabbok and the Arnon. They took and pillaged Ashteroth. They defeated the Zuzim, who were probably the same as the Zamzumim, ancient inhabitants of the country afterwards possessed by the Ammonites. (Deut. ii. 20, 21.) Moses says, that the Zuzim were beaten at Ham, which was perhaps Chamin, an ancient city of the same territory. They routed the Emim, in Shaveh Kiriathaim. (Gen. xiv. 5.) The Emim were an ancient people, who dwelt in the country afterwards possessed by the Moabites; and Shaveh Kiriathaim was a city in the same land, and afterwards belonged to king Sihon. (Deut. ii. 10, 11. Josh. xiii. 19, 21.) Lastly, in the mountains of Gilead, they defeated the Horites, a famous people, who were descended from Seir the Horite, and whose country was afterwards seized by the Edomites. (Gen. xxxii. 3.; xxxvi. 20.) They carried their conquests to the plains of Paran in Arabia Petræa. Thence they returned towards Kadesh-Barnea, where is the fountain of Meribah, which, however, was not known by that name before the time of Moses. (Numb. xx. 13.) They ravaged the country of the Amalekites, who inhabited part of Arabia Petræa; and they defeated the Amorites at Hazezon-tamar, which some think to be En-gedi, a city adjacent to the Pentapolis and Gomorrah. Thus the four allied kings destroyed the power of the several nations bordering on Sodom and Gomorrah, that these cities might have no assistance to expect, and be unable to escape their vengeance.

The five revolted kings, perceiving the allies drawing towards their cities, took the field with their army, and put it in order of battle, in the very plain, in which their several towns were situated. In this plain were many wells, out of which the inhabitants procured bitumen; a circumstance that might have rendered the access to it more difficult and dangerous to the enemy's horse. Here the battle was fought, and the kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, Zeboim, Admah, and Zoar, were put to flight. One part of their army was cut to pieces, and the other fled to the neighbouring mountains, leaving their cities a prey to the conquerors. Sodom, Gomorrah, and the other places were pillaged, and the enemy, loaded with spoils and captives, returned by the way of the Euphrates.

CHEM'ARIM. This word occurs only once in our version of the Bible: 'I will cut off the remnant of Baal, and the name of the Chemarims (Chemarim) with the priests,' (Zeph. i. 4.); but it frequently occurs in the Hebrew Bible, and is generally translated priests of the idols, or priests clothed in black, because chamar signifies blackness. By this word the best commentators understand the priests of false gods, and in particular the worshippers of fire, because they were, it is said, dressed in black. Le Clerc, however, declares against this last opinion. St. Jerom, in the Second Book of Kings, (xxiii. 5.) renders this word aruspices, sooth-sayers; and in Hosea, (x. 5.) and Zephaniah, (i. 4.) ditui, churchwardens. Our translators of the Bible, in the first and last places mentioned, would seem to understand by this word the idols or objects of worship, rather than their priests. This is also the opinion of Le Clerc. Calmet observes, that Camar in Arabic signifies the moon, and that Isis is the same deity. Among the priests of Isis, says Calmet, were those called melanephori, that is, wearers of black; but it is uncertain whether this was by reason of their dressing wholly in black, or because they wore a black shining veil in the processions of this goddess.

CHE'MOSH, כִּמּוֹשׁ, Chemosh, an idol of the Moabites. (Numb. xxi. 29.) The name is derived from a root which in Arabic signifies to hasten. For this reason, many believe Chemosh to be the sun, whose precipitate course might well procure it the name of swift. Some confound Chemosh with Ammon; and Macrobius shows that Ammon was the sun, whose rays were denoted by his horns. Calmet is of opinion, that the god Hamanus, and Apollo Chomeus, mentioned by Strabo and Ammianus Marcellinus, was Chamos, or the sun. These deities were worshipped in many parts of the East. Some, from the resemblance of the Hebrew Chamos, with the Greek Comos, have thought Chamos or Chemosh, to signify Bacchus. Jerom and most interpreters consider Chemosh and Peor as the same deity. To Chemosh Solomon erected an altar upon the mount of Olives. (1 Kings xi. 7.)

Mr. Parkhurst observes, that 'as to the form of the idol chemosh, the Scripture is silent; but if, according to Jerom, it were like Baal-Peor, it must have been of the beee kind, as were probably all the Baals, though accompanied with various insignia. There can be little doubt that part of the religious services performed to Chemosh, as to Baal-Peor, consisted in revelling and drunkenness, (Jer. xlviii. 11. 26.) obscenities and impurities of the grossest kinds. From Chemosh the Greeks seem to have derived their κῶμος, called by the Romans Comus, the god of lascivious feasting and revelling.' Parkhurst's Heb. Lexicon, p. 322. edit. 1811.

CHEREM, חֵרֵם, anathema. The Hebrews distinguish three sorts of excommunications: cher niddui, separation, the lesser excommunication; cherem, the greater excommunication, or anathema; and שמרה shammathah, to which death is annexed. By cherem, the excommunicated person is deprived of most of the advantages of civil society. He can have no commerce; and he cannot either buy or sell, except such things as are absolutely necessary to life. He cannot resort to the schools, nor enter the synagogues. He cannot eat or drink with any one. The sentence of cherem was to be pronounced by ten persons; or at least, in the presence of ten persons; but the excommunicated person might be absolved by three judges, or even by one, if he were a doctor of the law. Anciently, cherem and shammathah denoted sentence of death, and total destruction, inflicted either by the people when victorious, or by the decree of the senate. God ordains that he, who sacrifices to strange gods, shall be cherem, that is, punished with death. See ANATHEMA and EXCOMMUNICATION.

CHERETHIM, כִּרְתִּים, Χορεθίμ, signifies who cuts, who tears away, and exterminates. CHERETHIM or CHERETHITES, are denominations for the Philistines: 'I will stretch out mine hand upon the Philistines, and will cut off the Cherethim, and destroy the remnant of the sea-coast.' (Ezek. xxv. 16.) Zephaniah, exclaiming against the Philistines, says, 'Wo unto the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, the nation of the Cherethites.' (Zeph. ii. 5.) It is said, (1 Sam. xxx. 14.) that the Amalekites invaded the south of the Cherethites, that is, of the Philistines. It has been questioned whence the Philistines, or Cherethites, came; but this subject has been already discussed under the article CAPTORS.

David, and some of the kings his successors, had guards called Cherethites and Pelethites. (2 Sam. xv. 18.; xx. 7.) Calmet thinks that they were of the country of the Philistines; but several expositors are of a different opinion. We can hardly suppose, say the latter, that David would employ any of these uncircumcised people as his body-guard, or that the Israelitish soldiers would have patiently seen foreigners of that nation advanced to such places of honour and trust. It may, therefore, be inferred, that guards were called Cherethites, because they went with David into Philistia, where they continued with him all the time he was under the protection of Achish. These were the persons who accompanied David from the first, and who remained with him in his greatest distresses; and it is no wonder if men of such approved fidelity should be chosen by him for his body-guard. Besides, it is not uncommon for soldiers to derive their name, not from the place of their nativity, but of their residence. Patrik's Comment.; Poole's Annot., &c.

CHERUB, כִּרְבָּב, signifies as a child; otherwise, as multiplying, or as combating; or abundance, or multitude of knowledge.

CHERUB, or, in the plural, CHERUBIM, a particular order of angels. The term cherub, in Hebrew, sometimes denotes a calf or an ox. Ezekiel mentions the face of a cherub as synonymous to that of an ox. (Ezek. i. 10.) In Syriac and in Chaldee, the word cherub signifies to till or plough, which is the work of oxen. Cherub also signifies strong and powerful, and may, therefore, refer to the strength of oxen. Grotius says, the cherubim were figures nearly resembling a calf. Borchart thinks they were nearly the figure of an ox; and Spencer is of the same opinion. Josephus says, that the cherubim were winged creatures, of a figure unknown to mankind. Clemens of Alexandria thinks, that the Egyptians imitated the cherubim of the Hebrews in their sphinxes and hieroglyphical animals.

The descriptions, which the Scripture gives us of cherubim differ, but they all agree in representing a figure, composed of various creatures; a man, an ox, an eagle, and a lion. Such were the cherubim described by the prophet Ezekiel, (Ezek. i. 5, &c.; x. 2.); and those placed by Solomon in the temple must have been nearly the same. (1 Kings vi. 23.) Those placed by Moses on the ark of the covenant, (Exod. xxv. 18, 19, 20.) and those posted by God at the entrance of Paradise, (Gen. iii. 24.) are not so described as to be perfectly understood. Ezekiel compares the king of Tyre to the cherub, that covered the ark of the covenant upon the holy mountain, and glittered with gold and glory. (Ezek. xxviii. 14.) Moses says, that the two cherubim covered the mercy-seat, with their wings extended on both sides, and looked one upon another; and that they had their faces turned towards the mercy-seat, which covered the ark.

It appears from the descriptions in Scripture, that each cherub had four heads or countenances; that of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle. These four faces were probably attached to one head, and seen by the spectator in union, each being joined by its back parts to the others. The body, from the neck to perhaps below the navel, had the likeness of a man. Ezekiel describes the cherub as having four wings; and Isaiah the seraph, six wings. Their arms, which in our translation are properly enough rendered hands, were four in number, one on each side of the creature. The lower parts of the cherub, from the rim of the belly downwards, were probably either human thighs, legs, and feet, to which were appended, at the posteriors, the body and hind legs of an ox; or, rather, the body and four legs of an ox, from which the human part seemed to rise, so that all below the rim of the belly was in the form of an ox, and all above was human. It would seem that the vision of Ezekiel, as well as that of Isaiah, was the resemblance of a moveable throne, or chariot, which was of prodigious dimensions, and upon which the conductor was supposed to sit.

That the cherubic figures were emblems or representatives of something beyond themselves is agreed by all, both Jews and Christians. The question is, of what they were emblematical? 'to this it is answered,' says Mr. Parkhurst, that 'those in the Holy of Holies were emblematical of the ever-blessed Trinity, in covenant to redeem man, by uniting the human nature to the Second Person. This union was signified by the union of the faces of the lion and the man. (Ezek. i. 10.) The cherubs in the Holy of Holies were certainly intended to represent some being in heaven; because St. Paul has expressly and infallibly determined, that the Holy of Holies was a figure or type of heaven, even of that heaven where is the peculiar residence of God. (Heb. ix. 24.) These cherubs, therefore, represented either the ever-blessed Trinity, with man taken into the essence, or created spiritual angels.

'If it should be asked, since it appears that one compound Cherub solely was the representative of the ever-blessed Three with the Man united to the Second Person, why were there two of these in the Holy of Holies?—to this it is answered, that had there not in this place been two compound cherubs, it would have been naturally impossible for them to represent what was there designed; for otherwise all the faces would not have looked inward towards each other, and down on the mercy-seat, and on the interceding high-priest sprinkling the typical blood of Christ, and at the same time have looked outwards towards the temple. In other words, the Divine Persons could not have been represented as witnessing to each other's voluntary engagements for man's redemption, as beholding the sacrifice of Christ's death, typified in the Jewish church, and at the same time as extending their gracious regards to the whole world. See Isaiah, liv. 5. It would appear that in 1 Sam. vi. 20. the Bethshemites call the Cherubim by the name of Jehovah Aleim; and the Teraphim, a smaller sort of Cherubim, are also called Aleim. (Gen. xxxi. 30. 32; comp. 19. 34, and xxxv. 4.)

'The coupled Cherub, or Lion-Man, on the vail and curtains of the outer tabernacle, and on the vail, doors, and walls of the temple, accompanied with the emblematic palm-tree, is such a striking emblem of the Lion of the tribe of Judah, (Rev. v. 5.) united to the Man Christ Jesus, as is easy to be perceived, but difficult to be evaded. These coupled Cherubs are appropriate to the tabernacle or temple and their vails, as emblems of Christ, and express in visible symbols what he and his apostles do in words. (See John ii. 19. 21. Heb. x. 20; comp. Matt. xxvii. 51.) As these passages of the New Testament afford us sufficient authority for asserting that the tabernacle or temple, and their vails were types of the body of Christ; so they furnish us with an irrefragable argument to prove that the Cherubs on their curtains or walls could not represent angels. For angels did not dwell in Christ's body, but in him dwelleth all the fullness of the godhead bodily. (Col. ii. 9.) To obviate any undue prejudice, which may have been conceived against the Divine Persons being symbolically represented under any animal forms whatever, let it be remarked, that Jehovah appeared as Three Men to Abraham (Gen. xviii.); that the Serpent of brass, set up by God's command in the wilderness, was a type or emblem of Christ, God-Man, lifted up on the cross (Numbers xxi. 6—9. John iii. 14, 15.); that at Jesus's baptism the Holy Spirit descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him (Luke iii. 21, 22.); that Christ, as above intimated, is expressly called the Lion of the tribe of Judah (Rev. v. 5.); and that he is continually in that symbolical book set before us under the similitude of a lamb. Why then should it appear as a thing incredible, yea why not highly probable, that Jehovah Aleim should, under the typical state, order his own Persons and the Union of the Manhood with the Essence to be represented by animal forms in the Cherubim of Glory? The three animal forms, exclusive of the man, who stood for the very human nature itself, are the chief of their respective genera: the ox or bull, of the tame or graminivorous; the lion, of the wild or carnivorous; and the eagle, of the winged kind. As the great agents in nature, which carry on all its operations, certainly are the fluid of the heavens, or in other words, the fire, at the orb of the sun, the light issuing from it, and the spirit or gross air constantly supporting, and concurring to the actions and effects of the other two; so we are told, (Psalm xix. 1.) that the heavens are the means of declaring, recounting, or particularly exhibiting the glory of God, even his eternal power and Godhead, as St. Paul speaks, (Rom. i. 20.) Since Jehovah is in Scripture represented by the immaterial heavens, and even called by their name, and especially by that of fire; since the Second and Third Persons, are exhibited respectively by the two conditions of light and spirit; and since fire is really a condition of the heavenly fluid, as much distinct from the other two as they are from each other; it remains that the peculiar emblem of the First Person (as we usually speak) of the Eternal Trinity, considered with respect to the other two, be the fire. Bearing then in mind that the personality in Jehovah is in Scripture represented by the material Trinity of Nature, which also, like their divine antitype, are of one substance; that the primary Scriptural type of the Father is fire; of the Word, light; and of the Holy Ghost, spirit or air in motion; we shall easily perceive the propriety of the cherubic emblems. The ox, or bull, on account of his horns, the curling hair on his forehead, and his unrelenting fury when provoked, (Psalm xxii. 12.) is a very proper animal emblem of fire; the lion, from his usual tawny gold-like colour, his flowing mane, his shining eyes, his great vigilancy, and his prodigious strength, of the light; and the eagle, of the spirit, or air in motion, from his being the chief among fowls, from his impetuous motion (2 Sam. i. 23. Job

ix. 26. Jer. iv. 13. Lam. iv. 19.); and from his towering and surprising flights in the air. (Job xxxix. 27. Prov. xxiii. 5.; xxx. 19. Isaiah xl. 31.) The Heathens used these emblematic animals, or the like, sometimes separate, sometimes joined, in various manners, as representatives of the material Trinity of nature, which they adored.'

'Thus then the faces of the ox, the lion, and the eagle, representing at second hand the three persons of Jehovah, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit; and the union of the divine Light with Man being plainly pointed out by the union of the faces of the lion and the man, (Ezek. i. 10; xli. 18.) we may safely assert that the Cherubim of Glory, (Heb. ix. 5.) in the Holy of Holies, were divinely instituted and proper emblems of the three Eternal Persons in covenant to redeem man, and of the union of the divine and human natures in the person of Christ. We find (Gen. iii. 24.) that immediately on Adam's expulsion from Paradise, and the cessation of the first or Paradisaical dispensation of religion, Jehovah Aleim himself set up these emblems, together with the burning flame rolling upon itself, to keep the way to the tree of life, undoubtedly, considering the services performed before them, not to hinder, but to enable man to pass through it.' Some, however, think the arguments advanced on this subject not sufficiently conclusive.

'The word כרוב or כרוב kerub,' says Dr. Adam Clarke, 'never appears as a verb in the Hebrew Bible, and therefore is justly supposed to be a word compounded of ק ke, a particle of resemblance, like to, like as, and ר rab, he was great, powerful, &c. Hence it is very likely that the cherubs, to whatever order of beings they belonged, were emblems of the ALL-MIGHTY, and were those creatures, by whom he produced the great effects of his power. The word רב rab is a character of the Most High. Prov. xxvi. 10; The great God who formed all; and again in Psalm xlviii. 2. where he is called the Great King.' Hence Dr. Clarke supposes, that the cherubim were emblematical representations of the eternal power and Godhead of the Almighty.

In 2 Kings xix. 15. Psalm lxxx. 1. Isaiah xxxvii. 16. God is spoken of as dwelling, residing, between the Cherubim. The word between is supplied by our translators, who ought, perhaps, to have written above or over the Cherubim, since such is his relative situation in these visions. Parkhurst's Heb. and Eng. Lexicon, p. 340, octavo edit. 1811.; Fragments attached to Calmet's Dict. No. clii. p. 120—129.; Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Gen. iii. 24.

CHILD. In Scripture, disciples are often called children or sons. Solomon, in his Proverbs, says to his disciple, 'Hear, my son.' The children of the devil, the sons of Belial, are those who adopt, the maxims of the world and the devil. The descendants of a man, how remote soever, are denominated his sons or children; as the children of Edom, the children of Moab, the children of Israel. These expressions, the children of light, the children of darkness, the children of the kingdom, signify those, who follow light, those who remain in darkness, and those, who belong to the kingdom.

Persons arrived at almost the age of maturity, are called children. Thus, Joseph is called the child, though he was at least sixteen years old (Gen. xxxvii. 30.); and Benjamin even when above thirty, was so denominated. (Id. xlv. 20.) Men of full age are often called children. Thus Isaiah says, that the child shall die a hundred years old (Isaiah lxxv. 20.); that is, there shall be no more untimely deaths.

By the Jewish law, children were reckoned the property of their parents, who could sell them for seven years to pay their debts, and their creditors had also the power of compelling them to have recourse to this measure. The poor woman, whose oil Elisha increased so much as enabled her to pay her husband's debts, complained to the prophet, that, her husband being dead, the creditor was come to take away her two sons to be bondmen. (2 Kings iv. 1.)

Children, or sons of God, is a name, by which the angels are sometimes described: 'There was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord.' (Job i. 6; ii. 1.) Good men, in opposition to the wicked, are also thus denominated; the children of Seth's family, in opposition to those of Cain. 'The sons of God saw the daughters of men.' (Gen. vi. 2.) Or, perhaps, what is translated, 'the sons of God,' may be rendered 'the sons of the dignitaries.' Judges, magistrates, priests, are also termed children of God:—'I have said ye are gods, and all of you are the children of the Most High.' (Psalm lxxxii. 6.) Israelites are called sons of God, in opposition to the Gentiles. (Hos. i. 10. John xi. 52.) In the New Testament, believers are commonly called children of God, by virtue of their adoption, and the prerogative, which Christ purchased for them by the merit of his death and sufferings. (John i. 12.) Paul, in several places, extols the advantages of being adopted sons of God. (Rom. viii. 14. Gal. iii. 26.)

Children, or sons, of men is a name given to Cain's family before the deluge, and, in particular, to the giants, who were violent men, and had corrupted their ways. Afterwards, the impious, the wicked, Israelites were thus called: 'O ye sons of men, how long will ye love vanity?' (Psalm iv. 2.) 'The sons of men, whose teeth are spears and arrows.' (Psalm lvii. 4.) But very often by sons of men, mankind in general are to be understood: 'What is the son of man that thou visitest him?' (Psalm viii. 4.) 'His eyelids try the children of men.' (Psalm xi. 4.)

CHIMNEY occurs only once in our version of the Bible, (Hos. xiii. 3.); but we are not to suppose, that either the Hebrews or Egyptians had chimneys like ours. In Palestine, Arabia, and Egypt, the people use little fire, because those countries are very hot; and their fire consists of coals laid on a hearth, or in a foot stove.

CHIOS, Xîos, signifies an opening, and is an island next to Lesbos, in the Archipelago. It is situated opposite to Smyrna, and not above four leagues from the Asiatic continent. St. Paul, sailing from Mitylene, came the next day over against Chios. (Acts xx. 15.)

CHITTIM. Isaiah, speaking of the destruction of Tyre by king Nebuchadnezzar, says, 'Howl ye ships of Tarshish; for it (Tyre) is laid waste, so that there is no house, no entering in: from the land of Chittim it is revealed to them.' (Isaiah xxiii. 1.) If Chittim signifies Macedonia, how is it said, that the destruction of Tyre, occasioned by Nebuchadnezzar, should come from Chittim? Might it not be more properly interpreted, as relating to the destruction of that city by Alexander the Great? In fact, it has been sufficiently proved by some late writers, that this prophecy of Isaiah has no relation to the Tyre, which was taken by Nebuchadnezzar. It relates solely to Insular Tyre, and to the conquest of it by Alexander, in the year 332 before Christ, when this great city was entirely demolished, and most of the inhabitants slain. Those who remained, and escaped not to Carthage, were sold for slaves to the Greeks, and were sent captives to Macedonia; and so, as in the 12th verse, they passed over to Chittim, where they had no rest. The Tyre taken by Nebuchadnezzar was an inland city called Old Tyre, the ancient seat of the Tyrian kings, to which the Insular Tyre was subject. By the word Chittim, Basnage understands the Cuthæans, inhabitants of the Susiana near Babylon, who marched under Nebuchadnezzar, and assisted at the siege of Tyre. But it is asked, in what place of Scripture are the Cuthæans named Chittim? Bochart supposes the Romans to be meant by Chittim; but the Romans were not concerned in the siege of Tyre, here mentioned by Isaiah.

Calmet and Le Clerc are of opinion, that Chittim is the same as Macedonia, which was peopled by Kittim, the son of Javan, and grandson of Noah. Calmet translates the Hebrew of Isaiah as follows: 'Howl, ye ships of Tarshish, because Tyre is destroyed within: it is open on the side where people enter, who come from Chittim.' They came from Macedonia to Tyre by sea. The city was supposed impregnable on this side, because it was surrounded by the sea. Yet the prophet foretels, that it should be taken, laid waste, and open on this side. He also says, that it should be ravaged from within, by its own inhabitants, and that the citizens or soldiers, who defended it, should be divided among themselves. Jeremiah, reproaching the Israelites with their inconstancy in the religion of their forefathers, says, 'Pass over the isles of Chittim, and see; and send into Kedar, and consider diligently, and see if there be such a thing. Hath a nation changed their gods, which are yet no gods.' (Jer. ii. 10, 11.) The prophet speaks of the country of Macedonia, under the name of the isles of Chittim, after the manner of the Hebrews, who thus denominated peninsulas and maritime countries.

By Chittim, the author of the first book of Maccabees understands Macedonia. He calls Alexander king of Chittim (1 Mac. i. 1.); and he says, that Perseus, king of Chittim, was overcome by the Romans. (Id. viii. 5.) The prophecy of Balaam, as Le Clerc observes, fully proves that by the word Chittim in Scripture is meant Macedonia: 'And ships shall come from the coast of Chittim, and shall afflict Asshur.' (Numb. xxiv. 24.) Now the Assyrians were conquered by Alexander and his successors; and the Romans did not enter Assyria, till they had become masters of Parthia.

It may, however, be doubted, whether the word Chittim should be restrained to Macedonia, which was not particularly a maritime country. It might include all Greece, at least the islands of the Archipelago, and perhaps up the Bosphorus, since vessels might thence navigate to Tyre, as at present they do to Egypt, &c. It might include the Greek colonies in the Mediterranean, and consequently, Sicily, Sardinia, and much of Italy. This would seem also to be the opinion of bishop Lowth, who thus translates the passage in Isaiah:

'Howl, O ye ships of Tarshish!

For she is utterly destroyed both within and without:

From the land of Chittim the tidings are brought unto them.'

The bishop observes in a note on the place, that the news of the destruction of Tyre is said to be brought to them from Chittim, the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean.

In fact, Chittim, and the isles of Chittim, seem to denote, in general, the maritime countries and islands of the Mediterranean, Greece, Italy, Crete, Cyprus, Corsica, &c. Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 570.; Lowth's Notes on Isaiah.

CHI'UN, a word which occurs in the Hebrew of Amos (v. 26.) and which the translators of our English Bible have retained. According to Calmet, the literal translation of the passage is as follows: 'But ye have borne the tabernacle of your kings, and the pedestal (the Chiun) of your images, the star of your gods, which ye made to yourselves.' By our translators it is thus rendered: 'But ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch and Chiun your images, the star of your god, which ye made to yourselves.' The passage is thus cited by St. Luke, in the Acts of the Apostles: 'Ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan, figures, which ye have made to worship them.' (Acts vii. 43.) The Septuagint also read Παύδν, probably instead of Chiun. Some think that three false deities are here named; Moloch, Chiun, and Remphan. Others are of opinion, that the three names mean only one god; that is, Saturn and his planet. Salmasius and Kircher assert, that Kijoun is Saturn, whose star is called Keiran among the Persians, and Arabians, and that Remphan or Raiphan denoted the same among the Egyptians. They add, that the Septuagint, writing in Egypt, changed the word Chiun into Remphan or Raiphan, because it had the same signification. Basnage, in his Jewish antiquities, says, that Moloch was the sun; and Chiun, Chion, or Raiphan, the moon.

On the word Chiun, Mr. Parkhurst observes, that as it is evident the Cherubim in the Holy of Holies of the tabernacle, and no doubt in Solomon's Temple also, were constantly attended by a supernatural light or glory, and as the idolaters could not procure this supernatural glory to their images, it is no wonder that they endeavoured to imitate it as well as they could by the splendour of burnished metal, gold, silver, and precious stones. Since in Amos, the idolaters are said to have borne the chiun of their images, that word may denote either some glorious, resplendent seat or throne, on which their idols were placed, and occasionally carried in procession; or else it may signify the lustre of their idols, themselves shining with gold and precious stones. Parkhurst's Hebrew and English Lexicon, p. 310, edit. 1811.

CHORAZIN, Χοραζίν, signifies this secret, or this mystery. Chorazin was a town of Judea, generally supposed to have been situated on the Sea of Galilee, and not far from Capernaum, and consequently on the western coast of that sea. Chorazin is not found in the Old Testament: and though it is reckoned among the cities, in which most of our Saviour's miracles were performed, yet it is mentioned only by two of the Evangelists, St. Matthew and St. Luke, and by them only in a discourse, in which our Lord upbraids it for its infidelity. (Matt. xi. 21. Luke x. 13.) Wells's Geog. vol. ii. p. 172.

CHOREPISCOPI. In the first century, the bishops, who lived in cities, had erected new churches in the neighbouring towns and villages. These churches, continuing under the inspection and ministry of the bishops, imperceptibly became ecclesiastical provinces, which the Greeks afterwards called dioceses. But as the bishop of the city could not extend his labours and inspection to all these churches, he appointed certain deputies to govern and instruct the new societies. These deputies were denominated chorepiscopi, τῆς χώρας ἐπίσκοποι, bishops of the country. This order held a middle rank between bishops and presbyters, being inferior to the former, and superior to the latter. Mosheim, vol. i. p. 86.

CHRIST, a Greek word, which is a title of office, signifies anointed, and corresponds with the Hebrew Messiah. See JESUS and MESSIAH.

CHRISTIAN, a disciple of Jesus Christ. At Antioch, where Paul and Barnabas jointly preached the Christian religion, the disciples were first called Christians, (Acts xi. 26.) in the year of our Lord 43. They generally called themselves brethren, faithful, saints, and believers. They were also named Nazarenes by the Jews, and Galileans by the Gentiles. Epiphanius says, that they were sometimes denominated Jesseans, from Jesse, the father of David, or more probably, from the name of Jesus. Many have been of opinion, that Christian was originally derived from the Greek chrestos, good, useful; and Suetonius, speaking of Claudius and his expelling the Jews from Rome, says, he banished them, because they were continually quarrelling concerning Chrestus. Christ, says Lactantius, is not a proper name, but one that denotes power; for the Jews used to give this appellation to their kings, whom they called Christs, or anointed, by reason of their sacred unction. He adds, that the heathens by mistake called Jesus Christ 'Chrestus.' Tertullian says, that 'the name of Christian comes from the unction received by Jesus Christ; and that of Christianus, which you sometimes through mistake give us (for you are not particularly acquainted with our name,) signifies that gentleness and benignity, which we profess.'

CHRISTIANITY, one of the four grand systems of religion, derived its name from its Divine Author, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and the Saviour of the world. Judaism, which contains the only preceding revelation of the will of God, was introductory to Christianity; and the lineage, birth, life, sufferings, death, and resurrection of the Messiah, that is, of Jesus Christ, were minutely predicted by a succession of Jewish prophets, and in particular by Isaiah, who has hence been styled the evangelical prophet. These prophecies were exactly fulfilled; and

Jesus Christ was miraculously born at Bethlehem of Judea, about the year of the world 4004, or about 1834 years ago, in the reign of Augustus Cæsar, emperor of Rome, and of Herod, tributary king of Judea. During his life, he chiefly confined the benefits of his personal ministry to the Jews; but after his resurrection, he commissioned the twelve persons, whom he had chosen from the number of his disciples, and who were afterwards called apostles, to go and instruct all nations in the nature and principles of his religion, and to introduce them by baptism into that society, of which he was the constituted head. Notwithstanding the violent opposition, by which Christianity was encountered, the number of Christians daily increased, and their religion, assisted by its Divine Author, soon made a wonderful progress in the Roman empire, and over-spread nearly the whole part of the world, which was known at that time. Tertullian says, that, in the third century, Christians were found in the camp, in the senate, in the palace, and, in short, every where except in the temples and the theatres; they filled the towns, the country, and the islands. Men and women, of all ages and conditions, and even those of the highest rank and dignity, embraced the Christian faith; and the Pagans complained that the revenues of their temples were ruined. The late Dr. Porteus says, 'By the time the empire became Christian, there is every reason to believe, that the Christians were more numerous and more powerful than the Pagans.' Thus did the word of God mightily prevail. In a few years after the expiration of the first three centuries, the cross was waving in the banners of victorious armies, and many of the kingdoms of the world became 'the kingdoms of our God and of his Christ.' Constantine was the first Christian emperor, and established Christianity as the religion of the empire. By edicts issued A.D. 324, he exhorted all his subjects to receive and embrace the Gospel.

Evidences. In proof that his religion is divine, the Christian can refer to some uncontested and incontestible evidences. A Jewish peasant changed the religion of the world, without force, without power, without support, and without any natural source or circumstance of attraction, influence, or success. Such an event hath not taken place in any other instance, and plainly proves the work of a hand Divine. In addition to this, the great truths of Christianity possess clear and incontrovertible evidence, and such evidence as has been acknowledged by the wisest and best of men; by the Bacons, the Boyles, the Lockes, the Miltons, the Newtons, and the Halleys of every age. They possess an evidence not written with pen and ink, nor inscribed on the fleshly tables of man's heart, but the evidence of the Spirit, 'which they that believe on Jesus shall receive.'

The evidences of Christianity have been divided into external and internal, and are briefly comprised under the following heads: historical testimony; the miracles recorded in the New Testament; the exact accomplishment of the prophecies; the rapid spread of the Gospel, notwithstanding the violent opposition with which it was encountered; the consistency of the several parts of the inspired pages with each other; the purity and perfection of its doctrines and precepts; their agreement with the moral attributes and perfections of the Deity; their suitability with the present state of man; and their benevolent tendency to promote the good of society, and advance the present, as well as future happiness of mankind.

If the Celsi and Porphyrii have been numerous, Christianity has never wanted its Justins and its Origenes. Besides the ancient apologists and defenders, to whom the reader is referred, he may also advantageously consult the works of Fabricius, Huetius, and Walchius; and it will be necessary that he should peruse one or more of the well known treatises of Grotius, Addison, Bryant, Leslie, Lardner, Beattie, and Paley. The late Bishop of London published A Summary of the Principal Evidences for the Truth and Divine Origin of the Christian Religion, than which no work on the subject is more methodical and familiar, or better calculated for the instruction of youth, for whose use it was chiefly designed.

Doctrines and Precepts. Almost all Christians, of all denominations, appeal to the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament as the ultimate standard, and the only infallible rule of faith and manners; and they agree in rejecting, as an article of faith, whatever is not actually expressed in these writings, or fairly deducible from them. These writings they believe to have been given by immediate inspiration from God. Though the authority of one inspired writer, in a matter that is clear and unequivocal, is sufficient for the establishment of any article of faith, yet the principles of the Christian religion are to be collected, not from a single Gospel, nor from all the four Gospels, nor from the four Gospels with the Acts and the Epistles, but from the whole code of revelation, consisting of the canonical books of the Old and New Testament.

Christianity may be divided into credenda, or doctrines, and agenda or precepts. A summary of the former is contained in what is called the Apostles' Creed; and the latter may be collected from the discourses of our Saviour, and the writings of his apostles.

The being and the attributes of God are truths, on which all religion is founded. The eternal existence of the Deity; his omnipresence; his infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; his holiness; his justice; and his other unbounded perfections; were inculcated on the Jews by express revelation. The same truths form the foundation of Christianity. In this indivisible essence most Christians recognise three distinct subsistences, yet distinguished in such a manner as not to be incompatible with essential unity, or simplicity of being; and their essential union is also not incompatible with their personal distinction. Each of them possesses the same nature and properties, and to the same extent. If we may use the expression, they are constituent of one God, and no one of them is subordinate, no one supreme. They are severally denominated the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; and the only way, by which we can discriminate them, is by their various relations, properties and offices. Thus the Father is said eternally to beget the Son, the Son to be eternally begotten of the Father, and the Holy Ghost eternally to proceed from both. The mode of union existing between these Three Persons is to us unknown and incomprehensible, because God has not unfolded it to man; but we acknowledge the Trinity of persons, and the union between them, because these are revealed to us in the Scriptures.

The other leading doctrines of the New Testament, relate to the corruption of human nature; to the remedy for this corruption, or to the nature and offices of Jesus Christ; to the application of the remedy, or to the nature and offices of the Holy Ghost; and to the resurrection, and the future judgment.

1. Besides the other evils and misfortunes, which our first parents brought upon themselves, by, listening to the suggestions of Satan, and breaking that single commandment, the observance of which God had enjoined as the test of their obedience, they lost their original holiness and righteousness, the image and likeness of Jehovah in which they were created, and became depraved and corrupted. Ever since that time, mankind have been naturally inclined to evil, and averse to that which is good. The influence of this original depravation of nature affects every individual, and at every period of life. To this corruption of our nature, the Christian Scriptures refer, directly, or indirectly, on many occasions, and in the clearest manner; and, indeed, on that corruption the whole plan of Christianity is established. But we do not believe it merely as a truth clearly revealed in Scripture; the universal corruption of our nature is also a fact demonstrated by experience.

2. Man having sinned, death, the penalty of sin, must be suffered in the same nature in which it was incurred; but man could not undergo this penalty, and suffer all the consequences of sin, without being excluded for ever from happiness and from heaven. In compassion, therefore, to our ruined and hopeless state, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, left the bosom of his Father in heaven, took upon him our nature, and by his meritorious death and passion, and by what he performed and suffered in our stead, redeemed us from the fatal consequences of the fall, restored us to the favour of God, and 'opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers.' This doctrine of the atonement for sin, made by Jesus Christ, the Son of God himself, and both God and man in one person, together with the principles, on which it is founded, and the consequences, which flow from it, distinguishes Christianity from all other religions.

3. To secure to mankind the benefits of the redemption purchased by Jesus Christ with his blood, it was necessary to enable them to become the sons of God, and to walk worthy of the high and holy vocation, to which they were called. This also the Saviour of the world performed, by the powerful aids and assistance of the Holy Spirit. He promised his disciples, that after his own departure he would send to them from the Father the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, who should teach them all things, show them things to come, bring to their remembrance whatsoever he himself had said to them, guide them into all truth, endue them with power from on high, and enable them to overcome all worldly opposition. These promises, made partly before, and partly after, his resurrection from the dead, were faithfully accomplished. Many are the proofs, which the Scriptures afford, respecting the divinity and distinct personality both of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, whose benign influences are thus necessary to qualify us for the enjoyment of the blessings purchased by Christ.

4. Christianity has revealed to man, that in the unknown and unbounded realms of Omnipotence, an habitation is reserved for him; an habitation of bliss or of misery, according to his conduct on earth. It has revealed to him, that all his thoughts, words, and actions, shall be examined in the presence of assembled men and angels, on the great day appointed for judgment, before the throne of Jesus Christ, who is ordained by the Father to be judge both of the quick and the dead. It has revealed to him that his mortal body shall be raised from the grave, be re-united to his soul, rendered like his soul immortal, and be partaker with it of reward or of punishment. Without doubt for wise and good reasons, the state of happiness, and the state of misery, severally prepared for the righteous, and for the wicked and ungodly, are not described to us in detail. In the opinion of most Christians, each is great in the extreme, and each is unchangeable and eternal.

However, Christianity is not a rule merely of faith, but of life and manners. In vain it is heard, believed, professed, and even defended, if it be not obeyed. Its precepts are unquestionably holy and excellent; and it teaches the purest morality in all its just and noble extent, as comprehending the whole of our duty towards God, our neighbour, and ourselves. The idea, which it gives of piety towards God, is venerable, amiable, and engaging; the external worship of God, which it prescribes, is pure and spiritual, and possesses a noble simplicity; and its public ordinances, as instituted in the Gospel, are few in number, easy of observance, and excellent in their use and signification. According to this religion, the two grand principles of action are love to God, which is the sovereign passion in every pious mind; and love to man, which regulates our actions in our various relations. The love of man, which Christianity inspires and inculcates, can never be wholly extinguished by any temporary injuries, but is extended in some degree even to enemies. It requires, that we should pardon the offences of others against us, as we expect pardon for our own more heinous offences against God; and that we should no farther resist evil than is necessary for the preservation of personal rights and social happiness. It dictates every relative and reciprocal duty between parents and children, masters, and servants, governors and subjects, husbands and wives, friends and friends, men and men. It does not merely enjoin the observance of equity, but also inspires the most sublime and extensive charity; a boundless and disinterested effusion of tenderness for the whole human race. It teaches us to regulate not only the outward actions, but the inward affections and dispositions of the soul; to labour after real purity of heart, simplicity, and godly sincerity, without which no outward appearances can be pleasing in the sight of God, whom it describes as of purer eyes than to behold iniquity. It strikes at the root of all our corruptions and disorders, by correcting in our breasts that inordinate self-love, which causes us to centre all our views in our own pleasure, or glory, or interest, and by instructing and enabling us to mortify and subdue our sensual appetites and passions. It is designed to assert the dominion of the rational and moral powers over the inferior part of our nature, or of the spirit over the flesh, which alone can lay a just foundation for that moral liberty, and that tranquillity of mind, which it is the endeavour of all true philosophy and true religion to procure and establish. In short, it inculcates a morality not only superior to the deductions of human reason, but enforced on new principles and motives, and strengthened by additional considerations, derived from the highest source, and directed to the noblest end. It is pregnant with genuine comfort and real consolation to the sincere Christian, and teaches him that all the trials, and losses, and misfortunes, and difficulties, to which he is exposed, are nothing in comparison with the hopes and prospects of futurity.

Though, says the late Dr. Porteus, Christianity has not always been so well understood, nor so honestly practised, as it ought to have been; though its spirit has been frequently mistaken, and its precepts have been misapplied; yet it has produced a gradual and visible change in those points, which most materially concern the peace and tranquillity of the world. 'Its beneficent spirit has spread itself through all the different relations and modifications of life, and communicated its kindly influence to almost every public and private concern of mankind. It has insensibly worked itself into the inmost frame and constitution of civil states. It has given a tinge to the complexion of their governments, to the temper and administration of their laws. It has restrained the spirit of the prince, and the madness of the people. It has softened the rigour of despotism, and tamed the insolence of conquest. It has in some degree taken away the edge of the sword, and thrown even over the horrors of war a veil of mercy. It has descended into families, has diminished the pressure of private tyranny; improved every domestic endearment; given tenderness to the parent, humanity to the master, respect to superiors, to inferiors ease; so that mankind are upon the whole, even in a temporal view, under infinite obligations to the mild and pacific temper of the Gospel, and have reaped from it more substantial worldly benefits than from any other institution upon earth. As one proof of this (among many others), consider only the shocking carnage made in the human species by the exposure of infants, and the gladiatorial shows, which sometimes cost Europe twenty or thirty thousand lives in a month; and the exceedingly cruel usage of slaves, allowed and practised by the ancient Pagans. These were not the accidental and temporary excesses of a sudden fury, but were legal and established, and constant methods of murdering and tormenting mankind. Had Christianity done nothing more than brought into disuse (as it confessedly has done) the two former of these inhuman customs entirely, and the latter to a very great degree, it had justly merited the title of the benevolent religion: but this is far from being all. Throughout the more enlightened parts of Christendom there prevails a gentleness of manners widely different from the ferocity of the most civilized nations of antiquity; and that liberality, with which every species of distress is relieved, is a virtue peculiar to the Christian name.' The late Dr. Paley observes, that 'the benefit of religion, being felt chiefly in the obscurity of private stations, necessarily escapes the observation of history. From the first general notification of Christianity to the present day, there have been, in every age, many millions, whose names were never heard of, made better by it, not only in their conduct, but in their disposition; and happier, not so much in their external circumstances, as in that which is inter præcordia, in that which alone deserves the name of happiness, the tranquillity and consolation of their thoughts. It has been, since its commencement, the author of happiness and virtue to millions and millions of the human race' Dr. Knox says, 'I should love the religion of Christ, even as a heathen philosopher and philanthropist, for its beneficent effects on the human race. It is the guide of youth, the support of age, the repose of the weary, and the refuge of the miserable. It arrests the hand of the oppressor, by appalling his conscience; or, if haply the oppressor should prevail, it teaches the oppressed to look with confidence to a Deliverer, mighty to save.'

For a more detailed account of the doctrines and duties of Christianity, see Dr. Hammond on The Fundamentals, in the first volume of his works; Bishop Pearson On the Creed; Bishop Bull's works; Bishop Gastrell's Christian Institutes; and Mr. Gisborne's Survey of the Christian Religion.

Authors, who have written in defence of, and against Christianity.—In addition to those, to whom we have already referred, we shall mention only a few others. The apologies of Justin Martyr, Minucius Felix, and Tertullian among the ancients; together with Jenkin's Reasonableness and Certainty of the Christian Religion, Bishop Stillingfleet's Origines Sacrae, and Sermons preached at Boyle's Lectures, and collected in three volumes, folio, 1739, will be found highly useful. Bishop Newton on The Prophecies, may be also consulted with advantage, and Mr. Kett's valuable work, History the Interpreter of Prophecy; and Mr. Hume's abstruse and sophistical Argument against Miracles, will be found completely refuted by Drs. Adams, Campbell, and Paley.

Celsus, Porphyry, and Julian the Apostate, are perhaps the most distinguished opposers of Christianity among the ancients; and in later times, Lords Herbert and Bolingbroke, Hobbes, Hume, Gibbon, Voltaire, and Thomas Paine, have stood foremost in the ranks of infidelity. In our days, schemes have been formed, and plans artfully and deeply laid, for the extirpation of Christianity. Many of the most distinguished literati and others on the continent of Europe, entered into a conspiracy for the express purpose of banishing the very name of Christianity from the world; but, notwithstanding all the art, zeal, and exertions employed for effecting it, their design has hitherto in a great measure failed, and will doubtless finally prove abortive. Christians know who has said, that 'the gates of hell shall not prevail' against their religion.

Countries where found, number of Christians, &c.—The grand sub-divisions of the Christian religion are the Greek and Eastern churches, the former of which is subject to the patriarch of Constantinople; the Church of Rome, or the Roman Catholics, who acknowledge the authority of the pope; and the Protestant or Reformed Churches, by whose members that authority is rejected. The Greek and Eastern Churches, including the Armenians, Nestorians, Coptes or Cophts, &c. comprehend all Christians in European and Asiatic Turkey, viz. in Greece, the Grecian Islands, Syria, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Palestine, and Arabia; in Astracan, Casan, Georgia, and Mingrelia; in Egypt, Nubia and Abyssinia; and almost all those in the Russian empire, both in Europe and Asia. The church of Rome is established in Italy, Sardinia, Portugal, France, Spain, and their dependencies; in many of the states of Germany, and in seven of the Swiss cantons. It also comprehends many Christians in Great Britain, Ireland, and other Protestant countries in Europe, as well as in Asia, America, the West Indies, &c. The Protestant, or Reformed Churches, including the Lutherans, Calvinists, the united church of England and Ireland, &c. are established in Great Britain and Ireland, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, many states of Germany, part of Switzerland, &c. Many Christians also in Asia, and most of those in North America, the West Indies, &c. are Protestants.

All the inhabitants of Europe profess the Christian religion, except those who are Jews; about two-thirds of the inhabitants of Turkey, who are Mahometans; and some of the Laplanders, and others inhabiting the extreme northern parts, who are Pagans. In Asia, the greatest part of the empire of Russia, the countries of Circassia and Mingrelia, Georgia, and mount Libanus, are inhabited only by Christians; in every other part of Asiatic Turkey, and in all the eastern dominions of Great Britain, France, Spain, Portugal, and Holland, great numbers of Christians are to be found. Roman Catholic missionaries have long been employed in propagating their doctrines in the most distant regions of Asia; and Protestant missionaries of various denominations of Christians, besides those sent out and supported by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, are now engaged in publishing the important truths of Christianity, in the different countries of the East. In Africa, besides the Christians in Egypt, called Coptes or Cophts, and in the kingdoms of Congo and Angola, the islands on the western coasts, and also the large kingdom of Abyssinia, are inhabited by Christians. They are likewise numerous in all the dependencies of European powers in Africa; as at Melinda, &c. in Zanzibar, at the Cape of Good Hope, Sierra Leone, &c. &c. Christianity also prevails in all the dominions of Europeans on the large continent of America, as well as in the West Indies and other American islands. The Christians that extend farthest north and south, as in Canada and the Portuguese settlements, are Roman Catholics, whose religion is also established in all the American dominions belonging to Spain.

It is, however, a painful truth, that the spread of Christianity is of small extent, if compared with Paganism or Mahometanism. By an ingenious calculation, it has been found, that, were the known inhabited world divided into thirty parts, nineteen of them are still possessed by Pagans, six by Jews and Mahometans, two by Christians of the Greek and Eastern Churches, and three by those of the Church of Rome and the Protestant communion. If we consider the number of inhabitants on the surface of the globe, the proportion of Christians to other religionists is not much greater. According to a calculation published in a pamphlet in 1792, the inhabitants of the world amount to about 732,000,000; of whom only about 174,000,000, are Christians, viz. 100,000,000 of Roman Catholics, 44,000,000 of Protestants, and 30,000,000 in the Greek and Eastern Churches. All these united do not form a fourth part of the population of the world. Adam's Religious World, vol. i. p. 159, &c.

CHRISTIANS of St. JOHN, a sect of Christians, who derive their name from their baptism, and from their peculiar veneration for St. John the Baptist. They formerly inhabited the country near Jordan, but were afterwards obliged to flee for refuge from the persecutions of the successors of Mahomet into Mesopotamia and Chaldæa. De la Valle is of opinion, that these Christians might be the offspring of those Jews, who received the baptism of St. John. Their religion is a compound of Judaism, Christianity, and Mahometanism. Tavernier says, that these Christians are in great numbers at Balsara, or Bassora. They distinguish themselves by the name of the disciples of St. John, from whom they say that they received their faith, their religious treatises, and their customs. They celebrate a solemn annual festival, which is continued for five days; and, at this time they present themselves in a numerous body before their bishops to receive, or, more properly speaking, to repeat, the baptism of John. They baptize only in rivers, and at no other time than on a Sunday. The ceremony of baptism is performed in the name of God only. They do not acknowledge Jesus Christ to be God, nor the Son of God; but they consider him as a person greatly inferior to John the Baptist. Yet, they call him, as the Mahometans do, the Spirit of God. Every thing they say respecting Jesus Christ and his mission is replete with fiction and absurdity. Their ideas concerning the third person in the Trinity are equally ridiculous. In their sacred book called the Divan, are comprised the doctrines and mysteries of their religion. This book is extremely fabulous, and full of the grossest errors. Hurd on Religions, p. 373, &c.

CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS, Christians who inhabit the coasts of Malabar and Travancore in India, and on whom the Portuguese bestowed the name of St. Thomé Christians, probably from their first bishop and founder Mar Thomé, in the fifth or sixth century. Hence the Portuguese missionaries maintain, that St. Thomas the Apostle preached the Gospel in India, and suffered martyrdom at Malliapoor, now St. Thomé. Some say, that they were originally a colony of Nestorians, who fled from the dominions of the Greek emperors, after Theodosius II. had begun to persecute that sect. Certain it is, that they must have arrived in this part at an early period of Christianity, and that they were originally a colony from Syria. The name of Syrians retained by them, their distinct features, and complexion rather fairer than the rest of the Malabars, the style of their buildings, especially of their churches, and, above all, the general use of the Syrian, or rather Chaldean language, which is still preserved in all their religious functions, show that they are of Syrian extraction.

When the first Portuguese adventurers landed on the coast of Malabar, they found that these Christians followed the doctrines of Nestorius, and acknowledged as their ecclesiastical chief the patriarch of that sect, who resided in Syria. They rejected the divine nature of Christ, and called the Virgin Mary the mother of Christ only, and not of God. They maintained that the Holy Ghost proceeded only from God. They admitted no images of saints into their churches, where the cross alone was to be seen. They had only three sacraments; baptism, the eucharist, and orders. They did not believe in transubstantiation, nor in purgatory. They said that the saints are not admitted to the presence of God, but are kept in a third place till the day of judgment.

While the Portuguese possessed the chief settlements on the coast of Malabar, these Christians suffered innumerable vexations and the most grievous persecutions from the Romish priests. However, neither artifice nor violence could induce them to embrace the communion of Rome, till about the end of the sixteenth century, when Don Alexis de Menezes, archbishop of Goa, by employing the most violent and unwarrantable means, obliged the greater part of this unhappy and reluctant people to adopt the religion of Rome, and to acknowledge the supremacy of the pope. When the Portuguese were driven from these parts by the Dutch in 1663, the persecuted Nestorians resumed their primitive liberty, and were reinstated in the privilege of serving God according to their consciences. These blessings they continue to enjoy, and Mr. Wrede reckoned thirty-two churches, that still adhered to the doctrines of Nestorius; but he contrasted the misery of the present race with the opulence of their ancestors.

On the contrary, Dr. Buchanan, late vice-provost of the college of Fort-William, visited these Christians in 1806, and reckoned fifty-five churches in Malayala, which comprehends the whole region from Cape Comorin to Cape Illi. He denies that they are Nestorians, and says that their doctrines 'are contained in a very few articles, and are not at variance in essentials with the doctrines of the Church of England. They are usually denominated Jacobite, but they differ in ceremonial from the church of that name in Syria, and indeed from any existing church in the world. Their proper designation, and that which is sanctioned by their own use, is Syrian Christians, or The Syrian Church of Malayala.' The doctor, however, remarks, that they acknowledge the patriarch of Antioch, and that they are connected with certain churches in Mesopotamia and Syria, which amount to 215 in number, and labour under circumstances of discouragement and distress; but he does not say whether they are subject to the Greek or Jacobite patriarch of Antioch, though it would seem that they acknowledge the Nestorian patriarch. The Christians of St. Thomas are supposed to amount at present to 150,000. Asiatic Researches, vol. vii.; Monthly Magazine, vol. xvii. p. 60.; Adam's Religious World, vol. i. p. 438, &c.

CHRISTMAS, the feast of the nativity of Jesus Christ. It is not exactly known when this day was first observed. Some say that the observance of it began about

A.D. 68. It would appear, that Telesphorus, who lived in the reign of Antoninus Pius, ordered divine service to be celebrated, and an angelic hymn to be sung, the night before the nativity of our Saviour. Certain it is, that the nativity of Christ was observed before the time of Constantine. Dioclesian caused fire to be set to a church, in which a multitude of Christians had assembled to celebrate the nativity of Christ, and burnt them and the church to ashes.

The precise day, or even the month, in which our Saviour was born, is also very uncertain. Some, as Clemens Alexandrinus informs us, affixed it to the sixteenth of May. But as autumn was the most proper season of the year for a general assessment, which took place at the birth of Christ, and required personal attendance; and as shepherds were watching their flocks by night at the time of Christ's nativity, it is not improbable that our Saviour was born either in September or October. Chambers's Dict. by Rees; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. p. 196.

CHRONICLES, a name given to two historical books of Scripture, which the Hebrews called Dibre-jamim, Words of Days, Diaries, or Journals. They are denominated in Greek, Paralipomena, or things omitted; as if these books were a supplement of what had been omitted, or, too much abridged, in the Books of Kings and other historical parts of Scripture. Indeed, they contain many particulars, which are not elsewhere to be found; but it is not to be supposed, that these are the records, or books of the acts of the kings of Judah and Israel, which are so often referred to. Those ancient registers were much more extensive than the Books of Chronicles, which refer to those original memoirs, and from them make long extracts.

The author of these books is unknown. Some have thought that he was the same as the author of the Books of Kings. But the great difference in the dates, narratives, genealogies, and proper names; and also those repetitions of the same things, and often in the same words; strongly militate against this opinion. The Hebrews commonly ascribe the Chronicles to Ezra, who, they say, composed them after the return from the captivity, and was assisted in this work by Zechariah and Haggai, who were then alive. This opinion is proved, first, from the similitude of style, from the recapitulations and general reflections, which are sometimes made on a long series of events; secondly, the author lived after the captivity, since in the last chapter of the second book, he recites the decree of Cyrus, which granted liberty to the Jews, and he also continues the genealogy of David to Zerubbabel, the chief of those, who returned from the captivity; thirdly, these books contain certain terms and expressions, which, they think, are peculiar to the person and times of Ezra. Other marks, however, would seem to prove that Ezra was not the author of these books. First, the author continues the genealogy of Zerubbabel, to the twelfth generation; but Ezra did not live till that time. Secondly, in several places he supposes that the things, which he mentions, were then in the same situation as formerly; for example, before Solomon, and before the captivity, (2 Chron. v. 9. 1 Kings viii. 8. 1 Chron. iv. 41. 43.; v. 22. 26. 2 Chron. viii. 8.; xxi. 10.) Thirdly, the writer of these books was neither a contemporary nor an original, but a compiler and abridger. He compiled them from ancient memoirs, genealogies, annals, registers, and other works, which he often quotes, and from which he sometimes gives large extracts, without changing the words, or attempting to reconcile inconsistencies. Hence we sometimes find the genealogy of the same person more than once.

His principal design seems to have been accurately to exhibit the genealogies, rank, functions, and order, of the priests and Levites; that after the captivity, they might more easily assume their proper situations, and re-enter on their ministries. He also wished to show in what manner the lands had been distributed among the families before the captivity, that each tribe, as far as was possible, might obtain the ancient inheritance of their fathers. The author quotes old records by the name of ancient things. (1 Chron. iv. 22.) He recites four several rolls, or numberings of the people; one taken in the time of David, a second in that of Jeroboam, a third in that of Jotham, and a fourth in that of the captivity of the ten tribes. In other places he speaks of the numbers, which had been taken by order of king David, and which Joab did not finish. Hence we may perceive the extreme accuracy affected by the Jews in their genealogies and historical documents.

Commentators, induced by a false persuasion, that the Books of Chronicles contain few other matters than those illustrated in the Books of Samuel and the Kings, have too much neglected them. Jerom, however, truly observes, that these books contain a very great number of important things for the explication of Scripture; that in them are contained all the Scriptural traditions; that it is deceiving ourselves to imagine we have any knowledge of the holy books, if we are ignorant of these; and that in the Chronicles we may find the solution of an infinite number of questions, which concern the Gospel.

No one disputes the authority or canonicalness of the Chronicles. The ancient Hebrews formed them into one book; but in the modern Hebrew Bibles they consist of two.

Between the books of Kings and those of the Chronicles, many variations, as well in facts as in dates, are found. These, however, may be explained and reconciled, chiefly on the principle, that these books are supplementary to those of the kings. It must not be forgotten, that, after the captivity, the language was slightly changed from what it had been; that the various places had received new names, or undergone sundry vicissitudes; that certain things were now better known to the returned Jews, under other appellations than those, by which they were formerly distinguished; and that from the materials before him, which often were not the same as those used by the abridgers of the histories of the kings, the author takes those passages, that seemed to him best adapted to his purpose, and most suitable to the times in which he wrote. It must also be considered, that he often elucidates obsolete and ambiguous words, in former books, by a different mode of spelling them, or by a different order of the words employed even when he does not use a distinct phraseology of narration, which he sometimes adopts. The first book contains a recapitulation of sacred history, by genealogies, from the beginning of the world to the death of David, in the year of the world 2989, and before Jesus Christ 1015. The second book contains the history of the kings of Judah, and part of those of Israel, from the beginning of Solomon only, in the year of the world 2990, to the return from the captivity of Babylon, in the year of the world 3468, and before Jesus Christ 536.

The Jews have chronicles or histories in their language, but these are incorrect and modern.

The Samaritan Chronicle, which was published by M. Bernard, has been inserted by M. Basnage, with some remarks, in his history of the Jews. It begins at the creation, and continues to the taking of Samaria by Saladin, 1187. It is very short and inaccurate. See SAMARITAN.

CHURCH, a word which is found only in the writings of the New Testament, and is of different significations according to the different subjects, to which it is applied.

1. The Greek word ἐκκλησία, denotes an assembly, whether common or religious.
2. It is understood of the collective body of Christians, or of all those, who profess to believe in Christ, and acknowledge him as the Saviour of mankind. This is called by ancient writers the catholic or universal church, and agrees with the apostle Paul's account. (Col. i. 18.) 3. It is applied to any particular congregation of Christians, who are united together, and meet in one place for the solemn worship of God. 'The visible church of Christ,' says the nineteenth article of the church of England, 'is a congregation of faithful men, in the which the pure word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly administered according to Christ's ordinance, in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same.' An adherence to the fundamental principles of the Gospel is, therefore, sufficient to constitute a visible church, though every doctrine, which it maintains, may not be founded in truth, nor all the parts of its public worship be agreeable to Scripture. 4. It may denote all those persons, who have truly believed and obeyed the Gospel, and who, though they have lived at different periods, are supposed to be united into one body, which is called the mystical or invisible church. This appellation they receive not only because they are not now all upon earth, but because the qualities and properties, which gave them a claim to be members of this blessed society, were never the objects of sense, and could not be judged of by men from merely external circumstances. 5. It is now frequently used to denote any particular denomination of Christians distinguished by particular doctrines, ceremonies, &c.; as the Romish church, the Greek church, the English church, &c.

"We find," observes Bishop Tomline, "the word church used in the New Testament in a more or less extended sense; our Saviour said to Peter, 'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.' (Matt. xvi. 18.) Here the church means the whole body or society of faithful Christians throughout the world; and in this sense it is promised that the church of Christ shall be perpetual, that is, that there shall be always those, who will 'continue stedfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers.' (Acts ii. 42.) The word church was, from the first preaching of the apostles, used to signify believers in the Gospel generally; thus in the beginning of the Acts it is said, that 'the Lord added to the church daily.' (Ibid. 47.) And St. Paul, who, in the same chapter of his Epistle to the Ephesians, calls Christ 'the Head of the church,' says that 'the church is subject to Christ;' and that 'Christ loved the church,' (Ephes. v. 23, 24, 25.); in which passages the apostle means Christians in general, who however dispersed from one church, have 'one hope of their calling, one Lord, one faith, one baptism.' (Ephes. iv. 4, 5.) But in a more limited sense St. Paul, in addressing the Corinthian Christians, calls them 'the church of God, which is at Corinth.' (1 Cor. i. 2.) St. John writes, 'To the seven churches, which are in Asia,' (Rev. i. 4.); and St. Luke says, 'that St. Paul went through Syria and Cilicia confirming the churches.' (Acts xv. 41.) In these passages the word Church is applied to the Christians of particular cities. And even the believers of a single family are by St. Paul called the Church, in the cases of Priscilla and Aquila, Nymphas and Philemon: 'Greet Priscilla and Aquila; likewise greet the church that is in their house,' (Rom. xvi. 3, 5.); 'Salute Nymphas, and the church which is in his house.' (Col. iv. 15.) 'Paul unto Philemon, and to the church in thy house.' (Philem. 1, 2.) And thus Tertullian says 'Ubi tres, ecclesia est, licet laici;' and upon another occasion, 'In uno et altero est ecclesia.'" Bishop Tomline's Elements of Theology, vol. ii. p. 326, &c.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND AND IRELAND is that established by law in England and Ireland, where it forms a part of the common law of the land, or constitution of the country.

Rise, Progress, &c. When and by whom Christianity was first introduced into Britain, cannot at this distance of time be exactly ascertained. Eusebius, indeed, positively declares, that it was by the apostles and their disciples; Bishops Jewell and Stillingfleet, Dr. Cave, and others, insist that it was by St. Paul; and Baronius affirms, on the authority of an ancient MS. in the Vatican Library, that the Gospel was planted in Britain by Simon Zelotes the apostle, and Joseph of Arimathea, and that the latter came over A.D. 35, or about the twenty-first year of Tiberius, and died in this country. According to Archbishop Usher, the British Churches had a school of learning in the year 182, to provide them with proper teachers, and it would appear that they flourished, without dependence on any foreign church, till the arrival of St. Austin in the latter part of the sixth century.

Episcopacy was early established in this country; and it ought to be remembered, to the honour of the British bishops and clergy, that during several centuries they withstood the encroachments of the See of Rome. Popery, however, was at length introduced into England, and, as some say, by Austin the monk; and we find its errors every where prevalent during several ages preceding the reformation, till they were refuted by Wickliffe. The seed, which Wickliffe had sown, ripened after his death, and produced a glorious harvest. However, it was not till the reign of Henry VIII., that the reformation in England in reality commenced. When Luther declared war against the pope, Henry wrote his treatise on the Seven Sacraments against Luther's book Of the Captivity of Babylon, and was repaid by the pontiff with the title of Defender of the Faith. This title, in a sense diametrically opposite, and by a claim of higher desert, was transmitted by Henry with his crown, and now belongs to his successor. Henry's affections being estranged from his queen Catherine, and fixed on Anne Boleyn, he requested a divorce from his wife; but the pope hesitating, the Archbishop of Canterbury annulled his former marriage. The sentence of the archbishop was condemned by the pope, whose authority Henry, therefore, shook off, and was declared by parliament Supreme Head of the Church. In the year 1800, when the kingdoms of Britain and Ireland were united, the Churches of England and Ireland, which had always been the same in government, faith, and worship, became one United Church.

Tenets, &c. The acknowledged standards of the faith and doctrines of the United Church are, after the Scriptures, the Book of Homilies, and the Thirty-nine articles. Her liturgy is also doctrinal as well as devotional, and informs the judgment, while it kindles the affections.

The Homilies were composed by Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridley, men of unexceptionable learning and orthodoxy; or, according to others, the first book was written principally by Cranmer, and the second by Jewell. They were appointed to be read in churches at the beginning of the Reformation, when, by reason of the scarcity of learned divines, few ministers were found, who could safely be trusted to preach their own compositions.

The first draught of the Articles was composed by Archbishop Cranmer, assisted by Bishop Ridley, in the year 1551; and after being corrected by the other bishops, and approved by the convocation, they were published in Latin and English in 1553, and amounted to forty-two in number. In 1562, they were revised and corrected. Being then reduced to thirty-nine, they were drawn up in Latin only; but in 1571, they were subscribed by the members of the two houses of convocation both in Latin and English, and therefore the Latin and English copies are to be considered as equally authentic. The original manuscripts, subscribed by the houses of convocation, were burnt in the fire of London; but Dr. Bennet has collated the oldest copies now extant, in which it appears that there are no variations of any importance.

Though it is generally believed, that

Cranmer and Ridley were chiefly concerned in framing the forty-two articles, on which our thirty-nine are founded, yet Burnet says, that 'questions relating to them were given about to many bishops and divines, who gave in their several answers, that were collated and examined very maturely; all sides had a free and fair hearing before conclusions were made.' Indeed, caution and moderation are no less conspicuous in them, than a thorough knowledge of the Scriptures, and of the early opinions and practice of Christians.

The thirty-nine articles are arranged with great judgment and perspicuity, and may be considered under four general divisions: the first five contain the Christian doctrines concerning the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; in the sixth seventh, and eighth, the rule of Faith is established; the ten following relate to Christians as individuals; and the remaining twenty-one relate to them as members of a religious society. But as all confessions of faith have referred to existing heresies, we find in the articles not only the positive doctrines of the Gospel asserted, but also the principal errors and corruptions of the Church of Rome, and most of the extravagancies adopted by certain Protestant sects at the time of the Reformation, rejected and condemned.

During the last century, disputes arose among the clergy respecting the propriety of subscribing to any human formulary of religious sentiments. Parliament was applied to for its removal, in 1772, by certain clergymen and others, whose petition received the most public discussion, but was rejected by a large majority.

It has been generally held by most, if not all, Calvinists, both in and out of the Church, that the doctrinal parts of our articles are Calvinistic. This opinion, however, has been of late warmly controverted. The dispute was carried on principally by Mr. Overton of York, on the one side, and by Dr. Kipling, dean of Peterborough, and Mr. Daubeney, archdeacon of Sarum, on the other. It is, however, perhaps, more natural to believe, with some of our ablest divines, that the articles are framed with comprehensive latitude, and that neither Calvinism nor Arminianism was intended to be exclusively established. The Church of England, properly speaking is not in her doctrines, any more than in her discipline, Calvinistic, Arminian, Lutheran, or Romish. Combining the perfections of all those persuasions, and avoiding their faults and defects, she stands as distinguished in a religious, as the State to which she is allied, appears in a political view.

Worship, Rites, and Ceremonies. In this Church, divine service is conducted by a Liturgy, which was composed in 1547, and has undergone several alterations, the last of which took place in 1661, in the reign of Charles II. Many applications have been since made for a review; and particular alterations were proposed in 1689, by several learned and excellent divines, in the number of whom were Archbishops Tillotson and Tension, and Bishops Patrick, Burnet, Stillingfleet, Kidder, &c. To this Liturgy every clergyman promises at his ordination to conform in his public ministrations. Our enemies themselves being judges, it must be acknowledged, that the Liturgy of the Church of England abounds so much with the soundest doctrines of the Gospel, that every devout supplicant, participating in her solemn services, may read his duty, and the motives of his duty, in its truly evangelical petitions. See LITURGY.

The ceremonies of this Church are so innocent that most of the Christian world agree, or would agree, in them. They 'are few and easy, ancient and significant, and though we do not place so much religion in externals as the Church of Rome doth, yet here is prescribed all that is needful for decency and order; viz. that the clergy always wear grave and distinct habits, and have peculiar garments in divine ministrations,—that churches be adorned and neat,—that the people be reverent in God's house,—that the memory of our Saviour's chief acts, and the festivals of the Holy Apostles, be religiously observed,—that Lent, with the vigils of great feasts, the Ember weeks, and all the Fridays in the year, be kept as days of fasting or abstinence; and if some Protestants do not observe them, yet others do, and are commended for it.'

Government and Discipline. Ever since the reign of Henry VIII., the sovereigns of England have been styled 'Supreme Heads of the Church,' as well as 'Defenders of the Faith;' but this title conveys no spiritual meaning, and denotes only the regal power to prevent any ecclesiastical differences; or, in other words, it only substitutes the king in place of the pope, with respect to temporalities, and the external economy of the Church. The Church of England is governed by two archbishops, and twenty-four bishops, besides the Bishop of Sodor and Man. The benefices of the bishops were converted by William the Conqueror into temporal baronies; and, therefore, all of them, except the Bishop of Man, are barons or lords of parliament, and sit and vote in the house of lords, where they represent the clergy. It would seem, however, that as the See of Sodor and Man is now in the disposal of the Crown, the Bishop of Man will have a vote in parliament. The bishops' representatives and assistants are the archdeacons, of whom there are sixty in England. The other dignitaries of the church are the deans, canons, prebendaries, &c.; and the inferior clergy are the rectors, vicars, and curates. The United Church knows only three orders of ministers; bishops, priests, and deacons: but in these orders are comprehended archbishops, bishops, deans, archdeacons, rectors, vicars, and curates.

The Church of Ireland is also episcopal, and is governed by four archbishops, and eighteen bishops. Since the union of Britain and Ireland, one archbishop and three bishops sit alternately in the house of peers, by rotation of sessions. By a recent act of Parliament, the archbishoprics on avoidance, to be reduced to two; and the bishoprics to ten.

Eminent Men, &c. The Church of England has been justly styled the Bulwark of the Reformation. She has produced a succession of divines, more in number, and greater in point of natural abilities, and professional acquirements, than any other church whatever. The sermons of her bishops and clergy will be read and esteemed so long as sound judgment, solid reasoning, and orthodox divinity, shall be held in repute. While some of her sons have ably answered every objection that has been brought against Christianity, others of them have fully elucidated its evidences. There is, perhaps, no department in theology, in which her servants have not distinguished themselves; and there are few branches of study connected with it, to which some even of her laity have not applied, and in which they have not excelled.

Among the men, who have been eminent in their day and generation, who have adorned their respective situations in the now United Church, and many of whom were not less distinguished for piety than for learning, the following may be ranked:—Archbishops Cranmer, Usher, Laud, Wake, Tillotson, Secker, &c.; Bishops Ridley, Latimer, Jewell, Andrews, Taylor, Hall, Beveridge, Bedell, Patrick, Burnet, Bull, Pearson, Stillingfleet, Gastrell, Kenn, Kidder, Walton, Gibson, Wilson, Sherlock, Warburton, Newton, Lowth, Horne, Hurd, Horsley, Watson, &c.; Deans Prideaux, Stanhope, Sherlock, Tucker, Milner, &c.; Doctors Bentley, Barrow, Berriman, Bennet, Cave, Cudworth, Ellis, Hammond, Heylin, Jackson, Jenkin, Jortin, Kennicott, Lightfoot, Mills, Brett, Pococke, South, Stebbing, Trapp, Waterland, Whitby, Paley, &c.; Messrs. Nowel, Hooker, Leslie, Wheatley, Jones, Carlyle, &c. Adam's Religious World, vol. ii. p. 357, &c.

CINNAMON. The cinnamon-tree, in the Linnæan system of botany, is a species of the laurel or bay-tree. Ray seems to think that the cassia cinnamomea of Hermann, the cassia lignea, and the cassia fistula of the ancient Greek writers, were the same, or varieties of the same species of plant. It is observable, that the ancient signification of these names is very different from the modern. The younger branches of the tree, covered with their bark, were called by the Greek writers κιννάμωμον, cinnamon, and sometimes Ξυλοκασσία, or cassia lignea; but when they were divested of their bark, which being dried became tubular, this bark was denominated κασία σόριγξ, or cassia fistula. As in process of time the wood of this tree was found useless, they stripped the bark from it, and brought that only; and the same custom prevails at this day.

At present, no one doubts that the cinnamomum of the ancients is our cinnamon. It is a long thin bark of a tree, rolled up, of a dark red colour, of a poignant taste, aromatic, and very agreeable. The finest cinnamon comes from the isle of Ceylon. It has formed the subject of an inquiry, whether the cinnamon of Ceylon is of the same species as that growing in Malabar, Sumatra, &c.; differing only through the influence of the soil and climate, in which it grows, or from the culture and manner of curing the cinnamon. Mr. White and Mr. Combes determine this question in the affirmative. Mr. White conjectures, 'that the cinnamon of Ceylon was formerly, as well as that of Sumatra and Malabar, called cassia; but that the Dutch writers being acquainted with the excellent qualities, which the ancients ascribed to their cinnamon, chose to add the name of cinnamon to that of cassia; and in process of time they have found the name of cinnamon more profitable than that of cassia, by which we chose to call our canella, to our national loss of many thousands a year.'

God commands Moses to take cinnamon, and other sweet spices, and make a perfumed oil with them, to anoint the tabernacle and its vessels. (Exod. xxx. 23.) It is not improbable, that cinnamon might at that time be imported into Egypt, Arabia, &c. as it is now into Europe; and, therefore, it might originally come from the island of Ceylon. Some, however, have thought that Moses could not mean the cinnamon of Ceylon; but there might be cinnamon in Arabia or Ethiopia. Philosoph. Transac. vol. i. p. 887; *Scripture Illustrated. Expos. CIN'NERETH, or CIN'NEROTH, כנרת, כנרת, signifies harp, or guitar; otherwise, as a light. It was a city of Naphtali, south of which was situated a great plain, that reached to the Dead Sea, along the river Jordan. (Josh. xix. 35.) Many believe, and with probability, that Cinnereth was the same as Tiberias; for as the lake of Gennesareth (in Hebrew, the lake of Cinnereth) is without doubt that of Tiberias, it is reasonable to think that Cinnereth and Tiberias were the same city. See TIBERIAS.

The LAKE of CINNERETH, the Sea of Cinnereth, or Tiberias, or the Lake of Gennesareth, are names given to the lake from the city Cinnereth, or Tiberias, being situated on the western shore, toward the southern extremity; or from the district of Gennesareth on the eastern coast. It is also called the sea of Galilee, because on the north and east it is enclosed by Galilee. Josephus says, that it is one hundred furlongs in length, and forty in width. The water is good to drink, and breeds abundance of fish. Here, the apostles Peter, Andrew, John, and James, who were fishermen, carried on their trade. The river Jordan passes through this lake, into which it brings a supply of water. The country, which borders on the Sea of Galilee, is very beautiful and fruitful.

Josephus says, that 'the waters of this lake are sweet and very agreeable for drinking, for they are finer than the thick waters of other fens. The lake is also pure, and on every side ends directly at the shores, and at the sand: it is also of a temperate nature, when drawn up, and softer than river or fountain water: and it is so cold, that the people of the place cannot warm it in the sun, in the hottest season of the year. There are several kinds of fish in it, different both to the taste and sight from those elsewhere. It is divided into two parts by the river Jordan.' Mr. Buckingham visited this lake in 1816, and bears testimony to the truth of this description. He observes, that 'all these features are drawn with an accuracy, that could only have been attained by one resident in the country. The size is still nearly the same, the borders of the lake still end at the beach or the sands, at the feet of the mountains, which environ it. Its waters are still as sweet and temperate as ever, and the lake abounds with great numbers of fish of various sizes and kinds. The appearance of the lake, as seen from Capernaum, is still grand; its greatest length runs nearly north and south from twelve to fifteen miles; and its breadth seems to be, in general, from six to nine miles. The barren aspect of the mountains on each side, and the total absence of wood, give, however, a cast of dulness to the picture; and this is increased to melancholy by the dead calm of the waters, and the silence, which reigns throughout its whole extent, where not a boat or vessel of any kind is to be found.'

Dr. Clarke describes this lake as longer and finer than our Cumberland and Westmoreland lakes. Like that of Windermere, the lake of Gennesareth is often greatly agitated by winds. (Matt. viii. 23—27.) A strong current marks the passage of the Jordan through the middle of this lake; and when this is opposed by contrary winds, which blow here with the force of a hurricane from the south-east, sweeping into the lake from the mountains, a boisterous sea is instantly raised: this the small vessels, of the country are ill qualified to resist. 'The wind,' says he, 'rendered the surface rough, and called to mind the situation of our Saviour's disciples; when, in one of the small vessels, which traverse these waters, they were tossed in a storm, and saw Jesus in the fourth watch of the night walking to them upon the waves.' (Matt. xiv. 24—26.) These agitations, however, do not last for any length of time. When not agitated by tempests, the water is stated to be as clear as the purest crystal, sweet, cool, and most refreshing to the taste.

The fish in this lake are said by other travellers to be most delicious. 'There is not much variety, but the best sort is the most common; it is a species of bream, equal to the finest perch. It is remarkable, that there is not a single boat of any description on the lake at present; and the fish are caught by casting nets from the beach; a method, which must yield a very small quantity, compared to what they would get with boats.' Irby and Mangles's Travels in Egypt, &c. p. 295; Dr. Clarke's Travels, vol. iv. pp. 209, 210. 225; Buckingham's Travels in Palestine, pp. 470, 471; *Josephus de Bell. CIRCUMCELLIONES, a species of fanatics, who derived their name from their wandering course of life. They espoused the party of the Donatists, and first appeared in the reign of the emperor Constantine. This furious and bloody set of men, composed of the rough and savage populace, maintained their cause by the force of arms, and over-running Africa, filled that province with slaughter and rapine. This outrageous multitude, whom no prospect of sufferings could terrify, and who, on urgent occasions, faced death itself with the most audacious temerity, contributed to render the sect of the Donatists an object of the utmost abhorrence.

The Donatists unable to convince these madmen of their errors, applied to Taurinus, general of the forces in Africa, who sent against them some soldiers. Great numbers of the Circumcelliones were killed; but they were not entirely suppressed till the latter part of the fifth century. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. pp. 330, 331; Hurd on Religious Rites, Ceremonies, &c. p. 166.

CIRCUMCISION. This term is derived from the Latin circumcidere, to cut all round, because the Jews, in circumcising their children, cut off after this manner the little skin which covers the prepuce. God enjoined Abraham to use circumcision, as a sign of his covenant. In pursuance of this order, Abraham, at ninety-nine years of age, was circumcised; and also his son Ishmael, and all his family. (Gen. xvii. 10.) God repeated the precept of circumcision to Moses, and ordered that all, who intended to partake of the paschal sacrifice, should receive circumcision, and that this rite should be performed on children, on the eighth day after their birth, including the day when the child was born, and that on which it was performed.

The Jews have been always very exact in observing this ceremony; and it appears that they did not neglect it when in Egypt. But Moses, while in Midian, with Jethro, his father-in-law, did not circumcise his two sons born in that country. During the journey of the Israelites in the wilderness, their children were not circumcised, probably on account of the danger, to which they might have been exposed in sudden removals, &c. by reason of their unsettled state and manner of life.

The law mentions nothing respecting the minister, or the instrument of circumcision. The father, a relation, or any other person, might perform this ceremony. A knife or razor was generally used; but Zipporah, the wife of Moses, and also Joshua, employed a sharp stone. (Exod. iv. 25. Josh. v. 3.)

Circumcision was that rite of the law, by which the Israelites were taken into God's covenant; and (in the spirit of it) was the same as baptism among Christians. For, as the form of baptism expresses the putting away of sin, circumcision was another form to the same effect. The Scripture speaks of a 'circumcision made without hands,' of which that made with hands was only an outward sign, of the internal cleansing of the heart, by the effusion of the Spirit of God, and denoted 'the putting off the body of the sins of the flesh.' (Coloss. ii. 11.) This is also the meaning of the Christian baptism. Of this inward and spiritual grace of circumcision, the Apostle speaks expressly in another place: 'he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly, neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Jew, which is one inwardly, and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter.' (Rom. ii. 28.) Some, perhaps, may be ready to suppose, that this spiritual application of circumcision, as a sacrament, was invented after the preaching of the Gospel, when the veil was taken from the law; but this doctrine was enforced only on those, who had it before, and who had departed from the sense of their own law; for Moses instructed the Jews, that the 'foreskin of the heart' was to be 'circumcised' in a figurative or moral way, before they could be accepted as the servants of God; and again, that the Lord would 'circumcise their heart, to love him with all their heart, and with all their soul.' (Deut. x. 16. xxx. 6.) This was the same as to say, that he would give them what circumcision signified, making them Jews inwardly, and giving them the inward grace with the outward sign; without which the letter of baptism avails no more now than the letter of circumcision did then. Hence we may say of the one as is said of the other, 'he is not a Christian, which is one outwardly, and baptism is not the putting away the filth of the flesh, by washing with water, but the answer of a good conscience towards God.' (1 Peter iii. 21.)

Some authors of reputation assert, that the Jews as well as all other nations that practised circumcision, received this rite from the Egyptians. Celsus and Julian the Apostate affirmed that Abraham learned this ceremony in Egypt. Marsham and Le Clerc adopted the same opinion. It appears, however, that Herodotus, whose authority these writers have followed, did not intend to assert, that circumcision was first practised by the Egyptians. He says, that circumcision was a very ancient rite among the Egyptians, by whom it was instituted from the beginning. By the expression, from the beginning, is not meant from the origin of the Egyptians, but that it was so early among them, the heathen writers were at a loss to know when it was first practised. That Herodotus intended no more by this expression is evident from his own words. He afterwards doubts whether the Egyptians learnt circumcision from the Ethiopians, or the Ethiopians from the Egyptians; and unable to solve this matter, he concludes, that it was a very ancient rite. If he had before meant, that this was an original rite of the Egyptians, no reason could have existed for this doubt. It is to be observed, that among the heathen writers, to say any thing was ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, from the beginning, was the same as to say, that it was very anciently practised. It is true that Herodotus, in another place, tells us, that the Jews learned circumcision from the Egyptians; and Diodorus Siculus was of opinion, that the Colchians and the Jews, because they used circumcision, derived their origin from the Egyptians. To this it is answered, that the heathen writers had little knowledge of the Jewish history, and that they seldom mention the Jews without making some palpable mistakes. Origen, therefore, might justly blame Celsus for adhering to the heathen relation respecting circumcision, rather than to that of Moses. The latter has given a full and clear account of the origin of this rite; whilst the heathen writers offer only imperfect hints and vague conjectures. But we have the testimony of a heathen writer confirming the narration of Moses respecting Abraham's circumcision. We read in Philo Biblius's extracts from Sanchoniathon, that it was recorded in the Phœnician Antiquities, that Ilus, who was also called Chronus, circumcised himself, and compelled his companions to do the same. The same author tells us, that this Ilus, or Chronus, sacrificed his only son; and we are informed by the Egyptian records, that this Chronus was called Israel by the Phœnicians. It is therefore evident, that this Chronus, or Israel, who is said by the heathen writers to have sacrificed his only son, can be no other than Abraham. Besides, the Scripture speaks of the institution of circumcision, when it was first enjoined to Abraham, as a rite entirely new. It informs us, that this was the seal of the covenant, which God had made with that patriarch. How then could circumcision be a mark, by which to distinguish Abraham and his posterity from the rest of mankind, if it were at that time common among the Egyptians, Ethiopians, Phœnicians, and other nations, who had before practised it?

We need not be perplexed in discovering circumcision among the Arabians, Saracens, and Ishmaelites. These people, as well as the Hebrews, sprang from Abraham; but they never regarded circumcision as an essential rite, to which they were bound, on pain of being cut off from their people. Circumcision, with the law of Moses, was introduced among the Samaritans and Cuthæans. The Idumæans, though descended from Abraham and Isaac, were not circumcised till subdued by John Hyrcanus. They who assert that the Phœnicians were circumcised, probably mean the Samaritans; for we know, from other authority, that the Phœnicians did not observe this ceremony. With respect to the Egyptians, circumcision was never of general and indispensable obligation; certain priests only, and particular professions, were obliged to observe it.

It has been asked, whether circumcision might be repeated? After the Israelites had passed over Jordan into the land of Canaan, Joshua was commanded to renew the rite of circumcision. The text is, 'Make thee sharp knives, and circumcise again the children of Israel the second time,' (Josh. v. 3.); and after the rite had been performed, God said, 'This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from you,' (Ibid. 9.) 1. The sharp knives are allowed to be, what they are called in the margin of our English Bible, knives of flint, which were commonly used in the eastern countries. Some of the Jews, from the words of Jeremiah, (ix. 25.) 'I will punish the circumcised that has a foreskin,' have undertaken to prove, that it was possible to reproduce the foreskin by art. This they say had been done in the wilderness by the Israelites, who for that reason were commanded to be again circumcised. Those Christians who have embraced this opinion, endeavour to support it by the following words of St. Paul: 'If any man is called, being circumcised, let him not again get a foreskin,' or, as we render the words, 'let him not become uncircumcised.' The difficulty of the words of Joshua, however, arises from misunderstanding the idiom of the original, and may be easily removed by paraphrasing them as follows: 'Let the ceremony of circumcision, which has been so long discontinued, be renewed.' 2. The rolling away the reproach of Egypt, is supposed by some to relate to the reproaches used by the Egyptians; who upbraided the Israelites for their long wandering in the wilderness, where they seemed brought to be destroyed. From these reproaches God now delivered them, and by enjoining circumcision, he assured them, that they should shortly possess the country, which no uncircumcised person might inherit. Our learned Spencer thinks, that the reproach of Egypt was the slavery, to which the Israelites had been so long subject, and that they were now declared a free people, by receiving the mark of the seed of Abraham, and being made heirs of the promised land. It appears, therefore, that the Hebrews never repeated circumcision; but when they admitted a proselyte of another nation, in which circumcision had been customary, if he had already received circumcision, they were satisfied with drawing some drops of blood from the part usually circumcised. This blood was called the blood of the covenant. Jews, who renounced Judaism, sometimes endeavoured to erase the mark of circumcision. (1 Macc. i. 15.) Univ. Hist.; Spencer de Leg. Heb.; Patrick's Comment.; Shuckford's Connect. vol. iii. p. 354, &c. Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 271.

CISTERNs were common throughout Palestine, and also in cities and private houses. As the cities were built mostly upon mountains, and the rains fall in Judea at two seasons only, spring and autumn, people were obliged to keep water in cisterns; in the country for the use of their cattle, and in cities for the convenience of the inhabitants. There are cisterns of very large dimensions, at this day, in Palestine: some 150 paces long, and 60 wide; and others 122 paces long, and 54 wide. One at Ramah is 32 paces in length and 28 in width. Wells and cisterns, fountains and springs, are seldom accurately distinguished in the language of Scripture.

CISTERTIANS. Towards the conclusion of the eleventh century, Robert, abbot of Molême, in Burgundy, having employed, in vain, his most zealous efforts to revive the decaying piety and discipline of his convent, and to oblige his monks to observe more exactly the rule of St. Benedict, retired with about twenty monks to a place called Cîteaux, in the diocese of Chalons. In this retreat, Robert founded the famous order of the Cistercians, which made a most rapid and astonishing progress, spread through the greatest part of Europe in the following century, was enriched with the most liberal and splendid donations, acquired the form and privileges of a spiritual republic, and exercised a sort of dominion over all the monastic orders. The great and fundamental law of this new fraternity was the rule of St. Benedict, which was to be rigorously observed. To this were added several other injunctions intended to maintain the authority of the rule. These injunctions were extremely austere, and grievous to nature, but esteemed pious and laudable in a superstitious age. However, they did not preserve the sanctity of this order. The seducing charms of opulence corrupted the Cisterians, whose zeal in the rigorous observance of their rule began gradually to diminish, and who in time became as negligent and dissolute as the rest of the Benedictines. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. p. 306, &c.

CLAUDIUS, Κλαύδιος, in Latin signifies lame. The emperor Claudius, mentioned in the New Testament, succeeded Caius Caligula, A.D. 41, and reigned upwards of thirteen years. King Agrippa, by his persuasion, contributed much to his accepting the empire, which was offered him by the soldiers. In return, he gave all Judea to Agrippa; and the kingdom of Chalcis to his brother Herod. He ended the dispute between the Jews and the Alexandrians, by confirming the Jews in the freedom of that city, and in the free exercise of their religion and laws; but he would not permit them to hold assemblies at Rome.

Agrippa dying in the fourth year of Claudius, A.D. 44, the emperor again reduced Judea into a province, and sent Cuspius Fadus as governor. About this time happened the famine foretold by the prophet Agabus. (Acts xi. 28, 29, 30.) At the same time Herod, king of Chalcis, obtained from the emperor the authority over the temple, and the money consecrated to God, with a power of deposing and establishing the high priests. In the ninth year of Claudius, A.D. 49, this emperor published an order, expelling all Jews from Rome. (Acts xviii. 2.) It is very probable, that the Christians being confounded with the Jews, were also banished. This is plainly intimated by Suetonius, who tells us, that Claudius expelled the Jews, on account of the continual disturbances excited by them, at the instigation of Chrestus, or Christ. Claudius was poisoned by his wife Agrippina, and was succeeded by Nero.

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS, tribune of the Roman troops, that kept guard at the temple of Jerusalem. Observing the tumult raised on account of St. Paul, whom the Jews had seized and intended to murder, he rescued

Paul, and ordered him to be bound with two chains, and carried to Fort Antonia, where was the Roman garrison. Then, being desirous of knowing the reason of this disturbance, he commanded Paul to be extended on the ground, and to put him to the torture by whipping. Paul, however, having demanded whether it was lawful thus to treat a Roman citizen, Lysias was afraid, and forbade that treatment. The next day, the tribune sent for the Jewish priests and council, that he might learn the reason of the commotion the preceding day. Paul cried out, that he was a Pharisee, and that the accusation against him proceeded from his believing the resurrection of the dead. The Pharisees took Paul's part, and the Sadducees opposed him; and as the tumult increased, Lysias sent soldiers to carry off the apostle to the tower of Antonia, where he was imprisoned. The day following, more than forty Jews engaged in a conspiracy to kill Paul. This was told to the apostle by his nephew. The tribune, on receiving this intelligence, sent a strong guard the night following to conduct Paul to Cesarea. (Acts xxi. 27, 28, &c.; xxii. 1, 2, 3, &c.; xxiii. 1, 2, 3, &c.) This is what we know of Lysias.

CLAUDIUS FELIX, successor of Cumanus in the government of Judea. Felix found means to solicit and engage Drusilla, sister of Agrippa the Younger, to leave her husband Azizus, king of the Emessians, and to marry him, A.D. 53. Felix sent to Rome Eleazar, son of Dinæus, captain of a band of robbers, who had committed great ravages in Palestine; he procured the death of Jonathan, the high priest, who sometimes freely represented to him his duty; he defeated a body of 3000 men, whom an Egyptian, a false prophet, had assembled upon the mount of Olives. St. Paul being brought to Cesarea, where Felix usually resided, was well treated by Felix, who permitted his friends to see him, and render him services, hoping the apostle would procure his redemption by a sum of money. Felix did not think it convenient either to condemn Paul, or to set him at liberty, when the Jews accused him. He adjourned the determination of this affair till the arrival of Lysias, who commanded the troops at Jerusalem, where he had taken Paul into custody, and who was expected at Cesarea. (Acts xxiii. 26, 27, &c.; xxiv. 1, 2, 3, &c.) This happened, A.D. 58.

One day, Felix, with his wife Drusilla, who was a Jewess, sent for Paul, and desired him to explain the religion of Jesus Christ. The apostle spoke with his usual boldness, and discoursed to them on justice, chastity, and the last judgment. Felix trembled, and remanded him to his confinement. He afterwards caused Paul to be brought to him occasionally, as if he were disposed to receive his instructions. He detained Paul two years at Cesarea, and was glad of this opportunity to oblige the Jews, who were extremely dissatisfied with his government. He was recalled to Rome, A.D. 60; and many Jews going thither to complain of the extortions and violence committed by him in Judea, he would certainly have been put to death, if his brother Pallas, who had been Claudius's slave, and was now his freedman, had not preserved him. Felix was succeeded in the government of Judea by Porcius Festus.

CLEMENT, Clemens, signifies in Latin mild, good, modest, merciful, and is mentioned in St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians; in which that apostle says, that Clement's name is in the Book of Life. The generality of fathers and interpreters conclude, that this is the same Clement, who succeeded to the government of the church at Rome. Grotius, however, is of opinion, that the Clement mentioned by the apostle, was a priest of the church at Philippi.

CLEOPAS, Κλεόπας, signifies the whole glory, or glory altogether; or it may be derived from the Hebrew, חלפ, chalaph, to change. Cleopas, according to Eusebius and Epiphanius, was brother of Joseph, both being sons of Jacob. He was the father of Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, of James the Less, of Jude, and Joseph or Joses. Cleopas married Mary, sister to the Blessed Virgin. He was, therefore, uncle to Jesus Christ, and his sons were first cousins to him. Cleopas, his wife, and sons, were disciples of Christ; but Cleopas did not sufficiently understand what Jesus had so often told his disciples, that it was expedient he should die, and return to the Father. Having beheld our Saviour expire upon the cross, he lost all hopes of seeing the kingdom of God established by him on earth.

The third day after our Saviour's death, that is, on the day of his resurrection, Cleopas departed from Jerusalem. He went with another disciple to Emmaus; and, in the way, they discoursed on what had lately happened, particularly with respect to Jesus Christ. Our Saviour joined them, appearing as a traveller; and asking them on what they were discoursing, he reasoned with them, and encouraged them, convincing them from Scripture, that it was necessary the Messiah should suffer death, previously to his being glorified. At Emmaus, Jesus seemed as if inclined to go farther; but Cleopas and his companion detained him, and made him sup with them. While they were at table, Jesus took bread, blessed it, brake it, and gave it to them. By this action their eyes were opened, and they knew him; but Jesus left them, and they instantly returned to Jerusalem. (Luke xxiv.) In our translation it is said, 'that he vanished out of their sight;' but the words of the original ought to be rendered, 'he suddenly went away from them.' Dr. Chandler.

No other actions of Cleopas are known. It is the opinion of Jerom, that he abode continually at Emmaus, and that he invited our Saviour into his own house. Supposing Cleopas to have been the brother of Joseph, and father of James, &c., Calmet thinks it more probable, that he was a Galilean, and dwelt in some city of Galilee.

CLOUD, a collection of vapours suspended in the atmosphere. It is a congeries of watery particles, or vesiculæ, raised from the waters or the watery parts of the earth, by the solar, or subterraneous, or electrical fire.

When the Israelites had left Egypt, God gave them a pillar of cloud to direct their march. (Exod. xiii. 21, 22.) According to Jerom, in his Epistle to Fabiola, this cloud attended them from Succoth; or, according to others, from Rameses; or, as the Hebrews say, only from Etham, till the death of Aaron; or, as the generality of commentators are of opinion, to the passage of Jordan. This pillar was commonly in front of the Israelites; but at Pihahiroth, when the Egyptian army approached behind them, it placed itself between Israel and the Egyptians, so that the Egyptians could not come near the Israelites all night. (Exod. xiv. 19, 20.) In the morning, the cloud moving on over the sea, and following the Israelites, who had passed through it, the Egyptians followed the cloud, and were drowned. From that time this cloud attended the Israelites; it was clear and bright during night, in order to afford them light, but in the day it was thick and gloomy, to defend them from the excessive heats of the deserts. 'The angel of God, which went before the camp of Israel, removed and went behind them; and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face, and stood behind them.' (Exod. xiv. 19.) Here we may observe, that the angel and the cloud made the same motion, as it would seem, in company. The cloud by its motions gave the signal to the Israelites to encamp or to decamp. Where, therefore, it stayed, the people stayed, till it rose again; then they broke up their camp, and followed it till it stopped. It was called a pillar, by reason of its form, which was high and elevated, as it were a pile or heap of fogs. Some interpreters suppose, that there were two clouds, one to enlighten, the other to shade the camp. St. Paul says, that the pillar of cloud was a figure of baptism: it enlightened the Israelites by night, as baptism enlightens us; and it was a continual earnest of God's care and protection.

The Lord appeared at Sinai in the midst of a cloud (Exod. xix. 9.; xxxiv. 5.); and after Moses had built and consecrated the tabernacle, the cloud filled the court around it, so that neither Moses nor the priests could enter. (Exod. xl. 34, 35.) The same happened at the dedication of the temple of Jerusalem by Solomon. (2 Chron. v. 13. 1 Kings viii. 10.)

When the cloud appeared upon the tent, in front of which were held the assemblies of the people in the desert, it was then believed that God was present. (Exod. xvi. 10.; xxxiii. 9. Numb. xi. 25.) The motion of the cloud, which rested upon this tent was a sign of God's presence. The angel descended in the cloud, and thence spoke to Moses, without being seen by the people. (Exod. xvi. 10. Numb. xi. 25.; xii. 5.) It is common in Scripture, when mentioning God's appearing, to represent him as encompassed with clouds, which serve as a chariot, and contribute to veil his dreadful majesty. (Job xxii. 14. Isaiah xix. 1. Matt. xvii. 5. xxiv. 30, &c.; Psalm xviii. 11, 12.; xxvii. 2.; civ. 3.)

Cloud is also used for morning mists: 'Your goodness is as a morning cloud, and as the early dew it goeth away.' (Hosea vi. 4.; xiii. 3.) Job, speaking of the chaos, which covered the whole earth, says, that God had confined the sea or the water as it were with a cloud, and covered it with darkness, as a child is wrapped in its blankets. The author of Ecclesiasticus (xxxiv. 6.) uses the same expression. Isaiah prays to God to hasten the coming of the Righteous One, and to command the clouds to pour him down on the earth. (Isaiah xlv. 8.) The Son of God, at his second advent, is described as descending upon clouds. (Matt. xxiv. 30; Luke xxi. 27. Rev. xiv. 14, 15, 16.)

COCCEIANS, a denomination that arose in the seventeenth century, and obtained its name from John Cocceius, a native of Bremen, and professor of divinity in the university of Leyden. This man represented the whole history of the Old Testament as a mirror, which held forth an accurate view of the transactions and events that were to happen in the church, under the dispensation of the New Testament, and to the end of the world. He affirmed that by far the greatest part of the ancient prophecies foretold Christ's ministry and mediation, and the rise, progress, and revolutions of the church, not only under the figure of persons and transactions, but in a literal manner, and by the sense of the words used in these predictions. He laid it down as a fundamental rule of interpretation, that the words and phrases of Scripture are to be understood in every sense, of which they are susceptible; or, in other words, that they signify, in effect, every thing which they can signify.

Cocceius also taught, that the covenant made between God and the Jewish nation, by the ministry of Moses, was of the same nature with the new covenant obtained by the mediation of Jesus Christ. In consequence of this general principle, he maintained, that the ten commandments were promulgated by Moses, not as a rule of obedience, but as a representation of the covenant of grace; that when the Jews had provoked the Deity by their various transgressions, in particular by the worship of the golden calf, the severe and servile yoke of the ceremonial law was added to the decalogue, as a punishment inflicted on them by the Supreme Being in his righteous displeasure; that this yoke, which was painful in itself, became doubly so on account of its typical signification, since it daily admonished the Israelites of the imperfection and uncertainty of their state, filled them with anxiety, and was a standing and perpetual proof that they had merited the displeasure of God, and could not expect, before the coming of the Messiah, the entire remission of their transgressions and iniquities; that, indeed, good men, even under the Mosaic dispensation, were immediately after death made partakers of everlasting happiness and glory, but that nevertheless, during the whole course of their lives, they were far removed from that firm hope and assurance of salvation, which rejoices the faithful under the dispensation of the Gospel; and that their anxiety naturally arose from the consideration, that their sins, though unpunished, were not pardoned, because Christ had not as yet offered up himself a sacrifice to the Father to make for them an entire atonement. Mosheim's Eccles. History, vol. iv. p. 545, &c.

COCK, a tame bird very well known. It is observed by profane authors, that the cock usually crows twice in a night; once about midnight, and the second time at the fourth watch of the night, or about break of day. This latter, which is the louder and more remarkable, Dr. Whitby observes, is that properly called cock-crowing. Of this crowing of the cock, the Evangelists are to be understood, where they relate Christ's words to Peter, 'Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice,' that is, before the time of night emphatically called the cock-crowing; for it appears from St. Mark, that the cock crew after Peter's first denial of Christ, and crew the second time after his third denial. (Mark xiv. 68. 72.) The Jews affirm, that all cocks were removed from Jerusalem, at the time of the passover. Some critics, therefore, have proposed to render the words of Luke (xxii. 60.) 'the cock crew,' by the cock crowing was sounded, or that particular time was made known by the watchman. Though Dr. Doddridge does not approve of this solution of the difficulty, yet we know that in India the time is marked by the sounding of a bell, which is struck by a person called the ghuree-alee, and which is equivalent to our striking of a clock. Asiatic Researches, vol. v. p. 88; Fragments attached to Calmet's Dict. No. cclxiii. p. 166; Whitby's Comment. on the New Testament.

CÆLO-SYR'IA, hollow or depressed Syria; Syria in the vale. (1 Macc. xiii. 10.) This name imports the hollow land, or region, situated between two long ridges of mountains; and those mountains have been always understood to be Libanus and Anti-libanus. As these ridges run parallel for many leagues, they contain between them a long, extensive, and extremely fruitful valley.

CÆNOBITES, an order of monks, in the fourth century. They lived together in a fixed habitation, and formed one large community under a chief, whom they called father or abbot. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 309.

COLLEGIANTS, a religious society that arose in 1619, when the disputes and tumults, which the Arminian system produced in Holland, were at the height. They meet twice a-year at Rhinsberg, in the neighbourhood of Leyden, and are generally known by the name of Collegiants, or Collegians, from their assemblies being called colleges. All are admitted to the communion of this sect, who acknowledge the divinity of Scripture, and endeavour to live suitably to its precepts and doctrines, whatever may be their peculiar sentiments concerning the nature of the Deity, and the truths of Christianity. The union of this community is maintained, not by the authority of rulers and doctors, the force of ecclesiastical laws, the restraining power of creeds and confessions, nor the influence of certain positive rites and institutions, but merely by a zeal for the advancement of practical religion, and a desire of deriving instruction from the study of the holy Scriptures. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. v. p. 57, &c.

COLLYRIDIANs, a sect in the fourth century, that superstitiously worshipped the Virgin Mary, and offered to her, on certain appointed days, a particular kind of bread, or little cakes (collyridæ). Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 351.

COLOS'SE, Κολοσσαί, signifies punishment, correction. It was a city of Phrygia Minor, and stood on the river Lyceus, at an equal distance between Laodicea and Hierapolis. These three cities, says Eusebius, were destroyed by an earthquake, in the tenth of Nero, or about two years after the date of St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians.

Some believe that St. Paul never visited this place, though he preached in Phrygia; but the Colossians received the faith from Epaphras, and perhaps also from Timothy. Paul having been informed that false apostles at Colosse had preached the necessity of legal observances, either by Epaphras, then prisoner with him at Rome, or by a letter from the Laodiceans, wrote the Epistle to the Colossians, which we now have, and in which he insists that Jesus Christ is the only mediator with God, and the true head of the church, &c. This epistle was written at the time St. Paul was prisoner at Rome, very probably in A. D. 62, and was carried to the Colossians by Tychicus and Onesimus. Sac. Geography; Bp. Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. i. p. 413.

COMMINATION, an office in the Church of England appointed to be read on Ash-Wednesday, and at other times when the ordinary shall direct. The preface, which the church has prefixed to this office, informs us, that 'in the primitive church there was a godly discipline, that at the beginning of Lent such persons as stood convicted of notorious sins, were put to open penance, and punished in this world, that their souls might be saved in the day of the Lord; and that others, admonished by their example, might be the more afraid to offend.' This discipline, which was anciently exercised in our own, as well as in foreign churches, degenerated in succeeding ages, during the corruptions of the church of Rome, into a formal confession of sins on Ash-Wednesday, and was used by all persons indifferently, from whom no other testimony of repentance was required, than submission to the empty ceremony of sprinkling ashes upon their heads. This ceremony, therefore, was wisely rejected by our reformers as mere shadow and show; and in its room was substituted this office, which is called, A commination or denunciation of God's anger and judgment against sinners; whereby the people being apprised of God's wrath and indignation against their sins, might not, through want of discipline in the church, be encouraged to follow and pursue them, but be induced to supply the want of that discipline, by severely judging and condemning themselves, and thus avoid condemnation at the tribunal of God.

Certain parts of this office are sometimes used on solemn days of fasting and humiliation; but the whole office is never read, except on the first day of Lent. Wheatly's Illustration of the Book of Common Prayer, p. 529.

COMMUNION signifies 1. fellowship, concord, or agreement; 'What communion hath light with darkness?' (2 Cor. vi. 14.) Those who are enlightened by the word can have no profitable or agreeable converse with such as are in darkness or ignorance. 2. It is also used for the sacrament, or sign of our spiritual fellowship with Christ: 'The cup of blessing, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ?' (1 Cor. x. 16.)

Communion of Saints is an article in the Apostles' Creed, and denotes that Christians or saints have communion or fellowship with the Father, from whom cometh every good and perfect thing; with his Son Jesus Christ, through whom forgiveness and mercy are conveyed to us; and with the Holy Ghost, whose sanctifying graces are conferred on those whose hearts are duly prepared for their reception: that Christians have also communion with the holy angels, who are ministering spirits sent forth to minister for them, who shall be heirs of salvation; that, besides the external fellowship, which they have in the word and sacraments of the church, they have an intimate union and conjunction with all the saints on earth, as the living members of Christ: and that Christians have communion not only with the saints on earth, but are of one city and one family with all those who have ever died in the true faith and fear of God, and now enjoy the presence of the Father, and who in their state of glory still sympathize with the faithful below, assisting, comforting, and praying for them. The belief of this communion of saints should excite and encourage us to holiness of life. If 'we walk in the light, as God is in the light, we have fellowship one with another;' but 'if we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth.' (1 John i. 7, 6.) It should induce us to wish well to all mankind, and to render them every good in our power. To those who have obtained the like precious faith with ourselves, we are still more nearly related; as being in a peculiar sense children of the same father, disciples of the same master, animated by the same spirit, and members of the same body. These things should oblige us to preserve as much as possible, by prudent order and mutual forbearance, the unity of the church; and to attend on public instruction, join in public worship, and observe the sacraments, which our Lord has appointed. We ought to rejoice in the happiness of the saints above, cherish their memories, and beseech the disposer of all things that he would give us grace so to follow their good examples on earth, that we may meet them in happiness in heaven. Secker's Lectures on the Catechism of the Church of England, Lect. xiv.; Bishop Pearson on the Creed, p. 359, edit. 1710.

COMPASSION is a feeling, which naturally arises in our breasts, when we perceive pain or misery in our fellow-creatures. This principle of compassion was evidently planted in our nature for the best and wisest purposes; to stimulate our exertions for mitigating the pain, and alleviating the misery of each other. To resist, therefore, this tender impulse, and not to afford relief to the distressed when we are capable of affording it, is really as contrary to the dictates of our nature, as it would be to refuse food when we are hungry, or drink when we are thirsty.

Compassion is an aboriginal principle of our nature, distinct from benevolence, though one of the essential constituents of a benevolent disposition. In the tales of fictitious history, we participate more cordially in the griefs and disappointments of the unhappy, than in the realized hopes and success of the prosperous; and the same observation is applicable to the vicissitudes of real life. The feeling of compassion, though often blended with pain, produced by the misery of others, is not altogether destitute of pleasure to the individual. As suffering is the proper object of compassion, which was planted in our nature as a lively incitement to the relief of every species of misery, it follows that the feeling of compassion ought to be proportioned to the misery of the sufferer. If, in any particular conjuncture, a poor and a rich man are equally in need of our assistance, we ought to assist the poor before the rich man; for it seems morally right to direct our beneficence more especially to those points where we are sure it will produce the greatest quantity of happiness. A small favour conferred on a poor man will usually add more sensibly to his comfort and happiness, than a much larger favour bestowed on a rich man. We ought, therefore, to prefer, in the distribution of our charity, those whose wants are the greatest, and to the increase of whose happiness, or the alleviation of whose misery, we can contribute in the greatest degree.

It may be said, that it is our duty to follow the dictates of reason, rather than to be governed by the impulses of compassion; or that reason wants not the aid of the affections. But though reason teaches us, that it is our duty to exert ourselves to relieve the sufferings of our fellow-creatures, yet, in the service of humanity, the exertions of reason would generally be very feeble and inefficient, if they were not invigorated by the feeling of compassion. Men are usually directed in their conduct more by the feeling of right, than by the abstract principle of right; more by a sensitive consciousness, than by a speculative conviction of duty. Reason teaches us to prefer mercy and beneficence to cruelty and oppression; but compassion makes us feel the sufferings of others more than any rational inquiry into the difference of good and evil, of pleasure and pain, ever could accomplish. Reason is supreme when it can command the support of the affections.

Though reason teaches us to provide for the benefit of others, and shows the fitness of beneficence to our nature, and to the circumstances, in which we are placed, yet it would often ineffectually plead the cause of indigence and woe, if compassion, which gives a sensitive perception of the privations which others endure, and of the pains which others feel, did not second the authority, and enforce obedience to the decrees of reason. Hence we may learn how much it is our duty to cherish the feeling of compassion, which the Divine Wisdom planted in our breasts as an advocate for the distressed, whose miseries it renders more touching to our nature, for the purpose of increasing our willingness to relieve them.

It may be said, that the feeling of compassion is a defect in our nature, which we should accordingly endeavour to suppress rather than indulge. If defect mean want of wisdom or congruity, the assertion is false, for the affection itself is admirably adapted to our nature and circumstances. Were we never to assist the indigent and afflicted, till we were reasonably convinced that it was our duty to do it, that the relief would be well bestowed, or was exactly apportioned to the need of the sufferer, or the circumstances of the case, the favourable moment of administering relief would commonly elapse before we could determine. While the mind was thus employed in deliberation, the heart would grow cold. Pain and misery, of whatever species they may be, are scarcely seen before compassion touches some of the finer chords of our heart. Its tender impulses ought therefore to be generally regarded as the voice of God within our breasts, peremptorily calling upon us to pass by no misery which we can relieve. If the maxim were to be generally prevalent, that men in their conduct should be governed solely by their reason, and should discard the use, and reject the counsel of their affections, we might, perhaps, render our nature metaphysically wise, but it would, at the same time, become more practically barbarous. The heart of flesh would be exchanged for a heart of stone. The miseries of life, many as they are, would be increased tenfold in number and in size; in proportion as men advanced in intellect, they would retrograde in humanity; the young and the old, the sick and the infirm, would have no support; and those, who mourn, would be without a comforter. Reason was given us, not to supersede the use, but to prevent the abuse of our affections; not to destroy, but to regulate their operations. In the complex system of the present life, no man is so truly virtuous as he, in whose conduct the rectitude of reason is mingled with the tenderness of love. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. pp. 172. 193; Sterne's Sermons, Sermon iii. edit. 1787.

CONCUBINE. This term in Scripture signifies a wife of the second rank, who was inferior to the matron, or mistress of the house. The children of concubines did not inherit their father's fortune, but the father, during his life, might provide for them, and give them presents. Sarah was Abraham's wife, and bare to him Isaac, the heir of all his wealth. The patriarch had also two concubines, Hagar and Keturah. These bare to him other children, whom he distinguished from Isaac, and made them presents. (Gen. xxv. 6.) As polygamy was tolerated in the East, it was common to see one, two, or more wives in a family, and also several concubines. Since the abrogation of polygamy by Jesus Christ, and the reduction of marriage to its primitive institution, the use of concubines has been condemned and forbidden among Christians. Yet, clandestine marriages were for a long time tolerated, and the women so married were frequently called concubines.

CONDEMNATION signifies 1. the declaring guilty, or pronouncing the sentence of punishment on any malefactor, by some judge. 2. It denotes that which aggravates the sin and punishment, or that which is the reason, the evidence, and cause of condemnation. 3. The punishment itself, to which a person is adjudged or condemned. (1 Cor. xi. 32.) 4. A censure of other men's persons, intentions, words, or actions, either rashly, unjustly, or uncharitably. (Luke vi. 37.) 5. An evidence against the wickedness and faults of men, by the good example and conduct of others. (Matt. xii. 41.)

The manner of condemning, or passing sentence on persons, varied in different countries. The Jews, by simply pronouncing the sentence, 'Thou N. art just,' or 'Thou N. art guilty,' either absolved or condemned. Among the Greeks, condemnation was signified by giving a black stone; and absolution, by giving a white one. This custom is alluded to in Rev. ii. 17, 'To him that overcometh I will give a white stone;' that is, I will absolve and acquit him in the day of judgment. Lowman on Revelations.

CONFESSION signifies 1. a public acknowledgment of any thing as our own: thus Christ will confess the faithful in the day of judgment. (Luke xii. 8.) 2. To own and profess the truths of Christ, and to obey his commandments, in spite of opposition and danger from enemies. (Matt. x. 32.) 3. To utter or speak the praises of God, or to give him thanks. 4. To acknowledge our sins and offences to God, either by private or public confession; or to our neighbour, whom we have wronged; or to some pious persons, from whom we expect to receive comfort and spiritual instruction; or to the whole congregation when our fault is published. (Psalm xxxii. 5. Matt. iii. 6. James v. 16.)

1 John i. 9.) 5. To acknowledge a crime before a judge. (Josh. vii. 19.)

In the ceremony of the solemn expiation, the high priest confessed in general his own sins, the sins of other ministers of the temple, and those of all the people. When an Israelite offered a sacrifice for sin, he put his hand on the head of the victim, and confessed his faults. (Levit. iv. 1, 2, 3, &c.) Some interpreters believe, that he not only declared himself in general a sinner, but that he confessed in particular the sin, for which he offered this sacrifice. On the day of solemn expiation, the Jews still make a private confession of their sins, which is called by them cippur, and which is said to be in the following manner. Two Jews retire into a corner of the synagogue. One of them bows very low before the other, with his face turned towards the north. He who performs the office of confessor gives the penitent nine-and-thirty blows on the back with a leathern strap, repeating these words; 'God, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not; yea, many a time turned he his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath.' As there are only thirteen words in this verse recited in the Hebrew, he repeats it three times, and at every word strikes one blow; which makes nine-and-thirty words, and as many lashes. In the mean time, the penitent declares his sins, and at the confession of every one beats himself on his breast. This being finished, he, who has performed the office of confessor, prostrates himself on the ground, and receives from his penitent nine-and-thirty lashes.

The Romish church not only requires confession as a duty, but has advanced it to the dignity of a sacrament. These confessions are made in private to the priest, who is not to reveal them under pain of the highest punishment. The Council of Trent requires 'secret confession to the priest alone, of all and every mortal sin, which, upon the most diligent search and examination of our consciences, we can remember ourselves to be guilty of since our baptism; together with all the circumstances of those sins, which may change the nature of them; because, without the perfect knowledge of these, the priest cannot make a judgment of the nature and quality of men's sins, nor impose fitting penance for them.' This is the confession of sins, which the same council confidently affirms 'to have been instituted by our Lord, and, by the law of God, to be necessary to salvation, and to have been always practised in the catholic church.' It is, however, evident, that such confession is both unnecessary and unscriptural. 1. No proof exists that the power of remitting and retaining sins, on which sacramental confession is founded, was imparted to any besides the apostles, or at most to those to whom a discernment of spirits was communicated. 2. If our Saviour had intended this to be a duty, he would, very probably, have delivered to us an express command on the subject. 3. This authority of pardoning sins, immediately in relation to God, without any reference to church censures, was not claimed for many ages after Christ.

St. James, indeed, says, 'Confess your faults one to another,' (James v. 16.); but priests are not here mentioned, and the word 'faults' seems to confine the precept to a mutual confession among Christians, of those offences, by which they may have injured each other. Certain it is, that from this passage the necessity of auricular confession, and the power of priestly absolution, cannot be inferred. Though many of the early ecclesiastical writers earnestly recommend confession to the clergy, yet they never recommend it as essential to the pardon of sin, or as having connection with a sacrament. They only urge it as entitling a person to the prayers of the congregation; and as useful for supporting the authority of wholesome discipline, and for maintaining the purity of the Christian church. Chrysostom condemns all secret confession to men, as being obviously liable to great abuses; and Basil, Hilary, and Augustin, all advise confession of sins to God only. It has been proved by M. Daillé, that private, auricular, sacramental confession of sins was unknown in the primitive church.

Our church, therefore, encourages its members to use confidential confession to their priest, or to any other minister of God's holy word; but this is very different from its being an essential part of a sacrament instituted by Christ and his apostles. A contrite sinner may feel relief in unburdening his mind to his spiritual pastor, and may receive advice and consolation, which may soften the pangs of a wounded conscience. By this means, his scruples may be removed; his good resolutions confirmed; and, instead of falling a victim to religious melancholy, he may be enabled to work out his salvation by a life of active virtue, and by a humble faith in the merits of the blessed Jesus, who, as he himself assures us, came into the world 'to call sinners to repentance.' The only absolution, which our church authorizes its clergy to pronounce, is ministerial, or declaratory of God's pardon upon the performance of the conditions required in the Gospel; it always supposes faith and sincere repentance, of which God alone is Judge. Among the early Christians, no other absolution, than declaratory and precatory, was known. This fully appears from the ancient liturgies and rituals, and from the authors who have written upon these subjects, and particularly from the treatise of Morinus de Pœnitentiâ, in which he has proved, that the indicative form of absolution, as it is called, Ego te absolvo, was introduced into the church as late as the twelfth century. Previously to that period, only some such prayer as the following was used: Absolutionem et remissionem tribuat tibi omnipotens Deus. The right of requiring confession, and of absolving sins, as exercised in the church of Rome, must necessarily be the source of an undue and dangerous influence to the clergy, and must at the same time operate as a great encouragement to vice and immorality among the people.

But, though private auricular confession is not of Divine authority, yet as archbishop Tillotson properly observes, 'there are many cases wherein men, under the guilt and trouble of their sins, can neither appease their own minds, nor sufficiently direct themselves, without recourse to some pious and prudent guide. In these cases, men certainly do very well, and many times prevent a great deal of trouble and perplexity to themselves, by a timely discovery of their condition to some faithful minister in order to their direction and satisfaction. To this purpose a general confession is for the most part sufficient; and where there is occasion for a more particular discovery, there is no need of raking into the particular and foul circumstances of men's sins to give that advice, which is necessary for the cure and ease of the penitent.' Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theolog. vol. ii. p. 423, &c.; Tillotson's Sermons, Sermon 160, 161.

CONFIRMATION, a rite in the Christian church, by which a person, arrived at years of discretion, undertakes the performance of every part of the baptismal vow made for him by his godfathers and godmothers. In the Acts of the Apostles is afforded the most incontestable demonstration, that the apostles themselves used this rite after baptism, and that from the imposition of hands extraordinary benefits were originally derived: 'When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them; and they spake with tongues and prophesied.' (Acts xix. 5, 6.) We are also informed by St. Luke, in another place, that when Philip the Evangelist had planted a church in Samaria, and the apostles had heard 'that Samaria had received the word of God,' they sent thither Peter and John, two of their own body, who prayed for them, 'and laid their hands on them,' and the Samaritans 'received the Holy Ghost.' In the Epistle to the Hebrews, the 'laying on of hands,' is mentioned among such observances as are essential, and of strict necessity.

Upon these authorities was founded the practice, which prevailed in the primitive church, of persons receiving from the bishop immediately after baptism, a solemn benediction, accompanied with imposition of hands, unction upon the forehead with the holy chrism, made of oil and balsam, the sign of the cross, and a prayer for the descent of the Holy Ghost. Tertullian says, 'When we come out of the water, we are anointed with a blessed ointment, according to that ancient rite, by which men used to be anointed for the priest's office, with oil out of a horn, ever since the time that Aaron was anointed by Moses; so that Christ himself has his name from Chrism. Then we have the imposition of hands on us, which calls down and invites the Holy Ghost.' This ceremony was called confirmation, as it completed the admission of the person into the Christian church, and qualified him to partake of the Lord's Supper. It was not confined to adults, but infants also received confirmation as soon as they were baptized, and an opportunity offered of presenting them to the bishop. Though it was generally performed by bishops, yet, in some countries, and at some periods, it was performed by presbyters. Jerom tells us, that, in his time, confirmation was always performed in the Latin church by bishops, as it had been in earlier times. Hilary says, that in Egypt the presbyters confirmed in the bishop's absence; and that was also the practice in the Greek church; but the Greek Christians did not allow confirmation to be a sacrament. From one of the canons of the council of Illiberis, we learn, that, in the time of both Cyprian and Augustin, confirmation was performed by bishops. The ancients did not think this rite so absolutely necessary, that the want of it would exclude from the kingdom of heaven those who had already been baptized; but they attributed to it so much importance, that they punished the neglect of it with marks of disgrace and public censure, and denied the privilege of ecclesiastical promotion and holy orders to such as had voluntarily and carelessly omitted it.

After this example of the primitive Christians, our church requires all who have been baptized to appear publicly in the congregation, and renew their baptismal vow according to the form prescribed in our liturgy. To give this ordinance the greater solemnity, it is performed only by the higher orders of the church, the archbishops and bishops. Thus far our church receives confirmation, confining it to prayer and imposition of hands without the chrism or the sign of the cross, and believes it to be derived from the practice of the apostles. There is, indeed, no Scriptural authority for the use of the chrism, or the sign of the cross; and Bingham thinks that the chrism formed no part of confirmation before the latter part of the second century, though other writers attribute to it an earlier date.

It must be admitted, that the apostles laid no absolute injunction on their successors to observe this rite as of Divine authority; and in the New Testament is no express command enjoining confirmation as a thing ordained by Christ, and this proves that it is not a sacrament. At the same time, the Scripture does not give the least intimation that this rite was intended to be laid aside at any future age of the church; and the subsequent practice is a strong presumption of a contrary intention. Indeed, the general benefits, which still attend the institution, tend very much to confirm the supposition, that it was not designed to be of temporary observance, but of perpetual obligation.

By some it has been argued, that the apostles used this rite to procure for their converts the eminent gifts and miraculous powers of the Holy Ghost, which uniformly followed their imposition of hands; while their successors considered it only as a proper and probable means of obtaining the ordinary graces of wisdom and truth, to assist young persons in discharging the duties of religion, and to inspire them with pious sentiments and resolutions. To this it may be answered, that it has never been proved, and that it does not appear by any means probable, that miraculous powers were always intended to be procured by the apostles' imposition of hands; and we may reasonably suppose, that many of the Samaritans, already mentioned, had only the ordinary comforts and assistances of the Holy Spirit conferred on them at confirmation.

But, passing over matters of dispute and conjecture, we cannot avoid regarding it as an instance both of wisdom and piety in the governors of the Christian church to continue this rite, in conformity to the apostolic practice; and as it is the duty of the members of every church to obey the lawful commands of those 'who are set over them in the Lord,' we certainly ought to pay all due attention to this religious observance: an observance that may be traced back from this time to the age of primitive Christianity; an observance which has, indeed, been accompanied with different ceremonies, and been performed at different times in different churches, according as their respective governors have prescribed, but which has been always considered as a sacred institution, as a means of obtaining grace, and of advancing in holiness.

The church of Rome seems, in a great measure to have altered the practice of the apostles, in 'laying on of hands,' and by the addition of certain superstitions, has raised confirmation to the rank of a sacrament, for which the Scriptures furnish no authority. But this rite is observed, according to original usage, in all Protestant churches that admit of bishops; and even some of those that reject episcopacy, and, therefore, cannot properly have any confirmation, are so sensible of its wisdom and utility, that they observe it in the best manner, which their circumstances, and the nature of their establishments, will permit.

One principal design intended by our reformers in the continuance of this rite, was, that such persons as have been baptized in infancy, and are arrived at sufficient years of discretion, may, in the face of the church and of its proper governors, publicly and solemnly take upon themselves their Christian profession, and the discharge of that vow, which their sponsors engaged they should, in due time, perform. Another important end or reason for which we have retained confirmation, is, that those who, at years of discretion, thus openly declare their adherence to the Christian profession, and are solemnly dedicated to it by the imposition of hands, may be admitted to a participation of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. The last object we shall mention for confirmation being retained in our church, is, that the ordinary graces of the Holy Spirit may be implored for the persons thus dedicated to God by their spiritual governors. Wheatly's Illustration of the Book of Common Prayer, p. 396, &c.; Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. ii. p. 416.

CONGREGATIONALISTS, a denomination of Protestants, who reject all church government, except that of a single congregation, under the direction of one pastor, with their elders, assistants, or managers.

The platform of church discipline drawn up in 1643, and agreed upon by the elders and messengers of the churches, assembled in the synod at Cambridge in New England, defines a congregational church to be, by the institution of Christ, a part of the militant visible church, consisting of a company of saints by calling, united in one body by a holy covenant, for the public worship of God, and the mutual edification of each other in the fellowship of the Lord Jesus. According to this platform, those who are admitted members of churches ought to be first examined; for the eunuch of Ethiopia, before his admission, was examined by Philip, whether he believed in Jesus Christ with all his heart. The officers are charged with the keeping of the doors of the church, and are, therefore, in a special manner, to try the fitness of those who enter. The qualifications necessary to be found in all church members, are repentance from sin, and faith in Jesus Christ. The confession of faith, which was agreed upon by the synod at their second session, teaches the doctrine of the Trinity, of predestination, total depravity, particular redemption, effectual grace, and final perseverance. In one particular, the Congregationalists differ from the Independents: the former invite councils, which are advisory only; but the latter were accustomed to decide all difficulties within themselves. Adam's View of Religions, p. 122.

CONONITES, a denomination that appeared in the sixth century, and derived their name from Conon, bishop of Tarsus, their chief. Conon taught that the body never lost its form; that its matter alone was subject to corruption and decay, and was to be restored when this mortal shall put on immortality. Mosheim's Eccles. History, vol. i. p. 473.

CONSCIENCE may be defined an inward power or faculty, which furnishes us with such impressions or sentiments of moral good and evil, that we necessarily give our approbation to the one, and withhold it from the other. That there is within us such a moral faculty, or directing principle, as conscience, cannot be doubted. Every man must be conscious, not only of a power, common to him with the inferior creation, of complying with the solicitations of passion or appetite, but also of a superior faculty or power, not possessed by other creatures, of suppressing the inclinations of an injurious appetite, of opposing the impulses of a wrong passion, and of forming and regulating his whole conduct by certain laws. Every action is accompanied with a consciousness of right or wrong, by which we approve or disapprove of what we do. Conscience seems intended by our Creator to be to the mind what the eye is to the body. Its office consists in directing us in the way in which we should walk, in admonishing us of every deviation from it, and in bringing us back when we turn aside to the right hand or to the left. It justifies and applauds, when we act rightly; reproaches and condemns when we do amiss; and gives secret intimations that we shall accordingly be justified or condemned at a future tribunal. In particular persons, indeed, it is more or less active, according as they have established, or reduced, its influence, by an habitual attention to its admonitions, or by constant efforts to silence or suppress them. But there are seasons in which this principle, in spite of all arts and efforts to suppress it, will resume its authority, and execute its office, in placing before us the obligations of duty, and in severe accusations and reproaches for having departed from them.

To secure to us the approbation of conscience, it ought to obtain the supremacy of the mind, preside over all inferior principles, and regulate and govern every propensity and affection of our nature, and not be controlled or influenced by them. We should reverence it as the oracle of God, the faithful interpreter of his will; and we ought to give a constant attention to it, and form our whole conduct by its counsels. In all important points of duty, its decisions will be generally clear; and in particular doubtful cases, in which it may not be easy to decide on the lawfulness or unlawfulness of an action, we ought to adhere to the side most likely to secure our integrity, which should not be endangered by too near approaches to sin. Such approaches naturally lead to known and avowed iniquity; and the man, who allows himself to hazard an action, the lawfulness of which is not apparent, and the unlawfulness suspected, betrays a propensity that will not long permit him to hesitate at the commission of evident and undisputed crimes.

'Nothing,' says an elegant writer, 'is a surer instance of the goodness of the Creator, than that delicate inward feeling, so strongly impressed on every reasonable creature. This internal sense, if duly attended to, and diligently cherished, and kept alive, would check the sinner in his career, and make him look back with horror on his crimes. An ancient is commended for wishing, that he had a window in his breast, that every one might see into it. But it is certainly of more consequence to keep ourselves free from the reproach of our own hearts, than from the evil opinions of others. We should therefore consider conscience as a mirror, in which every one may see himself reflected, and in which every action is represented in its proper colours.'

It is, however, necessary to observe, that to secure the approbation of our conscience, we must not only religiously follow its guidance, and observe its dictates, but acquire a just information of our duty, and live conformably to our information. Conscience itself may be erroneous, and hold out false lights; and in that case, however faithfully we pursue its directions, this will not always insure our innocence. St. Paul calls himself the least of the apostles, not meet to be called an apostle, and the chief of sinners, because he persecuted the church of Christ, though, as he himself informs us, he did it in ignorance. We ought to act agreeably to our belief, and comply with the dictates even of an erroneous conscience. Yet, if such were not inevitable errors, but the effects of voluntary corruption and negligence, they must subject us to the imputation of guilt, and consequently to the reproaches of our own mind, as soon as we shall discern its errors, and the criminal occasions of them. Sermons by George Carr, vol. ii. p. 34, &c.; The Connoisseur, No. xxviii.

CONSECRATION, a devoting or setting apart of any things or persons to the worship and service of God. In the law, God ordained that the first-born of man and beast should be consecrated to him. He consecrated the race of Abraham, particularly the tribe of Levi, and more especially the family of Aaron. (Exod. xiii. 2. 12. 15. Numb. i. 49.; iii. 12. 1 Pet. ii. 9.) Other consecrations depended on the will of men, who consecrated themselves, or things, or persons subject to them, to the service of God for a time only, or entirely. Joshua devoted, or set apart, the Gibeonites to the service of the tabernacle. (Josh. ix. 27.) David and Solomon devoted the Nethinims, who were some remains of the Canaanites. (Ezra viii. 20.; ii. 58, &c.) Hannah offered her son Samuel to the Lord, to serve all his life in the tabernacle. (1 Sam. i. 11.) The angel, who promised Zacharias a son, commanded him to consecrate the child to the Lord, and to be careful that during his whole life, he fulfilled those laws, which the Nazarites, who were consecrated to God for a time only, observed during their consecration. (Luke i. 15.)

The Hebrews sometimes devoted to the Lord fields or cattle, which were afterwards no longer in their own power. (Levit. xxvii. 28, 29.) It seems probable that Jacob did the same. (Gen. xxviii. 20.) David and other kings frequently consecrated to the Lord the arms and spoils, or the cities and countries, of their enemies.

The New Testament furnishes us with instances of consecration. Believers in Christ are consecrated to the Lord, as a holy race, a chosen people. (1 Pet. ii. 9.) Bishops and other ministers of the Gospel are devoted more peculiarly to his service. Among the ancient Christians, the consecration of churches was performed with much pious solemnity.

CONSUBSTANTIAL, a word of similar import with co-essential, and denotes something of the same substance with another. Thus, it is said in the second article of our church, that Christ is consubstantial, or of one substance, with the Father. The term ὁμοούσιος, consubstantial, was first adopted by the fathers of the councils of Antioch and Nice, to express more precisely the orthodox doctrine, and to serve as a barrier and precaution against the errors and subtleties of the Arians, who denied only that Christ was consubstantial with the Father. The Arians allowed, that the Word was God, as having been made God; but they denied that he was the same God, and of the same substance with the Father. Accordingly, they greatly exerted themselves, that the use of this word might be abolished. The emperor Constantine employed all his authority with the bishops that it might be expunged from the symbols; but it was retained, and is at this day, as it was then, the distinguishing criterion between an Athanasian and an Arian.

St. John says, that 'the Word was with God,' that is, the Word was united with the Father, or was of one substance with the Father. 'I and my Father are one,' was a declaration of Christ himself. 'And the Word was God,' or the very and eternal God. 'The same was in the beginning with God,' that is, the Word was united with the Father from all eternity. 'All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made.' (John, ch. i.) This proves that by the Word St. John means Christ, since the creation of the world is in Scripture repeatedly attributed to Christ, and consequently the Word being made flesh is Jesus Christ. The creation of the world is also attributed to God the Father. This, therefore, forms an additional proof of an incomprehensible identity or unity of substance between the Father and the Son. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christ. Theology, vol. ii. p. 110.

CONSUBSTANTIATION, tenet of the Lutheran church, with respect to the manner of the change made in the bread and wine in the eucharist. In contradiction to the other reformers, Luther only changed transubstantiation into consubstantiation, which means that the substance of Christ's body and blood is present in the holy sacrament with the substance of bread and wine. He attempted to illustrate the doctrine of consubstantiation by saying, that Jesus Christ 'is in the bread, just as fire is in the red hot iron.' His perseverance in this opinion was a principal cause of the division among the reformed churches. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Theology, vol. ii. p. 481; Adam's Religious World, vol. ii. p. 333.

CONTENTMENT, is a cheerful acquiescence in that condition of life, in which we are placed, whatever it may be. Without this acquiescence in our condition, no wealth is any bar against misery; and with it, no penury can prevent happiness. Experience proves, that contentment is rather the effect of a virtuous and religious disposition of mind and heart, than of external circumstances; and that the specious advantages of wealth, of honour, and of power, contribute much less to this desired end than is commonly imagined. Dissatisfaction with our present circumstances, extravagant desires and immoderate wishes, the absence of inward placency, and the feeling of envy, are not exclusively the vices of the poor, but are more frequently found among the rich. Wealth certainly enlarges the means, as well as varies the modes of enjoyment; but all enjoyment, as far as it is sensual, is not so much proportioned to the means, as to the physical capacity of the individual. The power of receiving pleasure is very inferior to the means of producing it; and an accumulation of the means of pleasure, without the most resolute self-denial and the most vigilant government of the appetites, is sure to lead to excess of indulgence. Excess generates satiety, which is itself a feeling of dissatisfaction and discontent. Hence we see that outward circumstances have no inseparable connection with the degree of inward satisfaction; and that reason, as well as piety, enforces contentment in all conditions of life.

True contentment is founded on religion, which alone can offer such motives and considerations, as will render the mind contented under the dispensations of a Being infinitely wise and good, who intends the happiness of all his creatures, and who will sufficiently recompense us for all the hardships we suffer in this probationary state. The Apostle tells us, that, 'The Lord loveth whom he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.' Do we blame a physician for administering bitter and unpalatable medicines, when they are necessary to repress the ravages of disease, and restore the vigour of the body? Ought we then to murmur against the All-wise and All-good Being, who uses suffering and affliction as the means of our moral reformation? Assured that God is ever employed in the production of the greatest good, even in the most adverse occurrences of our lives, instead of fretting with acrimony, complaining with bitterness, or raving with passion, we should be contented, and ready to say with Jesus, 'Not my will, but thine be done.' The certain assurance of an eternal recompense in a better life will invigorate our fortitude, and exhilarate our hopes, making us deem our burthen easy, and our affliction light.

If we consider the world as an inn, intended only to accommodate us while we are on our journey; if we are convinced from the dispensations of Providence, that temporal enjoyments are no ingredients of true happiness, nor the proper and adequate reward of a sincere and unaffected piety; we shall become as happy as it is possible to be in this state of imperfection. To God, the past, the present, and the future, are as one indivisible point; and, consequently, the fitness of our present condition to produce our greatest good must appear very differently in his mind to what it does in ours. How presumptuous is it in us, who are so short-sighted, to murmur against the fitness of our present condition to our individual need! This is to accuse his justice, and to demonstrate our own impiety.

We have nothing, which we did not receive. We can prefer no claim of right to any one thing which we possess. All that we have, or enjoy, is an unmerited indulgence, flowing from the divine beneficence. This consideration aggravates the guilt of our discontent. It is more incumbent on us to thank God for what he pleases to confer, than to complain of what he thinks it proper to deny; and the pleasure which we enjoy will always be found to afford stronger reasons for gratitude, than the sufferings which we endure can furnish for discontent. When we consider our own unworthiness, we shall find that God is much more bountiful than we deserve, and that he always inflicts on us fewer evils than he well might, without any impeachment of his justice or his goodness. Can we imagine that God takes any pleasure in the misery of his children, or that he ever exposes them to any sufferings, which are not really and eventually beneficial? We ought, therefore, to be grateful to God for the evil, which he inflicts, as well as for the good, which he bestows; and whatever be our circumstances in this world, we ought not to give way to angry complaints, malevolent impatience, or sullen discontent. In a sincere and steady regard to God, to his fatherly purposes, and his unerring modes of bringing them to pass, we ought to seek that satisfaction with our lot, which none of its trials may be able to destroy. That is the best condition in life, in which we can best perform the duties incumbent on us. We have great reason to be thankful for poverty or affliction, if they teach us patience, meekness, and resignation, which are virtues not so natural and easy in a prosperous state. Richardson's Divine and Moral Essays, p. 141, &c.; Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. pp. 423. 500; Bowden's Sermons, Sermon. iv.

CONVERSATION signifies an interlocution between two or more persons, on any subject. The virtue of both sexes greatly depends on their observing a due regard to decency, in their conversation with each other. The modest respect and reserve, which are so strong a protection against any wanton or unbecoming familiarities, must otherwise be destroyed, and the most lax and sensual behaviour ensue. In particular, it is of the utmost importance to preserve in the female mind a nice and delicate sense of shame, which may instantly feel, and feel with lively abhorrence, every the least deviation from modesty. In proportion as the sense of shame and a regard for decency in a woman are weakened, her integrity becomes suspicious, and, at least, she loses its strongest safeguard, and its firmest stay. What, indeed, can tend so forcibly to deaden the sense of shame, and to destroy the regard for decency, as gross, impure, and libidinous conversation? Some persons delight in discoursing on such subjects only as place them below the level of the beasts, and are indifferent to every other sort of converse, than that which abounds with the language of obscenity. Hence, they are never so happy as when they are relating or hearing some filthy tale. Their language is the language of a brothel, and the whole of their discourse is blended with the associations of lewdness or the artifices of seduction. Older people are frequently more addicted to this sin than the young; and hence the corruption of their lips acts like a contagious poison on their offspring, who must occasionally hear their conversation. Thus their family, whom a greater respect for decency manifested in the parents might have preserved modest and innocent, are soon infected with the sensual venom, which is continually dropping from the father's or mother's lips, and which, while it withers every fibre of shame in the breasts of the young, fits them only for a life of debauchery and prostitution.

At the same time it may be observed, that any thing like gloom or sourness, whether in manner or in speech, is so far from being any mark of Christian excellence, that it is repugnant to the genius of the Christian doctrine, and to the native openness and simplicity of the Christian character. Those persons, who make religion to consist in an affected sanctity of look, or an habitual and unremitted gloominess of discourse, seem to slight both the spirit and the precepts of the Christian religion. Conversation with each other, so long as it be carefully separated from every infusion of irreligion, is one of the most delightful employments of our rational nature; but conversation may not be either irreligious or immoral, though it does not continually turn on grave or momentous topics. Are we to exert none of the gay but unvitiated flights of fancy, none of the exuberances of vivacity, or the creations of mirth? Surely the Christian religion does not enjoin us to be thus severe, or to debar ourselves from any enjoyments, which are not injurious to good morals, either in their causes or their consequences. We are all liable to depression of spirits; and may we not physically and medicinally have recourse to the exhilarating power of pleasurable conversation? May we never unbend from severer studies or serious occupations? Besides, pleasantness of discourse is a most powerful auxiliary of morality. Out of some follies and vices men may be better laughed than reasoned; and the playfulness of ridicule has sometimes a sharper edge than the fierceness of invective. Shame may be excited by raillery, when it cannot be provoked by serious reproof. Many, who cannot endure contempt, despise invective. The infidel often laughs at religion, and attacks it with the shafts of wit and irony; and may we not sometimes employ wit and irony in its defence? May we not show the sceptic that neither force of argument nor of ridicule is all on his side of the question? Fools make a mock of sin; and may not wise men make a mock of such fools? Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. p. 259, &c.

CONVERSION is a change from one state to another, or from a wicked to a holy life. It has been usual to divide all mankind into two classes, the converted and the unconverted. Such a division infers the necessity of conversion to all; but this appears to be too absolute and unlimited. There is a class and description of Christians, who having been piously educated, and persevering in a virtuous course of life, are not conscious to themselves that they were ever without the influence of religion on their hearts and conduct. These persons cannot be reckoned either converted or unconverted. They are not converted, because they are not sensible of any religious change, which can be properly called a conversion. They are not unconverted, because that implies a state of reprobation. If therefore conversion be insisted on as indispensable to all for the purpose of salvation, some persons, who were never indifferent to the influence of religion, or alienated from it, could not apprehend in what their conversion should consist.

It appears that spiritual assistance, may be imparted at any time from the earliest to the latest period of life; and therefore those, who are, and have been, in such a religious state, that no such change as is usually meant by conversion is necessary for their salvation, need not be dejected from not possessing the consciousness of this change. Our Saviour, indeed, says, 'Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God,' and, 'Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.' But it is no where determined at what time of life, or under what circumstances, this gift is imparted; and the contrary is intimated, by comparing it to the blowing of the wind, which, in its mode of action, is beyond our calculation: 'The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit.' The effect of this uncertainty is, that we are taught to pray for spiritual assistance in all stages, and under all circumstances, of life. We pray for it in baptism for those who are baptized; and we pray for it particularly in the office of confirmation, for young persons just commencing the business of life. If we cannot ordinarily distinguish the operations of the spirit from those of our own minds, we cannot distinguish when they commence. Spiritual assistance may therefore be imparted without such a sensible conversion, that a person can fix his memory on some great and general change produced in him at an assignable time.

As the notion of sudden and instantaneous conversions, and of the pangs of the new-birth, has been, and may still be held by some well-meaning Christians, to be a doctrine of the Gospel, it may be proper to show in what cases, and under what limitations, it ought to be allowed. A conversion may be sudden and instantaneous, when the conviction itself is wrought by surprise. Thus, in the second chapter of the Acts we read, that the Jews, being assembled at the great feast of Pentecost, from every nation known at that time in the world, and 'hearing the disciples speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance, were all amazed, and marvelled.' Finding that the Person, whom they had crucified as an impostor, was the true and long-expected Messiah, and that this miracle of speaking with new tongues, was wrought in confirmation of the truth of his mission, 'they were pricked to the heart, and said unto Peter, and unto the rest of the apostles, men and brethren, what shall we do?'—We read also, in the sixteenth chapter of the Acts, that the jailer, who kept Paul and Silas, was seized with the like sudden surprise, when he found that though all the doors of the prison had been opened, yet none of the prisoners had escaped. 'He fell down before Paul and Silas, and brought them out, and said, Sirs, what must I do to be saved?' In these two cases, conviction flashed like lightning on the mind, and extorted an instantaneous confession of what was felt. A conversion may be also sudden, not only from a sudden change of belief, or sentiments, but also from a sudden application of a previous belief to a conscience involved in guilt. For instance, Peter was suddenly struck with remorse, when our Lord turned back and looked on him; and David felt the same compunctions of conscience, when Nathan retorted on him that condemning sentence, 'Thou art the man.'

If, however, it be necessary, or at least, expedient, that some men should be wrought on by quick impulses, or sudden shocks, it is equally certain that others may be converted by more gentle methods, and gradual convictions. Of the latter kind many examples are recorded in Scripture. The Bereans mentioned in the Acts, gave not their immediate consent to the first preaching of the Gospel, but pondered and meditated on it, 'comparing spiritual things with spiritual.' For they searched the Scriptures daily whether these things were so.—The good Centurion, the first convert from the Gentile to the Christian world, seems to have felt no agonizing sensations of guilt and remorse, during the time of his conversion. For the account given by himself, and by St. Peter, intimates nothing of this kind. Cornelius and his company were not tormented with the stings of a guilty conscience, and the lashes of despair, before they were admitted into a justified state.—We read in the sixteenth chapter of the Acts, that Lydia of Thyatira, after having heard the preaching of St. Paul, was converted. She certainly did not feel any of those horrors, which some persons mention as a necessary proof of conversion; and she probably did not even find any sudden change of sentiments, or rapid alteration of belief. The account given of her is, that being one of those, who worshipped God, that is, adored the true God of the Jews, the great Jehovah, the Lord 'opened her heart, that she attended to the things, which were spoken by Paul.' The expression of attending to his preaching, intimates, very probably, a state of mind not immediately assenting, but rather weighing, considering, and deliberating on the things, which were spoken. The context also favours this opinion; for it plainly appears, that some time elapsed between her own conversion, and the baptism of all her household. Her expression also to Paul and Silas, 'If ye have judged me faithful to the Lord, come into my house, and abide there,' certainly implies no perturbation or agony of mind.

On the whole, nothing can be concluded either from sudden or gradual conversions; from piercing compunctions, or gentle drawings of the Holy Spirit, considered merely in themselves. Whether we are drawn at first by the cords of love, or driven by the lashes of fear, it is not so material, as whether we persevere to the end. This is the great point on which we ought to fix our attention. The apostle John tells us, that this is the side, on which we are most liable to dangerous errors. 'Let no man deceive you: he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous: He that committeth sin is of the devil.' (1 John iii. 7, 8.) Our Saviour himself says, 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' Paley's Sermons, Sermon vii.; Dr. Tucker on Conversion, in Clapham's Selection of Sermons, Sermon xxvi.

CONVOCATION, an assembly of the clergy of England, by their representatives, for the purpose of consulting on ecclesiastical matters. Though the convocation has not been permitted to transact any business for upwards of seventy years, yet it still meets on the second day of every session of parliament. Like parliament, it consists of an upper and lower house. In the upper house, the archbishops and bishops sit; and in the lower house, the inferior clergy, who are represented by their proctors. These consist of all the deans and archdeacons, of one proctor for every chapter, and two for the clergy of every diocese, and amount in all to one hundred and forty-three divines. The lower house choose their prolocutor or speaker, whom they present to the archbishops and bishops of the upper house. The business of the prolocutor consists in taking care that the members attend, in collecting their debates and votes, and in carrying their resolutions to the upper house. The convocation is summoned by the king's writ, directed to the archbishop of each province, requiring him to summon all bishops, deans, archdeacons, &c. The power of the convocation is limited by a statute of king Henry VIII. They are not to make any canons or ecclesiastical laws without the king's license; nor, when permitted, can they put them in execution, except under certain restrictions. They possess the power of examining and censuring all heretical and schismatical books, persons, &c.; but an appeal lies from them to the king in chancery, or to his delegates. The clergy in convocation have the same privileges as members of parliament. The reason for not permitting the convocation to sit, was originally owing to the unhappy disputes which began after the revolution, between the high-church party and those who favoured moderation. These disputes increased during the reign of queen Anne, and continued in that of her successor. It was, therefore, determined in council, that the convocation should be still summoned to meet, but that on the day of their meeting they should be adjourned.

A late writer judiciously observes, that 'it is always to be lamented when private animosities obstruct the discharge of public duties; the flock cannot prosper while the shepherds are at variance. It is not for an individual to express his opinion on so delicate a subject as the revival of the powers of the convocation: but he must ever look up with veneration to that assembly, whose deliberations, under God, rescued us from many dangerous errors, and settled on so sure a foundation the ecclesiastical establishment of this country.' Brewster's Secular Essay, p. 60; Hurd on Religious Rites, &c. p. 635.

CONY, OR RABBIT. The Hebrew word שָׁפָן saphan, which our translators have rendered a coney, conformably to the sentiments of the modern Jews, and the greatest number of interpreters, is translated in the Septuagint and Vulgate, chærogryllus, a hedge-hog, or porcupine. Many, indeed, are the reasons against admitting this animal to be the rabbit. This last was an animal peculiar to Spain, and therefore could not be supposed to be either in Judea or Arabia. The coney does not chew the cud; it inhabits a sandy soil, and does not dwell in rocks. Hence Bochart thinks, that this animal is a kind of large rat, which is common in Arabia, and is called Aljarbuho. These rats chew the cud, dwell in rocks, and are gregarious; and the same qualities are ascribed in Scripture to the saphan. Mr. Pennant supposes it to be the Egyptian jerboa, which is the same as that mentioned by Bochart, and which he thinks is the daman Israel, or Israel's lamb; but Dr. Shaw distinguishes the jerboa from the daman Israel.

Mr. Bruce is of opinion that the saphan is the ashkoko, which in Arabia or Syria is called Israel's lamb, or gannim Israel. The ashkoko, Mr. Bruce observes, 'is above all other animals so much attached to the rock, that I never once saw him on the ground, or from among large stones in the mouth of caves, where is his constant residence; he is gregarious, and lives in families. He is in Judea, Palestine, and Arabia, and consequently must have been familiar to Solomon. For David describes him very pertinently, and joins him with other animals perfectly known to all men: 'The hills are a refuge for the wild goats, and the rocks for the saphan or ashkoko.' (Psalm civ. 18.) And Solomon says, 'There be four things, which are little upon earth, but they are exceeding wise.' 'The saphanim are a feeble folk, yet they make their houses in the rocks.' (Prov. xxx. 24. 26.) Now this, I think, very obviously fixes the ashkoko to be the saphan, for this weakness seems to allude to his feet, and how inadequate these are to dig holes in the rock, where yet, however, he lodges.' The ashkoko greatly resembles our rabbit. Bruce's Travels, vol. v. p. 139, &c.; Scripture Illustrated; Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Leviticus.

COPTS, a name given to the Christians of Egypt, who do not belong to the Greek church, but are Monophysites, and in most respects Jacobites. Scaliger and father Simon derive the name from Coptos, once a celebrated town of Egypt, and the metropolis of the Thebaid; but Volney and others are of opinion, that the name Copts is only an abbreviation of the Greek word Aiguptios, an Egyptian. The Copts have a patriarch, whose jurisdiction extends over both Egypts, Nubia, and Abyssinia, who resides at Cairo, but who takes his title from Alexandria. He has under him eleven or twelve bishops, besides the abuna, or bishop of the Abyssinians, whom he appoints and consecrates. The rest of the clergy, whether secular or regular, are composed of the orders of St. Anthony, St. Paul, and St. Macarius, who have each their monasteries. Their archpriests, who are next in degree to bishops, and their deacons, are said to be numerous; and they often confer the order of deacon even on children. Next to the patriarch is the bishop or titular patriarch of Jerusalem, who also resides at Cairo, because there are only few Copts at Jerusalem; he is, in reality, little more than bishop of Cairo, except that he goes to Jerusalem every Easter, and visits some other places in Palestine, which own his jurisdiction. To him belongs the government of the Coptic church, during the vacancy of the patriarchal see. The ecclesiastics are said to be in general of the lowest ranks of the people; and hence that great degree of ignorance which prevails among them. They have seven sacraments; baptism, the eucharist, confirmation, ordination, faith, fasting, and prayer. They admit only three œcumenical councils; those of Nice, Constantinople, and Ephesus. They observe four Lents, as do the Greeks and most Eastern Christians; but it is said, by Brerewood and Ross, that they do not keep the Lord's day. There are three Coptic liturgies; one attributed to St Basil, another to St. Gregory, and the third to St. Cyril. These are translated into Arabic for the use of the clergy and the people. The Copts are fond of rites and ceremonies. During the time of service, they are always in motion. In particular, the officiating priest is in continual motion, incensing the saints, pictures, books, &c. every moment. They have many monasteries in which the monks bury themselves from society in remote solitudes. Their nunneries are properly hospitals; and few enter them, except widows reduced to beggary. During the first three ages of the church, no country exhibited more sincere or greater Christian piety than Egypt, and the north of Africa in general. At present, however, little more than the mere shadow of Christianity can be seen in Egypt; and, in point of numbers, not more than fifty thousand Christians in all can be found in this country. There are not more than three Christian churches at Cairo. Adam's Religious World, vol. i. pp. 391, &c.

COR'BAN, denotes a gift, a present made to God, or to his temple. The Jews sometimes swore by corban, or by such gifts offered to God. (Matt. xxiii. 18.) Theophrastus says, that the Tyrians forbade the use of such oaths as were peculiar to foreigners, and particularly of corban, which, as Josephus observes, was used only by the Jews. Jesus Christ reproaches the Jews with cruelty towards their parents, and says, that to excuse themselves from showing any liberality to them, they would tell them, 'May what you ask of me be corban,' that is, consecrated to God; or, 'May all that I am able to give you be corban,' that is, devoted to God, so that neither you nor I may employ any thing of it to our use; or, 'I swear by corban,' that is the gift made to God, 'that I will not assist you in any thing.' St. Mark expresses, much after this manner, such reply from children to their parents: 'It is a gift (corban) by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me,' that is 'I have already devoted that to God which you ask of me, and it is no longer mine to give.'

Josephus remarks, that, among the Jews, men and women sometimes made themselves corban; that is, they consecrated themselves to God, or to certain ministries in his service. If they were afterwards desirous of quitting their obligation, they gave to the priest for a man fifty, for a woman thirty shekels; or they agreed with the priest for so much as was satisfactory. Moses speaks of different sorts of corban, or dedications of part of their estates, which was afterwards redeemed, or, if cattle, was sanctified. (Levit. xxvii. 1, 2, 3, &c.) Those who, in the Acts, (xxiii. 12.) vowed neither to eat nor drink till they had killed Paul, in some measure made every thing corban that belonged to them, or every thing, which might supply them with meat and drink.

CORBAN, as it is expressed in the original, (Matt. xxvii. 6.) signifies also the treasury of the temple, where offerings, made in money, were deposited. The Jews taking up the money, which Judas had cast into the temple, after he had betrayed Jesus Christ, scrupled to place it in the treasury of the temple, because it was the price of blood, and as such was esteemed impure.

CORD. To put cords about the reins, to gird one's self with a cord, was a mark of sorrow and humiliation. The servants of Benhadad, king of Syria, presented themselves before the king of Israel, with sackcloth on their loins, and ropes upon their heads, and implored Ahab's clemency. (1 Kings xx. 31, 32.) The cords of the wicked, (Psalm cxxix. 4.) are the snares, with which they catch weak persons. The cords of sin, (Prov. v. 22.) are the consequences of crimes and bad habits; for bad habits are, as it were, indissoluble bands, from which it is almost impossible to extricate ourselves. 'Let us cast away their cords from us;' (Psalm ii. 3.) that is, let us cast off their government, and free ourselves from subjection to their laws, which, like fetters, restrain us from our purposes. To draw iniquity with cords of vanity, (Isai. v. 18.) is to spare no pains or cost in the pursuit of sin. I drew them with the cords of a man, (Hos. xi. 4.) that is, I used fair and gentle means, suitable to the temper of man, to draw them to obedience.

Baruch, (vi. 43.) speaks of a custom among the Babylonians. 'The women with cords about them, sitting in the ways, burn bran for perfume: but if any of them, drawn by some that passeth by, lie with him, she reproacheth her fellow, that she was not thought as worthy as herself, nor her cord broken.' This is explained by Herodotus, who says, that the Babylonian women have a custom of prostituting themselves once in their lives, in honour of Melitta: they stand near the temple of the goddess, with cords about their heads, as marks of their devoting themselves. They are separated from one another by lines; and into these strangers enter, carry off whom they choose, and break the cords.

CORINTH, Κόρινθος, signifies satiety, or fulness; otherwise, ornament. It was a celebrated city, the capital of Achaia, and was situated on the isthmus which separates the Peloponnesus from Attica. This city was one of the best peopled, and most wealthy of Greece. Its situation between two seas drew thither the trade of both the East and West. Its riches produced pride, ostentation, effeminacy, and all vices, the consequences of abundance. In particular, lasciviousness was not only tolerated, but was, in some sort, consecrated there, by the worship of Venus, and the public prostitution of numerous attendants devoted to her. The Corinthians pretended to philosophy, learning, and politeness. This city is chiefly memorable among heathen writers for its citadel, Acro-corinthus, which was so denominated from its being built upon a very high rock; and also for its insolence to the Roman legates, which caused L. Mummius to destroy it. In the burning of it, so many statues of different metals were melted together, that they produced the famous Corinthian brass, which was more esteemed than either gold or silver. It was afterwards restored to its former splendour by Julius Cæsar, and was beautified with pillars, which have been ever since called by the name of the Corinthian order.

A late French writer, who visited this country, thus observes: When the Cæsars rebuilt the walls of Corinth, and the temples of the gods rose from their ruins more magnificent than ever, an obscure architect was rearing in silence an edifice, which remains standing amidst the ruins of Greece. This man, unknown to the great, despised by the multitude, rejected as the offscouring of the world, at first associated with himself only two companions, Crispus and Gaius, with the family of Stephanas. These were the humble architects of an indestructible temple, and the first believers at Corinth. The traveller surveys the site of this celebrated city; he discovers not a vestige of the altars of paganism, but perceives some Christian chapels rising from among the cottages of the Greeks. The apostle might still from his celestial abode, give the salutation of peace to his children, and address them in the words,

'Paul to the church of God, which is at Corinth.'

St. Paul came to Corinth before the end of A.D. 51, or in the beginning of A.D. 52. (Acts xviii. 1.) He lodged with Aquila and his wife Priscilla, who, as well as himself, made tents; and thus he obtained a livelihood by his labour, without being burdensome to any one. He preached in the Jewish synagogues, and converted some. From Corinth he wrote his two Epistles to the Thessalonians, A.D. 52. Observing that the Jews of Corinth, instead of being benefited by his instructions, opposed him with blasphemy, he shook his raiment, and said, 'Your blood be upon your own heads; I am clean: from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles.' He went, therefore, and lodged with Justus, surnamed Titus, a Gentile, but one who feared God; and many of the Gentiles afterwards embraced the faith. Paul suffered much at Corinth; but Jesus Christ said to him, Be not afraid, for I have much people in this city. He continued eighteen months at Corinth, or in its vicinity.

St. Paul left Corinth, A.D. 53 or 54, and went to Jerusalem. From Ephesus he wrote his first Epistle to the Corinthians, in the beginning of A.D. 56. In this Epistle, he reproves some who disturbed the peace of the church; complains of some disorders in their assemblies; of law-suits among them; and of a Christian, who had committed incest with his mother-in-law, the wife of his father. This letter produced in the Corinthians abundant sorrow, great vigilance against the vices reprov'd, and a very beneficial dread of God's anger. They repaired the scandal given, and expressed abundant zeal against the crime committed. (2 Cor. vii. 9, 10, 11.)

Paul having understood the good effects of his first letter among the Corinthians, wrote a second to them, A.D. 57, from Macedonia, and probably from Philippi. He expresses his satisfaction at their conduct, justifies himself, and comforts them. He glories in his suffering, and exhorts them to liberality. Near the end of the year 57, he came again to Corinth, where he stayed about three months, and whence he went to Jerusalem. Just before his second departure from Corinth, he wrote his Epistle to the Romans, probably in the beginning of A.D. 58.

From the words ἔγραψα ὑμῖν ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ, (1 Cor. v. 9.) which in our version is rendered, 'I have written to you in an epistle,' a question of importance has been much agitated, whether St. Paul wrote any other epistles to the Corinthians than those which we now have. From the text it has been inferred, that St. Paul had already written to the Corinthians an epistle, which is no longer extant, and to which he alludes; some contend that by τῇ ἐπιστολῇ, he means only the epistle, which he is writing; and others, that St. Paul refers to an epistle, which he had written, or begun to write, and had not sent, but which he suppressed, on receiving further information from Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, and wrote this, in which he considers the subject more fully. It would appear, however, from the evidence adduced, that St. Paul wrote only the two epistles, which are now extant, and bear his name. Horne's Introduction, vol. iv. p. 374; Lardner's History of the Apostles and Evangelists; Bishop Tomline's Elements, vol. i. p. 360, &c.; Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 259; Chateaubriand's Travels in Greece, Palestine, &c. vol. i. p. 183; Bloomfield's Recensio Synoptica, vol. vi. pp. 341, 342.

CORNARISTS, the disciples of Theodore Cornherf, a sectary of the states of Holland. He wrote at the same time against the Catholics, the Lutherans, and the Calvinists. He maintained that every religious communion needed reformation; but he added, that no person had a right to engage in accomplishing it, without a mission supported by miracles. He was also of opinion, that a person might be a good Christian without being a member of any visible church. Adam's View of Religions, p. 122.

CORNE'LIUS, centurion of a cohort belonging to the legion surnamed Italian. (Acts x. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, &c.) He was a Gentile, but one that feared God, was constant at his devotions, and performed many charitable deeds. His whole family also served God. It pleased the Almighty to favour him, in a miraculous manner, with an introduction to the knowledge of the Gospel. An angel directed him to send for Peter, from whom he might receive instruction. This direction he obeyed; and whilst he and his family were listening to Peter's relation of Gospel truths, the Holy Ghost fell on them, and they were added to the Christian church, as the first-fruits of the Gentiles. See PETER.

Some of the Latins make Cornelius bishop of Cesarea in Palestine: some of the Greeks, bishop of Ilium; and others, of Seepsis.

CORNER, the extremity of any land, country, habit, of the beard and hair, of a people, building, table, altar, &c. 'Ye shall not round the corners of your heads, neither shalt thou mar the corners of thy beard,' says Moses. (Levit. xix. 27.)

In a room fitted up in the East, the place of sitting is a raised kind of settle, which is called the duan or divan, or sofa. Upon this sofa are placed cushions against the wall to lean upon. In this seat, the place of honour is the corner, where two cushions may be used by the person at the same time. 'Thou gavest them kingdoms and nations; and didst divide them into corners.' (Nehemiah ix. 22.) As the shepherd taketh out of the mouth of a lion two legs, or a piece of an ear; so shall the children of Israel be taken out that dwell in Samaria, in the corner of a bed, and in Damascus, in a couch.' (Amos iii. 12.) The corner of a bed, or duan, is the place of honour; the most easy, voluptuous, indulging station. As if the prophet had said, 'Those now most at their ease, shall be delivered to their enemies, like sheep to the lion, and scarcely any of them be rescued from his jaws.' Some writers are of opinion, that what in this passage is rendered in a couch, is much better translated in the margin of our English Bibles, by the bed's feet, the lower or broad part of the divan.

The corner sometimes signifies the most devoted place, the part of the edifice most in sight. Zechariah, (x. 4.) speaking of the tribe of Judah, after their return from the captivity, says, 'Out of him came forth the corner.' This tribe shall afford corners, heads; it shall produce the corner-stone, the Messiah. Corner is also taken for the most retired part of a house. (Prov. xxi. 9.; xxv. 24.) Paul speaking to Agrippa, (Acts xxvi. 26.) of our Saviour, and his resurrection, tells him that these things were not transacted in a corner, but publicly. Harmer's Observations, vol. ii. p. 369; Fragments attached to Calmet's Dict. No. xii. p. 26.

COVENANT. The word testamentum is often used in Latin, and διαθήκη in Greek, to express the Hebrew ברית berith, which signifies covenant; and hence Old and New Testament are improperly used to denote the Old and New Covenant.

Jeremiah, (xxxiv. 18.) mentions a remarkable ceremony not noticed in the historical books of Scripture: the Lord says, 'I will give the men which have not performed the words of the covenant, which they had made before me, when they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof.' When this covenant was sworn to, and on what occasion, is unknown; but it is probable, that it was not long before, since they who had sworn to it were still living. The custom of cutting a victim in two, of putting the several parts upon two different altars, and causing those, who contracted any covenant, to pass between them, is well authenticated in Scripture, and profane authors. (Gen. xv. 9, 10, 17.) The passage in Hebrews, (ix. 16.) which in our translation is rendered testament, &c. may perhaps be illustrated by referring it to such a ceremony. 'Now, where there is a testament, διαθήκη, a covenant,' the death of the testator, διατείνου, the confirmer of the covenant, is necessary: for a testament, 'covenant,' is of no authority while the confirmer of the testament, covenant, 'is living;' that is, while those beasts were not slain, between whose divided parts the persons covenanting were to pass, the covenant wanted the most solemn token of its ratification. Διαθήκη may signify not so much a covenant made between two equal contracting parties, as a proposal made by one party for the other to accept; thus, let him 'take hold of my covenant,' my proposals. (Isa. lvi. 4. Hos. ii. 18. Psalm xxv. 14, &c.)

The first covenant with the Hebrews, is that made when the Lord chose Abraham and his posterity for his people, and gave them circumcision as a mark of his covenant with them. God proposed to Abraham to give him posterity, and to bestow on his posterity the promised land; and Abraham, as a token on his part of accepting the proposal, undertook the obedience of circumcision. A second covenant, or a solemn renewal of this covenant, was made at Sinai, and comprehended all those, who observed the law of Moses. The new covenant, of which Jesus Christ is the mediator and author, and which was confirmed by his blood, comprehends all who believe in him, and are in his church.

The first covenant between God and man, was that made with Adam at his creation, when he was prohibited from eating the forbidden fruit. (Gen. ii. 16.) A second covenant God made with man after his fall, and promised him not only forgiveness, provided he repented, but also a Messiah, who should redeem the human race from the death of sin, and from the second death. (Rom. v. 12. 19.) A third covenant is that, which God made with Noah, when he directed him to build an ark, in which to preserve animals and men, to re-people the world after the deluge. (Gen. vi. 18.) These three covenants were general between Adam and Noah, and their posterity; but that, which God made with Abraham, was limited, and regarded that patriarch only, and his family by Isaac exclusively. (Gen. xii. 1, 2, 3, &c.; xv. 4, 5. 18.) The seal or confirmation of this covenant was the circumcision of all the males of Abraham's family. The effects of this covenant are visible in all parts of the Old Testament; the coming of the Messiah was its consummation and end. The covenant of God with Adam forms what we call the state of nature; that with Abraham, explained farther under Moses, constitutes the law; and that covenant through the mediation of Jesus Christ, forms the law of grace.

We commonly say the Old and New Testament; the covenant between God and the posterity of Abraham, and that which he hath made with believers by Jesus Christ; because these two covenants eminently contain all the rest, which are consequences, branches, or explanations of them. The greatest, most solemn, most excellent, and most perfect of the covenants of God with men, is that made through the mediation of Jesus Christ. This eternal covenant must continue to the end of time; of it the Son of God is the guarantee; it is confirmed with his blood; the end and object of it is eternal life; and its laws and constitutions are infinitely more exalted than those of the Old Testament. Faith, repentance, and a holy and virtuous life, are the conditions, or token on our part. The conditions of this covenant are necessary to purify our nature, and prepare us for happiness. Our eternal felicity absolutely depends on the observance, and our eternal misery infallibly pursues the transgression, of this covenant. It is with the most high God, that we have exchanged promises in this important treaty of peace. This contract cost nothing less than the blood of Christ, the eternal and only begotten Son of God. We ought to consider, that the conditions of this covenant were laws of our own enacting, though God first proposed them to us; and that they are to us truly a law of liberty, because we gave them the force of laws in respect to ourselves, by our own voluntary ratification. God communicates to us the assistance of his Holy Spirit, which 'helps our infirmities,' and enables us, if we are not shamefully wanting to ourselves, to observe and perform the conditions promised on our part. Indeed, he who is comparatively called the righteous man, 'falls seven times a-day;' but he does not, like the reprobate, sin 'through malicious wickedness,' nor fall, except through infirmity; and when he does fall, he rises again in a sincere repentance, and with new resolution. Serm. xiii. in Sermons selected by Mr. Clapham; Tillotson's Sermons, vol. ix. p. 309.

COVETOUSNESS, an immoderate desire of worldly possessions. The worshipping of false gods, or the worshipping of the true God by images or by any other material representations, is idolatry. It is the first and grossest sort of idolatry, of which the covetous man is guilty; for though he has idols of gold and silver, yet he doth not worship the true God by or through these, but he adores the idols themselves, purely and solely on their own account. They are his gods. 'He saith unto gold, thou art my hope, and to the fine gold, thou art my confidence;' for it is in these, and not in Providence, that he placeth his chief support. They constitute the objects of his highest regard, and most tender solicitude. The mere sight of them fills him with joy unspeakable; and his attention to them absorbs every other care. Though he lift up his hands and his eyes to heaven, and in his prayers call loudly on the name of the true God, this is only a mock worship. The god that he adores is that which has his heart, in which he puts his whole trust, which he prefers to every thing besides, and which he 'loves with all his soul, and with all his strength.' Accordingly, our blessed Saviour declares, that we cannot serve two such different masters as God and mammon, or riches; since the services they require from us will often interfere with each other, and 'we must hate the one and love the other, or we must hold to the one and despise the other.'

The dread of some trifling loss, or expense, will make the covetous man neglect many opportunities, which Providence affords him, of promoting the honour of his Maker, and the good of his fellow-creatures; and the hopes of a paltry advantage will engage him in such schemes and measures, as neither justice nor humanity, neither reason nor religion, permit. He will utterly hate every expensive virtue, and meanly attach himself to every gainful vice. In short, what can be expected that is truly great and good, or rather, what is not to be expected that is vile and wicked, from him, who prefers his own sordid views to every other consideration, and who dreads poverty much more than eternal death? Covetousness, however, is not only justly entitled to the imputation of idolatry, but of the worst idolatry, the most obstinate and incurable. Whilst we hear or read of the conversion of whole nations of other idolaters, the worshippers of mammon have been ever deaf to all instruction. Even a voice from heaven has no effect upon them. Penitents of other classes may frequently be met with; but who ever saw or heard of a reformed miser? The extreme difficulty of such a man's repenting is affirmed by our Saviour, who intimates that the extraordinary grace of God is necessary to his repentance.

It may not be improper to suggest a few observations, by which we may discover how far the infection of this sin hath seized upon our hearts. Are our wealth and riches the most frequent and agreeable entertainments of our private thoughts and meditations? Are we transported with an immoderate joy at any increase of our fortunes? Or do we feel as disproportionate a sorrow at any diminution of them? Are we not rigorous exactors of our own rights, and unwilling to forego any trifling advantage to ourselves, though we might by such means perform the most friendly and beneficial act to our neighbour? Do we feel reluctance to any work of charity, to which we contribute nothing, or much less than we are able? Let us consider well the favorite attachments of our hearts, and to what party they would adhere in a contest between God and mammon. Do we find that interest and gain would obtain the superiority over our duty; and that we should choose to hazard our soul rather than our property? According as we discover in our hearts more or fewer of such affections and attachments, we may conclude, that we are more or less inclined to covetousness. Serm. xxxviii. in Sermons selected and abridged by Mr. Clapham.

COUNCIL, sometimes denotes any kind of assembly; sometimes that of the Sanhedrim; and, at other times, a convention of pastors met to regulate ecclesiastical affairs. The assembly of the apostles, &c. at Jerusalem, (Acts xv. 6, 7.) met to determine whether the yoke of the law should be imposed on the Gentile converts, is reputed the first council of the Christian church.

Ecumenical or general councils were composed of commissioners from all the churches in the Christian world, and, therefore, represented the church universal. Of them the Romanists reckon eighteen, Bullinger six, Dr. Prideaux seven, and Bishop Beveridge eight. They were established by the authority of Constantine the Great, the first Christian emperor, who thought it equitable, that questions of superior importance, and such as intimately concerned the interests of Christianity in general, should be examined and decided in assemblies, which represented the whole body of the Christian church. These general councils were as follows:

The first general council was that held in the year 325, at Nice, in Bithynia, whence it derived its name, and was called the council of Nice. The opinions promulgated by Arius, who denied the divinity of Jesus Christ, occasioned the assembling of this council. The tenets of Arius, who was himself present, were deliberated upon for several days. After many severe debates, and violent efforts of the two parties, the council condemned the doctrine of Arius, and declared Christ consubstantial, or of the same essence, with the Father. Arius was banished among the Illyrians: and his followers were obliged to subscribe to the creed, or confession of faith, composed in this council.

The second general council was that convened at Constantinople, in the year 381. In it the heresy of the Macedonians, who denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost, was condemned. One hundred and fifty bishops, who were present at this council, finished what the council of Nice had left imperfect, asserted the divinity of the Holy Ghost, and confirmed, in a full and determinate manner, the doctrine of Three Persons in One God.

The third general council was held at Ephesus, in 431. Anastasius, a friend of Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople, had declaimed warmly against the title of mother of God, which was at this time frequently given to the Virgin Mary, and said that she was rather to be called the mother of Christ, since the Deity can neither be born nor die, and consequently, the Son of Man alone could derive his birth from an earthly parent. These opinions were defended by Nestorius, who was cited before the above council, at which presided his avowed enemy Cyril, bishop of Alexandria. Nestorius, who was judged without being heard, was charged with blasphemy against the Divine Majesty, deprived of his episcopal dignity, and sent into exile, where he died. However, the doctrine established in this council was that which has been generally received, 'that Christ was one divine person, in whom two natures were most closely and intimately united, but without being mixed or confounded.'

The fourth general council was held at Chalcedon, by order of the emperor Marcian, in the year 451. In this council, Eutychus, who had affirmed that there was only one nature in Christ, and who had been already sent into banishment, and deprived of his sacerdotal dignity, by the emperor, was condemned though absent. At the same time, the following doctrine, which is still almost generally received, was inculcated on Christians as an object of belief, 'that in Christ two distinct natures were united in one person, and that without any change, mixture, or confusion.'—These, as they were the first four general councils, so they were by far the most eminent. They were caused respectively by the Arian, Apollinarian, Nestorian, and Eutychian controversies; and their decrees are in high esteem among both Papists and orthodox Protestants.

The fifth general council, and the second of Constantinople, was called in the year 553, by the emperor Justinian. The principal transaction of this council, was the condemnation of the Three Chapters: by these were meant, 1. the books of Theodore, who lived 150 years before, and was said to have led the way to the Nestorian heresy; 2. those of Theodoret against Cyril; and 3. an epistle of Ibis to Maris the Persian, in which the orthodoxy of the council of Ephesus was attacked. Some say, that this council also condemned certain doctrines of Origen; but we do not find this mentioned in any acts of this council. The tenets of Origen, which gave the most offence, were those which considered the Father as greater than the Son, and the Son than the Holy Ghost; those which taught the pre-existence of souls, which Origen believed to be sent into mortal bodies for the punishment of sins committed in a former state of being; the plurality of worlds; that the torments of the damned will have an end; and that as Christ had been crucified in this world to save mankind, he is to be crucified in the next to save the devils.

The sixth general council was held in 680, at Constantinople, and is called the third of that city. This council condemned the heresy of the Monothelites, who maintained that in Christ were two distinct natures, which were so united as to form only one person; that the soul of Christ was endowed with a will or faculty of volition; that this faculty of volition co-operated with the divine will; and though they thus attributed to our Lord two wills, yet they affirmed that in Christ were only one will and one manner of operation.

The seventh general council was called to compose the disputes, which had arisen respecting the worship and use of images, and met at Constantinople, in 754. This council was afterwards convened at Nice, in 786, and is known by the name of the second Nicene council. In this assembly, whilst it sat at Constantinople, the worship and use of images were condemned; but at Nice, through the influence of the Roman pontiff, the decrees of the council of Constantinople were reversed, the worship of images and of the cross were restored, and severe punishments denounced against such as maintained that God was the only object of religious adoration.

The eighth general council was assembled at Constantinople, in 869; and in it the worship of images was confirmed, and the religious disputes between the Latins and the Greeks were concluded, or at least suspended.

The last general council was that held at Trent, for the purpose of checking the progress of the reformation. It first met by the command of pope Paul the Third; it was suspended during the latter part of the pontificate of his successor Julius the Third, and the whole of the pontificates of Marcellus the Second, and Paul the Fourth, that is, from 1552 to 1562. In this last mentioned year it met again by the authority of pope Pius the Fourth; and it ended while he was pope, in 1563.

The first four general councils were summoned by the emperors of the East, whose dominions included the whole, or nearly the whole, of Christendom, and who continued to exercise the same power for several succeeding centuries; but at length the popes of Rome, among other usurpations, assumed to themselves the right of summoning general councils, and the first, which met by their authority, was the first Lateran council, in the year 1123.

A general council composed of men, every one of whom is fallible, must be liable to error; and that they have actually erred is hence sufficiently evident, that different councils have made decrees directly opposite to each other, particularly in the Arian and Eutychian controversies, which were upon subjects immediately 'pertaining unto God.' Indeed, neither the first general councils themselves, nor those who defended their decisions, ever pretended to infallibility. This claim was of a much more recent date, and suited to the dark ages, in which it was asserted and maintained, but is now considered equally groundless and absurd. If God had been pleased to exempt them from a possibility of error, he would have announced that important privilege in his written word; but no such promise or assurance is mentioned in the New Testament. The Scriptures being the only source, from which we can learn the terms of salvation, it follows, as our church observes in her articles, that 'things ordained by general councils as necessary to salvation, have neither strength nor authority, unless it may be declared that they be taken out of Holy Scripture.' It is upon this ground we receive the decisions of the first four general councils, in which we find the truths revealed in the Scriptures, and therefore we believe them. At Nice it was declared that the Son is truly God, of the same substance with the Father; at Constantinople, that the Holy Ghost is also truly God; at Ephesus, that the divine was truly united to the human nature in Christ, in one person; at Chalcedon, that both natures remained distinct, and that the human nature was not lost or absorbed in the divine. We reverence the councils for the sake of the doctrines, which they declared and maintained; but we do not believe the doctrines on the authority of the councils. The deliberations of most councils were disgraced by violence, disorder, and intrigue; and their decisions were usually formed under the influence of some ruling party. Dr. Jortin says, 'they have been too much extolled by Papists, and by some Protestants, they were a collection of men frail and fallible. Some of those councils were not assemblies of pious and learned divines, but cabals, the majority of which were quarrelsome, fanatical, domineering, dishonest prelates, who wanted to compel men to approve all their opinions, of which they themselves had no clear conceptions, and to anathematize and oppress those, who would not implicitly submit to their determinations.'

Provincial councils were very numerous; Baxter enumerates 481, and Dufresnoy many more. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christ. Theology, vol. ii. p. 341, &c.; Jortin's Works, vol. vii. charge 2; Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. pp. 337. 434. 457. 461; ii. p. 93; Gregory's History of the Christian Church, vol. i. p. 305; Du Pin's Hist. vol. iii. p. 11.

COURT. The courts belonging to the temple of Jerusalem were three: first, the court of the Gentiles, because the Gentiles were not allowed to enter farther; second, the court of Israel, because Israelites, if purified, had a right of admission; third, that of the priests, where stood the altar of burnt-offerings, and where the priests and Levites exercised their ministry. Israelites, who offered sacrifices, might bring their victims to the inner part of the court, but could not pass a certain separation, which divided it; and they withdrew as soon as they had delivered their sacrifices and offerings to the priest, or had made their confession, laying their hands on the head of the victim, if it were a sin-offering. See TEMPLE.

Before the temple was built, there was a court around the tabernacle, but not large, and formed only of pillars, and veils hung by cords. See TABERNACLE.

These courts were like those of the Egyptian temples, which were surrounded by large courts with colonnades. The palaces of kings, and of great men, had great courts, as appears from those of Solomon, and of king Ahasuerus. The historian has taken great pains to describe correctly the situation of Esther, when she went and stood within view of king Ahasuerus. 'The queen,' says he, 'stood in the INNER court,' that is, within the third gate of the ambassadors' entrance, as is described by Knolles in his History of the Turks, 'over against the king's house,' where, says Knolles, sat Selimus, the Turkish emperor, 'and the king sat upon his royal throne in the royal house over against the gate (or door) of the house,' so that through the portal of his chamber he could see any person, who approached him, or who was standing in the court adjacent to him.

This disposition of the courts of a royal palace may illustrate the history of the private interview of Isaiah with Hezekiah, (2 Kings xx.) Isaiah having been admitted into the third court, on special business, had scarcely quitted the royal presence, or had gone into the middle court, when he was ordered to return, and revive the dying king. It may also serve to illustrate the history of Peter's denial of Christ; as it shows, that the outer hall mentioned by St. Matthew, (xxvi. 69.) and the lower hall mentioned by St. Mark, (xiv. 66.) are the same; and that Jesus, having been examined in the apartment, in which sat the council, was remanded into the lower or outer hall, where he heard Peter deny him, and whence Peter, after he had received from his divine Master the significant look, retired to a fit place for his penitent weeping. This construction of courts seems to afford ample opportunities for many incidents attending the examination and exposure of Jesus by Pilate: the governor might maintain his dignity by keeping within his palace; the priests satisfy their scruples, by preserving a proper distance from polluting heathens; there might be a terrace, or raised pavement; the priests might fill the courts with their creatures, who were ready to clamour according to their orders; the governor could perceive this management of the priests; and Jesus might be easily brought forth, and Pilate retire.

This idea of an extensive palace may also serve to illustrate the history of the decollation of John the Baptist, as related by Mark, (vi. 21, &c.) Herod, on his birth-day, made a supper to his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee (in the Great Hall of his palace,) into which the daughter of Herodias came, and danced before them: the king was so pleased with her performance, that he sware to give her whatever she would ask. She went forth, slipped away, out of that hall to her mother, who was either close by, or in the harem of the palace; and returning straightway, in haste, before she could be missed by the king, or he could suspect, where she had been for advice, demand[ed] forthwith, instantly, the head of John the Baptist. John, who was in prison, in another part of the palace (a common thing in the East), was slain directly by a person sent by Herod. The whole of this history, therefore, passed in a very rapid manner, was soon over, and was transacted as it were on the very spot. The account, thus understood, agrees more precisely to that of Matthew, (xiv.): the 'pre-instruction' of the daughter, by the mother, becomes perfectly easy; and the words, 'give me here (not presently, but instantly, at the present time) the head of John,' are an entire coincidence. Fragments attached to Calmet's Dictionary, No. 1. p. 97, &c.

CREATION, the producing of something from nothing; and this can be effected by the power of God alone, all other creations being only transformations, or change of shape. The schoolmen observe, that creation from no pre-existing matter may be differently understood. 1. That is said to be created from no pre-existing matter, in the production of which no matter is employed, as an angel. 2. Though matter may be employed in the creation of a thing, yet it may be so created, that both its matter and form shall be produced at the same time, by the same agent. They who deny that God made the chaos, think that the heaven and the earth were created in this manner. 3. Though matter may be the subject in producing a thing, yet that thing may not depend on matter with respect either to its future or present existence; of this nature is the human soul, which, though created in pre-existing matter, is not created from pre-existing matter, but from nothing, and cannot therefore be dependent on matter for existence.

Of the creation of all things, Moses has given a summary account, not in a philosophical manner, but such as to afford the people of the age, in which he wrote, just and affecting notions of this first and most stupendous work of God, so far as was necessary to the purposes of true religion, and no further. It is, therefore, sufficient that his account is true, so far as it goes, and in no respect inconsistent with the most accurate discoveries, which have been made in later ages concerning the system of the universe, or any of its parts. 'In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.' (Gen. i. 1, &c.) The heaven and the earth may comprehend the whole universe, or all things visible and invisible. It does not therefore follow, that the whole universe was created at once, or at some one period of time; but the meaning of Moses is, that at first when the universe was produced, it was brought into existence by the sole power and wisdom of the almighty and eternal God. Though the several parts of the universe may have been produced at different times, and though God may still be creating new worlds in the immense bosom of space, yet the whole universe of beings, whenever created, doth not exist by necessity or chance, but is the production of God. As Moses, however, here gives us a particular account of the formation of our earth, the phrase, in the beginning, may have a special reference to the time when our earth was created. The matter, of which it consists, was produced in the state of a chaos, (ver. 2.) without form and void, that is, shapeless, waste, and useless; all the parts, solids, and fluids, were confounded together, surrounded with darkness, and unadorned and uninhabited. The 'Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters,' that is, the influences and exertions of the divine power actuated this dark confused mass, and digested and reduced its parts to the beautiful state and order, in which we now behold them. On the first day, and the first thing after the production of the chaos, the element of light was created. (ver. 3, 4, 5.) On the second day was created the element of air, or that body of air, which we call the atmosphere, רקיע the firmament, or rather spacious expansion of air, where the fowls do fly. (ver. 20.) This is spread above and around the earth, and includes meteors and clouds, which are the waters above, or at the upper extremity of the atmosphere, in contradistinction to the waters of the sea and rivers, which are under it. (ver. 6, 7, 8.) On the third day, God formed the element of water, by draining off the fluids of the chaos, and causing them to flow into large cavities, prepared to receive them; that the earth might thus become one firm, compact, and voluble globe, and be rendered fit to produce grass, herbs, trees, and plants, which were then created. (ver. 9, 10, 11, 12.) On the fourth day, God created the sun and moon. (ver. 14, 19.) The sun being the centre of our system, it seems probable, that the whole solar system was produced at the same time with the earth, though the design of the writer did not lead him to notice its other parts. But, from the account of Moses, we have no just reason to suppose that the stars, each of which is probably the centre of a distinct system, were all of them created on this day. Most of them might have been created long before, and some of them since our world was brought into existence. For that clause, (ver. 16.) 'he made the stars also,' denotes in the Hebrew only 'and the stars;' and therefore the passage might be rendered, 'the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night with the stars.' Hitherto, our globe, and perhaps the other planets, might, by the power of God, be suspended in the empty space, in a state of rest. But now, when the sun, the centre of our system, was created, and the earth was reduced to a proper state of firmness and solidity, they might be thrown into those regular and rapid motions, around the sun and their own centres, which, by the same power impressed on them, continue to this day; and by their exact periodical revolutions produce that grateful and necessary variety of day and night, spring and summer, autumn and winter. These are effected by the annual and diurnal motions of the earth; and, therefore the annual and diurnal motions might on this day commence. On the fifth day, fish and fowl; and on the sixth day, beasts and man, were created. (ver. 20, &c.)

One difficulty may appear in its being said, that light was created before the sun, because the sun has been supposed to be the sole fountain of light, by emitting luminous particles from its body. But in this Moses may be found a more accurate philosopher than is commonly imagined. Light is a distinct substance from all others, as much as air is from water. By light is not meant that sensation, which we experience in ourselves, on the presence of any illuminated body, but that inconceivably subtle matter, which makes an impression on the organs of sight, and paints on the optic nerve those objects, from the surfaces of which it was reflected to us. Light then, taken in this sense, is a body quite different from the sun, and independent of it, and might have existed before it, as it now does exist when the sun is absent, as well as when present. It is diffused from one end of the creation to the other, traverses the whole universe, forms a communication with the most remote spheres, penetrates into the inmost recesses of the earth, and only waits to be put in a proper motion to render itself visible. Light is to the eye what the air is to the ear. Air may be called the body of sound, and equally exists all around us, though there be no sonorous body to put it in motion. In like manner, the extremely agile particles of light equally extend at all times, from the most distant fixed stars to us, though they do not strike our eyes, till impelled by the sun, or by some other mass of fire. The account of Moses therefore, as to this particular, is agreeable to truth, as well as an useful lesson of caution, when he informs us, that God, and not the sun, was the author and parent of light, and that it was created by his almighty word, before a sun existed to dart it on one part of the earth, and a moon to reflect it on the other.

The account, which Moses has delivered concerning the creation of the world, is short, and suited rather to the capacities of the people he intended to instruct, than to satisfy a philosophical inquirer. It has therefore left room for various explanations, and for several different hypotheses, of which the most remarkable are those of Descartes, Burnet, and Whiston. Descartes has endeavoured to form a fine system of his own, rather than to explain the Mosaic description, and reconcile it with philosophy. He agrees with Epicurus in considering matter and motion as the principles of nature; but he acknowledges the existence of a God, who has created matter, and impressed on it the first motion. After this motion is once commenced, he leaves the vast machine, without any farther assistance from the first impressor, to the laws of mechanism, which affect all things, both celestial and terrestrial. 1. He supposes, that the matter of which the world is composed, being at first of one uniform nature, and infinitely divisible, was actually divided into many particles of a moderate size, which had all such a motion, as is now observed in the world. 2. He thinks that all these particles were not at first spherical, because many such globules will not fill up a continued space, but that whatever might be their original figure, their angles would be cut off, and they become spherical, by their continual motion, and occurrences against each other. 3. He asserts that no space is left empty, and therefore, when these round particles united, leave some intervals between them, he supposes that other less particles arise from the angles cut off, and by the force and celerity of their motion become divided into innumerable lesser fragments, which fill up all the interstices. 4. He supposes, that some of these fragments taken from the angles of the spherical particles, will necessarily possess very angular figures, and, therefore, being less capable of motion, will be apt to unite, and transfer a great part of their motion to such particles as are smaller, and consequently move swifter. He then proceeds to the formation of the world from three elements, consisting of the three kinds of particles above-mentioned. The first element, or the subtle matter, separated from the angles of the greater particles, is that of the sun and fixed stars, and susceptible of a much quicker motion than the two others; the second element consists of the spherical particles themselves, of which the heavens were formed; the third element consists of those angular particles, which are less adapted to motion, and from which proceeded the earth, planets, comets, and other appearances of nature. He supposes that the solar system is a vortex continually turning round, the matter of which, except the earth and planets, is very liquid and transparent, consisting entirely of the first and second elements, and containing a greater quantity of the first than is sufficient to fill the spaces between the particles of the second; and since all bodies, which move in a circular manner endeavour to recede from the centre of their motion, and the more gross and solid parts, such as the particles of the second element, fly off with a greater force than the rest, the particles of the second element must necessarily recede from the common centre, and approach each other as much as their figure and motion will permit. After their interstices, therefore, are filled, the remaining matter of the first element assumes the place left by the second; by which means a mass or heap of the first element settles, and is formed in the middle of the vortex, and this mass we call the sun, and the centre of a vortex. Descartes also supposes, that each of the fixed stars is a sun, and the centre of a vortex. He thinks that the earth was originally such a star, whose vortex adjoined that of the sun, but that it was gradually covered or encrusted with spots, which arose on its surface like the scum on a boiling pot, and which continuing to increase and grow thicker, the star lost its light and activity, and the motion of the celestial vortex around it became more weak, languid, and unable to resist the vigorous encroachments of the sun's vortex. Hence it was at length drawn in, and wholly absorbed by the sun, one of whose satellites it became. Both philosophers and divines have justly objected to the hypothesis of Descartes.

Dr. Burnet, omitting to discuss the origin of the universe, or even of the solar system, as completed long before the Mosaic creation, confines himself to the formation of the earth only, which he supposes to have been produced from a chaos, or confused mass, consisting of the principles of all terrestrial bodies. He is of opinion, that the heaviest and grossest part would sink downwards, towards the middle of the mass, which he supposes to be the centre of gravity, and that being more and more compressed, they would gradually harden, and constitute the interior parts of the earth; that the rest of the mass would also be divided from above by the same principle of gravity into two orders of bodies, the one liquid like water, the other volatile like air, and that the more fine and active parts would mount upwards, and constitute that body we call air; that the grosser parts settled in a mass under the air, on the body of the earth, and composed not only water, strictly so called, but the whole of the liquid bodies belonging to the earth; that as there are two principal kinds of terrestrial liquids, the oily and the light, and those which are more earthy, the oily and light part of this mass would consequently swim on the surface of the other. He proceeds to suppose, that the air was as yet gross, thick, and dark; that the lesser and lighter particles, which remained after the grossest had sunk down by their weight, would naturally descend slowly till they met with the oily liquid on the face of the deep, or on the watery mass, which would stop their progress any farther, and that on mixing with that unctuous substance, they composed a soft and light earth spread on the face of the waters; that this thin and tender orb of the earth continued to increase, till, all the light particles being collected and incorporated with it, it attained a firm and consistent substance, which arose on the face of the chaos, and became an habitable earth, such as nature designed it. The form of this first earth, both external and internal, may be easily conceived from the manner of its creation. Its external form would be smooth, regular, and uniform, without mountains, and without a sea. Its internal form would consist of several regions involving each other, like orbs about the same centre, the water being contained entirely under the upper crust of the earth, which formed a wonderful vault, and was sustained above the deep by its own manner of construction only. To prove that the first earth must have been different from the present, Dr. Burnet endeavours to show, that, if the earth had been in its present form, it would not have been capable of a deluge, which could not have been effected without such an immense quantity of water, as could neither be brought on the earth, nor removed from it; and that the chaos as a fluid body, would naturally and necessarily settle and become every where a smooth surface, not broken into irregularities like our earth, nor imitating its cavities, dens, and holes. He attempts to confirm these arguments by the authority of Scripture, which plainly intimates, he says, a difference in the form and constitution of the old, and of the present world; and by reason of this difference, the former was subject to perish by a deluge, as the latter is by a conflagration. (2 Pet. iii. 5. 7.) Besides, several passages seem to describe the structure of the antediluvian world as founded on the waters, (Psalm xxiv. 2.; cxxxvi. 6.) and as an orb on the face of the deep, (Prov. viii. 27.); conformably to which, on the renovation or restitution of nature to its primæval state, the new earth will appear without a sea. (Rev. xxi. 1.) To these he adds the testimony of ancient tradition, that the world was in the form of an egg. This, says he, was true of the original earth, in respect not only to its outward figure, but also to its inward composition; the central parts being represented by the yolk of an egg, the exterior region of the earth by the shell, and the abyss of water by the white under the shell. Among the many objections that will occur to a philosophic reader against this hypothesis, those which regard the author's laws of gravitation, destroy the whole scheme; for if every thing subsided according to its specific gravity, the earth, which is heavier than the water, must necessarily place itself nearer the centre, and thus leave the waters to cover the face of the whole orb. Nor is the Scriptural account of the antediluvian world less contradictory to this theory, which supposes that the earth in its external form was smooth, regular, uniform, and without mountains; for it is expressly said, (Gen. vii. 19, 20.) that 'the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth, and all the high hills that were under the whole heaven were covered. Fifteen cubits upward did the waters prevail, and the mountains were covered.'

Mr. Whiston not only shows a greater regard to Scripture, but has avoided many difficulties chargeable on the last theorist, and proceeds on more philosophical principles. He first lays down this proposition, that the Mosaic narrative of the creation is not a nice and philosophical account of the origin of all things, but an historical and a true representation of the formation of our earth alone from a confused chaos, and of its successive and visible changes each day, till it became the habitation of mankind. This he proves from the first words of Moses, 'In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth,' which plainly imply that the creation of the universe from nothing, commonly called creation, preceded the work of six days. Moses immediately thence descends to the chaos of our earth, to which he confines himself; and he mentions the formation of the sun and of other celestial bodies, to accommodate his narrative to common apprehension, and render it complete, but chiefly to secure the Jews from worshipping the host of heaven. Mr. Whiston, therefore, supposes that the sun, moon, and stars, had been previously created, and were only rendered visible on the fourth day; that the ancient chaos, the origin of the earth, was the atmosphere of a comet, or an unformed planet in its original state, placed in a very eccentric orbit. To support this proposition, he endeavours to show, that the atmosphere of a comet possesses the several properties recorded of the ancient chaos; that it possesses such other peculiar properties as lay a foundation for some of those phenomena of our earth, which can scarcely be otherwise explained in a philosophical manner; and that no other body, or mass of bodies, will bear a comparison, or can pretend to the same character. He proceeds to suppose, that the six days of the creation are equal to six years; and that a day and a year signify the same before the fall of man, when, as he thinks, the diurnal rotation of the earth about its axis first commenced. This supposition agrees with the letter of Moses, and with some other parts of Scripture, in which a day frequently denotes a year; it allows a convenient time for the works of the creation, which appear to have been regular and gradual, and not accelerated by any miraculous power on every occasion; and it might be still farther strengthened by arguments deduced from the peculiar characters of the state of nature before the fall. On these foundations, Mr. Whiston attempts to account for the formation of the earth, which, he thinks, was not a mere result from any necessary laws of mechanism, independent of the Divine power, but the effect of the interposition of God, and always under his peculiar care; and that God not only created the matter, of which the universe, and particularly the earth, was to consist, from a non-existent state, and endued it with its several properties and powers, but that he interposed more particularly in the formation of the earth, by changing the course and orbit of the chaos into that of a planet, by immediately forming the seeds of all animals and vegetables, by ordering every distinct day's work to be completed in its proper period, and principally in the creation of our first parents. At the time immediately preceding the creation of six days, the face of the abyss, or superior regions of the chaos, were involved in thick darkness, agreeably to the nature of a comet, which is represented as containing a central, solid, hot body, of many hundred or thousand miles in diameter; and also a very large fluid, or heterogeneous mass, or congeries of bodies, in a rare, separate, and expanded condition, the diameter of which was ten or eleven times as large as that of the central solid, and which is the atmosphere or chaos itself. On the change of the comet from a very eccentric to a moderately elliptic orbit, the commencement of the Mosaic creation, and the influence of the Divine Spirit, all things would assume their respective places, and every species of bodies rank themselves according to the laws of specific gravity. By this means, the mass of dense fluids, which composed one part of the entire chaos, and were heavier than the masses of earth, water, and air, would descend with the greatest velocity, and elevate the masses enclosed among them. This must distinguish the chaos into two distinct regions: the lower and larger would be a collection of dense and heavy fluids, or a vast abyss immediately encompassing the central solid; the higher and lesser, a collection of earthy, watery, and aerial parts, confusedly mixed, and encompassing the great abyss. This Mr. Whiston considers as the state of darkness, since the collecting of those opaque bodies, which had hitherto floated in the immense atmosphere, would consequently more exclude the sun's rays. Among other objections to this theory, Dr. Keil observes, that it is a paradox to say, that the diurnal rotation of the earth did not commence till after the fall, and that till that period the days and years were exactly the same. If we consider the extreme cold which must have been occasioned by the absence of the sun during one half of the year, and the intense heat during the other, we must acknowledge, that these immoderate degrees of heat and cold would be pernicious to the antediluvian plants and animals, unless their bodies were of a very different construction from what they are at present. Nor is there any necessity to lengthen a day into a year, for the sake of a regular and gradual formation, without precipitation or acceleration, since an almighty agent is acknowledged to be concerned. The primitive chaos could not be the atmosphere of a comet, which is not an obscure, but a bright, pellucid fluid, in consequence of the intense heat of the central solid; and by the comet's near approach to the sun, the greatest part of the bodies, which compose the upper stratum of the earth, would have been vitrified. It is pretty certain that, at the time of the Mosaic creation, the moon was formed, or at least placed in its orbit, and made to turn round the sun; for no comets have any secondary planets, and, therefore, more must be meant by Moses than merely rendering the moon visible. Besides, the word made is equally applied to both the sun and moon, and therefore ought in both places to be understood in the same, that is, in a literal sense.

Professor Jameson, one of the most profound geologists and practical philosophers of the present day, observes, that 'the structure of the earth, and the mode of distribution of extraneous fossils or petrifications, are so many direct evidences of the truth of the Scripture account of the formation of the earth; and they might be used as proofs of its author having been inspired; because the mineralogical facts discovered by modern naturalists were unknown to the sacred historian. Even the periods of time, the six days of the Mosaic description, are not inconsistent with our theories of the earth.' Nor are the phenomena of the heavenly bodies at all contradictory to the Mosaic history. Modern opposers of revelation have objected (as has been already noticed,) that the historian talks of light before there was any such thing as the sun, and calls the moon a great light, when every one knows it to be an opaque body. But Moses seems to have known what philosophy did not till very lately discover, that the sun is not the original source of light, and, therefore, he does not call either the sun or the moon a great light, though he represents them both as great luminaries or light-bearers. Had these objectors looked into a Hebrew, Greek or Latin Bible, they would have found that the word which in Gen. i. 3, our translators have properly rendered light, is different from that which in the fourteenth verse they have improperly rendered light also. In the third verse the original word is אור aur, the Greek φῶς, and the Latin Vulgate lux; in the fourteenth verse the corresponding words are מֵאֲרֹת, (mart) φωστῆρες, and luminaria. Each of the former set of words means that subtle elastic matter, to which in English we give the name of light; each of the latter, the instruments, or means, by which light is transmitted to men. But surely the moon is as much an instrument of this kind, as the reflector placed behind the lamp of a light-house, for the purpose of transmitting to the mariner at sea the light of that lamp, which would otherwise have passed in an opposite direction to the land. Though the moon is not a light in itself, yet is that planet a light in its effects, as it reflects the light of the sun to us. And both the sun and moon are with propriety called great,—not as being absolutely greater than all other stars and planets, but because they appear greater to us, and are of greater use and consequence to this world. Even now, after all our improvements in philosophy and astronomy, we still speak of the light of the moon, as well as of the sun's motion, rising and setting; and the man, who in a moral, theological, or historical discourse, should use a different language, would only render himself ridiculous.

Moses represents the earth at first in a state of fluidity. 'The Spirit of God,' says he, 'moved upon the face (or surface) of the waters.' (Gen. i. 2.) The apostle Peter also speaks of the earth as being formed out of a fluid. The earth standing out of the water (or more correctly, consisting of water), and in the midst of the water.' The Brachmins, Indian philosophers, also agreed that the world was made of water; and Thales, one of the seven wise men, and the wisest of them all, as Cicero informs us, said, that all things were made out of water. Others after him taught the same doctrine; and is it in the least degree contradicted or disproved by modern discoveries. On the contrary, the present form of the earth demonstrates the truth of the Mosaic account. It is well known that if a soft or elastic globular body be rapidly whirled round on its axis, the parts on the poles will be flattened, and the parts on the equator, midway between the north and south poles, will be raised up. This is precisely the shape of our earth; it has the figure of an oblate spheroid, a figure bearing a close resemblance to that of an orange. Now, if the earth was ever in a state of fluidity, its revolution round its axis must necessarily induce such a figure, because the greatest centrifugal force must necessarily be near the equatorial parts, and, consequently, there the fluid must rise and swell most. It has been demonstrated by admeasurement, that the earth is flattened at the poles, and raised at the equator. This was first conjectured by Sir Isaac Newton, and afterwards confirmed by M. Cassini and others, who measured several degrees of latitude at the equator and near the north pole, and found that the difference perfectly justified Sir Isaac Newton's conjecture, and consequently confirmed the Mosaic account. The result of the experiments instituted to determine this point, proved, that the diameter of the earth at the equator is greater by more than twenty-three and a half miles, than it is at the poles. Thus do the Scriptures and philosophy agree together, and confirm each other. The Scriptures assert that the earth was in a state of fluidity; and philosophy evinces that it must have been in such a state from its very figure.

Philo, Origen, St. Austin, Procopius, and some modern writers, maintain, that God created at once not only the earth, but the whole world, by a single word, without waiting for the term of six days; that the account Moses gives of the creation, and of the distribution of the Creator's works, is not a succession of time, but of order; and that the intention of Moses was to render the subject intelligible to the people, and to afford them a distinct notion of the material creation, by dividing it into parts, and a certain disposition or order. Horne's Introduction, vol. ii. pp. 554—556; Dr. Adam Clarke's Commentary on Gen. i. 10; Watson's Theolog. Tracts, vol. i. p. 18, &c.

CRETE, Κρήνη, signifies carnal, or fleshy in Hebrew, the Isle of the Caphtorim, Cre-tim, or Kerethians. Crete is an island in the Mediterranean, and is now called Candia. Paul sent Titus, his beloved disciple, to Crete, and in an Epistle to him, charges him to rebuke the people severely, and in strong terms, to prevent their adherence to Jewish fables, human ordinances, and legal observances. He adds, that the Cretans, as one of their own prophets, (or poets,) witnesses, 'are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies.' (Titus i. 12, 13.) This Cretan poet is Epimenides. See CAPHTOR.

CROSIERS, or CROSS-BEARERS, an order in the church of Rome, founded in honour of the discovery of the cross, upon which our Saviour suffered, by Helena, mother of Constantine the Great. Till of late, they were to be found in several parts of Europe. They wore a cross of red cloth on their breasts. Before the reformation, they had several houses in England, in particular one in London, on the spot now called Crutched-friars, which ought to be denominated Crossed-friars. The superior of this order received episcopal ordination, and wore a mitre, with a golden cross, in the same manner as a bishop. Hurd on Religious Rites, &c. p. 214.

CROSS, a kind of gibbet made of pieces of wood placed crosswise, whether crossing at right angles, at the top like a T, or in the middle like an X. The cross, upon which our Saviour died, was of the former kind, or rather it represented a line crossing another at right angles, and transversing it thus, †. In this manner it is described in old documents, on the coins of the emperor Constantine, &c.; and St. Jerom compares it to a bird flying, to a man swimming or praying with his arms extended, like a cross with the head piece above the transverse beam.

The death of the cross was the most dreadful of all others, both for the shame and pain of it; and it was so scandalous, that it was inflicted as the last mark of detestation on the vilest persons. It was the punishment of robbers and murderers, provided they were also slaves; but if they were free, and had the privileges of the city of Rome, crucifixion was thought a prostitution of that honour, and too infamous a punishment for any one, whatever were his crimes. The form of a cross being such as has been already described, the body of the criminal was fastened to the upright piece, by nailing to it the feet, and on the transverse beam, commonly by nailing the hands on each side. As these parts of the body are the instruments of action and motion, they are provided by nature with a much greater number of nerves than others; and as all sensation is performed by the spirit contained in these nerves, it will follow, as Stanhope observes, that wherever they abound, the sense of pain must in proportion be more quick and tender.

The Jews confess that they crucified people, but not whilst living. They say, they first put them to death, and then fastened them to a cross, either by the hands or neck; but there are indisputable proofs of their frequently crucifying men alive.

The worshippers of Baal-peor (Numb. xxv. 4.) and the king of Ai (Josh. viii. 20.) were hanged alive; as were also the descendants of Saul, who were put into the hands of the Gibeonites. (2 Sam. xxi. 9.) Before crucifixion, the criminal was generally scourged with cords; sometimes small bones, or pieces of bones, were tied to these scourges, that the condemned person might suffer more severely. It was also a custom, that he, who was to be crucified, should bear his cross to the place of execution. After this manner, we find Christ was compelled to bear his cross; and as he sunk under the burden, Simon the Cyrenian was constrained to carry it after him, and with him. It is generally supposed, that our Lord bore the whole cross, that is, both the long and transverse parts; but this seems impossible, and therefore Lipsius, in his treatise De Supplicio Crucis, tells us, that he carried only the transverse beam, and that the long beam, or body of the cross, was either already fixed in the ground, or ready for that purpose when the criminal came. Hence he observes, that painters are very much mistaken in their description of our Saviour carrying the whole cross.

There were several modes of crucifying. Sometimes the criminal was crucified upon a tree, and fastened to it with cords. Sometimes he was crucified with his head downwards; and this was the way St. Peter chose from respect to his master Jesus Christ, not thinking himself worthy to be fixed to a cross in the same manner as he had been. The common way of crucifying was by fastening the criminal with nails, one at each hand, and one at both his feet, or one at each foot; for this was not always the same. The ancients represent Jesus Christ as crucified sometimes with four, and sometimes with three nails. The criminal was crucified quite naked; and in all probability the Saviour of the world was not used with any greater tenderness than others, who suffered this punishment. The text of the Gospel, (John xx. 25. Luke xxiv. 39.) clearly shows, that Jesus Christ was fastened to the cross with nails; and the Psalmist, (Psalm xxii. 16.) had long before foretold, that they should pierce his hands and his feet.

Sometimes, those, who were fastened upon the cross, lived long in that condition. St. Andrew is believed to have lived three days upon it; others, nine days. Eusebius speaks of certain martyrs in Egypt, who were kept upon the cross till they were starved to death. Pilate was amazed that Jesus Christ died so soon, because naturally he must have lived longer, (Mark xv. 44.) if he had not possessed the power of laying down his life, and of taking it again. The thighs of the two thieves were broken, to hasten their death, that their bodies might not remain upon the cross on the sabbath-day, and to comply with the law, which forbade the bodies to hang after sun-set. Among other nations, they were suffered to continue a long time, and sometimes till they were devoured alive by birds and beasts of prey. Guards were appointed to observe that none should take them down, and bury them. The Roman soldiers, who had crucified Jesus Christ and the two thieves, kept guard near the crosses till the bodies were taken down.

Our Saviour says, that his disciples must take up his cross and follow him, (Matt. xvi. 24.); that is, they must readily submit to any afflictions which God lays upon them, or to any sufferings that befall them in the service of God. Cross is also used for the whole of Christ's sufferings from his birth to his death, but especially for those upon the tree.

Soon after the death of St. John, the last of the apostles, the primitive Christians began to take some notice of the cross; for they signed every person at baptism with it, and prayed with their arms folded in the manner of a cross. These ceremonies, however, were not carried farther, till towards the middle of the fourth century, when Christianity received the sanction of the civil power, and its priests were laden with honours. During the reign of Constantine the Great, his mother Helena, supposed to have been a courtesan, and much addicted to superstition, went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, where it is pretended she found the real cross, upon which our Saviour suffered. Her son, the emperor, ordered the figure of the cross to be stamped on his coins, displayed on his standards, and painted on his shields, helmets, and crown; but it does not appear that it was set up in churches till some years after. The great universal council, held at Constantinople towards the close of the seventh century, decreed, that Jesus Christ should be painted in a human form upon the cross, in order to represent, in the most lively manner, to all Christians, the sufferings and death of Christ. In memory of the empress Helena's finding the cross, a solemn festival was instituted by pope Gregory the Great, in the sixth century; and it is observed in all Roman Catholic countries on the third of May. Another festival is observed in honour of the cross, on the fourteenth of September, and was occasioned by the following event:—In the reign of Heraclitus, the Greek emperor, Cosroes, king of Persia, plundered Jerusalem, and took away that part of the cross which Helena had left there, but which Heraclitus having recovered, it was carried by him in great solemnity to Mount Calvary, whence it had been taken. Many miracles were said to have been wrought on this occasion: and the festival in memory of it is called the Exaltation of the Cross. The number of cru-cifixes used by the Roman Catholics in churches, on the highways, in the market-places, in private houses, &c. is almost incredible. Hurd's History of Religious Rites, &c. p. 235, &c.

CROWN, an ornament frequently mentioned in Scripture, the use of which was very common among the Hebrews. The high-priest wore a crown about his mitre, or the lower part of his bonnet, tied behind his head. It would seem that private priests, and even common Israelites, wore a sort of crown: God commands Ezekiel not to take off his crown (tire), nor assume the marks of mourning. (Ezek. xxiv. 17, 23.) This crown was a ribbon, or fillet, which surrounded the head; it was a custom practised by others in the East, who wore upon their heads merely such a fillet or ribbon, which differed only in colour and value from the diadems of princes. When Moses commands the Israelites to bind the words of the law on their hands, and between their frontlets, he intimates the use of crowns and bracelets among them. (Deut. vi. 8.)

Newly married people of both sexes wore crowns, which were richer and more beautiful than those commonly used. (Isaiah lxi. 10. Cant. iii. 11.) On festival and other joyful occasions, it was customary to wear crowns of flowers.

The crown, mitre, and diadem, royal fillet, and tiara, are frequently confounded. Crowns were bestowed on gods, kings, and princes, as marks of dignity. David took the crown from the god Moloch, or Milcom, which was of gold, and enriched with jewels, and placed it on his own head, (1 Chron. xx. 2. 2 Sam. xii. 30.) or rather, he held it suspended over his head, for it weighed a talent; unless he took out the jewels for his own crown. In our translation of the Bible, it is said that he took the crown from the head of the king of the Ammonites; but it seems impossible that a man could carry the weight of a talent upon his head. Besides, it is not probable that the king of Rabbah would present himself before David, wearing this immense crown. There is also an error in the rendering of the precious stones, which ought to be stone, the word in the original not being in the plural, but in the singular number. The passage in 1 Chron. xx. 2. may be thus analyzed: 'And David took the crown (otherot) off (not Melecum, their king, but) Milcom, the deity which they worshipped, (quasi Molec-um their Molec, or Moloch) from off his head, that is, from the head of the image, which wore it; and found its weight to be a talent of gold; and in it the precious aben (stone as usually understood), and it was upon the head of David.' This meaning of the passage is confirmed by a medal, which describes the god Milcom or Moloch, wearing such a crown. Fragments attached to Calmet's Dictionary, No. cclxxxii. p. 184.

The Amalekite, who valued himself on killing Saul, brought that prince's diadem or fillet to David. (2 Sam. i. 10.) The diadem was placed upon the head of the young king Josiah, when he was presented to the people. (2 Chron. xxiii. 11.) Baruch (vi. 9.) says, that the idols of the Babylonians wore golden crowns. Queens also among the Persians wore diadems. (Esth. ii. 17.) God says, that he had put a crown of gold upon the head of the Jewish nation, which is represented as his spouse, (Ezek. xvi. 12.) Kings sometimes used several diadems, when they possessed several kingdoms. St. John, (Rev. xix. 12.) speaking of Christ's governing the affairs of his church, says, that 'on his head were many crowns; which denotes his absolute sovereignty and many triumphs. Pilate's guards set a crown of thorns upon the head of Jesus Christ, with intention to insult him under the character of the king of the Jews, (Matt. xxvii. 29.); but it is unknown of what species of thorn this crown was composed.

Crown, figuratively understood, signifies honour, joy: 'Ye are my joy and my crown,' says St. Paul to the Philippians, (iv. 1.) Crown is also used for reward, because conquerors in the public games were crowned with wreaths, garlands, &c.

CRUSADES, or CROISADES, was a name given to the holy wars carried on against the infidels for the conquest of Palestine. These expeditions were distinguished in the French language by the name of croisades, and all who embarked in them were called croises, or cross-bearers; not only because the design of these holy wars was to wrest the cross of Christ from the hands of the infidels, but also on account of the consecrated cross of red or other colour, which every soldier wore upon his breast or right shoulder.

In the tenth century, the European kings and princes formed the project of a holy war against the Mahometans, who were masters of Palestine. They considered it as an intolerable reproach to Christians, that the land, in which the divine Author of their religion had received his birth, exercised his ministry, and made expiation for the sins of men, should be abandoned to the enemies of the Christian profession. They also thought it highly just, and suited to the majesty of the Christian religion, to avenge the calamities and injuries, the persecution and reproach, which its professors had suffered under the Mahometan yoke. Accordingly, towards the conclusion of the tenth century, the bloody signal was given by the Roman pontiff, Silvester II. who wrote an epistle, in the name of the church of Jerusalem, to the church universal throughout the world, in which the European powers were solemnly exhorted and entreated to succour and deliver the Christians in Palestine. This exhortation, however, failed in producing the desired effect.

From the time of Silvester II. the popes were employed in forming plans for extending the limits of the church of Asia, and especially for expelling the Mahometans from Palestine; but the troubles, in which Europe was so long involved, prevented the execution of these arduous designs. Gregory VII., the most enterprising pontiff that ever filled the apostolic chair, animated and inflamed by the complaints, which the Asiatic Christians made of the cruelty of the Saracens, resolved to undertake in person a holy war for the deliverance of the church; and upwards of fifty thousand men were already mustered to follow him in this bold expedition. But his quarrel with the emperor Henry IV., and other unforeseen occurrences, obliged him to lay aside his intended invasion of the Holy Land. The project, however, was renewed towards the conclusion of the eleventh century, by the enthusiastic zeal of an inhabitant of Amiens, who was known by the name of Peter the Hermit, and who suggested to the Roman pontiff, Urban II., the means of accomplishing what had been unfortunately suspended. In a journey which Peter made through Palestine, in 1093, he had observed with inexpressible anguish the vexations and persecutions, which the Christians, who visited the holy places, suffered from the barbarous and tyrannic Saracens. Inflamed, therefore, with indignation and zeal, which he considered as the effect of a divine impulse, he implored the assistance of Simeon, patriarch of Constantinople, and Urban II., but without success. Far from being discouraged by this, he renewed his efforts, and went through all the countries of Europe, exhorting all Christian princes to draw the sword against the tyrants of Palestine. With a view to engage the superstitious and ignorant multitude in his cause, he carried about with him a letter, which he affirmed was written in heaven, and addressed to all true Christians to animate their zeal for the deliverance of their brethren who groaned under the burthen of a Mahometan yoke.

The minds of the people being thus prepared by the exhortations of the hermit, a grand and numerous council was assembled by Urban at Placentia, A.D. 1095; and the pontiff warmly recommended, for the first time, the sacred expedition against the infidel Saracens. But notwithstanding the presence of the emperor's legates, this arduous enterprise was far from being approved by the greatest part of this numerous assembly. Though disappointed at Placentia, Urban renewed his proposal for a holy war in a council, which was afterwards assembled at Clermont, where he himself was present. The pompous and pathetic speech, which he delivered on the occasion, made a deep and powerful impression on the minds of his auditors, especially of the French, whose natural character renders them much superior to the Italians, in encountering difficulties, facing danger, and attempting the execution of the most perilous designs. An incredible multitude, among whom were many persons of rank, devoted themselves to the service of the cross, which was made the symbol of the expedition, and which, worked in red worsted, was worn on the breasts or shoulders of the adventurers. Every motive was used by the court of Rome to increase the numbers. A plenary indulgence was proclaimed in the council of Clermont to all those who should enlist under the cross, and a full absolution of all their sins.

The 15th of August, A.D. 1096, had been fixed in the council of Clermont, for the departure of the pilgrims: but the day was anticipated by a thoughtless and needy crowd of plebeians. Early in the spring, from the confines of France and Lorraine, above sixty thousand of the populace of both sexes flocked round the first missionary of the crusade, and pressed him with clamorous importunity to lead them to the holy sepulchre. The hermit, assuming the character, without the talents or authority of a general, impelled or obeyed the forward impulse of his votaries along the banks of the Rhine and the Danube. Their wants and number soon compelled them to separate; and his lieutenant, Walter the Pennyless, a valiant though needy soldier, conducted a vanguard of pilgrims, whose condition may be determined from the proportion of eight horsemen to fifteen thousand foot. The example and footsteps of Peter were closely followed by another fanatic, the monk Godescal, whose sermons had drawn fifteen or twenty thousand peasants from the villages of Germany. The rear of these was pressed by a herd of two hundred thousand, the most stupid and savage refuse of the people, who mingled with their devotion a brutal licence of rapine, prostitution, and drunkenness. Some counts and gentlemen, at the head of three thousand horse, attended the motions of the multitude to partake in the spoil. Of this rabble, more than two-thirds were killed by the Hungarians, &c. during their journey. The remainder who escaped to Constantinople, were overwhelmed in the plains of Nice, by the Turkish arrows; and from the beginning to the end of this expedition, 300,000 perished, before a single city was rescued from the Infidels, and even before their graver and more noble brethren had completed their preparations.

The armies, which were conducted by illustrious commanders, distinguished by their birth and military endowments, arrived more happily at the capital of the Grecian empire. That which was commanded by Godfrey of Bouillon, duke of Lorraine, who deserves a place amongst the greatest heroes, whether of ancient or modern times, and by his brother Baldwin, was composed of eighty thousand well-chosen troops, horse and foot, and directed its march through Germany and Hungary. Another, which was headed by Raimond, earl of Toulouse, passed through the Sclavonian territories. Robert earl of Flanders, Robert Duke of Normandy, Hugo, brother to Philip I. king of France, embarked their respective forces in a fleet, which was assembled at Brindisi and Tarento, whence they were transported to Durazzo, anciently Dyrrachium. These armies were followed by Boemond, duke of Apulia and Calabria, at the head of a chosen and numerous body of valiant Normans. This army was the greatest, and apparently the most formidable, that had been known in the memory of man. The first successful enterprise, which was formed against the Infidels, was the siege of Nice, the capital of Bithynia. This city was taken in the year 1097, and the victorious army thence proceeded into Syria, and, in the following year, subdued Antioch, which, with its fertile territory, was granted by the assembled chiefs to Boemond, duke of Apulia. Edessa fell next into the hands of the victors, and became the property of Baldwin, brother to Godfrey of Bouillon. The conquest of Jerusalem, which, after a siege of five weeks, submitted to their arms in the year 1099, seemed to crown their expedition with the desired success. In this city were laid the foundations of a new kingdom, at the head of which was placed the famous Godfrey, whom the army saluted king of Jerusalem, with an unanimous voice.

The new kingdom of Jerusalem, which had been thus erected by the holy warriors, appeared at first to flourish considerably, and to rest on firm and solid foundations; but this prosperous scene was transitory, and was soon succeeded by the most terrible calamities and desolations. The Mahometans, who had recovered from their first surprise, collected troops, and harassed and exhausted the Christians by incessant invasions and wars. In the most desponding strain, the Christians implored the assistance of the European princes, and requested a fresh army to support their tottering empire in the Holy Land. A new expedition was the subject of long deliberation, and its expediency was strenuously debated in both the cabinets of princes and the assemblies of the clergy and the people. At length, through the eloquence of Bernard, the celebrated abbot of Clairval, a man of the boldest resolution and of the greatest authority, these disputes were terminated under the pontificate of Eugenius III. This eloquent and zealous ecclesiastic preached the cross with much ardour and success. In the grand parliament assembled at Vezelai, in 1146, at which Lewis VII. king of France, his queen, and a prodigious concourse of the nobility, were present, Bernard recommended this holy expedition with such persuasive powers, and declared with such assurance that he had a divine commission to foretell its glorious result, that the king, the queen, and all the nobles, immediately put on the military cross, and prepared themselves for the voyage to Palestine. The orator next directed his exhortations to Conrad III. emperor of Germany, who, after some hesitation, complied with his fervent solicitations; and such was the pathetic vehemence of the tone and gestures of the indefatigable Bernard, that a phlegmatic people, who were ignorant of his language, were induced to follow their sovereign to the fields of Palestine. The nobles of France and Germany were animated by the example and presence of their sovereigns; and, in 1147, Lewis VII. and Conrad III. were followed by armies which might have claimed the conquest of Asia. Their united cavalry was composed of seventy thousand knights, and their attendants; and the whole number, including women and children, is computed to have amounted to at least four hundred thousand souls. As it was impossible to procure necessaries for such numbers in the countries through which they were to pass, each army pursued a different road. But before their arrival in the Holy Land, the greater part of their forces were melted away, and perished miserably, by famine, by the sword of the Mahometans, by shipwreck, or by the perfidious cruelty of the Greeks. In 1149, the two princes led back into Europe the miserable remnant of troops that had survived the disasters they had encountered in this expedition. Such was the unhappy issue of the second crusade, which was rendered ineffectual by a variety of causes, but more particularly by the jealousies and divisions, which distracted the Christians in Palestine.

In 1187, Saladin, viceroy, or rather sultan of Egypt and Syria, took prisoner Guy of Lusignan, king of Jerusalem; and in the same year, he reduced Jerusalem itself, which he filled with carnage and desolation. At the instigation of the Roman pontiff, the third expedition was undertaken, in 1189, by Frederic I. surnamed Barbarossa, emperor of Germany. This prince marched a prodigious army through several Grecian provinces into the Lesser Asia, whence, after having defeated the sultan of Iconium, he penetrated into Syria. His valour and conduct promised successful campaigns to his army; but he, by an unhappy accident, lost his life in the river Saleph, which runs through Seleucia. His son Frederic, who succeeded to the command, died in 1191 of a pestilential disorder, which destroyed the greatest part of the troops. The example of Frederic Barbarossa was followed, in the year 1190, by Philip Augustus, king of France, and Richard I. king of England. These two monarchs proceeded from their respective dominions with a considerable number of ships of war and transports, arrived in Palestine in the year 1191, each at the head of a separate army, and were successful in their first encounters with the Infidels. After the reduction of the strong city of Acre or Ptolemais, the French monarch returned into Europe, in the month of July, 1191. However, the king of England pursued the war, exhibited daily marks of heroic intrepidity and military skill, and not only defeated Saladin in several engagements, but rendered himself master of Yaffa (Jaffa, or Joppa) and Cæsarea. In 1192, Richard concluded with Saladin a truce of three years, three months, and as many days, and evacuated Palestine with his army. Such was the issue of the third expedition against the Infidels, which exhausted England, France, and Germany, of both men and money, without producing any solid advantage, or giving even a favourable turn to the affairs of the Christians in the Holy Land.

The Roman pontiffs employed their most zealous and assiduous efforts in support of the Christian cause in Palestine, which was now in a most declining, or rather in a desperate state. Innocent III. sounded the charge; but the greater part of the European princes and nations were deaf to the voice of the holy trumpet. However, after many unsuccessful attempts in different countries, a number of the French nobility entered into an alliance with the republic of Venice, and set sail for the east, with an army which was far from being formidable. The French and Venetians, instead of steering their course towards Palestine, sailed directly for Constantinople, and, in the year 1203, took that imperial city by storm. The next year, they elected Baldwin, Count of Flanders, emperor of the Greeks; and this empire of the Franks at Constantinople continued till A.D. 1261. The event of the fourth crusade did not, therefore, equal the expectations of the Roman pontiff.

In 1223, the emperor Frederic II., after having been excommunicated, on account of his delay, by Pope Gregory IX., proceeded, with a small train of attendants, to the troops, who expected his arrival in Palestine. No sooner, however, did the emperor reach that disputed kingdom, than, partly from the discord of the Mahometans, and partly from their personal esteem for him, he turned all his thoughts towards peace; and he was enabled to conclude an advantageous treaty with the sultan of Egypt in the following year. By this treaty, he obtained possession of the city and kingdom of Jerusalem, of Tyre and Sidon; and entering into the holy city with unparalleled pomp, and accompanied by a numerous train, he placed the crown upon his head with his own hands. Having regulated with much prudence and moderation the governments of Palestine, Frederick returned into Italy; and, notwithstanding all the reproaches cast upon the emperor by the pope and his agents, the fifth crusade was by far the most successful expedition that had hitherto been undertaken against the infidels.

The sixth crusade was undertaken by Lewis IX., king of France, in consequence of a vow which that prince had made in the year 1248, when he was seized with a painful and dangerous sickness. In 1249, Lewis embarked for Egypt with a numerous army, and a formidable fleet, and took the celebrated city of Damietta. However, the progress of the war presented one uniform scene of calamity and desolation. The united horrors of famine and pestilence overwhelmed the royal army; and Lewis, with two of his brothers, and the greater part of his troops, was taken prisoner by the Mahometans. This pious and valiant monarch was ransomed at an immense expense, and, in 1254, returned into France with a handful of men, the miserable remains of his formidable army.

The seventh and last crusade was undertaken by the same prince, who fitted out a formidable fleet, with which he set sail for Africa, and made himself master of the fort of Carthage. Soon after, a pestilential disease broke out in the fleet, in the harbour of Tunis, carried off the greatest part of the army, and, at length, seized the monarch himself, who fell a victim to its rage, in the year 1270. Lewis was the last of the European princes who embarked in the holy war; the dangers and difficulties, the calamities and disorders, and the enormous expenses, which accompanied each crusade, disgusted the most zealous, and discouraged the most intrepid promoters of these fanatical expeditions. In consequence of this, the Latin empire in the East declined with rapidity; and, notwithstanding the efforts of the Roman pontiffs, it was entirely overthrown in the year 1291.

These holy wars were not less prejudicial to the cause of religion, and the true interests of the Christian church, than to the temporal concerns of men. One of the first and most pernicious effects was the enormous augmentation of the influence and authority of the Roman pontiffs. They also contributed, in various ways, to enrich the churches and monasteries with daily accessions of wealth, and to open new sources of opulence to all the sacerdotal orders. Those who assumed the cross, disposed of their property as if they were at the point of death, and left a considerable part of their possessions to the priests and monks, with a view of obtaining, by these pious legacies, the favour and protection of the Almighty in their new undertaking. Such of them as had been engaged in suits of law with the priests and monks, renounced their pretensions, and submissively resigned whatever had been the subject of debate; and those who had possessed themselves of the churches or convents, or heard of any injury, which had been committed against the clergy by the remotest of their ancestors, made the most liberal restitution, or the most ample satisfaction, by rich and costly donations to the church. Whilst whole legions of bishops and abbots girded the sword on their thigh, and proceeded as generals, volunteers, or chaplains, into Palestine, the priests and monks, who had lived under their jurisdiction, and were awed by their authority, felt themselves released from restraint, and lived without order or discipline. The list of pretended saints was also greatly augmented; and the greatest impositions arose from the importation of an immense quantity of relics by the adventurers in the crusades. However, something was eventually gained in science, and something in freedom, by these warlike pilgrimages. The arts and manufactures of the East were introduced into Europe, and a spirit of enterprise, which probably led to the cultivation of commerce, was excited. Mr. Gibbon observes that, before the æra of the crusades, 'the larger portion of the inhabitants in Europe was chained to the soil, without freedom, or property, or knowledge; and the two orders of ecclesiastics and nobles, whose numbers were comparatively small, alone deserved the name of citizens and men. This oppressive system was supported by the arts of the clergy, and the swords of the barons. Among the causes that undermined this Gothic edifice, a conspicuous place must be allowed to the crusades. The estates of the barons were dissipated, and their race was often extinguished, in these costly and perilous expeditions. Their poverty extorted from their pride those charters of freedom, which unlocked the fetters of the slave, secured the farm of the peasant, and the shop of the artificer, and gradually restored a substance and a soul to the most numerous and useful part of the community. The conflagration, which destroyed the tall and barren trees of the forest, gave air and scope to the vegetation of the smaller and nutritive plants of the soil.' Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire; Mosheim's Ecclesiast. Hist; Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. ii. pp. 60. 91, &c. &c.

CUBIT, a measure used by the ancients. Originally, a cubit was the distance from the elbow to the extremity of the middle finger; this is the fourth part of the stature of a well-proportioned man. The common cubit is eighteen inches. According to Bishop Cumberland, and M. Pelletier of Rohan, the Hebrew cubit is twenty-one inches; but others fix it at eighteen inches. Lucius Capellus, and some others, have asserted, that there were two sorts of cubits among the Hebrews, one sacred, the other common; the sacred containing three feet, and the common a foot and a half. Both these are mentioned in 1 Kings vii. 15. and 2 Chron. iii. 15. In the former the two columns of brass, in Solomon's temple, are reckoned eighteen cubits high; and in Chronicles, thirty-five cubits. Moses, (Numb. xxxv. 4.) assigns to the Levites 1000 sacred cubits of land, about their city; and in the next verse, he gives them 2000 common cubits.

Vallapandus, and the learned Dr. Arbuthnot, are of opinion, that the Jews used two sorts of cubits; a sacred, and a profane, or common cubit. In Deut. iii. 11, the bed of Og is said to have been nine cubits long, and four broad, after the cubit of a man. But Ezekiel's reed, (Ezek. xl. 5.) is said to be six cubits long, by the cubit and hand's breadth; and hence it appears, that the larger cubit, by which the reed was measured, was longer than the common cubit, by a hand's breadth, or three inches.

Notwithstanding these reasons, Calmet is of opinion, that there was only one cubit among the Hebrews, from the Exodus to the Babylonish captivity, and this was the Egyptian cubit; and that only after the captivity, the Scripture notices two sorts of measures, to distinguish the ancient Hebrew cubit from that of Babylon, which the captives had used during their abode in that city. On this is founded the precaution of Ezekiel, in observing, that the cubit, of which he is speaking, is the true old cubit, larger by a hand's breadth than the common cubit.

Mr. Greaves, and after him Dr. Arbuthnot, has computed the ancient cubit to be 21 888 inches, or nearly twenty-two inches. Dr. Arbuthnot's Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures, p. 66, &c.

CUP is used in Scripture in a proper, and in a figurative sense. In a proper sense it signifies a common cup, out of which persons drink at meals; or a cup of ceremony, used at solemn and religious meals, as at the Passover, when the father of the family pronounces certain blessings over the cup, and having tasted it, passes it round to the company and his whole family, who partake of it. In a figurative sense, it is taken, 1. for the wine in the cup. (1 Cor. xi. 27.) 2. It imports afflictions or sufferings: 'Stand up, O Jerusalem, which hast drunk at the hand of the Lord the cup of his fury.' (Isa. li. 17.) And the Psalmist (lxxv. 8): 'In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, the dregs thereof all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them.' Our Saviour prays, (Matt. xxvi. 39.) 'Let this cup pass from me'; that is, let me be freed from these sufferings. 3. Cup denotes the blessings and favours of God. (Ps. xxiii. 5.) The cup of salvation, (Ps. cxvi. 13.) is a cup of thanksgiving, of blessing the Lord for his mercies. We see this practice in 3 Macc. vi. 27, in which the Jews of Egypt, in their festivals for their deliverance, offered cups of salvation. The cup of blessing (1 Cor. x. 16.) is that which was blessed in entertainments of ceremony, or solemn services, in which the company drank round. Our Saviour, in the Last Supper, blessed the cup, and gave it to each of the apostles to drink. (Luke xxii. 20.) At this day, the Jews have cups of thanksgiving, which are blessed, in their marriage ceremonies, and in entertainments made at the circumcision of their children. Some commentators think the cup of salvation to be a libation of wine poured on the victim sacrificed on thanksgiving occasions, according to the law of Moses. (Exod. xxix. 40. Numb. xv. 5.; xxviii. 7. 14.) 4. Cup also denotes share or portion: 'The Lord is the portion of my cup,' because at meals each had his cup; or, the prophet alludes to those cups, which were drunk by each in his turn.

In respect to Joseph's cup is a difficulty, which has appeared to some persons considerable. (Gen. xlv. 5.) In our translation, it is said, 'Is not this it (the cup) in which my Lord drinketh, and whereby, indeed, he divineth?' As divination is not a study which reflects any honour on the character of Joseph, some have rendered the passage 'for which he would search accurately.' Instead of 'wot ye not, that such a man as I can certainly divine?' they render, 'I would search carefully,' that is, for the cup. It was, and perhaps is still, the custom for the town of Madras in the East Indies, to present every new governor with a cup, out of which to drink his arrack after dinner. This cup, on which were engraven, probably, the governor's name and titles, was used at table, in the cheerful hours of drinking, after the meal was ended, and was a cup of privilege, and such as the town could not furnish another, in any of the shops. Now the word nachesh in Genesis signifies to view, to eye, to observe attentively, that is, to distinguish one thing from another. We may, therefore, render the passage, 'And distinguishing, he is distinguished by it.' As if it had been said, 'He is eminently distinguished by this cup; this is his particular cup; no other person dares have such a one; it appertains to his office, and therefore he highly values it.' Joseph's reprimand may also be thus rendered: 'Could you not perceive that this formed one of the distinctions appertaining to my station?' In Bruce's Travels is an account of a golden cup, which was given to Ras Michael, governor of Tigré, by the king. This proves, that a particular cup, as an appendage to his office, was peculiar neither to the governor of the metropolis of Egypt, nor to the governor of Madras. Bruce's Travels, vol. ii. p. 657; Fragments attached to Calmet's Dict. No. xxi. p. 43.

CURSES. God denounced his curse against the serpent, which had seduced Eve, (Gen. iii. 14.) and against Cain, who had embued his hands in his brother Abel's blood. (Gen. iv. 11.) The Lord promised to bless those, who should bless Abraham, and to curse those, who should curse him. The divine maledictions are not merely imprecations, or impotent wishes, they carry their effect with them, and are attended with all the miseries denounced.

Holy men sometimes prophetically cursed particular persons. Noah cursed Canaan (Gen. ix. 25.) Jacob, the fury of his two sons, Simeon and Levi, (Gen. xlix. 7.) Moses enjoins the people of Israel to curse the violators of the law, (Deut. xxvii. 15.) Joshua cursed him, who should undertake to rebuild Jericho, (Josh. vi. 26.) and our Saviour, the barren fig-tree. (Mark xi. 21.) These imprecations had their effect. They were not, however, produced by passion, impatience, or revenge, but were predictions, and therefore not such curses as God condemns. No one shall presume to curse his father or his mother, on pain of death, (Exod. xxi. 17.) nor the ruler of his people (Exod. xxii. 28); nor one that is deaf, (Levit. xix. 14.) whether is meant a man really deaf, or one that is absent, and therefore cannot hear what is said against him. Blasphemy, or cursing God, is punished with death. (Levit. xxiv. 10, 11.) In the Gospel, (Matt. v. 11.) Jesus Christ pronounces a blessing upon those disciples, who are falsely loaded with curses; and he requires his followers to bless those who curse them, to render blessing for cursing, &c.

CUSH, כוש, Xovoi, signifies an Ethiopian, or black, and was the name of the eldest son of Ham. The sons of Cush were Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Sabtecha, and Nimrod. (Gen. x. 6, 7, 8.) The Vulgate, Septuagint, and other interpreters, ancient and modern, generally translate Cush, Ethiopia; but there are many passages, in which this translation is certainly erroneous. It is, therefore, necessary to examine the several acceptations of the word Cush, and to be well advised on that particular Cush, to which any passage of Scripture refers.

1. Cush is found in Bactria, in the vicinage of the river Indus. This was the original Ethiopia, or Ethiopia in the East, in which the family of Cush was first situated. Strabo calls the Ethiopians a two-fold people, who lie extended in a long tract, from the rising to the setting of the sun. It is evident from Apuleius, Arrian, and other writers, that Ethiopia was very far east, and in the neighbourhood of India. It is impossible to suppose, that the African Ethiopians sent colonies to such a distance east; but we have testimony that the Western Ethiopians emigrated from the vicinity of the river Indus, that is, from a situation north-west of that river, Bactria is west of the Gihon. (Gen. ii. 13.) The Syriac in 2 Chron. xvi. 8. for Cushites, or Ethiopians, reads Indians; and both the Syriac and Chaldee in Isa. xi. 11. and Zeph. iii. 10. for Cush read India.

2. We find Cush in Assyria, west of the Caspian Sea. As the dispersion of the Jews was principally in Assyria, it is not improbable, that to this dispersion the prophet Zephaniah refers, (iii. 10.) where he speaks of the return of Judah from captivity, 'from beyond the rivers of Cushan, my suppliants, even the daughters of my dispersed, shall bring mine offering.' It appears, however, that this dispersion extended even to the ancient Hindoostan. St. Jerom, in his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers, mentions that St. Andrew preached the Gospel on the rivers of Colchis, the Apsarus, and the Phasis; and he calls the natives Ethiopians, that is, Cushites.

3. We find Cush in Arabia Petraea, bordering on Egypt; this country extended itself principally on the eastern shore of the Red Sea. The proofs are these:—Zipporah, the wife of Moses, who was a native of Midian, is called a Cushite, or Ethiopian. (Numb. xii. 1.) Now, Midian, as Josephus, Ptolemy, and Jerom all agree, was situated on the east of the Red Sea in Arabia. Habakkuk (iii. 7.) mentions the land of Cush, or Cushan, as synonymous with that of Midian: 'I saw the tents of Cushan in affliction: and the curtains of the land of Midian did tremble.' We know the land of Midian, connected by this prophet with Cushan, too well to be mistaken.

4. Ethiopia, south of Egypt, in Africa, is designated by the name of Cush. The eunuch of queen Candace is rendered in the Syriac, the Cushite. (Acts viii. 27.) Ethiopia is frequently in the Hebrew called Cush. Jeremiah (xiii. 23) says, 'Can the Cushæan, or Ethiopian, change his skin?' Isaiah (xi. 11.) says, 'He will recover the remnant of his people from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush;' and, in another place (xviii. 1.) rivers of Cush are rivers of Ethiopia, that is, south of Egypt.

It, therefore, appears, that in Scripture are four countries named Cush. Great confusion has arisen in the descriptions of Ethiopia (Cush,) from the different families of the Cushites, which by various removals inhabited these places so widely separated from each other. Sacred Geography; Additions to Calmet's Dict.

CUTH, or CUTH'AH with the Chaldee termination, the same as Cush. (2 Kings, xvii. 24. 30.) Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, carried away Israel into Assyria, and replaced them by other people out of Cuthah. Josephus observes, that Cuthah is the name of a country in Persia, which also possesses a river of the same name. Of the Cuthæans, he says, there were five tribes or nations, each of which had their own gods, which they brought with them into Samaria. These were the people afterwards called Samaritans, who, though they had no pretensions, affected to be related to the Jews; and hence probably arose the violent animosity, which subsisted between the two nations. The Cuthæans, Josephus observes, had formerly belonged to the inner parts of Persia and Media.

The Cuthæans worshipped their idol Nergal. After their arrival in Samaria, they continued to worship the gods they had formerly adored. The Lord being provoked, sent among them lions, which destroyed them. This being reported to Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, who succeeded Sennacherib, he appointed an Israelitish priest to instruct them in that worship, which was pleasing to God. But these people thought they might reconcile their old superstitions with the worship of the God of Israel. They therefore worshipped both the Lord and their false gods, and chose the lowest of the people for priests of the high places. Afterwards, however, they forsook idols, and adhered to the law of Moses, as the Samaritans, their descendants, do at this day. See SAMARITANS.

CYPRUS, Κύπρος, signifies fair, beautiful, and is the name of the largest island in the Mediterranean, situated between Cilicia and Syria. It is thought, by a very judicious writer, in opposition to Calmet, that the Philistines did not people, from Cyprus and Crete, that part of the shores of the Holy Land called Philistia; but that the Philistines, migrating from the shores of Egypt, or of Judea, peopled the islands of Crete, Cyprus, and others in the Mediterranean Sea. It seems, indeed, confirmed by some ancient medals, that the Philistines were a Hindoo nation, first settled on the coast of the Red Sea, afterwards removing thence to Canaan, and so to Cyprus, Crete, &c. See CAPHTOR.

The inhabitants of this island were immersed in all manner of luxury and debauchery. Their principal deity was Venus. The apostles Paul and Barnabas landed in Cyprus, A. D. 44. (Acts xiii. 4, 5, &c.)

Whilst they continued at Salamis, they preached Jesus Christ in the Jewish synagogues; and from that place they visited all the cities in the island, preaching the Gospel. At Paphos, they found Bar-jesus, a false prophet, with Sergius Paulus, the governor. Paul struck Bar-jesus with blindness; and the proconsul embraced Christianity. Some time after, Barnabas went again into this island, with John, surnamed Mark. (Acts xv. 39.) Barnabas is considered as the principal apostle and first bishop of Cyprus, where, it is said, he suffered martyrdom, being stoned to death by the Jews of Salamis. Sacred Geography.

CYRENE, קִיר, Κυρήνη, signifies a wall, or beam; otherwise, cold, or a meeting. Cyrene was a city of Libya in Africa, which, as it was the principal city of that province, was sometimes denominated Cyrenaica, and by St. Luke, (Acts ii. 10.) is paraphrastically called Libya about Cyrene. This city was once so powerful as to contend with Carthage for pre-eminence. In profane writers, it is mentioned as the birth-place of Eratosthenes, the mathematician, and Callimachus, the poet; and in Holy Writ, of Simon, whom the Jews compelled to bear our Saviour's cross. (Matt. xxvii. 32. Luke xxiii. 26.)

At Cyrene resided many Jews, a great part of whom embraced the Christian religion; but others opposed it with much obstinacy. Among the most inveterate enemies of Christianity, Luke reckons those of this province, who had a synagogue at Jerusalem, and excited the people against St. Stephen. (Acts vi. 9; but see Acts xi. 20.) Wells's Geography, vol. ii. pp. 140. 303.

CYRENIUS, governor of Syria. (Luke ii. 1, 2.) Great difficulties have been raised on this history of taxing under Cyrenius, because Cyrenius was not governor of Syria till nine or ten years after our Saviour's birth. Indeed, it is granted on all hands, that Cyrenius was not properly governor of Syria at the time of our Saviour's birth, though he was afterwards; but Saturninus was governor at that time. Yet, for the purposes of this enrolment, Cyrenius might be associated with Saturninus; or, though now sent into Syria as an extraordinary officer, yet being afterwards governor of this province, he might be called governor of Syria, as we call an officer during his life by the title he has borne, even after he has laid down his commission. On a medal of Antioch appear the names of Saturninus and Volumnius, who were the emperor's chief officers in Syria. It would seem, therefore, that Volumnius was the colleague of Saturninus in the government of Syria; that Saturninus was properly president, and Volumnius procurator of the province; and that, whilst Saturninus kept his court at Antioch, where he remained stationary, his associate was engaged in other districts of the province, as circumstances required.

What we suppose of Volumnius, we may also suppose of Cyrenius, who, after him, held the same office. Thus, this medal vindicates Josephus, who describes Saturninus and Volumnius as governors of Syria; and it may justify both St. Luke and Tertullian, of whom the former affirmed that Cyrenius, and the latter that Saturninus, executed the enrolment. It may also justify the words of the Evangelist, which may be thus understood: 'This was the first enrolment of Cyrenius, he being then governor of Syria associated with Saturninus; and it should be distinguished from that, which he made eleven years after, when he was the chief, the pre-cedential governor of the same province.' Dr. Campbell and Mr. Parkhurst translate the words as follows: 'This first register took effect when Cyrenius was president of Syria.'

It may be observed on the passage in Luke (ii. 1, 2.) first, that the word οἰκισμένη rendered all the world, sometimes signifies the whole of a country, region, or district, as perhaps Acts xi. 28, and certainly Luke xxi. 26. The expression, all the country, is peculiarly proper in this place, because Galilee, as well as Judea, was included, and perhaps all other parts, in which were Jews. Secondly, the word ἀπογραφῆς, rendered taxing, should have been translated enrolment; as a taxation did not always really follow such enrolment, though such enrolment generally preceded a taxation. The difficulty of the passage is in the word πρῶτη, 'first,' because, ten or eleven years after, there was actually a taxation, which, as a decisive mark of subjection to the Roman power, was very mortifying to the Jewish nation. To this taxation Gamaliel alludes, (Acts v. 37.) 'Judas of Galilee rose up in the days of the taxing,' when mobs and riots were frequent, under pretence of liberty.

The narrative of St. Luke may be combined in the following order, which is probably not far from its true import. 'In those days Cæsar Augustus,' who was displeased with the conduct of Herod, and wished him to feel his dependence on the Roman empire, 'issued a decree that the whole land' of Judea, 'should be enrolled,' as well persons as possessions, that the true state of the inhabitants, their families, and their property, might be known and recorded. Accordingly, 'all were enrolled,' but the taxation did not immediately follow this enrolment, because Augustus was reconciled to Herod; and this accounts for the silence of Josephus on an assessment not carried into effect. 'And this was the first assessment (or enrolment) of Cyrenius, governor of Syria. And all went to be enrolled, each to his own city;' and, as the emperor's order was urgent, and Cyrenius was known to be active in the dispatch of business, 'even Mary, though far advanced in her pregnancy, went with Joseph, and while they waited' for their turn, to be enrolled,

'Mary was delivered of Jesus.' It is not, however, improbable, that Mary had some small landed estate, for which her appearance was necessary. Jesus, therefore, was enrolled with Mary and Joseph, as Julian the Apostate expressly says.

An officer being sent from Rome to enrol and assess the subjects of a king, implied that such king was dependent on the Roman emperor, and demonstrates that the sceptre was departed from Judah. This occurrence, added to the alarm of Herod on the inquiry of the Magi respecting the birth place of the Messiah, might sufficiently exasperate Herod, not merely to slay the infants of Bethlehem, but to every act of cruelty. Hence, after such an occurrence, all Jerusalem might well be alarmed with Herod, (Matt. ii. 3.) and the priests, &c. study caution in their answers to him. This occurrence would quicken the attention of all, who expected temporal redemption in Israel, as it would exceedingly mortify every Jewish national feeling.

The over-ruling providence of God appointed, that at the time of Christ's birth, there should be a public, authentic, and general production of titles, pedigrees, &c. which should prove, that Jesus was descended from the house and direct family line of David; and that this should be proved judicially on such a scrutinizing occasion. This occurrence brought about the birth of the Messiah, at the very place appointed by prophecy long before, though the usual residence of Joseph and Mary was at Nazareth. Among so much confusion, and such vexation, as this enrolment would occasion, the slaughter of the infants at Bethlehem might be passed over without much noise. Perhaps Herod represented publicly (whatever he knew privately,) that Bethlehem was a turbulent disaffected place, and ought to be punished for the disloyalty shown by it on occasion of this enrolment. Additions to Calmet's Dict.; Parkhurst's Greek and English Lexicon.

CYRUS, כורש, signifies as miserable; otherwise, belly: in Persian, the sun. Cyrus, son of Cambyzes, the Persian, and of Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of the Medes. Astyages dreamed, that a vine issued from his daughter's womb, the branches of which covered all Asia. The soothsayers told him, that this signified the future power and greatness of a child that should be born of his daughter; and that the same child should deprive him of his kingdom. Astyages, to prevent the accomplishment of this prediction, instead of marrying his daughter to some powerful prince, gave her to Cambyzes, a Persian of mean condition. Besides, as soon as he understood that his daughter was pregnant, he commanded Harpagus, one of his officers, to kill the infant the moment it was born. Harpagus, fearing the resentment of Mandane, preserved the child, and gave it to the king's chief shepherd to be exposed. The shepherd's wife, touched with the beauty of Cyrus, persuaded her husband to preserve the young prince; and thus Cyrus was brought up among the king's shepherds.

One day, as the neighbouring children were playing together, Cyrus was chosen king, and having treated with too much authority one of his little play-fellows, the parents of the child complained to Astyages. This prince sent for Cyrus, and, observing something great in his air, and some features of his daughter Mandane, he inquired particularly into the matter, and discovered that Cyrus was in reality his grandson. Harpagus, who had preserved him, was punished with the death of his own son; and Astyages concluded, that the royalty, which the soothsayers had promised to young Cyrus, was that which he had lately exercised among the shepherds' children. When Cyrus was grown up, Harpagus discovered to him the secret of his birth, encouraged him to come into Media, and promised him forces in order to depose Astyages. Cyrus engaged the Persians to take arms against the Medes, marched at their head against Astyages, defeated him, and possessed himself of Media. After many other wars, he sat down before Babylon, which he took after a long siege.

This is a summary account of Cyrus from Herodotus and Justin; but the learned confess, that this recital is so blended with fable that it is difficult to distinguish truth from falsehood. Xenophon has given us a very different history of Cyrus. It is possible, that these different histories may refer to different persons of the same name; or it is more probable, that this confusion has been increased, if not occasioned, by the misunderstanding of foreigners, the Greeks, through whom we have received our information on these points of history.

According to Xenophon, Astyages married his daughter Mandane to Cambyzes, king of Persia, son to Achæmenes, king of that nation. Cyrus was born in the court of the king his father, and was educated with the greatest care. When he was about twelve years old, his grandfather Astyages sent for him into Media, with his daughter Mandane. Some time after, the king of Assyria's son having invaded Media, Astyages, with his son Cyaxares, and his grandson Cyrus, marched against him. Cyrus distinguished himself in this war, and defeated the Assyrians. Cambyzes afterwards recalled him, that he might have him near his own person; and Astyages dying, his son Cyaxares, uncle by the mother's side to Cyrus, succeeded him in the kingdom of Media.

At the age of thirty, Cyrus was made general of the Persian troops, by his father Cambyzes, and was sent at the head of thirty thousand men to assist his uncle Cyaxares, whom the king of Babylon, with his allies, was preparing to attack. Cyaxares and Cyrus prevented them, by attacking and dispersing them.

After this, Cyrus carried the war into the countries beyond the river Halys, and subdued Cappadocia; and, having marched against Cræsus, king of Lydia, defeated Cræsus, and besieged him in Sardis, his capital. After a siege of fourteen days, Cræsus was obliged to surrender.

Cyrus having reduced almost all Asia, repassed the Euphrates, and waged war against the Assyrians. He marched to Babylon, took it, and there prepared a palace for his uncle Cyaxares. After these expeditions, Cyrus returned to his father and mother in Persia. He afterwards married his cousin, the only daughter and heiress of Cyaxares's dominions, and went with her to Babylon. He engaged again in several wars, and subdued all the nations between Syria and the Red Sea. He died at the age of seventy, after a reign of thirty years. Authors differ concerning his death; and we are only imperfectly acquainted with the history of this great prince, who was the founder of the Persian, and the destroyer of the Chaldæan, empire.

From Scripture we learn few particulars respecting Cyrus; but they are more certain than any others. Daniel, in the famous vision, (viii. 3. 20.) in which God showed him the ruin of several great empires, that preceded the birth of the Messiah, represents Cyrus as 'a ram which had two horns, both high, but one rose higher than the other, and the higher came up last. This ram pushed westward, and northward, and southward, so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hands, but he did according to his will, and became great.' The two horns signify the two empires which Cyrus united in his person; that of the Medes, and that of the Persians. In chap. vii. 5, Daniel compares Cyrus to a bear, with three ribs in its mouth, to which it was said, 'Arise, devour much flesh.'

Cyrus succeeded Cambyses in the kingdom of Persia, and Darius the Mede, by Xenophon called Cyaxares, and Astyages in the apocryphal chapter (xiii. 1.) of Daniel, in the kingdom of the Medes, and the empire of Babylon. He was monarch, as he speaks (2 Chron. xxxvi. 22, 23. Ezra i. 1, 2.) 'of all the earth,' when he permitted the Jews to return into their own country, in the year of the world 3466, and before Jesus Christ 538.

The prophets foretold the coming of Cyrus. Isaiah (xliv. 28.) particularly declares his name above a century before he was born. Josephus (Antiq. lib. ii. c. 2.) says, that the Jews of Babylon showed this passage to Cyrus; and that this prince, in the edict which he granted for their return, acknowledged, that he received the empire of the world from the God of Israel; and that the same God had described him by name in the writings of the prophets, and foretold that he should build a temple to him in Jerusalem.

The taking of Babylon by Cyrus is clearly foretold in Scripture. (Isaiah xiii. xiv. xxi. xli. xlii. xlv. Jerem. i. li. Dan. vii. viii.) Archbishop Usher fixes the birth of Cyrus to the year of the world 3405; his first year at Babylon, to 3466; and his death to 3475. The eastern people say, that one of Cyrus's wives was a Jewess; and hence they account for his favour to the Jews.

DAG

DA'GON, דגון, signifies corn from its increase, and fish from its fertility. Dagon may also at the same time allude to preservation, as a fish is preserved in the waters, and corn in the earth; both in reference to newness of life.

Dagon, the god of the Philistines, was represented like a woman, with the lower parts of a fish:—

Desinit in piscem mulier formosa superne,

A handsome woman with a fish's tail.

(Horat. de Art. Poet.)

DAG

The Great Etymologicum says, that Dagon was Saturn; others, Jupiter; others, Venus. Bochart is of opinion, that the god Dagon was Japheth, the third son of Noah; and that to him was given the divinity of the sea, because his lot, and that of his descendants, was the islands, peninsulas, and countries beyond the sea, or the continent of Europe. Mr. Jurieu, and some others, think, that Noah himself may probably be concealed under the name of Dagon, or Neptune, since he who floated several months on the waters of the deluge, and who alone escaped from that flood, which destroyed the rest of mankind, might with propriety be said to possess the empire of the sea. They who favour this last opinion, think that the name by transposition should be Dag-NAU, which may signify the Dag of Nau, or Noah, that is the fish of Noah, as the Hebrew word dag imports, or figuratively the vessel, or preserver, of Noah.

An ancient fable says, that 'Ὀάννης, Oannes, a creature half man and half fish, rose out of the Red Sea, and came to Babylon, where he taught the people several arts, and then returned again to the sea. There were several of these Oannes, the name of one of which was 'Ὀδάκων, Odacon, that is ὁ Dagon, the Dagon. Berosus says, that Oannes had the body and head of a fish; and above the head of the fish a human head; and below the tail of the fish, he had human feet. This is the true figure of Dagon. The Red Sea, in very ancient authors, means the Indian Ocean. Now who could teach several arts, or who could first teach letters and astronomy? No other person than Noah. Oannes is said to have come on shore, and taught, and returned to the sea at night. To what could he return, but to some embarkation, or vessel, out of which he came by day? For Berosus expressly represents Oannes as coming out of the fish. It is, therefore, clear, that this personage is described as coming out from, and returning to, something, which swam on the waters, and which could be no other than a ship of some kind, symbolized under the figure of a fish, or designated by that class of animals, whose constant residence is in the waters. Besides, as a fish passes in safety along the mighty deep, and is secure amidst storms and tempests, so the idea of that structure, in which a person, or persons, were preserved from the perils of the boisterous waves, easily became connected with that of a fish.

The Scripture shows pretty clearly, that the statue of Dagon was human, at least the upper part of it. (1 Sam. v.) 'And the Philistines took the ark of God, and introduced it into the temple of Dagon, and placed it before Dagon. And the Ashdodites rose on the morrow morning, and behold! Dagon fallen; his face to the earth, before the face of the ark of Jehovah. And they took up Dagon, and restored him to his place. And they rose early on the next morrow morning, and behold! Dagon fallen; his face to the earth, before the face of the ark of Jehovah: and the head of Dagon, and the two bendings of his arms (palms of his hands) were broken off, on the threshold: the empty, concave, hollow, fish part of the compound of Dagon, remained unto him.' They who suppose that the word dag figuratively denotes a ship or vessel, seem inclined to think, that Jonah, when fleeing to Tarshish, was miraculously preserved by a vessel, and not by a whale. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dict. No. cxlv. p. 97, &c.

DALMANUTHA, Δαλμανυθά, signifies a bucket prepared; exhaustion of what is numbered; otherwise, leanness, or branches prepared, or numbered. St. Mark (viii. 10.) says, that Jesus Christ embarked with his disciples on the sea of Tiberias, and came to Dalmanutha. St. Matthew (xv. 39,) relating the same event, says, that our Saviour went to Magdala. Dr. Doddridge explains the passages as follows: He came into the parts of Dalmanutha, which, with several neighbouring cities, stood in the coast of Magdala, not far from Gadara, on the eastern shore of the sea of Galilee. Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 185; Doddridge's Family Expositor, vol. i. p. 454, edit. 1810.

DAMASCUS, דְּמוֹשֶׁק, Domeshech, Δαμασκός, signifies the sack of blood, or cup of blood, otherwise blood of the thigh, or of fires, or of the procurator, or of stewards. Damascus was a celebrated city of Syria, and was for a long time the capital of a kingdom of Damascus, or Aram of Damascus, or Syria of Damascus. It was a city in the time of Abraham; and some of the ancients say, that patriarch reigned there immediately after Damascus its founder. The Scripture says nothing more of this city till the time of David; when Hadad, king of Damascus, sending troops to Haddadzer, king of Zobah, David defeated both kings, and subdued their country, in the year of the world 2092, and before Christ 1912. Josephus says, that this Hadad was the first that took the title of king in this city.

Toward the end of Solomon's reign, God stirred up Rezin, the son of Eliadab, who restored the kingdom of Damascus, and shook off the yoke of the Jewish kings. Asa, king of Judah, implored the assistance of Benhadad, son of Tabrimon, king of Damascus, against Baasha, king of Israel, and engaged him by subsidies to invade Baasha's territories. After this time, the kings of Damascus were generally called Benhadad, which they probably assumed as a surname.

Jeroboam II. king of Israel, resumed the ancient superiority over the kings of Syria. He conquered Damascus and Hamath, the two principal cities of Syria, (2 Kings xiv. 25.) but, after the death of Jeroboam II., the Syrians re-established their monarchy. Rezin assumed the title of king of Damascus; entered into a confederacy with Pekah, the usurper of the kingdom of Israel; and, in conjunction with him, made great havoc in the territories of Jotham and Ahaz, kings of Judah. (2 Kings xvi. 5, &c.) Ahaz, sensible that he was not sufficiently strong to oppose them, desired the assistance of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria. This prince, in order to relieve Ahaz, invaded the dominions of Rezin, took Damascus, which he destroyed, killed Rezin, and sent the Syrians his subjects into captivity, beyond the Euphrates, according to the predictions of the prophets Isaiah and Amos. (2 Kings xvi. 7. 9. Isaiah vii. 4. 8.; viii. 4.; x. 9.; xvii. 1, 2, 3. Amos i. 3.)

However, after a time, Damascus recovered from these misfortunes. Calmet thinks, that Sennacherib took this city, when he marched against Hezekiah. (Isaiah ix. 9, &c.) Holofernes also took it. (Judith ii. 17.) Ezekiel (xxvii. 18.) speaks of it as a flourishing city. Jeremiah (xxv. 9, 10.; xxvii. 8.; xlix. 23, 24.) threatens it with the attacks of Nebuchadnezzar. After the return from the captivity, Zechariah, (ix. 1.) foretold several calamities, which should befall it, and which, in all probability, did befall it, when it was conquered by the generals of Alexander the Great. The Romans took Damascus about the year of the world, 3939, when Pompey warred against Tigranes, and sent thither Metellus and Lælius, by whom it was seized.

Damascus remained under the Roman government, till it fell into the hands of the Arabians. Obodas, father of Aretas, king of Arabia, whom St. Paul mentions, (2 Cor. xi. 32.) was master of Damascus, in the reign of Augustus; but he was not independent, being subject to the Romans. Aretas, whose officer was governor of Damascus, when St. Paul came thither, quarrelled with the Romans, with whom he was then at war, A.D. 37. Aretas was a name common to many kings of Damascus, at least, from the second century before Christ, and it appears to have been retained by them after that period.

Damascus is situated in a very fertile plain, at the foot of Mount Libanus, being surrounded by hills in the manner of a triumphal arch. It is bounded by a river, which the ancients named Chrysorroas, as if it flowed with gold; and it is divided into several channels. Damascus has still a great number of fountains, which render it extremely agreeable. Its fertile and delightful meadows, covered with fruits and flowers, contribute also to its fame. Volney thus describes it:—'Damascus is the capital and residence of the Pacha; the Arabs call it El Shams, agreeably to their custom of bestowing the name of the country on its capital. The eminent oriental name of Dameshk is known only to geographers. This city is situated in a vast plain, open to the south and east, and shut in, towards the west and north, by mountains, which render the territory of Damascus the best watered, and most delicious province of all Syria: the Arabs speak of it with enthusiasm, and think they can never sufficiently extol the verdure and freshness of its fruits, its numerous streams, and the clearness of its rills and fountains. This is also the only part of Syria where there are detached pleasure-houses in the open country. The natives must set a higher value on these advantages, as they are the more rare in the adjacent provinces. In other respects the soil is poor, generally, and of a reddish colour, and ill adapted for corn; but is, on that account, more suitable to fruits, which are there excellently flavoured. No city contains so many canals and fountains; each house has one; and all these waters are furnished by three rivulets, or branches of the same river, which, after fertilizing the gardens for the course of three leagues, flow into a hollow of the desert to the south-east, where they form a morass called Behairat-el-Mardj, or the Lake of the Meadow. With such a situation, it cannot be disputed that Damascus is one of the most agreeable cities in Turkey; but it is still deficient in point of salubrity: the inhabitants complain, with reason, that the white waters of the Barrada are cold and hard; and it is observed that the natives are subject to obstructions; that the whiteness of their skin is rather the paleness of sickness than the colour of health; and that the too great use of fruits, particularly of apricots, occasions there, every summer and autumn, intermittent fevers and dysenteries.' The street, still called Straight, where St. Paul dwelt, is entered by the road from Jerusalem: it is as straight as an arrow, a mile in length, broad, and well paved. Volney's Travels through Syria and Egypt; Sacred Geography; Horne's Introduction.

DAMIANISTS, a denomination in the sixth century, that derived their name from Damian, bishop of Alexandria. They distinguished the Divine Essence from the Three Persons; Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. They denied that each Person was God, when considered in himself, and abstractedly from the other two; but they affirmed, at the same time, that there was a common Divinity, by the joint participation of which each Person was God. They, therefore, called the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, hypostases, or persons, and the Godhead, which was common to them all, substance, or nature. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 473.

DAMNATION. This word is used in a theological sense, to express the total loss of the soul; or a state of suffering under spiritual punishment. But this is not its proper import in all passages, in which it occurs in Scripture; and the use of this word, in some parts of our translation, is extremely unfortunate. We read, (John v. 29.) of the 'resurrection to damnation,' (Mark iii. 29.) of 'eternal damnation,' and (Matt. xxiii. 33.) of 'the damnation of hell.' In these instances, the stronger sense of the word, is required by the import and tenor of the context. On the other hand, we read (Matt. xxiii. 14.) of the 'greater damnation,' which evidently implies a lesser damnation; and, (Rom. xiii. 2.) 'Whosoever resisteth—shall receive damnation,' for which should be substituted condemnation. St. Paul, in speaking of the holy sacrament, says, (1 Cor. xi. 29.) 'He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself.' For the word damnation should be substituted condemnation, judgment; and the apostle teaches that this conduct is highly reprehensible, and shall terminate in his personal punishment. Dr. Calamy observes, 'the original word, here translated damnation, signifies no more than judgment, or punishment in general. So that there is no necessity for translating it by the word damnation; nay, there are two plain reasons, why it ought to be understood only of temporal evils and chastisements. 1. Because the judgments inflicted on the Corinthians, for the profanation of this holy sacrament, were only temporal. 'For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep.' 2. Because the reason assigned for these judgments is, that the Corinthians might not be condemned in the other world; 'but when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world.' God inflicted these evils on the Corinthians, that being reformed by stripes in this life, they might escape that future vengeance, which is reserved for the impenitent; and therefore it could not be eternal damnation, that was either threatened or inflicted upon them for their receiving unworthily.' In the first Epistle to Timothy (v. 12.) 'Younger widows will marry: having damnation,' read condemnation, or judgment, because they cast off their first faith. In the Epistle to the Romans, (xiv. 23.) 'He that doubteth is damned,—read self-condemned—if he eat flesh or any other thing' which may offend a weak brother. Eternal damnation cannot be the penalty of doing an action, which is lawful in itself, though it may offend an uninstructed fellow Christian, who, in fact, has no right to be offended, but should rather seek instruction, and practise that charity, which one Christian should bear to another, in respect to his sentiments, his words, and actions. Warner's System of Divinity, vol. iii. p. 2; Supplementary Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

DAN, דָּן, signifies judgment, or the judge, and was the name of the fifth son of Jacob, and the eldest by Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid. Dan had only one son, named Hushim. (Gen. xlii. 23.) Yet, at the time the Israelites went out of Egypt, this tribe contained 62,700 men. (Numb. i. 38.) Jacob blessed Dan in the following words, (Gen. xlix. 16, 17.):—'Dan shall judge his people, as one of the tribes of Israel; Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder in the path that biteth the horse's heels, so that his rider shall fall backwards.' Jacob's meaning is, that though this tribe was not the most powerful, or the most celebrated in Israel, yet it would produce one, who should be the prince of his people; and this prediction was accomplished in Samson, who was descended from Dan. The tribe of Dan possessed a very fat and fertile tract, between the tribe of Judah east, and the country of the Philistines west; but the limits of their land were very narrow, because it was only part of the territories of Judah divided from the rest. In what manner they proceeded, and their success in enlarging their territories, may be seen in Judges, (xviii.)

DAN, a town at the northern extremity of Israel, in the tribe of Naphtali. From Dan to Beersheba, denotes the two extremities of the land of promise; Dan being the northern, and Beersheba the southern city. Dan was seated at the foot of Mount Libanus, on the spring of Dan or Jordan. Several authors have thought, that the river Jordan took its name from the Hebrew Jor, a spring, and Dan, a town near its source. Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, set up one of his golden calves in Dan. (1 Kings xii. 29.)

DANCERS, a denomination that arose in the year 1373 at Aix-la-Chapelle, whence they spread through the district of Liege, Hainault, and other parts of Flanders. It was their custom to begin dancing on a sudden; and, holding each other's hands, they continued their motions, till, suffocated with the extraordinary violence, they fell down breathless together. They affirmed, that during these intervals of vehement agitation, they were favoured with wonderful visions. Like the Flagellants, they wandered from place to place, had recourse to begging for their subsistence, treated with the utmost contempt both the priesthood and the public rites and worship of the church, and held secret assemblies. Thus it appears, that the French Convulsionists, and the Welsh Jumpers, have had predecessors of the same kind. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iii. p. 206, 207.

DANIEL, דָּנִיֵּאל, signifies judgment of God, and was the name of a prophet who, if not descended from the royal family of David, (as the Jews say) was of noble birth. When Daniel was very young, he was carried captive to Babylon, in the fourth year of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, in the year of the world 3398, and before Jesus Christ 606. He, with his three companions, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, was chosen to continue in Nebuchadnezzar's court; and he received a suitable education, and made great progress in all the sciences of the Chaldeans, but declined to pollute himself, by eating provisions from the king's table.

If we may believe the Apocrypha, the first occasion, on which Daniel discovered his wisdom, was in the deliverance of Susanna. (Dan. xiii. Apoc.) Some time after, Nebuchadnezzar, having dreamed that a large image, composed of several metals, was beaten to pieces by a stone, and believing this dream to be prophetic, was very desirous that it should be explained; but, as he had lost the recollection of it, he insisted that the Magi should recal it to his mind, as well as explain its meaning. This being impossible, they were condemned to death. Daniel recovered and explained the dream, and was, therefore, established governor of the province of Babylon, and chief of the Magi.

Another time, Nebuchadnezzar having dreamed that a large tree was cut down, but that its roots remained in the earth, Daniel explained it of the king himself, whose fate it prefigured.

Nebuchadnezzar was succeeded by Evil-merodach, under whose reign Daniel maintained his credit. Belshazzar succeeded Evil-merodach. In the reign of Belshazzar, Daniel had a vision of four beasts, which represented the four great empires of the Babylonians, the Persians, the Greeks, and the Romans. (Dan. vii.) In the following chapter, Daniel saw in a vision a ram and a he-goat pushing at each other with their horns. The he-goat denoted Alexander the Great; and the ram, Darius Codomannus, the last king of Persia. The ram was overcome; and the he-goat became extremely powerful. The prophet also describes the successors of Alexander.

Darius the Mede having succeeded Belshazzar, in the year of the world 3448, this prince promoted Daniel above all his governors, and designed to give him the general administration of his kingdom. This state of favour exciting the envy of the grandees, they engaged the king to make an edict, forbidding every one, during a time, to ask any thing from God or man, except from the king. However, Daniel continued his prayers to God three times a day, turning his face towards Jerusalem. His enemies, glad of this disobedience, informed the king, who was obliged to order him to be thrown into the lions' den. Early the next morning, Darius went thither, and finding Daniel safe, commanded him to be taken out, and his accusers, with their wives and families, to be thrown into the same den.

Daniel having read in Jeremiah, that seventy years would be accomplished in the desolation of Jerusalem, ardently prayed that God would remember his people, and restore them to their native land. After his devotion, the angel Gabriel appeared to him, and revealed to him something of much greater importance, even the death and sacrifice of the Messiah; which was to happen after seventy weeks of years, or four hundred and ninety years.

In the year of the world 3448, and in the third year of Cyrus's reign in Persia, which coincides with the first year of Darius at Babylon, Daniel had another remarkable vision, in which the angel Gabriel discovered to him, in a manner almost as clear as if he had related a history, what was to happen in Persia after Cyrus, (Dan. x.) he revealed to Daniel the coming of Alexander the Great, the overthrow of the Persian empire, the Greek dominion in Asia, the continued wars between the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, the tyranny of the papal antichrist, which was to spring up under the Roman empire, the general resurrection, and the time of the accomplishment of these great events.

After the death of Darius the Mede, Cyrus ascended the throne of the Medes and Persians. Daniel continued to enjoy great authority in his dominions.

The reputation of Daniel was so great even during his life, that it became a proverb; 'Thou art wiser than Daniel,' says Ezekiel, (xxviii. 3.) ironically, to the king of Tyre. In another part of the same prophet, (xiv. 14, 20.) God says, 'Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, they should deliver but their own souls by their righteousness.' It is believed that Daniel died in Chaldaea, and that he did not return to his own country, when Cyrus permitted the Jews to revisit their native land. Epiphanius says, that he died at Babylon; and in this sentiment he is followed by the generality of historians; but as the last of his visions took place at Susa on the Tigris, when he was ninety-four years of age, it is not improbable that he died in that city.

The name of Daniel is not prefixed to his book; but, as Dr. Prideaux observes, the many passages, in which he speaks in the first person, sufficiently prove that he was the author. The style of Daniel is not so lofty and figurative as that of the other prophets: it is clear and concise, and his narratives and descriptions are simple and natural. In short, he writes more like an historian than a prophet. He was a very extraordinary personage, and was more favoured by God, and honoured by men, than any who lived in his time. His prophecies concerning the coming of the Messiah, and the other great events of succeeding times, are so clear and explicit, that Porphyry objects, they must have been written after the events took place. The Jews do not reckon Daniel among the prophets; and they say, that he lived the life of a courtier in the palace of the king of Babylon, rather than that of a prophet. They add, that though he received divine revelations, yet these were only by dreams and visions of the night, which they consider as the most imperfect mode of revelation, and not strictly prophetic. However, Josephus, one of the most ancient writers of that nation, accounts him one of the greatest of the prophets, and says, that he conversed familiarly with God, and not only foretold future events, but also mentioned the time, in which they would happen. Our Saviour, by acknowledging Daniel as a prophet, (Matt. xxiv. 15.) fully establishes his prophetic character.

Part of the book of Daniel, from the fourth verse of the second, to the end of the seventh chapter, was originally written in the Chaldee language, because that portion treats of the Chaldean or Babylonish affairs; but the rest of the book is in Hebrew. The Greek translation, used by the Greek church in the East, was that of Theodotion. In the Vulgate Bible, are added, in the third chapter, after the twenty-third verse, The Song of the Three Children; and, at the end of the book, The History of Susannah, and of Bel and the Dragon, the former constituting the thirteenth, and the latter the fourteenth chapter. These additions were never received into the Jewish canon; and they are not extant in the Hebrew or Chaldee language.

Sir Isaac Newton observes, that of the old prophets Daniel is most distinct in order of time, and the easiest to be understood; and, therefore, in those events, which relate to the last times, he must be the interpreter of the rest. All his prophecies refer to each other, as if they were only several parts of one general prophecy. The first is the easiest to be understood, and every succeeding prophecy adds something to the former.

DARI'US, דָּרְיֹוֹשׁ, signifies he that inquires and informs himself, and was the name of several princes in history, some of whom are mentioned in Scripture.

1. DARIUS the Mede, spoken of in Daniel, (v. 31.; ix. 1.; xi. 1, &c.) was the son of Astyages, king of the Medes, and brother to Mandane, the mother of Cyrus, and to Amytis, the mother of Evil-merodach, and grandmother of Belshazzar. Darius the Mede, therefore, was uncle by the mother's side to Evil-merodach and Cyrus. The Septuagint, in Daniel vi. give him the name of Artaxerxes; the thirteenth, or apocryphal chapter, of Daniel, calls him Astyages; and Xenophon designates him by the name of Cyaxares. He succeeded Belshazzar, king of Babylon, his nephew's son, or his sister's grandson, in the year of the world 3448, according to Calmet, or in 3468, according to Usher. Daniel does not inform us of any previous war between them: but the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah supply this deficiency; whether they mean the wars between Darius the Mede and the Babylonians, or that which

2. DARIUS, the son of Hystaspes, has been supposed by some, on the authority of Archbishop Usher and Calmet, to be the Ahasuerus of Scripture, and the husband of Esther; but Dr. Prideaux thinks that Ahasuerus was Artaxerxes Longimanus. This prince recovered Babylon after a siege of twenty months. This city, which had been formerly the capital of the East, revolted from Persia, taking advantage of the revolutions that happened, first at the death of Cambyses, and afterwards on the massacre of the Magi. The Babylonians employed four years in preparations, and when they thought that their city was furnished with provisions for a long time, they raised the standard of rebellion. Darius levied an army in great haste, and besieged Babylon. The Babylonians shut themselves up within their walls, whose height and thickness secured them from assault; and as they had nothing to fear but famine, they assembled all their women and children, and strangled them, each reserving only his most beloved wife, and one servant. Thus was fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah. (xlvii. 7-9.) Some believe that the Jews were either expelled by the Babylonians, as being too much in the interest of Darius; or that, in obedience to the frequent admonitions of the prophets, they quitted that city, when they saw the people determined to rebel, (Isa. xlviii. 20. Jer. l. 8.; li. 6-9. Zech. xi. 6, 7.) Darius lay twenty months before Babylon, without making any considerable progress; but, at length, Zopyrus, one of his generals, obtained possession of the city by stratagem. Darius ordered the hundred gates of brass to be taken away, according to the prediction of Jeremiah, (li. 58.):—'Thus saith the Lord, the broad walls of Babylon shall be utterly broken, and her high gates shall be burnt with fire, and the people shall labour in vain.' This is related in Herodotus, (lib. iii.)

3. DARIUS CODOMANNUS was of the royal family of Persia, but very remote from the crown. He was in a low condition, when Bagoas, the eunuch, who had procured the destruction of two kings, Ochus and Arses, placed him on the throne. His true name was Codoman, and he did not take that of Darius till he was king. He was descended from Darius Nothus, whose son, Ostanes, was father to Arsames, that begat Codomannus. He was at first only a courtier to the emperor Ochus. But one day when he was with this prince's army, one of their enemies challenged the bravest of the Persians. Codomannus offered himself for the combat, and overcame the challenger, and was made governor of Armenia. From this situation, Bagoas placed him on the throne of Persia.

Alexander the Great invaded the Persian empire, and defeated Darius in three successive battles. After the third battle, Darius fled towards Media, in hopes of raising another army. At Ecbatane, the capital of Media, he gathered the remains of his forces, and some new levies. Alexander, having wintered at Babylon and Persepolis, took the field in search of Darius, who quitted Ecbatane, with an intention of retreating into Bactria; but, changing his resolution, Darius stopped short, and determined to hazard a battle, though his army at this time consisted only of forty thousand men. While he was preparing for this conflict, Bessus, governor of Bactria, and Nabazanes, a grandee of Persia, seized him, loaded him with chains, forced him into a covered chariot, and fled, carrying him with them, towards Bactria. If Alexander pursued them, they intended to purchase their peace by delivering Darius into his hands; but if not, to kill him, seize the crown, and renew the war.

Eight days after their departure, Alexander arrived at Ecbatane, and set out in pursuit of them, which he continued for eleven days; at length he stopped at Rages, in Media, despairing to overtake Darius. Thence he went into Parthia, where he learned what had happened to that unfortunate prince. After a precipitate march of many days, he overtook the traitors, who seeing themselves pressed, endeavoured to compel Darius to get upon horseback, and save himself with them; but he refusing, they stabbed him in several places, and left him expiring in his chariot. He was dead when Alexander arrived, who could not forbear weeping at so sad a spectacle. Alexander covered Darius with his own cloak, and sent him to Sisymbria his wife, that she might bury him in the tombs of the kings of Persia.

Thus were verified the prophecies of Daniel, (viii.) who had foretold the destruction of the Persian monarchy, under the idea of a ram, which butted with his horns westward, northward, and southward, and which nothing could resist: but a goat which had a very large horn between his eyes, and which denoted Alexander the Great, came from the west, and overran the world without touching the earth; springing forward with impetuosity, the goat ran against the ram with all his force, attacked him with fury, struck him, broke his two horns, trampled him under foot, and no one could rescue the ram. Nothing can be clearer than these prophecies.

DARKNESS, absence, privation, or want of natural light. We are told in Genesis, (i. 2.) that 'darkness was on the face of the deep,' that is, chaos was immersed in thick darkness, because light was withheld from it. The most terrible darkness was that brought on Egypt as a plague. (Exod. x. 21, 22.) The inhabitants of England and Holland, says a commentator on this place, have frequent opportunities of contemplating darkness, by means of fogs, &c. which in the climate of Egypt would be altogether miraculous. Where the air is so clear as scarcely to form clouds, those clouds can much less appear in the state of that thick vapour, which a fog in London sometimes assumes. We frequently say, 'the fog is so thick that it may be cut with a knife'; and this phrase appears to be perfectly analogous to the expression of the sacred writer, 'darkness which may be felt.' The duration of this fog is marked as being three days; which is probably to be taken in the Hebrew sense as denoting the close of the first day, the whole of the second, and beginning of the third day. The expressions, 'they could not see each other, nor did they rise from their places,' are to be understood rather at large, because artificial lights, as lamps, flambeaux, &c. were in use, though these probably afforded only an obscure solemnity of illumination. This kind of dim half light would astonish the inhabitants of Egypt, who would rather sit at home, than venture abroad, and endeavour at their personal risk to visit their friends, or to follow their occupations:

Find out their uncouth way.

The author of the Book of Wisdom has indulged his fancy on the subject of this darkness.

The darkness at our Saviour's death, began at the sixth hour, that is, at noon; and it ended at the ninth hour, that is, at three o'clock in the afternoon. It therefore continued nearly the whole time that our Saviour was upon the cross. Compare Matt. xxvii. 45. with John xix. 14. and Mark xv. 25. It is generally thought that this darkness covered Judea only, which is sometimes expressed by all the land, &c. By what was this darkness occasioned? The nature of eclipses is so well known among us, that we need not explain how they are occasioned by the intervention of the moon, hiding the face of the sun; or by the shadow of the earth falling on the moon. It is also well known, that the Jewish feasts were regulated by the moon's course and age; and that at this time a natural eclipse of the sun by the moon was impossible, the moon being now at full. What was the real secondary cause of this suspension of the solar light in this country, we cannot determine. Was it a cometary body passing so near the earth as to hide the face of the sun for a time? Was it a body of extremely dense clouds? Was it a foggy exhalation rising from the earth, and enveloping the atmosphere in gloom and obscurity? It may be rationally inquired, whether the cause of this darkness was not in the earth, or in its atmosphere, rather than in the sun, or occasioned by any celestial body. Is it quite certain, that the word scotos, used by three of the Evangelists, signifies an eclipse of the sun? Might not such dense vapours, as our fogs sometimes are, cause an obscurity impenetrable by the solar light, or at least very little penetrable by it? We are not obliged to suppose that it was a pitchy darkness; and, therefore, we may venture to incline to the opinion, that our earth, or its atmosphere, or both, furnished the principles of that interposing medium, which shadowed Jerusalem at this time, and kept the rays of the sun from that city and its neighbourhood.

'It may be ascribed,' says Mr. Bloomfield, 'to an extraordinary and præternatural obscuration of the solar light, which might precede and accompany the earthquake.' For before an earthquake, say the naturalists, such a mist arises from sulphureous vapours, as to occasion a darkness almost nocturnal.' DAVID, דָּוִד, signifies well-beloved, dear, and was the name of the son of Jesse, of the tribe of Judah, and town of Bethlehem. After the rejection of Saul, the first king of Israel, as to the descent of the crown in his family, the Lord sent Samuel to Bethlehem, to anoint a son of Jesse to be the future king. Samuel coming to Jesse, Jesse produced his seven sons, one after another; but he who was to reign was not among them. Jesse, therefore, sent for David, who, according to Calmet, was about fifteen, or, as Usher thinks, twenty-two years of age, and on whom Samuel conferred an unction in the midst of his brethren. After this, David returned to his ordinary occupation of feeding his father's flocks. (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 2, &c.) The birth of David took place in the year of the world 2919, and his anointing by Samuel, according to Calmet, in 2934, or, according to Usher, in 2941.

In the same year, in which Samuel went to Bethlehem, in the opinion of Usher, Saul fell into a dismal state of melancholy, and was advised to send for David, who, by playing on some musical instrument, might relieve him. David had obtained the reputation of an expert musician, and also of a sober, discreet, and valiant youth. David acquitted himself so well before Saul, that the king appointed him his armour-bearer; an office probably in some respects similar to that of our aid-de-camp to the king, but perhaps of no great advantage, except when in actual service. When Saul became better, David returned to his father's house.

of extraordinary strength, insulted Israel by a challenge. At this time, Jesse sent David to the camp, where he had three sons, to inquire after their welfare. David, hearing that this giant had defied Israel, declared he would encounter him. This declaration being reported to the king, he sent for him, and told him he was too young to attack such a man. But David answered by relating instances of his success against wild beasts, and observed, that the same Almighty power, which had formerly delivered him, would at this time protect and preserve him. Saul admiring David's courage, would have accoutred him in his own armour, but David declined it as too heavy, and impeding his free motion. With his sling and five well chosen stones, he marched against Goliath, who, advancing, and observing him to be a youth of a beautiful and fresh complexion, despised him. David, undismayed, slung at him a stone, which struck him so violently in the middle of his forehead, that he fell on the ground. David immediately ran upon him, drew Goliath's sword, and cut off his head. The Philistines seeing their hero killed, fled, and were pursued by the Hebrews.

When Saul saw David going against this Philistine, he inquired of Abner who he was? Abner answered that he did not know. It has seemed strange to commentators, that Saul, to whom David had so lately played on the harp, and who had appointed him armour-bearer, should not now know David. But it does not appear that David had been a regular attendant on the person of Saul; nor whether he had often played before Saul; nor under what circumstances of dress, place, &c. Perhaps, Saul, like insane persons among us, was kept private in some dark apartment; or, it is not improbable, that David played in a separate apartment, &c. Any of these ideas resolve this difficulty. It does not appear, that even Jonathan had previously seen David, at least not familiarly. Abner presented David to the king, with the head and sword of Goliath in his hands. From this instant, Jonathan, son of Saul, conceived for David a great affection, which continued ever after.

When Saul and David returned from this expedition, the women of Israel met them, singing, 'Saul has killed his thousands, and David his ten thousands.' This so enraged Saul against David, that from this time he looked on him with an evil eye. Though he retained David in his service, and gave him the command of some troops, yet he refused to bestow on him his daughter in marriage, agreeably to the promise he had made to the person that should kill Goliath. (1 Sam. xvii. 25.) The next day Saul being returned home, his distemper seized him, and David played on a harp before him. Saul had in his hand a spear, with which he attempted twice to kill David; but David avoided the blow, and this increased Saul's aversion to him.

Michal, Saul's second daughter, entertaining kind thoughts of David, her father was extremely pleased, and signified to him, that to merit the honour of becoming the king's son-in-law, he required only an hundred foreskins of the Philistines. Saul's design in this was, that David might fall by the hands of the Philistines. David, with his people, killed two hundred Philistines, and brought their foreskins to the king. Saul, therefore, could no longer refuse him his daughter; but he did not lay aside the intention of destroying him. His distemper again possessing Saul, David played on the harp before him. The king endeavoured to pierce him with his lance; but he avoided the blow, and fled to his house. (1 Sam. xix. 10.)

David having thus repeatedly escaped from Saul's malice, went to Samuel at Ramah, and related to him what had passed; and they went together to Naioth. David, not thinking himself secure at Naioth, secretly visited Jonathan, who encouraged him, and promised to discover Saul's real disposition towards him, distinct from his disease. As this proved altogether inimical to David, the two friends renewed protestations of perpetual kindness; and David retired to the high-priest Ahimelech, at Nob, to whom he pretended that the king had sent him on business that required haste. (1 Sam. xxi.) Ahimelech gave him Goliath's sword, which was deposited in the tabernacle, and some of the shew-bread, taken the preceding day from the golden table.

David, not thinking himself safe in Saul's territories, retired to Achish, king of Gath. He was soon known, and was preserved either by counterfeiting madness, as some think, or by a real epilepsy, as others suppose. Hence he went to Adullam, where his relations and others resorted to him, and formed an army of about four hundred men. The prophet Gad advised him to return into the land of Judah, where Abiathar the priest joined him, bringing the priestly ornaments. The Philistines having invaded the threshing floors of Keilah, David immediately attacked and dispersed them. Saul understanding that David was at Keilah, marched against him; but David retreated into the deserts of Maon. Saul pursued him; but being informed that the Philistines had invaded the land, he desisted from the pursuit.

David being delivered from this danger, retired to the wilderness of Engedi, whither Saul soon followed him with three thousand men. Saul entering a cave, on some natural necessity, David, who lay there concealed with his men, went softly, and cut off the skirts of his robe, without his perceiving it. When Saul was got to some distance, David went out, and calling to him, showed him the skirt of his raiment, and remonstrated with him on his innocence. Saul was so touched with what David said, that he shed tears, and acknowledged David's integrity; but he made him swear that he would not exterminate his family, when he should be advanced to the throne. (1 Sam. xxiv.)

David, in the wilderness of Maon, protected the flocks of Nabal, not only from his own people, but also from the thievish tribes of wandering Arabs, who seize as prey every thing they can find. For this service he requested a present from Nabal; but Nabal refusing, David's anger prompted him to destroy Nabal and all his family. With this resolution he set forward; but Abigail, Nabal's wife, made presents to David, and stopped his indignation. For this David was very thankful to God. Nabal died, and David married Abigail.

The Ziphites, knowing that David lay concealed in the hill of Hachilah, informed Saul, who marched against him with three thousand men. (1 Sam. xxvi.) But David by night got into Saul's tent, and took his spear and cruse of water, and went away without discovery. When on the other side of the hill, he called to Abner, and reprimanded him as a bad sentinel, but told him that the king was safe.

After this, Achish, king of Gath, (1 Sam. xxvii.) gave David Ziklag for an habitation. From this place he made several excursions against the Amalekites, and the people of Geshur and Gezri; and in these expeditions he killed all with whom he fought, that no one might discover where he had been. He brought all the cattle to Achish, and reported that they were from the south of Judah, &c. Achish did not scruple to carry David with him to war against Saul; but the other princes of the Philistines prevailed with Achish to dismiss him. This dismissal was, doubtless, very agreeable to David. (1 Sam. xxviii. xxix.) On his return to Ziklag, after a march of three days, David discovered that the Amalekites, in revenge for his incursions, had, during his absence, pillaged and burned it, and carried away all the property and all the persons. David and his people pursued and attacked them, cut them in pieces, and recovered the booty.

In the battle fought between the Philistines and Hebrews, upon Mount Gilboa, Saul was slain, with Jonathan his son. (1 Sam. xxxi.) Three days after, an Amalekite brought the news to David, boasted that he had assisted Saul in dispatching himself, and presented David with Saul's diadem and bracelet. David and all his people lamented the death of Saul, and the defeat of the Israelites. David composed a mournful song in honour of Saul and Jonathan; and he ordered the Amalekite to be slain, who boasted that he had laid hands on the Lord's anointed.

David, by God's direction, removed with his family and forces to Hebron, where the tribe of Judah acknowledged him as their king. (2 Sam. ii.) Ishbosheth, son of Saul, reigned at Mahanaim over the other tribes. Ishbosheth having reprimanded Abner, his general, the latter went to David, and promised to render him master of all Israel; but he was treacherously killed by Joab, at the gate of Hebron. David was extremely displeased with this action; but Joab had so much influence over his soldiers, that he could not avenge it. He, therefore, contented himself with declaring publicly his detestation of it, and with making a magnificent funeral for Abner.

Ishbosheth being assassinated soon after, David punished the murderers, and was proclaimed king over all the tribes, in the year of the world 2957. He expelled the Jebusites from Jerusalem, where he fixed his residence. The Philistines advanced twice to Jerusalem, and encamped near the city; but they were defeated by David, and obliged to return home. Some time after, David removed the ark of the Lord from Kirjath-jearim to Jerusalem; but on the death of Uzzah, he left it near the city in the house of Obededom. However, he brought it soon after to his own palace; and when Michal rallied him for dancing, as she thought, in an indecent manner before it, he reproved her with equal humility and zeal. David finding himself at peace, formed the design of building a temple to the Lord; and the prophet Nathan applauded his intention. However, the night following, God discovered to this prophet that this honour was reserved for David's son, because David had shed blood. Yet, David prepared gold, silver, copper, iron, and wood, for that edifice.

After this, David fought the Philistines, (2 Sam. viii.) and freed Israel from these enemies, and also from the Moabites, whom he treated with a severity, for which we are not well acquainted with the motives, nor indeed with the circumstances. He likewise subdued all Syria; made an expedition as far as the Euphrates; and conquered the eastern Edomites in the valley of Salt.

Nahash, king of the Ammonites, being dead, David sent compliments of condolence to his son and successor. But the great men about that king persuaded him, that David sent these men as spies to observe his forces, and that he intended to wage war against him. The credulous young prince affronted the ambassadors; and David sent against Nahash an army under the command of Joab, by whom the Ammonites, together with the Syrians, were routed. The next year, which was the year of the world 2968, David marched in person against the Ammonites, who had received succours from the Syrians beyond the Euphrates. These were entirely dispersed. However, David the year following resolved to subdue Rabbah, the capital of the Ammonites; and he sent Joab with the army, whilst he continued at Jerusalem.

David rising one day from his bed, after reposing at noon, and walking upon his terrace, saw Bathsheba bathing herself in a place belonging to her house. She was the wife of Uriah the Hittite, who was at that time with Joab. (2 Sam. xi.) David sent for her, and lay with her. Soon after, she sent him intelligence that she was with child. To conceal his crime, and secure her honour, David sent for Uriah, and advised him to pass the night with his wife; but as he did not comply, the king sent him with letters to Joab, who was commanded so to manage, that Uriah might be killed by the Ammonites. These orders were punctually executed. When David was informed of this, he married Bathsheba, and took her home. This misdeed was extremely displeasing to God. All Israel was scandalized at it; and the very strangers took occasion of blaspheming the name of the Lord. (2 Sam. xii. 14.) Nathan, by God's appointment, visited David, and, under the parable of a rich man, who had taken from a poor man the only ewe-lamb he had, obliged David to condemn himself. (2 Sam. xii.) Nathan foretold, that, as a punishment for this crime, his house should be filled with blood, that his wives should be abused in the sight of the world, and that the child born of this adultery should die, as it accordingly did a few days after.

Joab having reduced Rabbah to extremity, invited David to come and take the place. David went, took the city, and plundered it, and ordered the people to be subjected to the most cruel labours. This was probably before he was brought to repentance on account of his criminal connection with Bathsheba.

As the beginning of David's predicted punishment, Amnon having ravished Tamar, was slain by Absalom, who fled, but after two years was brought back by Joab's management. Yet, Absalom soon abused his father's indulgence, and aspired to the royal dignity, in the year of the world 2980, and before Jesus Christ 1024. He went to Hebron with a number of people, and was there acknowledged king. David fled from Jerusalem with a design of crossing Jordan. Hushai the Archite, intended to accompany him; but David told him he would be more serviceable in the city, by pretending to adhere to Absalom, and defeating the counsels of Ahithophel. David had scarcely passed Mount Olivet, when Ziba, the servant of Mephibosheth, a son of Saul, met him with a couple of asses laden with provisions, which he presented to the king. (2 Sam. xvi.) David asked why Mephibosheth did not come? Ziba replied, that he stayed in Jerusalem, in hopes of being made king. David too credulously, in his confusion of mind, gave the crafty Ziba the whole inheritance of his master. David having arrived near Bahurim, Shimei loaded him with curses; but David endured all with a patience, which showed his remorse for his past iniquity. Absalom followed David to Mahanaim, and a battle ensued, in which Absalom's army was defeated, and he hanging by the hair upon a tree, was run through and killed by Joab. The news of Absalom's death overwhelmed the king with sorrow; but Joab representing to him how much his interests would suffer by this conduct, he showed himself publicly to the people, and began his return to Jerusalem. The tribe of Judah met him; but Sheba, son of Bichri, sounded the trumpet, (2 Sam. xx.) saying, 'We have no part in David, neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse. Every man to his tents, O Israel.' Israel, therefore, followed Sheba; but Judah adhered to David, and Sheba was afterwards slain in Abel.

The land being afflicted by a famine of three years' continuance, the oracle of the Lord reminded David of the blood of the Gibeonites unjustly shed by Saul. David, therefore, asked the Gibeonites what satisfaction they required; and they demanded seven of Saul's sons to be hanged in Gibeah. With this David complied, in the year of the world 2983, and before Jesus Christ 1021. (2 Sam. xxi.)

Some years after, David proudly and obstinately commanded the people to be numbered. On this enumeration Mr. Baruch observes, "It is said in Samuel, (2 Sam. xxiv.) that Joab found the Israelites to be eight hundred thousand men, and the men of Judah five hundred thousand; whereas Chronicles, (1 Chron. xxi.) says, that Joab found Israel to be one million one hundred thousand, and those of Judah only four hundred and seventy thousand.—Let it be observed, that it appears by Chronicles, (xxvii.) that there were twelve divisions of generals, who commanded monthly, and whose duty was to keep guard near the king's person, each having a body of troops consisting of twenty-four thousand men, which, jointly, formed a grand army of two hundred and eighty-eight thousand; and as a separate body of twelve thousand men naturally attended on the twelve princes of the twelve tribes, mentioned in the same chapter, the whole will be three hundred thousand; which is the difference between the two accounts, of eight hundred thousand, and of one million one hundred thousand. As to the men of Israel, the author of Samuel does not take notice of the three hundred thousand, because they were in the actual service of the king, as a standing army, and therefore there was no need to number them; but Chronicles joins them to the rest, saying expressly, 'all those of Israel were one million one hundred thousand;' whereas the author of Samuel, who reckons only the eight hundred thousand, does not say 'all those of Israel,' but barely, 'and Israel were,' &c. It must also be observed that, exclusive of the troops before mentioned, there was an army of observation on the frontiers of the Philistines' country, composed of thirty thousand men, as appears by 2 Sam. vi. 1, which, it seems, were included in the number of five hundred thousand of the people of Judah, by the author of Samuel; but the author of Chronicles, who mentions only four hundred and seventy thousand, gives the number of that tribe, exclusive of those thirty thousand men, because they were not all of the tribe of Judah, and therefore does not say 'all those of Judah,' as he had said 'all those of Israel,' but only 'and those of Judah;' and thus both accounts may be reconciled, by only having recourse to other parts of Scripture, treating on the same subject, which will ever be found the best method of explaining difficult passages."

God being much offended at this numbering of the people by David, sent the prophet Gad to him to offer him the choice of three punishments; either that the land should be afflicted with a famine during seven years, or that he should flee three months before his enemies, or that a pestilence should rage during three days. David chose the last; and, during the three days of pestilence, seventy thousand persons died. Yet, the sentence was not executed with full rigour. David, as an act of thanksgiving, erected an altar in the threshing floor, where, some are of opinion, the temple was afterwards built. (2 Sam. xxiv.)

The king, being old, could scarcely receive any warmth. A young woman, therefore, named Abishag, being brought to him, lay with him, and attended him, but continued a virgin. At this time, Adonijah, his fourth son, set up the equipage of a king, and formed a party. Nathan, knowing the promises of David in favour of Solomon, informed Bathsheba, who claimed those promises. David, therefore, gave orders that Solomon should be mounted upon his own mule, conducted to Gihon, and there anointed king.

David, perceiving himself near his end, sent for Solomon, put into his hands the plans and models of the temple, with the gold and silver prepared for it, charged him to be constantly faithful to God, and advised him not to suffer Joab to go unpunished, and to punish Shimei. Dr. Kennicott, however, suggests that the negative should be repeated, so as to give a quite opposite sense to the injunction respecting Shimei.

He died at the age of 71, in the year of the world 2990, and before Jesus Christ 1014. He reigned seven years and a half at Hebron, and thirty-three in Jerusalem, in all forty years. Fragments attached to Calmet's Dictionary. No. xxxvii. p. 62.

DAVIDISTS, a singular and ridiculous sect, founded by David George, a native of Delft, and a member of the Anabaptists. This enthusiast, after having founded the Davidists, or David-Georgians, deserted the Anabaptists, and removed in 1544 to Basil in Switzerland, where he changed his name to John Bruck. He is said to have called himself the Son of God, the Fountain of divine wisdom; to have denied the existence of angels, good and evil, of heaven and hell; to have rejected the doctrine of a future judgment; and to have trampled on all the rules of decency and morality with the greatest contempt. In all this, however, it is possible that there may be much exaggeration. Yet, he was led to such a high degree of fanaticism, that, rejecting as mean and useless the external services of piety, he reduced religion to contemplation, silence, and a certain frame or habit of soul, which it is equally difficult to define and to understand. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iv. p. 164.

DAY is distinguished into natural, astronomical, civil, and artificial. Another distinction of the day may be termed prophetical.

The prophets are the only persons, who call years days; of this is an example in the explanation, which is given of Daniel's seventy weeks. The natural day is one revolution of the sun. The astronomical day is one revolution of the equator, added to that portion of it through which the sun has passed in one natural day. The civil day is that whose beginning and end are determined by the custom of any nation.

The Hebrews began their day in the evening, (Levit. xxiii. 32.) 'From even unto even shall ye celebrate your sabbath.' The Babylonians reckoned their days from sunrise; some reckon from sun set; but the greatest part of Europe, from midnight.

This day, or to-day, not only signifies the particular day, on which we are speaking, but any indefinite time; as we say, the people of the present day, or time.

DEACON, δακωνος, signifies a minister, servant, or attendant. This word is sometimes used in the New Testament to denote any one that ministers in the service of God; and in this sense bishops and presbyters are styled deacons. It is, however, generally used to signify the third order of the clergy. The first seven deacons were Stephen, Philip, Prochorus, Nicanor, Timon, Parmenas, and Nicolas.

These were presented to the apostles, and ordained by prayer, and the imposition of hands. (Acts vi. 1, &c.) St. Paul, (1 Tim. iii. 8, 12,) requires, that a deacon should be chaste, sincere, and blameless, neither a great drinker, nor given to filthy lucre; that he should hold the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience; be well approved before admission; be the husband of one wife, and rule well his own house and family, &c.

The apostles, before they left any city, in which they had preached and made converts, selected from their congregations a certain number of proper persons, whom they ordained deacons and presbyters. The forms of ordination, and the power, which they communicated, were different. The deacons were inferior to the presbyters; and their office consisted in taking care of such things as belonged to the public service. They also assisted the presbyters in the administration of the eucharist; but they were not allowed to consecrate the elements. They were permitted to baptize; and it was their peculiar duty to attend to every thing which related to the poor. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christ. Theology; Dr. Gregory's Church Hist.; Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 83.

DEACONESS, a woman that served the church in those offices, which the deacons could not with propriety exercise themselves. This order was also appointed in the apostolic age. They were generally widows, who had been only once married, though this employment was sometimes exercised by virgins. Their office consisted in assisting at the baptism of women, in previously catechising and instructing them, in visiting sick persons of their own sex, and in performing all those inferior offices towards the female part of the congregation, which the deacons were designed to execute for the men.

St. Paul, (Rom. xvi.) speaks of Phebe as servant, or deaconess, of the church at Cenchrea, which was a haven of Corinth. Deaconesses appear to be the same persons as those, whom Pliny in his famous letter to Trajan styles, 'Ancillis quæ ministræ dicebantur,' that is, 'female attendants, who were called assistants, ministers, or servants.' It appears, then, that these were customary officers throughout the churches; and when the fury of persecution fell on Christians, these were among the first to suffer. They underwent the most cruel tortures, and even extreme old age was not spared. Suicer's Thesaurus; Lardner's Test. vol. ii. p. 42.

DEAD SEA. See ASPHAR.

DEATH is generally defined the separation of the soul from the body. Adam, having eaten of the forbidden fruit, incurred the penalty of death for himself and all his posterity. Had he continued obedient to God, in all probability he had not died; and the fruit of the tree of life might be intended to preserve him in a happy state of constant health. Perhaps too, after a long life, God might have translated him, by some easy mutation, into a life absolutely immortal.

It was natural that the Hebrews should have great consideration for the dead, since they believed the soul's immortality, and a resurrection of the body. When an Israelite died in any house or tent, all persons and furniture in it contracted a pollution. (Numb. xix. 14, 15, 16.) All who touched the body of one that died, or was killed, in the open fields; and all who touched his bones, or his grave, were impure seven days. To expiate this pollution, they formerly took the ashes of a red heifer, sacrificed by the high priest on the day of solemn expiation. (Numb. xix. 3, 4, 5, 6.) These they threw into a vessel of water. A person who was clean then dipped a bunch of hyssop in the water, and sprinkled with it the furniture, the chamber, and those polluted. This ceremony was performed on the third and seventh day. It was also required, that the polluted person should bathe his whole body, and wash his clothes on the seventh day. Since the destruction of the temple, and the sacrifice of the red heifer has ceased, the Jews do not consider themselves as polluted by a dead body. Some modern Jews, however, affirm that they still constantly observe the prohibition; and that they always quit the house, in which a death is expected, and avoid entering one, in which a death has recently happened. All present where any person has just expired, tear their clothes, according to the ancient custom of the Hebrews; but they tear only the extremities about the breadth of their hand, and this more from ceremony than sorrow. It is an old custom with them to pour all the water in the house, &c. into the street. The Rabbins say, that the destroying angel washes in this water the sword with which he killed the sick person, and that by this means the water is rendered poisonous. Then they place the body on a sheet spread on the pavement, turn his thumb inward to his hand, and light a wax taper at his feet, or head. After this, they wash the body, put on it a shirt, and over the shirt a garment of fine linen, which he wore on the day of solemn expiation; then his taled, which is a piece of square cloth with tufts. Lastly, they put a white cap on his head, and shut him up in his coffin. It appears to have been an ancient custom in Palestine, to embalm the bodies of persons of distinction and fortune; but this was not general. St. John remarks, that our Saviour was wrapped in linen cloths, and rubbed with perfumes, as the manner of the Jews is to bury. (John xix. 40.) We read that either with, or near, the bodies of some kings of Judah, abundance of spices was burnt, (2 Chron. xxi. 19.); but it cannot be affirmed that this was a custom. (Jerem. xxxiv. 5.)

Jesus Christ, by his death, has subdued the power of death, and merited for us a blessed immortality. Not that the soul, mortal before, has been rendered by him immortal, or that he has merited for us the privilege of not dying; for he has not changed the nature of our souls, or exempted us from the necessity of dying. But he has given us the life of grace in this world, and has merited for us a happy immortality, provided the merits of his death be applied by faith.

A frequent and attentive prospect of that moment, which must put a period to all our schemes, and deprive us of all our acquisitions, is of the utmost efficacy to the just and rational regulation of our lives; nor would ever any thing wicked, or often any thing absurd, be undertaken or prosecuted by him, who should begin every day with a serious reflection that he is born to die. The disturbers of our happiness in this world, are our desires, our griefs, and our fears, and to all these the consideration of mortality is a certain and adequate remedy. The frequent contemplation of death, as it shows the vanity of all human good, discovers also the lightness of all terrestrial evil, which certainly can last no longer than the subject on which it acts, and must, therefore, be shorter in proportion to its violence. The most cruel calamity, which misfortune can produce, must by the necessity of nature be quickly at an end. The soul cannot long be held in prison, but will fly away, and leave a lifeless body to human malice. We ought, therefore, to mitigate the evil and terror of death, by considering the evils and miseries of life. If we look on death as a reprieve from all the evils and miseries we endure, we shall be reconciled to it; and if we are wise, we shall be glad to obtain a release from all the dangers and sufferings, to which we are liable on earth. We should be even thankful to God that we were born to die, and that we may begin another and more happy life, which shall never have an end. We should also endeavour to maintain a lively sense of death in our minds, that we may be as much under its power, as if it were just approaching. We should be always thinking of that which may happen the next moment, that whenever our Lord comes we may be found watching. To do this effectually, it should be our constant prayer to God, that he would prepare us for our dissolution, and assist and comfort us in that particularly needful time. Without his gracious aid and support, the physicians and the ministers of God are only miserable comforters. It should be our daily petition to God, that he would enable us to perform this last act of our life with decency and constancy of mind, that neither our disease, nor our weakness, may destroy the firmness of our spirits, and cause us to be amazed with fear, or filled with peevishness. In general, death is not attended with much suffering; and very frequently it is attended with no suffering. This, however, is uncertain, and we should be prepared to endure pain with patience and resignation, at whatever period of our lives it be sent to us. We know not the degree of pain, which we are appointed to suffer in this life: but we do know, what is far more important, that after death dreadful sufferings are prepared for those, who do not repent. We ought, therefore, to consider this, and seek the Lord while he may be found. Those, who enjoy health and strength, should never neglect the duty they owe to their dying friends, on account of any pain, which it may give to themselves. Many useful lessons are to be learned in the house of mourning. If an opportunity offer of showing them that death is not really terrible to a Christian, it may be to them a very useful lesson. They should learn never to flee from distress, which they can relieve, but to be kind and compassionate; and they should learn the vanity of all earthly things, by seeing that they lead only to the grave. These reflections will not rob a man of happiness while he is young, and they will secure his possession of it when he is old. They will teach him to remember his Creator in the days of his youth; they will teach him to fear God, and to know no other fear. Death is an awful change to all, but it should be an object of terror only to wicked men. To them, indeed, it is dreadful beyond the power of language; but it must be endured by them and by all. 'It is appointed to men once to die, but after this the judgment.' This ought to make every man tremble, who has not reason to hope for the mercy of God; but only to such men death is terrible. To the humble follower of Christ this last enemy appears as a kind friend. To him death is the road to life. It has no terror in the eyes of the true believer. He views it only as the gate of heaven, the appointed path to eternal joy. Death will end all his sorrows, confirm all his hopes, seal the pardon of all his sins, and crown all his virtues. Death has no power to keep the Christian from his Saviour and his God. Like the great Captain of his salvation, he will rise triumphant from the tomb; he will look back on this world as on a dream when one awaketh; he will view its pleasures with contempt, and its sorrows with a smile. These are the blessings of redeeming love, these are the hopes, and these the prospects of the dying Christian.

In Scripture death denotes, first, the separation of the soul from the body, or the first death; secondly, the second death, that is eternal damnation; thirdly, any great danger or imminent risk of death; fourthly, the plague, and contagious diseases; and, fifthly, poison, and great calamity. 'The gates of death,' signify the grave; 'instruments of death,' dangerous and deadly weapons; 'bonds,' or snares of death, snares intended to produce death; and 'the dust of death' denotes the state of the body in the grave. Johnson's Rambler; Tillotson's Sermons; Sermons on the Doctrines and Duties of Christianity.

DEBT, an obligation to be discharged by the party bound to perform it. This may be either special or general. Special obligations are those, by which the party has bound himself to perform something in return for a favour received. General obligations are those, to which a man is bound by his situation as a man, as a member of civil society, as a member of Christian society, &c. Whoso shall swear by the gold of the temple, by the gift on the altar, is a debtor, is bound by his oath, and obliged to fulfil his vow. (Matt. xxiii. 16.) Paul was debtor to both Jews and Gentiles; under obligations to persons of all nations. (Rom. i. 14.) 'He is a debtor—is bound—to perform the whole law.' (Gal. v. 3.) Men may be debtors to human justice, or to divine justice; that is, bound to obedience, and if that be not complied with, bound to suffer the penalties annexed to transgression. Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

DECALOGUE, the ten commandments delivered by God to Moses. They were engraven by God on two tables of stone, and delivered to the Hebrews as the basis of their religion. The Jews, by way of eminence, call these commandments the ten words; and hence they afterwards obtained the name of Decalogue. The Jews, however, joined the first and second into one, and divided the last into two. They understand that against stealing to relate to the stealing of men, or kidnapping, and allege that the stealing of another person's goods or property is forbidden in the last commandment.

Most divines, says the learned Spencer, seem to think, that God gave the Decalogue to be a general rule of life and manners, and as a summary to which all other precepts, either of the Law or the Gospel, may be reduced. 'To offer my opinion in a few words,' continues he, 'the chief scope and intent of the Decalogue were to root out idolatry and its more immediate effects, and to add force and authority to the other laws contained in the Pentateuch. For who can persuade himself, that God would have collected into one short system those ten precepts, which have scarcely any connection with each other, had they not all naturally tended to destroy idolatry and its primary effects!'

DECREE, a determination, or appointment, judicial, civil, ecclesiastical, or divine. Judicial decrees are intended to determine litigation and controversy between one man and another; civil decrees refer to the purposes of society; ecclesiastical decrees are appointments for the promotion of piety. All these, though well intended, may err; but the divine appointments never err, being founded on truth, judgment, perfect wisdom, and perfect knowledge, united with perfect goodness, kindness, and grace.

Calvin contended for absolute unconditional decrees of God, and irresistible grace, and asserted that God, in predestinating from all eternity one part of mankind to everlasting happiness, and another to endless misery, was led to make this distinction solely by his own good pleasure and free will. But, observes Bishop Tomline, "We are not required to believe that God, from all eternity, absolutely decreed, that certain persons only should be saved, or that he gives an irresistible grace to some men which he denies to others: such a mode of proceeding would be as destructive of human freedom, as it would be repugnant to the perfections of the divine nature. If we believe that God is infinitely just and merciful, we must believe that he has equally enabled every man born into the world to work out his salvation, though we know so little of the divine government, that in many cases we cannot discern how that impartiality is maintained. This ignorance should lead us to be very cautious in what we pronounce concerning the decrees and counsels of God; it should make us reluctant to speculate upon these awful and mysterious subjects, and solicitous to avoid the pernicious error of aiming at being 'wise above that which is written.' The prescience of God, as extending to every instance of human conduct, from the creation of man, to the final consummation of all things, is a fit object of our belief; but we are utterly incapable of comprehending how this prescience consists with the other attributes of the Deity, and with the free-agency of man; nor can we conceive how those future contingencies, which depend upon the determination of the human will, should be certain and infallible; and yet, that they are so, is fully proved by the accurate accomplishment of prophecies. Rather than bewilder ourselves in the inextricable difficulties of such contemplations, to which our limited faculties are by no means competent, we should exclaim with the pious and humble Psalmist, 'Such knowledge is too wonderful and excellent for us, we cannot attain unto it.'" Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christ. Theology, vol. ii. p. 300; Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

DECRETALS, letters said to have been written by the pontiffs of primitive times, on certain points or questions in the ecclesiastical law. The Decretal Epistles were the productions of an obscure writer, who fraudulently prefixed to them the name of Isidore, bishop of Seville, that it might be thought they had been collected by that illustrious and learned prelate. Some of them had appeared in the eighth century, but in the ninth century they were entirely drawn from their obscurity, and produced with an air of ostentation and triumph, to demonstrate the supremacy of the Roman pontiffs. There is every reason to believe, that those Decretals were forged with the knowledge and consent of the Roman pontiffs; since it is utterly incredible, that those pontiffs should, for many ages, have constantly appealed, in support of their pretended rights and privileges, to acts and records, which were only the fictions of private persons. Public deeds were necessary to accomplish the views of papal ambition. In the ninth century, forgeries were considered lawful, on account of their supposed tendency to promote the glory of God, and to advance the prosperity of the church. It is, therefore, not surprising, that the good pontiffs should feel no remorse in imposing on the world frauds and forgeries, which were intended to enrich the patrimony of St. Peter, and to aggrandize his successors in the apostolic see. At the desire of Gregory IX., the Decretals were collected into five books in the thirteenth century; and towards the conclusion of the same century, Boniface VIII. caused another collection to be made, which was intitled The Sixth Book of Decretals. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. p. 126; iii. p. 28; Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. i. p. 474.

DEDICATION, a religious ceremony by which any person or thing is solemnly consecrated, or set apart to the service of God, and the purposes of religion. Moses dedicated the tabernacle built in the wilderness, (Exod. xl. Numb. vii.) Solomon dedicated the temple, which he erected. (1 Kings viii.) The Israelites, who returned from the Babylonish captivity, dedicated their new temple, and on the day of this dedication sacrificed a great number of victims. (Ezra vi. 16, 17.) The Maccabees having cleansed the temple, which had been polluted by Antiochus Epiphanes, again dedicated the altar. (1 Macc. iv.) When Nehemiah had finished the gates and walls of Jerusalem, he dedicated them. (Nehem. xii. 27.) The dedication of houses, according to the Rabbins, was performed by pronouncing a certain blessing, while some particular words of the law written on parchment, rolled up in a cane, or hollow stick, were fastened to the door-post. From the Jews is derived the custom of dedicating churches and chapels among Christians. Selden says, that the practice of dedicating was derived from the Jews to the Heathens. On the contrary, Spencer ascribes the dedications of the Jews to a Pagan origin.

DEFILEMENT. Under the law, many were those blemishes of person and conduct, which were considered as defilements: some were voluntary, others involuntary; some originated with the party, others were received by him; some were inevitable, and the effect of nature itself, others arose from personal transgression. Under the Gospel, defilements are those of the heart, of the mind, the temper, and conduct. Moral uncleanness is equally as numerous, and as much prohibited; but ceremonial uncleanness is superseded, as religious rites; though many of them claim attention as usages of health, decency, and civility. Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dict.

DEGREES. Psalms of Degrees is a name given to fifteen psalms, from the 120th to the 134th inclusive. The Hebrew text calls them a song of ascents. Junius and Tremellius translate the Hebrew, a song of excellences, or an excellent song, from the excellent matter they contain. Some call them psalms of elevation, because they were sung with an exalted voice, or because at every psalm the voice was raised; but the translation of psalms of degrees has more generally obtained. Some think that they were called psalms of degrees, because they were sung upon the fifteen steps of the temple; but they are not agreed where these steps were. Some are of opinion, that they were so denominated, because sung in a gallery, which was in the court of Israel, where the Levites sometimes read the law. Calmet thinks that they were called songs of degrees, or of ascent, because they were composed on occasion of the deliverance of the Jews from the captivity of Babylon, either to implore this deliverance from God, or to return thanks for it after it had been obtained; and that the Hebrews used the term to go up, when they spoke of their journeying from Babylon to Jerusalem. Others are of opinion that these psalms were sung during the time of service, whilst the flesh, &c. were consuming on the altar, and whilst the fume and smoke ascended towards heaven; and that the title Psalms of Ascent seems to favour this supposition. Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dict.

DEISTS, those who deny the existence and necessity of any revelation, and profess to acknowledge that the being of a God is the chief article of their belief. The term Deist is derived from the Latin word Deus, God. The same persons are frequently called infidels, on account of their incredulity, or want of belief in the Christian dispensation of religion.

Dr. Hodges supposes that Deism was nearly coeval with revelation. On the declaration of God's will to Adam, and the terms of his acceptance, the founder of Deism appeared to contradict and oppose the divine precepts. In most ages of the church Deism has attended the triumphs of Christianity, either as a captive, a rebel, or an enemy. Irreligion and even atheism appeared in Italy at the revival of letters, partly from an excessive fondness for the ancient philology, and principally from the disgust which elegant and polished minds always feel at the follies of popular superstition, then at their height in the unreformed dominion of popery. In England, the modern Deism is the offspring of that luxury and impiety which succeeded the great rebellion. The first assaults on revealed religion were rude and tumultuary, like those of peasants and barbarians. Libertinism began the attack, which was supported by the aid of learning. Much erudition was employed on both sides, in the conduct of this interesting controversy with a Herbert, a Blount, a Toland, a Woolston, a Collins. While the philosopher of Malmesbury (Hobbes) attempted to reason Britons out of their faith and freedom, Shaftsbury employed the finer weapons of wit and ridicule. All in their turns have been disarmed of the power of doing mischief. It was reserved for the times in which we live, to assault Christianity with the shining and specious arms of eloquence. To the plebeian style of Chubb and Morgan, to the thorny erudition of Woolston and Collins, to the wit and ribaldry of Shaftsbury and Mandeville, have succeeded the purity and elegance of Voltaire, the cold correctness of Hume, and the impassioned delicacy of Rousseau. In this great question, Bolingbroke, like another Messala, has displayed the richness and harmony of the English language. Chesterfield, leaving the debate about principles to the metaphysic of his noble predecessor, has availed himself of equal eloquence to subvert our morals. His popular letters are a complete example of human corruption, veiling itself under the decent exterior of false virtue, false science, and accomplishments equally brilliant and deceitful. Our antagonists have been as various in their mode of assault, as in their style and erudition. The first, and still the most considerable of the writers against revelation, made their objections in form to its capital proofs, the evidence of prophecy, miracles, and doctrine; and they gave occasion to a complete defence of each. Since religion has been found impregnable in her citadel, her enemies have been content to make desultory attacks on the mere outworks, and have exchanged the open war for the more insidious and destructive way of stratagem. Not to wear out a metaphor too obvious in polemic literature, objections to revelation have been of late proposed obliquely, and where the unsuspecting reader would not think to find them. Writers of civil history (as Gibbon, &c.) have stepped out of their way, to asperse both primitive and reformed Christianity. Irreligion hath appeared in the flowery dress of fable and romance;

and, like another Circe, hath held forth her enchanted cup, to transform men into brutes. At this very time (1778), we see the archimage of infidelity (Voltaire) presenting to a dissipated public the dotages of a worn-out imagination, in every fantastic form that fiction can assume.' It may be added, that the same insidious mode of assault has been continued to this day, and that it has been so far successful, as, for a time, to unchristian France.

Dr. Clarke divides the Deists into four classes, according to the number of articles comprised in their creed: 1. Those who pretend to believe in God as Creator of the world, but deny his providence. 2. Those who admit a providence in natural things, but deny it in the moral world. 3. Those who seem to have right apprehensions respecting the being and providence of God, but deny a future state, and believe that men perish entirely at death. 4. Those who believe in the existence of a Supreme Being, together with his providence, and all the obligations of natural religion, so far only as these things are discoverable by the light of nature alone, without believing any Divine revelation. These last, Dr. Clarke observes, are the only true Deists; but as the principles of these men would naturally lead them to embrace the Christian revelation, he concludes, that there is now no consistent scheme of Deism in the world.

The objections which Deists have frequently made to revelation affect not so much the religion of Jesus Christ, delivered in the Gospel, as the abuses of Christianity. Hence reiterated accusations of unfairness, in their objections or cavils, have been brought against the generality of deistical writers; and with this palpable injustice, lord Bolingbroke, Voltaire, and Thomas Paine, stand particularly charged. To regard the superstition, the avarice, the ambition, the intolerance, of Antichristianism as Christianity itself, has been the great error on which infidelity has built its system, both at home and abroad. The only just and honourable way, either of attacking or defending our religion, is to consider it simply as it is contained in the sacred writings, and divested of all human appendages. Every true Deist must admit the possibility of a revelation, and, therefore, our dispute with them turns chiefly on the necessity and the evidences of a revelation from Heaven, both of which they deny. Dr. Kant and Dupuis, indeed, deny the possibility of it; and, therefore, they must, at the same time, deny the existence of a God. It is, perhaps, no inconsiderable argument for the necessity, if not a full evidence of the actual existence, at some time or other, of a revelation from Heaven, that a belief in it has so generally prevailed in the world, for oracles as well as sacrifices, have been found in almost all nations of the earth.

The principles of Deism admit of no Sunday or Sabbath, and of no Bible but the universe. 'The word of God,' says T. Paine, 'is the creation we behold.' The late Reverend William Jones observes, that 'Deism, so called, is a religion without Christianity; it has neither the Father, the Son, nor the Holy Ghost, into whose name Christians are baptized. It has no sacraments, no redemption, no church communion, and, consequently, no charity; for charity is the love and unity of Christians as such. Natural religion is but another name for Deism; it is the same thing in all respects.' The Bishop of Llandaff, in answer to Thomas Paine, observes, 'Deism, you say, consists in a belief of one God, and an imitation of his moral character, or the practice of what is called virtue; and in this (as far as religion is concerned) you rest all your hopes. There is nothing in Deism but what is in Christianity; but there is much in Christianity, which is not in Deism. The Christian has no doubt concerning a future state; every Deist, from Plato to Thomas Paine, is on this subject overwhelmed with doubts insuperable by human reason. The Christian has no misgivings as to the pardon of penitent sinners, through the intercession of a mediator; the Deist is harassed with apprehension lest the moral justice of God should demand, with inexorable rigour, punishment for transgression. The Christian has no doubt concerning the lawfulness and the efficacy of prayer; the Deist is disturbed on this point by abstract considerations concerning the goodness of God, which wants not to be entreated; concerning his foresight, which has no need of our information; concerning his immutability, which cannot be changed through our supplication. The Christian admits the providence of God, and the liberty of human actions; the Deist is involved in great difficulties, when he undertakes the proof of either. The Christian has assurance that the Spirit of God will help his infirmities; the Deist does not deny the possibility that God may have access to the human mind, but he has no ground to believe the fact of his either enlightening the understanding, influencing the will, or purifying the heart.'

The more distinguished advocates for Deism, on the continent, are Bayle, Voltaire, Frederick II. king of Prussia, Boindin, Helvetius, Diderot, Maupertuis, D'Argens, Raynal, Rousseau, Condorcet, D'Alembert, Mirabeau, Boulanvilliers, Duke de Choiseul, with a long list of disciples of the new philosophy.

The late constituent assembly at Paris was almost wholly formed of Atheists or Deists. Those in Great Britain are Lord Herbert, Natalis Comes, Hobbes, Toland, Mandeville, Woolston, Collins, lords Shaftsbury and Bolingbroke, Chubb, Tindal, Toulmin, Morgan, Blount, Middleton, Halsey, Hume, Gibbon, Paine, &c. The last of these was a man, who, from the lowest origin, raised himself to some distinction in the political and literary world, by his bold and impious libels against government, and against religion and the Holy Scriptures. In these writings were concentrated all the malignity, the shrewdness, and the sophistry, of his numerous predecessors; and, from their brevity, their plainness, their familiarity, their vulgar ribaldry, their bold assertions, and artful misrepresentations, they were more likely to impose on the ignorant and uninformed, and to endanger the principles of the great mass of mankind, than any other publications produced in this country. Certain it is, that having been distributed with the greatest industry through every part of the kingdom, they for a time made a strong and fatal impression on the multitude. Happily, however, they at length met with talents infinitely superior to those of their illiterate author. The learned Bishop of Llandaff's Apology for the Bible, accompanied by the blessing of God, gave a sudden and effectual check to the progress of this mischief, and afforded a striking proof of the truth of that prophecy respecting the stability of our religion, 'that the gates of hell shall never prevail against it.'

If the Celsi and Porphyrii have been thus numerous, equally numerous have been the Justins and Origens, who have defended Christianity. Among the latter may be ranked the venerable names of Grotius, Leslie, Ellis, Addison, Bentley, Tillotson, Stillingfleet, Butler, Waterland, Leland, Clarke, Sherlock, Campbell, Beattie, Bryant, Newton, Horne, Watson, and Paley. Adam's Religious World, vol. iii. p. 449, &c.; Bishop Watson's Apology for the Bible; Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. i. p. 188.

DELUGE, the flood or inundation of waters, by which God destroyed mankind and animals in the time of Noah, and in which, as St. Peter says, only eight persons were saved. The word מַבּוּל, in its primary sense, does not include the idea of a flood; it is derived from נָבַל, which, respecting plants and animals, originally signifies to be so exhausted of natural moisture and spirits, in which their life consists, as to be withered or dead. It is applied peculiarly to the Deluge, and only to that, under the idea of extinction of life; and the phrase may be translated an extinction of life by waters. It is used only in Genesis

vi. vii. ix. x.; and in Psalm xxix. 10. The Lord sitteth (sat, or did sit) upon, or at, the flood, the extinction of life at the deluge. He then sat upon the seat of judgment, executing vengeance upon that wicked generation; yea, the Lord sitteth King for ever.

The following is the calendar of this melancholy year, according to M. Basnage:

Month.

I. September. Methuselah died, aged 969 years.

II. October. Noah and his family entered the ark.

III. November 17. The fountains of the great deep broken open.

IV. December 26. The rain began, and continued forty days and forty nights.

V. January. The earth buried under the waters.

VI. February. The rain continued.

VII. March. The waters at their height till the 27th, when they began to abate.

VIII. April 17. The ark rested upon mount Ararat in Armenia.

IX. May. They waited the retiring of the waters.

X. June 1. The tops of the mountains appeared.

XI. July 11. Noah let go a raven, which did not return.

———18. He let go a dove, which returned.

———25. The dove being sent a second time, brought back an olive branch.

XII. August 2. The dove sent out a third time, and returned no more.

The year of the world 1657.

I. September 1. The dry land appeared.

II. October 27. Noah went out of the ark.

However, archbishop Usher and some others compute, that Noah and his family entered the ark on the 18th of December; that, on the 17th of May, the waters began to decrease; that, on the 21st of July, the tops of the mountains appeared; that, about the 8th of September, Noah let go the raven; and that, on the 29th of December, he and his family went out of the ark, in which they had remained, according to the antediluvian computation, a year and ten days, or, according to our present mode of computing, a full year, or three hundred and sixty-five days. Dr. Hales thinks that the Deluge commenced in the second month of the sacred year, which began about the vernal equinox; and that Noah continued in the ark from the 17th of the second month, till the 27th of the same month, in the next year.

With respect to the universality of the deluge, men have always been solicitous to account for it in a philosophical manner, and to discover whence such an amazing quantity of water could be brought, as might cover the whole earth to the height of fifteen cubits above the highest hills, to which height the waters are said to have prevailed. (Gen. vii. 20.) The immense quantity of water necessary for this purpose has induced several authors to think that the deluge was only partial. These are of opinion, that it was sufficient to deluge those countries in which there were men, especially as the world was only new, and the people not numerous, the Scriptures reckoning only eight generations from Adam to Noah. They add, that, in the language of Scripture, the whole earth means no more than all the inhabitants; and, therefore, that an overflowing of the neighbouring rivers, by a vehement rain, &c. might occasion all the phenomena of the Deluge. But how do they know that the earth was not then fully peopled? Supposing a partial deluge only, what necessity was there to build at great expense a prodigious ark? to bring into it all sorts of animals for preservation? to oblige eight persons to enter into it? Would it not have been more easy to direct these people, &c. to travel into those countries which the deluge was not to reach? If the deluge was only partial, how could the waters continue above the mountains, without spreading into the neighbouring countries? How could the ark float many months upon a mountain of water, and not slide down its declivity? That the Deluge was universal is sufficiently evident. God declared to Noah, that he was resolved to destroy by a flood of waters every thing that had breath under heaven, or life on the earth. Such was the menace, and such the execution. Moses assures us, that the waters covered the whole earth, and buried all the mountains; and that every thing that had life perished, except Noah and those with him in the ark.

The strongest objection against the universality of the Deluge is the quantity of water requisite to cover the whole earth, to the height of fifteen cubits above the mountains. Moses says (Gen. vii. 11.) that 'the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened,' as if he meant to describe a rising of waters from beneath the earth, as well as a falling of waters from above on the earth. Dr. Thomas Burnet, in his Telluris Theoria Sacra, has attempted to explain, physically, in what manner the Deluge was produced. He supposes that the earth was in its beginning round, smooth, and even throughout, without mountains or valleys; that the centre of the earth contained a great abyss of water; that the earth by sinking in many places, and by rising in others, in consequence of different shocks and of divers earthquakes, opened a passage for the internal waters, which issued impetuously from the centre where they had been enclosed, and spread over all the earth; that, in the beginning, the axis of the earth was parallel with the axis of the world, moving directly under the equator, and producing a perpetual equinox; and that in the first world there were neither seas, nor rain, nor rainbow. The objections to Dr. Burnet's system arise rather from the extremes to which he pushed his supposition, than from the general idea itself. If, instead of saying that the earth was uniformly level, he had admitted hills and valleys, though not such high mountains as at present; if he had admitted lakes or small seas, but not such oceans as at present; much might have been urged in support of his hypothesis. For it is every way credible, that the state of the globe before the Deluge was very different from what it is at present: but to show in what those differences might consist, requires, besides a lively fancy, a correct judgment, and much scientific information.

The drifting of the ark northwards, from the settlement of Noah to Mount Ararat, leads us to infer, that the main current of the waters of the deluge came from the south. This inference is strongly supported by the present appearances of the great continents of the terraqueous globe; which are such as might naturally be supposed to have arisen from tremendous disruptions of 'the fountains of the great abyss,' principally in the higher southern regions, the waters issuing northwards with inconceivable fury at first, but becoming less violent toward the end of their progress. Thus the deep indentations of the southern coasts of Asia, Africa, and America, and the bold projecting capes of the peninsula of Hindostan, of Good Hope, and of Horn, with the disruptions of Ceylon, Madagascar, and of Terra del Fuego, from the continents; the chaotic appearances of the ghauts of Hindostan, of the mountains of Abyssinia and Caffaria, and of those in the neighbourhood of the straits of Magellan; and the mountains of Northern Asia, Europe, and North America, which assume tamer aspects and more regular forms; all conspire to prove the northerly progress of the cataclysms of the Deluge from high southern regions. There are also traces of prodigious disruptions of the earth in high northern regions, as if on purpose to absorb the redundant waters from the south. In some parts, whole countries have been uplifted on one side, and half buried on the other, in vast gulphs which opened to receive them. Thus, the coasts of Norway are the most abrupt, and the highest known, on the ocean, and rise from the level of the sea to the height of from 300 to 900 toises or fathoms. From these, the general face of the country slopes till it reaches the Baltic, under whose basin part of its former surface lies deeply buried. To these facts it may be added, that all the researches of the most eminent geologists tend to prove the recent population of the world, and that its present surface is not of very ancient formation.

The universality and northerly course, in general, of the Deluge, appear to be fully established by well attested accounts of the fossil remains of foreign animals and vegetables, found in every quarter of the globe, in places and at elevations where they could not have been naturally produced. Thus, the highest eminences of the earth, as the Andes, the Alps, the Apennines, the Pyrenees, Libanus, Atlas, and Ararat, in short, all the mountains of every region under heaven, where search has been made, conspire in one uniform and universal proof that the sea was spread over their highest summits; for they are found to contain shells, skeletons of fish, and marine animals of every kind. The bones of extinct animals have been found in America, at an elevation of 7,800 feet, and in the Cordilleras, at 7,200 feet above the level of the sea. In central Asia, the evidence is still more decisive, the fossilized remains of the horse, deer, and bear species having been brought to England from the Himalaya mountains, from an elevation of more than 16,000 feet. Further, skeletons of the elephant and rhinoceros, natives of Africa and Southern Asia, have been dug up on the steppes or table-lands of Tartary and Siberia; and remains of elephants have been found in various parts of England. Most of the fossil crocodiles which have been discovered in different parts of Europe, are referred by St. Fond to the Givial or Asiatic species. The gigantic mammoth, an animal which has hitherto been supposed to belong exclusively to the antediluvian world, has been found in the most northern parts of Russia, and also in North America, and in Ireland. The fossil bones and teeth of the rhinoceros, hippopotamus, tiger, and hyæna, (animals found only in Africa and the East,) and of the bear, and numerous other animals, have been discovered in England. Trees of vast dimensions, with their roots and tops, and some also with leaves and fruit, have been discovered in the bottom of mines and marle pits, not only in regions where no trees of such kind were ever known to grow, but likewise where it is demonstrably impossible that they should grow; and this effect could be produced only by the fountains of the great deep being broken up.

Dr. Woodward was of opinion, that the whole mass of the earth being dissolved by the waters of the Deluge, a new earth was afterwards formed, composed of different beds, or layers, of terrestrial matter which had floated in this fluid; that these layers were disposed one over the other, almost according to their different gravities; and, therefore, that plants or animals, and particularly shell fish, which were not dissolved like others, remained inclosed by mineral and fossil matters, which preserved them entire, or at least have retained impressions of them. These are what we now call fossils. By this hypothesis Dr. Woodward explains the shells found in places very distant from the sea, the teeth of elephants, the bones of animals, the petrified fishes, and other things found upon the tops of mountains, &c. In his work are many very curious facts and observations relative to the Deluge. This author is ranked among the first, who, by inquiring into the actual appearances of nature, produce proofs of this great event, still remaining in sufficient abundance. He opened those memorials of evidence which have been enlarged by others; and Mr. Whitehurst, in particular, has since trodden in the same path.

That the Greeks and western nations had some knowledge of the flood, has never been denied; and the Mussulmen, Chinese, and Americans, have traditions of the Deluge. The ingenious Mr. Bryant, in his mythology, has pretty clearly proved that the Deluge, so far from being unknown to the heathen world at large, is in reality conspicuous in every one of their acts of religious worship. In India, also, Sir William Jones has discovered, that in the oldest mythological books of that country, there is such an account of the Deluge as sufficiently corresponds with that of Moses. How erroneous then is that opinion, which denied the universality of the Deluge, because of the supposed ignorance of that event in India! Asiatic Researches, vol. i. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. p. 329, &c.; Ainsworth on Psalm xxix. 10; *Watson's Theolog. DEMETRIUS, Δημήτριος, signifies belonging to Ceres. DEMETRIUS SOTER reigned in Syria twelve years, from the year of the world 3842, to the year of the world 3854. He was son of Seleucus IV. surnamed Philopater. Demetrius being a hostage at Rome when his father died, his uncle, Antiochus Epiphanes, who in the interim arrived in Syria, procured himself to be acknowledged king, and reigned eleven years; after him, his son Antiochus Eupater reigned two years. At length, Demetrius Soter regained his father's throne. He is frequently mentioned in the books of the Maccabees.

DEMETRIUS NICANOR, or NICATOR, son of Demetrius Soter, in the beginning of the war against Balas, was sent by his father into the isle of Cindus, to secure him against accidents. After the death of his father, he continued waiting for an opportunity of recovering his kingdom. At length, in the year of the world 3856, young Nicanor passed into Cilicia with troops. Soon after, Apollonius, governor of Cœle-Syria, joined him; and as Jonathan Maccabæus persisted in his alliance with Balas, Apollonius waged war against him, but with little success. (1 Macc. x. 76—89.) In the mean time Balas's affairs became still less prosperous; and Nicanor strengthened himself in Syria, till at length, by the assistance of Ptolemy Philometor, his father-in-law, he recovered the throne of his ancestors. When seated in security, he became voluptuous and contemptible. Diodotus or Tryphon expelled him, and placed on the throne Antiochus, son of Alexander Balas. Tryphon murdered Antiochus, and seized the throne himself; but he became odious to the soldiery, who eventually abandoned him.

Jonathan Maccabæus, solicited by Tryphon, abandoned the party of Demetrius, and espoused that of young Antiochus, who permitted him to attack those cities of Phœnicia and Syria which held out for Demetrius. Tryphon had a little before treacherously killed Judas Maccabæus, who was one of the most powerful supporters of Antiochus. Simon, Jonathan's brother and successor, abhorring the cruelty of this usurper, sent a crown to Demetrius Nicanor, acknowledged him king, and entreated him to exempt the Jews from tribute. This prince, banished as it were to Seleucia, in a corner of his dominions, readily consented; and in the year of the world 3861, the Jews were entirely freed from subjection to the Gentiles.

Demetrius resolved to make war against the Parthians; but he was treacherously taken, and delivered to the king of Parthia, who treated him with honour, and gave him his own daughter in marriage. Cleopatra, his first wife, whom he had left at Seleucia with his children, seeing him engaged in another marriage, offered the kingdom of Syria to Antiochus Sidetes, brother to Demetrius, if he would make her his wife. Antiochus consented, and, coming into Syria, assumed the title of king. He began his reign in the year 3865; and in an attempt to rescue his brother from the Parthians, he perished in the year 3874. Demetrius returned into Syria, and was again placed on the throne. He reigned four years after this, and was killed in the year of the world 3878. He was succeeded by his eldest son Seleucus.

DEMETRIUS, a goldsmith of Ephesus, who made niches, or little chapels, for Diana of Ephesus, which he sold to foreigners. (Acts xix. 24.) This man observing the progress of the Gospel, not in Ephesus only, but in all Asia, assembled his fellow-craftsmen, and represented that by this new doctrine, not only their trade would suffer, but the worship of the great

Diana of Ephesus was in danger of being entirely forsaken. This produced an uproar and confusion in the city. At length the town-clerk (the grammateus) addressed them, 'Ye men of Ephesus, is there any man who does not know that the city of Ephesus is the existing (or established, appointed) neokoron of the great Diana! and of the Jove descended?' Our translators render it Jove-fallen image, supplying the word image. The city of Ephesus enjoying the office of superintendent of sacra to the temple of Diana, was bound to promote its interests. The city could not, therefore, be unaffected, when this great and famous edifice was about to become contemptible through the impiety of a few hated Jews. Demetrius was a worker in silver (a chaser perhaps), who made representations, some on medals, some in alto-relievo, or other kinds of wrought or cast work, of the portico and temple (the naos) of the goddess Diana. When, therefore, there was a tumult, the grammateus, or town-clerk, harangued the people on the subject of their riot. He stated, 'that the honour of their city as neokoron, guardian of the temple and its contents, or superintendent of the sacra, was incontrovertible; that the persons in custody were neither guilty of sacrilege, nor of blaspheming the gods; that if they were guilty of any misdemeanour, they should be properly indicted for it; and that if the people were desirous of extending their measures beyond merely ensuring the honour and security of Diana, they should call a general meeting of the town, because the honour of the neokorate appertained to the whole town, and not to any individuals.' Perhaps the grammateus, town-clerk, employed an ambiguity in speaking of the goddess, or her image (διοπεριούς, it descended, or it fell.) He might wish to say, the things signified by the image of the goddess, that is, the powers of nature, descended from Jove; and taking Jove to denote the supreme deity, this would be the truth. Without doubt, however, the popular belief was, and the people would understand the speaker, that the image itself fell down from Jove. If this be the fact, it is an instance of the esoteric and exoteric doctrines, and proves that the philosophers, by expressions capable of two senses, meant to convey ideas of different principles when they spoke as philosophers, from those which they taught the people. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. cxxvii. p. 43, 44.

DEMONS, a name given by the ancients to certain spirits or genii, which, they say, appeared to men, either to render them service, or to injure them. Several of the heathen philosophers were of opinion, that there were different kinds of demons; that some of them were spiritual substances of a more noble origin than the human race, and that others had once been men. But those demons which were the more immediate objects of the established worship among the ancient nations were human spirits, such as were believed to become demons, or deities, after their departure from their bodies.

It has been generally thought, that by demons, in the Septuagint version of the Old Testament, we are to understand devils. It appears, however, that the word in that version is certainly applied to the ghosts of such dead men as the heathens deified. (Deut. xxxii. 17. Psalm cvi. 37.) Mr. Farmer observes, that 'the Greek language, in the age of the Gospel, was generally spoken in all the cultivated parts of the world, not only by the Gentiles, but by the Jews also, who were dispersed amongst them, and even by the inhabitants of Judea. It is the language in which the New Testament was written, which was designed for the use of the bulk of mankind. Demon in this language was not a new word, invented by the sacred writers, to express their own peculiar opinions, but was in daily use with all men in their age, as it had been for ages before. Now, can it be reasonably supposed, that these writers, when they adopted this word, were ignorant of its usual signification, which was that of a pagan deity, or deified man? We are certain they were not ignorant of this signification of it: for they have recorded an instance amongst the heathens, in which it could not be applied to any other than deified human spirits. (Acts xvii. 18.) To such spirits they likewise knew the word was applied in the Jewish Scriptures, I mean, in the Septuagint version of them, with which they were intimately acquainted. Nay, it is allowed, that they do themselves employ this term to describe the heathen gods, (1 Cor. x. 20, 21.) and other deified or bea-tified human spirits. (1 Tim. iv. 1.) It is no inconsiderable confirmation of all that has been offered concerning possessing demons, that the primitive Christians understood hereby human spirits, and represent this as the general opinion of the world.'

In opposition, however, to the opinions of Mr. Joseph Mede, Dr. Bekker, and Mr. Farmer, Dr. Doddridge and others think, that the demons mentioned in the New Testament were fallen angels, or evil spirits, under the direction of Satan, their prince. That these demons, however understood in profane authors, do belong to the devil's retinue, and may be his angels or under agents, over whom he is chief or prince, will appear by comparing Matt. xii. 22. 24—28. Luke x. 17, 18.; xi. 15. 18. Those who in the Gospels are said to be possessed by demons, are represented as oppressed of the devil, from their being under the power of his agents. (Acts x. 38.) Thus we may conceive of the devil and his angels, (Matt. xxv. 41.); of the dragon and his angels. (Rev. xii. 7.) He is the prince and head, and those demons are his subjects. They are often spoken of in the plural number, as being many; but Satan, or the devil, is always in the singular, as being one single spirit, and chief of the rest. Farmer's Essay on the Demoniacs of the New Testament; Doddridge's Family Expositor; Watson's Theolog. Tracts, vol. i. p. 51.

DEMONIAC, a human being whose volition and other mental faculties are overpowered and restrained, and his body possessed and actuated, by some created spiritual being of superior power. This appears to be the determinate sense of the word: but it is disputed whether any of mankind were ever in this unfortunate condition. The following are the principal arguments on each side of the question.

1. Arguments against the existence of demoniacs.—The Greeks and Romans believed in the reality of demoniacal possession. They supposed that spiritual beings sometimes entered into the sons or daughters of men, and distinguished themselves by capricious freaks, deeds of wanton mischief, or prophetic enunciations. But in the instances in which they supposed this to happen, it is evident that no such thing took place. Their accounts of the state and condition of those persons whom they believed to be possessed in this supernatural manner, plainly show that what they ascribed to the influence of demons was merely the effect of natural diseases. Among the Latins, all the words which describe demoniacs, or persons possessed by ghosts, include in them the idea of madness. Their larvati, ceriti, and lymphatici, were all madmen, persons of a disordered mind, and in the same unfortunate situation as those madmen, idiots, or melancholy persons, whom we have among ourselves. To be full of larva, or the ghosts of wicked men, was a phrase expressive of the most outrageous madness. In like manner among the Greeks, rage and frenzy were the usual attendants of inspiration and possession; and the same word denoted both the being mad, and having a demon. The highest degrees of rage and distraction are expressed by a term borrowed from evil demons. Lucian describes demoniacs as lunatic, and as staring with their eyes, foaming at the mouth, and being speechless. It appears still more evident, that all the persons spoken of in the New Testament as possessed with devils, were either mad or epileptic, and precisely in the same condition with the madmen and epileptics of modern times. Some of the Jews, offended with Christ's discourses, said, He hath a devil, and is mad: why hear ye him? The expressions he hath a devil, and is mad, were certainly used on this occasion as synonymous. With all their virulence, they would not surely ascribe to him at once two things that were inconsistent and contradictory. Those who thought more favourably of Christ, replied to the calumny of his enemies, These are not the words of him that hath a devil; meaning that they did not discover in his discourse the ravings of a madman, or of one disordered in his understanding. The Jews ascribed to demons not only raving, but also melancholy madness. Of John, who secluded himself from intercourse with the world, and was distinguished by abstinence and acts of mortification, they said, He hath a demon. The youth, whose father applied to Jesus, to cure him, was plainly epileptic; and the disorder was attended with a deprivation of the understanding, or loss of sense, and with the signs of frenzy. This appears from the language of his father: Have mercy on my son, for he is lunatic, and sore vexed with a demon: for oftentimes he falleth into the fire, and oft into the water. In the interval of his fits, the demon was supposed to depart from him. Indeed, every thing related in the New Testament concerning demoniacs, proves that they were persons affected with such natural diseases as are not uncommon among mankind in the present age. When the symptoms of the disorders cured by our Saviour and his apostles, as cases of demoniacal possession, correspond so exactly with those of diseases well known as natural at the present time, it would be absurd to impute them to a supernatural cause. It is much more consistent with common sense and sound philosophy, to suppose that our Saviour and his apostles adopted the vulgar language in speaking of those unfortunate persons, who, without any foundation, were imagined to be possessed with demons. It is customary with the sacred writers, and our Saviour himself, to speak on many subjects in the language of the vulgar, though known and admitted to have been originally grounded on a false philosophy. When, therefore, the sacred historians tell us, that one person was possessed by seven demons, and another by a legion, is it not more probable to suppose that they adopted the phraseology of the Jews, than to imagine that diseases which arise at present from natural causes, were produced in ancient times by the intervention of demons, or that evil spirits still continue to enter into mankind in all cases of madness, melancholy, or epilepsy? Besides, it is by no means a sufficient reason for receiving any doctrine as true, that it has been generally received through the world.

Error, like an epidemical disease, is communicated from one to another. In certain circumstances, too, the influence of imagination predominates, and restrains the exertions of reason. Many false opinions have extended their influence through a very wide circle, and for a long time maintained it. On all such occasions, therefore, it becomes us to inquire, not so much how generally any opinion has been received, or how long it has prevailed, as from what cause it has originated, and on what evidence it rests. In every part of the world that falls under our observation, we perceive a fixed order of causes and effects, which is not disturbed by any invisible beings; and the preservation of this order appears to be essential to the happiness of the creation. May we not hence conclude, that the human system, in particular, is governed in the same manner, and subjected to invariable laws, which God alone can control? Are we to take it for granted, that God will permit these laws to be controlled, merely for the sake of subjecting the healths, the understandings, and the lives of mankind, to the caprice and malice of evil spirits? This appears utterly repugnant to all our ideas of the equity, the goodness, and the mercy, of the gracious Parent of mankind.

2. Arguments for the existence of demoniacs.—It would appear, that, in the time of our Saviour, demoniacal possession was very common among the Jews, and also in the neighbouring nations. Many were the evil spirits that Jesus is related in the Gospels to have ejected from patients, who were brought to him as possessed and tormented by those malevolent demons. His apostles, too, and the first Christians, who were very active and successful in the propagation of Christianity, frequently exerted on similar occasions the miraculous powers with which they were endowed. The demons displayed a degree of knowledge and malevolence which sufficiently distinguished them from human beings. The language in which the demoniacs are mentioned, and the actions and sentiments ascribed to them in the New Testament, show that our Saviour and his apostles did not consider the idea of demoniacal possession merely as a vulgar error concerning the origin of a disease or diseases produced by natural causes. The more enlightened cannot always avoid the use of metaphorical expressions, which, though founded on error, yet have been so established in language by the influence of custom, that they cannot be suddenly dismissed. However, in descriptions of characters, in a narrative of facts, and in laying down systems of doctrine, we require different rules to be observed. If any person, in compliance with popular opinions, should talk seriously of the existence, dispositions, declarations, and actions, of a race of beings whom he knew to be entirely fabulous, we certainly could not praise him for his integrity; we must suppose, that he either exults in irony over the weak credulity of those around him, or that he takes advantage of their weakness, with the dishonesty and selfish views of an impostor. If he himself should pretend to any connexion with this imaginary system of beings, and should claim, in consequence of his connexion with them, particular honours from his contemporaries, whatever might be the dignity of his character in all other respects, no person would hesitate to brand him as an impostor. In this light we must regard the conduct of our Saviour and his apostles, if the idea of demoniacal possession be considered merely as a vulgar error: They talked and acted as if they believed that evil spirits had actually entered into those who were brought to them as possessed with devils, and as if those spirits had been actually expelled by their authority from the unhappy persons possessed. They also demanded that their authority and declarations should be believed, in consequence of their performing such mighty works, and thus triumphing over the powers of hell. The reality of demoniacal possession rests on the same evidence as the Gospel system in general. There is nothing unreasonable in this doctrine. It does not appear to contradict those ideas which the general appearances of nature and the series of events suggest, concerning the benevolence and wisdom of the Deity, by which he regulates the affairs of the universe. We often fancy ourselves able to comprehend things to which our understanding is wholly inadequate; we frequently persuade ourselves that the whole extent of the works of the Deity must be well known to us, and that his designs must always be such as we can understand. We are then ready, whenever any difficulty arises in considering the conduct of Providence, to model things according to our own idea, to deny that the Deity can be the author of things for which we are not able to account, and to assert that he must act on every occasion in a manner consistent with our narrow views. This is a pride of reason, which seems to have suggested the strongest objections against the reality of demoniacal possession. But the Deity may certainly connect one order of his creatures with another. We perceive mutual relations and a beautiful connexion in every part of nature within the sphere of our observation. The inferior animals are connected with mankind, and subjected to their authority, not only in instances in which it is exerted for their advantage, but even where it is tyrannically abused to their destruction. Among the evils to which mankind have been subjected, might not demoniacal possession be one? The Supreme Being may employ whatever agents he thinks proper in the execution of his purposes; he may either commission an angel or let loose a devil, as well as bend the human will, or communicate any particular impulse to matter. All that revelation makes known, all that human reason can conjecture, concerning the existence of various orders of spiritual beings, good and bad, is perfectly consistent with, and favourable to, the doctrine of demoniacal possession. It is mentioned in the New Testament in such language, and such narratives are related concerning it, that the Gospels can be regarded only as parts of an imposture, and Jesus Christ be considered as a person who took advantage of the weakness and ignorance of his contemporaries, if this doctrine be only a vulgar error. In short, it teaches nothing inconsistent with the general conduct of Providence; and the pride of reason alone, not the caution of philosophy, suggests objections against this doctrine. Farmer's Essay on the Demoniacs of the New Testament; Dr. Worthington's Impartial Inquiry into the case of the Gospel Demoniacs; Fell's Inquiry into the Heathen and the Scripture Doctrine of Demons.

DESTRUCTIONISTS, those who hold a kind of middle scheme between the system of universal restoration and that of endless misery, or who maintain that the wicked shall neither be for ever miserable, nor finally saved, but that after undergoing an awful judgment, and a condemnation proportioned to their crimes, they shall be punished with an utter extinction of being. They say, that the Scripture positively asserts this doctrine of destruction; that the nature of future punishment, which the Scripture terms death, determines the meaning of the words everlasting, eternal, for ever, &c. as denoting endless duration, because no law ever did or can inflict the punishment of death for a limited period; that the punishment cannot be corrective, because no man was ever put to death, either to convince his judgment, or to reform his conduct; that if the wicked receive a punishment apportioned to their crimes, their deliverance is not to be attributed either to the mercy of God, or the mediation of Jesus Christ, but is an act of absolute justice; and, finally, that the mediatorial kingdom of Christ will never be delivered up, since the Scripture asserts, that 'of his kingdom there shall be no end.' Those who maintain this doctrine of the destruction of the wicked, are accused of espousing the doctrine of annihilation. This, however, they deny, and allege that, 'philosophically speaking, there can be no annihilation, and that destruction is the express phrase used in the New Testament.'

Several advocates for this doctrine have been distinguished for their erudition and piety. Among these may be ranked Dr. John Taylor, of Norwich, the Rev. J. Bourn, of Birmingham, from whom they are sometimes called Bourneans, Mr. J. Nicol Scott, Dr. Price, and Mr. J. Marsom. If the doctrine of annihilation be connected with that of destruction, as many seem to think, the learned Dr. Watts may be considered, in some measure, as a destructionist; since it was his opinion that the children of ungodly parents, which die in infancy, are annihilated. Mr. Forsyth, in his Principles of Moral Science, argues against a future state of rewards and punishments, confers immortality on the elect few who have cultivated their intellectual powers in this life, and 'very charitably consigns the multitude to inevitable annihilation!' Bourn's Sermons; Dr. Edwards on the Salvation of all Men strictly examined; Adam's Religious World, vol. iii. pp. 390, 392.

DETRACTION is the impairing or lessening of another man's reputation. He who is given to detraction is always very solicitous to discover some infusion of bitterness in the most delicious sweet, some hidden defect in the most perfect quality, some latent vice in the most transcendent virtue. The detractor is always vigilant in tracing the best actions to the worst motives; he ascribes the purest waters to the foulest springs. The mind of the detractor seems to be so circumscribed as to perceive only deformity in beauty, treachery in frankness, interestedness in liberality, and hypocrisy in piety. Such is the general character of the detractor, and such the general nature of detraction.

Detraction differs from slander in this, that the latter is a wrongful imputation of some vice, the former a wilful lessening of another's virtue. The one consists in accusing our neighbour of evil, the other in undervaluing and obscuring his good deeds. Detraction is a fault not less frequent than injurious. A detractor is always disposed to view the best actions in the least favourable aspect, or that in which they seem liable to the most objections. In the best actions will be some defects, which are owing either to the imperfection of our nature, or to the invincible necessity of our circumstances. On those defects which the benevolent would not see, or would not notice, the detractor will almost exclusively fix his attention, and render them the theme of his remarks. Unlucky accidents, or fortuitous combinations, will often oblige us against our inclination, and contrary to our endeavours, to omit the most favourable opportunities of action. Such occasions will frequently furnish the detractor with the means of gratifying his malevolent disposition, by lowering the merit, and depreciating the worth, of his fellow-creatures. Good endeavours are always in our power, but we cannot command the issue of events. Yet the detractor usually speaks as if these things were subject to the arbitrary disposal of the individual; and he is always ready to suggest that the will was less than the means, the inclination less favourable than the opportunity, and that where much good has been done, more might have been performed. Almost every action has some extenuating circumstances; but while the detractor carefully conceals those circumstances which may palliate a bad action, he industriously discloses others, which can in any degree detract from the merit of a good action. The detractor is continually endeavouring to overturn the force of facts, by improbable suppositions. Though a man's conduct be distinguished by uniform integrity, yet the detractor will affect to know that the person has more virtue in appearance than in reality; and that he assumes a fictitious sanctity of character for the purpose of effecting some black design, or compassing some interested end.

When we consider the motives in which detraction originates, we shall find that most of them spring from, or centre in, malevolence. In some persons is a lust of distinction, which cannot endure an equal, and burns with a vehement desire to level the pre-eminence of every superior. In whatever degree this disposition may prevail, it is combined with a desire to eclipse the worth, or to deduct from the excellence of those above, or those on a level of ability or merit with itself. Hence, if we would eradicate every propensity to detraction, it is essentially requisite that we cultivate an humble spirit, and that, impressed with a consciousness of our own unworthiness, we learn to think and to speak of others more justly as well as more charitably. Some persons of mean talents, slender capacity, grovelling desires, or little industry, who are too timid to undertake any thing good or great, or too feeble, or too indolent, to execute it, are continually endeavouring to screen themselves from contempt, or to hide their own individual insignificance, by depreciating the worth, railing at the audacity, or ridiculing the exertions of those who have more ability, more enterprise, more intellect, and more activity, than themselves. There is no integrity, however pure, no worth, however genuine, which is not exposed to invidious obscuration, to unjust surmises, and wily misrepresentation; and designing and interested men, who abound in the wisdom of this world, well know how to convert these practices to their own advantage, and to the injury of their neighbour. If detraction be found in a greater degree, or of a more mischievous kind, in a court than in a village, it is only because in the former there is a stronger incitement to its exercise, and more ample space for its operations.
